

---

This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

Google<sup>TM</sup> books

<http://books.google.com>

His Majesty KING GEORGE III Granting
his Royal License for the Publication of this Work

KW 62 B4.

A NEW AND COMPLEAT

HISTORY and SURVEY
OF THE CITIES OF
L O N D O N
AND WESTMINSTER,
THE

Borough of Southwark, and Parts adjacent;

From the EARLIEST ACCOUNTS, to the Beginning of the YEAR 1770.

CONTAINING

- I. An Account of the original Foundation, and modern State of those Places.
- II. Their Laws, Charters, Customs, Privileges, Immunities, Government, Trade and Navigation.
- III. A Description of the several Wards, Parishes, Liberties, Precincts, Churches, Palaces, Noblemen's Houses, Hospitals, and other public Buildings.
- IV. An Account of the Curiosities of the Tower of London, the Royal Exchange, St. Paul's Cathedral, the British Museum, Westminster-Abbey, &c.
- V. A general History of the memorable Actions of the Citizens, and the Revolutions that have happened, from the Invasion of Julius Cæsar to the present Time.

---

By a SOCIETY of GENTLEMEN;
Revised, Corrected, and Improved, by
HENRY CHAMBERLAIN of Hatton-Garden, Esq;

---

*Hail chief of Cities, whose immortal Name
Stands foremost in the glorious List of Fame;
Whose Trade and Splendor roll on Thames's Tide, Unrivall'd still by all the World beside.*

---

---

L O N D O N:
Printed for J. COOKE, at SHAKESPEAR'S HEAD, No. 17, PATER-NOSTER-ROW.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE

SAMUEL TURNER, Esq;

L O R D - M A Y O R

O F T H E

C I T Y O F L O N D O N.

MY LORD,

IN the Name of the Authors, Compilers and Proprietors of this Volume, I have the Honor to inscribe to your Lordship, a Work calculated to illustrate the History, assert the Dignity, and extend the Fame of that City, over which your Lordship so worthily presides.

Where superior Merit is Conspicuous to all the World, it would be as superfluous as ridiculous to attempt a display of it.

This City, in former Times, has boasted many chief Magistrates, who have been an Honor to the Stations they have held, and to human Nature; and the Names of a BARNARD, a JANSSEN and a BECKFORD, will be honoured by the Inhabitants of this City, for Ages yet to come.

I cannot be suspected of Flattery, while I rank with these illustrious Names, that of the present LORD MAYOR of LONDON: and I must be allowed to wish, for the Honor of this City, that future Magistrates may copy such excellent Examples.

Unwilling, however, to detain your Lordship a Moment longer from the Discharge of the Duties incumbent on that High Office to which you have been called by the united Suffrages of your Fellow-Citizens, I beg leave to subscribe myself,

My Lord,

Your Lordship's most obedient,

most devoted Servant,

*Hatton-Garden,
Jan. 16, 1769.*

HENRY CHAMBERLAIN.

G E O R G E R.

GEORGE the THIRD, by the Grace of God, King of Great Britain, France and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c. To all to whom these Presents shall come, Greeting. Whereas Our Trusty and Well-beloved John Cooke, of Our City of London, Bookseller, hath, by his Petition, humbly represented unto Us, that he hath, for a long Time past, been at great Labour and Expence in collecting Books and ancient Manuscripts, and in employing divers learned and ingenious Men, to write and compile a valuable Work, entitled, "A NEW and COMPLEAT HISTORY AND SURVEY OF OUR CITIES OF LONDON AND WESTMINSTER, THE BOROUGH OF SOUTHWARK, and Parts adjacent; from the earliest Accounts to the Beginning of the Year 1770: Containing an Account of the original Foundation, ancient and modern State of those Places, their Laws, Charters, Customs, Privileges, Immunities, Government, Trade and Navigation. A Description of the several Wards, Parishes, Liberties, Precincts, Churches, Palaces, Noblemens Houses, Hospitals, and other public Buildings. An Account of the Curiousities of the Tower of London, the Royal Exchange, St. Paul's Cathedral, the British Museum, Westminster Abbey, &c. with a general History of the memorable Actions of Our Citizens, and the Revolutions that have happened, from the Invasion of Julius Cæsar to the present Time;" Which Work he most humbly apprehends will be of the utmost Use and Advantage to Our Subjects in general, and to the Inhabitants of London, Westminster and Southwark in particular, as it treats of Matters in which they are peculiarly interested. And he humbly conceives that a Work in which the Rise, Progress, Increase and present State of the largest City in the Universe are faithfully delineated; in which the many noble Actions of her Citizens are fairly recorded, and in which her superior Riches and Dignity, her amazing Commerce, and the Weight and Influence of her Power throughout every Part of the Globe are asserted and maintained; cannot fail of impressing the Minds of Our faithful Subjects the Citizens of London, Westminster, &c. with a true Sense of their own Importance, and of inspiring the rising Generation with a generous Ardor to imitate the Actions of their renowned Forefathers! Wherefore the Petitioner, desirous of reaping some Advantage from his great Toil, Labour and Expence, most humbly solicits our Royal Licence and Protection to himself, his Heirs, Executors and Assigns, for the sole Printing, Publishing and Vending the said Work for the Term of Fourteen Years, so far as may be agreeable to the Statute in that Case made and provided. We being willing to give all due Encouragement to this Undertaking, are graciously pleased to condescend to his Request; and We do therefore by these Presents, as far as may be agreeable to the Statute in that Case made and provided, grant unto him the said John Cooke, his Executors, Administrators and Assigns, Our Licence for the sole Printing and Publishing of the said Work for the Term of Fourteen Years, to be computed from the Date hereof; strictly forbidding all Our Subjects within Our Kingdoms, or Dominions, to reprint or abridge the same, either in the like, or in any Size or Manner whatsoever, or to import, buy, vend, utter or distribute any Copies thereof reprinted beyond the Seas, during the aforesaid Term of Fourteen Years, without the Consent or Approbation of the said John Cooke, his Executors, Administrators and Assigns, under their Hands and Seals first had and obtained, as they will answer the contrary at their Peril; Whereof the Commissioners and other Officers of Our Customs, the Master, Warden and Company of Stationers, are to take Notice that due Obedience may be rendered to Our Pleasure herein declared.

Given at our Court at St. James's, the Nineteenth Day of December, 1768, in the Ninth Year of Our Reign.

By his Majesty's Command,

R O C H F O R D.

The Genius of London sitting on the bank of the Thames, receiving the homage of Europe Asia Africa and America, represented by their respective Emblems.

A

COMPLEAT
HISTORY AND SURVEY
OF LONDON,
WESTMINSTER, SOUTHWARK, &c.

INTRODUCTION.

THE great dignity, antiquity, riches and splendor of the cities of London and Westminster, and the Borough of Southwark, may well demand the pen of the historian, to hand down their fame to future ages.

We accordingly find that several writers, at various periods of time, have given to the public the best accounts they were able to collect, of the state and condition of those places.

Among these, our more ancient HISTORIES and SURVEYS are written in a stile so totally unfit to afford entertainment to a modern reader, that it would be well if he could peruse them without disgust.

We wish we could say that our later historians had paid a greater attention to the purity of their stile; in which case there would have been one reason the less for the publication of this volume.

B

But

But allowing that the modern books of this kind had every advantage arising from the happiest flow of language, and the most graceful turn of period, there would yet be sufficient reason for the publication of this Work, at this particular time, when the numerous improvements in all parts of the Metropolis, give ample proofs of the wisdom, policy, and public spirit of her inhabitants.

We shall therefore, without farther apology, submit this work to the opinion of the public, at whose tribunal we are proud to be judged, conscious of deserving its ACQUITTAL, and not without hope of engaging its APPLAUSE.

CHAPTER I.

Conjectures of several writers respecting the name of London: Account of its Situation, Form, Extent, &c.

IT may not be an unpleasing task to give the opinion of various writers respecting the derivation and meaning of the name of London.

With regard to its etymology, Geffrey of Monmouth derives it from Caer-Lud, or Lud's town; Erasmus from Lindum, a city of Rhodes; Vitus is of opinion that it is derived from Lugdus, a Celtick prince; while Selden imagines that he traces its etymology in the words Llan-Dyn, the Temple of Diana.

The learned Somner derives the name of London from Llawn, full, and Dyn, a Man, that is a populous place: but Camden is of opinion that this city owes its name to the British words, Llawn, a wood; and Dinas, a town; and if this etymology be admitted, the term London will signify a town in a wood; which corresponds with the manner in which the Britons formed their towns, by building them in the midst of woods, and fencing them with the trunks and branches of trees.

But lest this derivation should not prove satisfactory, the same learned writer offers another from the British word Llbon, a Ship, and Dnas, a town or city; and agreeable to this, the term London will signify a city or harbour for ships: and indeed many learned authors have supposed that London was the ancient emporium or mart of the British trade with the Phœnicians, Greeks, and Gauls, before the time of Julius Cæsar.

Lewis, a Welsh historian, informs us that about the year 130, the Britons called this city Lundain, or Llandain, that is, the Thames-Bank-town: but this derivation is liable to great exceptions, for it is difficult to conceive how Lewis should come by an authentic account of the transactions of the year 130, when his countryman Gildas, who wrote near a thousand years before him, acknowledges that he took the materials of his history from foreign authors, the Britons, in his time, having no records of their transactions.

Tacitus calls this city by the name of Londinium, which afterwards yielding to the more honourable denomination of Augusta, some of our historians are for deriving this name from that of Helena Augusta, mother to Constantine the Great; while others, with greater appearance of reason, affirm, that the appellation of Augusta was conferred on the city by the Romans, on account of its being the principal place in their British dominions.

It is not easy to determine whether this city was known by the name of Augusta, during the whole time that the Romans remained in Britain; but it appears most probable it was not, because soon after the Saxons arrived in this kingdom, we find it mentioned by the name of London-byrig, which was after changed into Lunden-Cæster, Lunden-Wye, Lundenne, Lunden Berb, or Lunden Burg: and by various records it appears, that since the conquest it has been denominated Londonia, Lundania, Lundine, and Londres; but for several ages past it has been called London, without any variation.

This great and magnificent city, is situated in fifty-one degrees, thirty-two minutes North latitude, in the county of Middlesex, on a fine soil,

*This opinion of Selden is founded on the pretended discovery of a great number of boar's tusks, horns of oxen and stags (whose bodies were proper sacrifices to Diana) which were said to be found in the neighbourhood of St. Paul's Cathedral, on which spot it is imagined that the Temple of Diana originally stood. But Sir Christopher Wren (whose authority must be allowed to have great weight) assures us, that in digging to lay the foundation of St. Paul's, he met with no indications to support such a tradition.

He adds, "that the north side of this ground had been very anciently a great burying place was manifest; for upon digging the foundation of the present fabrick of St. Paul's, he found under the graves of the latter ages, in a row below them, the burial places of the Saxon times: The Saxons, as it appeared, were accustomed to lie their graves with chalk stones; tho' some, more eminent, were intombed in coffins of whole stones.

Below these were British graves, where were found ivory and wooden pins, of a hard wood, seemingly box, in abundance, of about six inches long; it seems the bodies were only wrapped up, and pinned in woollen shrouds, which being consumed, the pins remained entire.

In the same row, and deeper, were Roman urns intermixed; this was eighteen feet deep, or more, and belonged to the colony when Romans and Britons lived and died together."

But for further particulars on this subject, we refer to our account of St. Paul's Cathedral, which will occur in its proper place in this work.

on the Northern bank of the River Thames, at a place where it forms a crescent or half moon, so that each part of the city may enjoy the benefit of that noble river, without lying at an inconvenient distance from any other.

The cities of London and Westminster communicate with the Borough of Southwark, and the counties of Surry, Kent, &c. by means of three grand stone bridges, of which proper descriptions will be given in the course of this work.

London is situated at about sixty miles distance from the sea, and is therefore in no danger of being surprized by the fleets of foreign enemies; yet, by the help of the tide, which flows every twelve hours, ships of very great burden are brought into its very bosom.

The rising grounds about Islington, and the hills of Hampstead and Highbury, are finely placed by nature to defend the metropolis from the bleak winds of the north, while it lies delightfully open to the more genial breezes of the west.

A certain writer has compared the figure or shape of London, Westminster and Southwark, to that of a whale; which description we shall insert as a mere matter of curiosity.

"It much resembles (says our author) the shape of a great whale; Westminster being the under jaw; St. James's Park the mouth; Pall-mall, &c. northward the upper jaw; Cock and Pye fields, or the meeting of the seven streets, the eye; the rest of the city and Southwark, to East-Smithfield, the body; and thence eastward to Limehouse, the tail; and 'tis probably in as great a proportion the largest of towns, as that is of fishes."

The whole extent of London, from east to west, that is, from Limehouse to the end of Tothill-Street, Westminster, is nearly seven miles and a half; but its breadth, from north to south, is but about two miles and a half, even where it is broadest, that is from the extremity of Shore-ditch, to the farthest end of Blackman-Street in the Borough.

It has been calculated that London, upon a medium, is seven miles long, and one mile and a quarter in breadth; which make an area of near nine square miles.

The circumference of the contiguous buildings of London, Westminster and Southwark, as one city, including the great additions lately made in and about the parish of St. Mary Le Bone, is ather more (by the way of the several new made roads) than twenty three miles.

The circumference of the walls* of London is as follows: from the Thames the wall runs northward on the east side of Fleet-ditch 270 yards, to within 30 yards of the south-west angle of Ludgate-street: thence it runs near 140 yards east, till it reaches within 20 yards of Ludgate: thence the wall continues northward, (a little to the east of the Old Bailey) 330 yards, to 40 yards to the north of Newgate; then eastward 390 yards, to 55 yards eastward of Aldersgate; from whence it runs northward 240 yards, to within 30 yards of the south-west angle of the church of St. Giles, Cripplegate; from thence to Cripplegate, and so continuing eastwardly 1000 yards to Bishopsgate, and thence south-eastwardly 480 yards to Aldgate; from whence it runs still south-eastwardly, 465 yards, to within 20 yards of the middle of the north part of Tower-ditch: in the whole 3315 yards; to which adding the distance from the Tower to Fleet-ditch, which is 2170 yards, the whole circumference of the city within the walls appears to be 5485 yards, or three miles, and 205 yards. §

The whole ground within the walls of the city of London, amounts to 373 acres, and four fifths of an acre.

Without the walls, but within the liberty or freedom, there are 263 acres, and four fifths of an acre; and all the parts built on without the freedom, exceeds 2500 acres; to which if we add Westminster and Southwark, the whole will be found considerably more than 3000 acres; an astonishing track of ground to be covered with buildings closely compacted together, and inhabited, as they are in many thousand instances, by two, three, or more families in one house! ‡

In giving this early account of the present extent of this city and its environs, we have deviated from the practice of every former writer on this subject; but this we have purposely done, in order to enable the reader to form a just idea of the immense increase of this capital of the universe, which, in the remoter ages of antiquity, was nothing but a few mean and straggling huts erected in the midst of a wood; but is at present, by the co-operation of many concurring circumstances, the soul and center of COMMERCE, the seat of EMPIRE, the happy spot, sacred to CIVIL and RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.

*The alterations which have taken place in this city within a very few years past, have made some breaches in various parts of the wall, and other parts are obscured from sight by the interposition of houses; but there are still remains sufficient to assist the researches of the curious.

§ The late improvements made in the city of London, have occasioned the taking away of all the gates except Newgate, (for Temple Bar is not a City Gate) which will be also removed when the plan for building a more commodious prison for felons shall be carried into execution: But we have used the terms, Ludgate, Aldersgate, &c. as the late situation of these buildings is within the memory of almost every reader.

‡ A modern author, speaking of London, says, "This Ancient City has ingulphed one City, one Borough, and forty-two villages, viz. the city of Westminster, the borough of Southwark, and the villages of Morda, Finsbury, Wenlabarn, Clerkenwell, Islington, Hoxton, Shoreditch, Norton-falgate, the Spital, Whitechapel, Mile-End New-town, Mile-End Old-town, Stepney, Poplar, Limehouse, Ratcliff, Shadwell, Wapping, East-Smithfield, the Hermitage, St. Catharine's, the Minorities, St. Clement's, Danes, the Strand, Charing-cross, St. James's, Knightsbridge, Soho, St. Giles's in the fields, Bloomsbury, Port-pool, Saffron-hill, Holborn, Vauxhall, Lambeth, Lambeth-Marsh, Kennington, Newington-Butts, Bermondsey, the Grange, Horsleydown and Rotherhithe:"—to which number we may now fairly add Paddington, and Marybone; nor is it at all unlikely, if the modern rage of building continues, that London will become one immense line of houses from Epping Forest to Hounslow Heath; since, even at present, little more is necessary to make it so, than some houses of communication between Hounslow and Brentford, and the same between Stratford and the edge of the Forest.

CHAPTER II.

Account of the foundation of the city of London by the Romans, and of various circumstances relative thereto, till the year of Christ 368. A full and curious account of the wall of London, of the Liberties of the city without the wall, and of the several Gates.

THE antiquity of the city of London is so great, that it is impossible to give any certain account of its origin.

It is not wholly improbable, that it existed in the time of the ancient Britons, before the art of writing was known in England, and when any degree of knowledge respecting ancient facts, could only be gathered from the songs of the bards, and were preserved only by memory.

We shall therefore reject the fabulous tales of Geoffrey of Monmouth, who pretends that this city was founded by Brutus, nephew of Æneas, and called Trinovantum, or New Troy; and that, in process of time, it was surrounded with walls by king Lud, who gave it the name of Caer-Lud, or Lud's Town.

We shall likewise reject the opinions of Dr. Gale and Mr. Salmon, who have conjectured that London was anciently a Roman station erected in St. George's Fields and Lambeth Marsh, to secure their conquests on that side of the river; because those fields were then, and for several ages afterwards, laid under water by the flowing of the tides, before the embanking of the river Thames.

Setting aside, therefore, vague conjectures and idle surmises, we have nothing like what may be called a history of London, during the times preceding the invasion of this kingdom by Julius Cæsar, soon after which the conquerors began to build towns, of which we may conclude that London was one of the first that was erected.

As the vast quantity of water that overflowed the Thames may be reasonably supposed to have greatly reduced the depth of that river, it is not unreasonable to suppose but that the Romans might have a ford somewhere near the present situation of London, and that they might build that town to secure and command the ford.*

This was probably done by Ostorius Scapula, who, about the 49th year of the Christian Æra, is said to have settled several colonies for the security of the Roman allies, who, till this period, had been too much exposed to the invasions of the Britons.

But we are not to imagine that this city, in its early state, bore any great resemblance to what it is at present; but even then, or as soon after that period as the year 64, (according to Tacitus) it was famous for the number of its merchants and the greatness of its trade.

About this period, § Suetonius Paulinus, the Roman general, being employed in the conquest of the Isle of Anglesea, in North Wales, receiving intelligence of the revolt of the Britons, (who had flocked in great numbers from all parts, to join Boadicea, queen of the Iceni,) he marched to the assistance of the veterans and colonies, and arrived in London.

Suetonius finding that this city was too large to be defended by his army, abandoned it to the rage of Boadicea, who, without distinction of age or sex, put all the inhabitants to the sword, and then burnt the city.†

This being done, she marched in search of Suetonius, whom she overtook and defeated, killing about 70,000 Romans and their allies; one half of which, considering the extensive commerce of London at that time, we may reasonably conclude were inhabitants of that city.

It was not long, however, before London recovered from this dreadful catastrophe, and, in the space of a few years, increased so much in its trade, its buildings, and the number of its inhabitants, that Herodian, in his life of the emperor Severus, calls it a great and wealthy city; and about this time it obtained the name of Augusta, and was made a prefecture by the Romans, who sent annually a PREFECT from Rome, whose business it was to impose taxes, and otherwise act in a public judicial capacity.

It is very uncertain at what period of time the wall of London was first erected, some writers ascribing the honour of this work to Constantine the great, and others to his mother Helena; but a late historian‡ urges several arguments to prove that it was built by Valentinian the first, about the year 368; for at that time Britain was reduced to a very great degree of misery, by the joint attacks of the Scots, Picts, Attacots, Franks and Saxons, who defeated the Romans in several engagements, until the arrival of Theodosius the elder, who landing in Britain, divided his army into several bodies, and marching towards Lon-

* Mr. Maitland, in his history of London, says, he discovered that the greatest marshes on the south side of the river Thames, reached from Wandsworth in the west to Woolwich in the east. "Then (says he) sounding the said river, at several neap tides, from the first of these places to London-bridge, I discovered a ford, about ninety feet west of the south-west angle of Chelsea College garden; whose channel, in a right line from north-east to south-west, was no more than four feet and seven inches deep; where the day before, it blowing hard from the west, my

"waterman assured me, that the water then, was above a foot lower; and it is probable, that at such tides, before the course of the river was obstructed either by banks or bridge, it must have been considerably shallower."

§ A. D. 64.

† It is to be observed that, at this time, the Londoners were chiefly Romans, and other foreigners, settled in this new mercantile town.

‡ Maitland.

don,

don, attacked and routed several parties of the enemy, and entered the city in triumph.

It cannot be absolutely ascertained whether the wall of London originally extended along the side of the river, though it is certain it did so in the times of the Saxons: nor need we doubt the existence of this wall, because we cannot, at this distant period of time, trace its ruins; since the tide, the weather, and other concurring circumstances, might have destroyed many such walls, in the course of so many ages.

We are told by an ancient-writer * that there was a tower palatine on the east of the city, and two castles on the west; the former of which (he says) was the square white tower of London, built at the south-east angle of the city wall; and the latter were the castles of Baynard and Mountfitcher, which last was situated in Black-friars, on the spot of ground which is now covered by the king's printing-house, and the contiguous buildings.

The city wall was originally strengthened with many lofty towers, those on the land side being fifteen in number.

In the year 1707, Dr. Woodward, the learned antiquary, had an opportunity of observing the fabric and composition of this wall, by the pulling down of a part of it, near Bishopsgate, to make way for new buildings. This gentleman's account is curious, and well deserves to be transcribed: "From the foundation (says he) which lay eight feet below the present surface, quite up to the top of the oldest part, which was in all near ten feet, it was compiled alternately of layers of broad flat bricks, and rag-stones. The bricks lay in double ranges, and each brick being but one inch and three tenths in thickness, the whole layer, with the mortar, exceeded not three inches. The layers of stone were not two feet thick of our measure. It is probable they were intended for two of the Roman, their rule being somewhat shorter than ours.

"To this height the workmanship was after the Roman manner, and these were the remains of the ancient wall. In this it was very observable, that the mortar was so very firm and hard, that the stone itself as easily broke. It was thus far, from the foundation upwards, nine feet in thickness. The above broad thin bricks were all of Roman make, and of the very sort we learn from Pliny, that were in common use among the Romans. Measuring some of these (says our author) I found them seven-teen inches and six tenths in breadth.

"The old wall, on its being repaired, was carried up of the same thickness to eight or nine feet in height; or if higher, there was no more of that work now standing. All this was apparently additional, and of a make later than "the other part underneath it, which was levelled and brought to a plane for the raising of this new work upon it. The outside, or that towards the suburbs, was faced with a coarse sort of stone, not compiled with any great care or skill, nor disposed into a regular method; but on the inside there appeared more marks of workmanship and art.

"At the bottom were five layers composed of flint and free stone; though they were not so in all parts, yet in some the squares were near equal, about five inches diameter, and ranged in a quincunx order.

"Over these were a layer of brick, then of hewn free-stone, and so alternately brick and stone to the top. These bricks, of which there were four courses, were of the shape of those now in use, but much larger, being near eleven inches in breadth, and somewhat above two and a half in thickness.

"There was not one of the Roman bricks above mentioned in all this part, nor was the mortar here near so hard as in that below; but from the description may be easily collected, that this part when first made, with so various and orderly a disposition of the materials, flint, stone and brick, could not but carry a very handsome aspect.

"Whether this was done at the expence of the barons in the reign of king John; or of the citizens in the reign of king Henry III. or of king Richard II. or at what other time, I cannot take upon me to ascertain, from accounts so defective and obscure as are those which at this day remain of this affair.

"Upon the additional work now described, was raised a wall wholly of brick, only that it terminating in battlements, these were topped with copings of stone. It was two feet four inches in thickness, and somewhat above eight feet in height. The bricks of these were of the same module and size with those of the part underneath. How long they have been in use is uncertain."

There is still remaining a tower of the same construction, twenty-six feet high, situated almost opposite the end of Gravel-Lane, on the west side of Houndsditch; but it is much decayed. Within the wall of this tower there is a door, in Shoemaker-row, fronting the passage into Duke's place. †

Mr. Maitland says, that in searching for this tower, about eighty paces south-east, towards Aldgate, he discovered another of the same construction, twenty-one feet high, perfectly sound, and much more beautiful than the former; the bricks being as sound as if but newly laid, while the stones in most parts have fallen a sacrifice to time. ‡

* Fitzstephens.

† The authors of this work having made a very careful survey, find that this tower is still standing, though pretty much decayed. A dreadful fire breaking out in Houndsditch, on the evening of Christmas-day 1767, this tower resisted and stopped the progress of the flames on that side. It is at present inhabited by Mr. Solomon Jacobs, a Poulterer, the door of whose shop is the very door referred to by Maitland.

‡ This tower is situated at the top of Rose and Crown Court, in Houndsditch, and may be conveniently seen by the curious, in the Walhouse belonging to Mr. Hyam Phillips, to whom the authors of this work thus make their acknowledgements, for his obliging readiness in permitting them to gratify their curiosity. This tower is still in fine preservation; the bricks in particular being, probably, as strong as when first made; and if not destroyed, it has all the appearance of strength sufficient to last a thousand years longer.

The same writer informs us, that on the south of Aldgate, at the lower end of a street denominated the vineyard, is the basis of another Roman tower, about eight feet high, which supports a new building of three stories in height: in the wall of which is fixed a large stone, with the following inscription.

“ Glory be to God on high, who was graciously pleased in a wonderful manner to preserve the lives of all the people in this house, twelve in number, when the old wall of this bulwork fell down three stories high, and so broad, as two carts might enter a-breast, and yet without any harm to any of their persons. The Lord sanctify this his great providence unto them. Amen and Amen.

“ It was Tuesday, the 23d. of September, 1651. §

The ancient citizens of London thought the walls of so much consequence to the city, that, in order to preserve them from all incumbrances, they made an act that no house should be built nearer to them than sixteen feet.

Exclusive of the city of London within the wall, there is a large space of ground without the wall, yet within the liberty or freedom of the city; and this is encompassed by an irregular line,* by which the city is separated from the county of Middlesex.

This line begins at Temple-bar, where it abutts westward, upon the liberty of the duchy of Lancaster, which is without Temple-bar. It extends itself, by many turnings and windings, through part of Shire-lane, Bell-yard, Chancery-lane, by the liberty of the Rolls, &c. into Holborn, almost opposite Grays-Inn-lane, where there is a bar,† that is, two posts with rails, and a chain to fix across on any emergency.

From Holborn-Bars, the line continues, with various windings, by Brook-street, Furnivals-Inn, Leather-lane, Hatton-garden, Ely-house, Field-lane, and Chick-lane, to the common sewer, where it returns westward to Cow-crofs, and so to Smithfield-bars.

From thence it runs, by several windings, between Long-lane and Charter-house-lane, to Goswell-street, and up that street northward to the bars.

From the bars in Goswell-street, (where the manor of Finsbury begins) it extendeth itself, by windings, across Golden-lane, at the posts and chain there erected, to the posts and chain in White-crofs-street, and from thence to the posts and chain in Grub street.

From Grub-street it is continued through Rope-maker's-alley, to the posts and chain in the high road from Moorgate, and thence by the north side of Moorfields, abutting upon the manor of Finsbury, where it turns northward up to Norton-falgate, and there meets the bars in Bishopsgate-street, whence it runs eastward into Spital-fields, all abutting upon Norton Falgate.

From Norton-falgate it runs southward, by Spital-fields, and then south-east by Wentworth-street, to the bars in Whitechapel.

From Whitechapel-bars it winds southerly, by the Little-Minories and Goodman's-Fields; from whence it returns westward to the posts and chain in the Minories; and thence, inclining more to the west, till it comes to London-wall, where it abutts upon the tower liberty, and there it ends.

Notwithstanding the great length of this line, yet the ground that is enclosed between it and the wall, is but narrow; so that the quantity of ground thus enclosed is by no means so great as it appears to be.

The whole length of the LINE OF SEPARATION is 21,370 feet, and yet the ground comprehended between the line of the city wall, and this line of separation, is only about three hundred acres.

Having given a description of the extent of the city of London, both within and without the wall, it may now be proper to describe the several gates thereof, which have been erected at various periods of time, for the security and embellishment of the city: and as it is probable that the time is advancing when not even one of these will be permitted to remain, we have given an accurate view of them all, elegantly engraved on copper, that posterity may see with what kind of buildings our ancestors defended their metropolis.

In ancient times, the gates of this city were only four in number: that is ALDGATE on the east, ALDERSGATE, on the north, LUDGATE on the west, and the BRIDGE-GATE over the river Thames on the south: but in process of time several other gates and posterns were erected, for the convenience of bringing goods and provisions into the city, and the accommodation of the citizens in passing to their fields and gardens.

In this description of the gates, we shall begin at the south-east angle of the ancient city wall, where the old Tower of London, commonly called the White Tower is situated.

The POSTERN-GATE.

This gate was situated at the east end of Postern-row on Tower-hill; and, by a part of it which was remaining when Stow wrote his survey of London, appeared to have been a strong, handsome, arched gate; and was erected soon after the conquest, partly with Kentish stones, and partly with stones brought from Caen in Normandy.

The destruction of this gate commenced in the year 1190, when William Longchamp, bishop of Ely, and Chancellor of England, (the favourite of Richard I.) caused a part of the city wall to be broken down, to enlarge the Tower of London, which he then encompassed with a wide ditch, and an embattled wall, which is the outer wall of the tower at this time.

The Postern-gate, being thus deprived of the support of the city wall on one side, fell down in * Called the Line of Separation.

† This inscription is still perfectly legible.

† Called Holborn Bars.

Engraved for Chamberlain's History of London

Bishopsgate

Judgate

Moorgate

New-gate

Whitegate

St. Dunstons

Bishopsgate

Bridge-gate

View of the CITY GATES as they appeared before they were pulled down.

the year 1440, and was never rebuilt; but in the place of it was erected a mean building of timber, lath and loam; which is likewise decayed, and all remains of it totally removed.

In the place where this gate stood, there are now several posts set up, to prevent the passage of carts and coaches, room being left between the posts for foot passengers.

Adjoining hereto is a descent by several steps to an excellent spring of water, called the Postern spring; near to which is an iron bowl fastened by a chain, for the use of any person who chuses to drink the water, which is greatly esteemed.

A L D G A T E.

This was one of the four original gates of the city, and that through which the Roman vicinal way led to the Trajectus or ferry at Old-ford. Stow says that its name was derived from its antiquity; but this Mr. MAITLAND observes is very improbable, though he acknowledges that the Saxons might give it the epithet of Eald or Ald, from the ruinous condition in which they found it when they first possessed themselves of the city. The earliest mention we can find of it, is in a charter granted by king Edgar, about the year 967.

This gate being in a very ruinous condition, was pulled down in the year 1606, and the first stone of the late building was laid in the following year; but it was not compleated till 1609.

It is worthy of remark, that in digging the foundation, several Roman coins were discovered, resemblances of two of which Mr. Bond, one of the surveyors of the work, caused to be cut in stone, and placed one on each side of the east front, where they remained till the late demolition of the gates.

In a large square on the same side of the gate, was placed the statue of king James I. in gilt armour, with a golden lion and a chained unicorn, both couchant at his feet.

On the west side of the gate was a figure of fortune gilt, and standing on a globe, with a prosperous sail spreading over her head; under which was carved the king's arms, with the motto, Dieu et mon Droit, and a little below it, Vivat Rex: somewhat lower, on the south side, stood peace with a dove perched on one hand, and a gilded wreath in the other.

On the north side of the gate was the figure of charity, with a child at her breast, and another in her hand.

On the top of the gate was a vane supported by a gilt sphere, on each side of which stood a soldier holding a bullet in his hand, on the top of the upper battlements.

Over the arch of the gate were carved the following words;

Senatus Populusque Londinensis.
Fecit, 1609,
HUMPHREY WELD, Maior.

There were two posterns through this gate, that on the south side of which was made as late as the year 1734. There were likewise apartments over the gate, which were appropriated to the use of one of the Lord-Mayor's carvers; but had, of late years, been used as a Charity-school.

BISHOPSGATE.

This gate, which was situated 1440 feet north-west from the former, a modern writer * conjectures to have been erected by Erkenwald, bishop of London about the year 675; which he has no other authority for than the effigies of two bishops with which this gate was formerly adorned, and from which it might possibly take its name: but it is very improbable that it was erected so early, since Stow himself could find no mention made of it earlier than the year 1210, when William Blund, one of the sheriffs of London, sold to Serle Mercer and William Almaine, procurators, or wardens of London-Bridge, his land and gardens without Bishopsgate.

In the reign of king Henry III. the Anseatick company of merchants residing in this city, in consideration of several privileges granted to them, obliged themselves and their successors not only to keep this gate in repair, but to defend it whenever it should be attacked by an enemy.

But the said company not fulfilling their contract, they were presented to the judges itinerant, sitting at the tower of London, for their neglect in not keeping the said gate in repair, altho' they were made free of the city on that consideration.

Upon this presentment, Gerard Marbod, alderman of the Haunse, and the directors of the said company, agreed to pay to the mayor and citizens the sum of two hundred and ten marks, for the immediate reparation of the gate, and entered into a new covenant, by which they bound themselves and their successors to keep it in repair and defend it for the future; and by this company it was rebuilt in a beautiful manner in the year 1479.

On the south side, over the gateway, was placed a stone image of a bishop with a mitre on his head: he had a long beard, eyes sunk, an old mortified face, and was supposed to represent St. Erkenwald.

On the north side was another figure of a bishop with a smooth face, reaching out his right hand to bestow his benedictions, and holding a crozier in his left, who is thought to have been bishop William the Norman. This last was accompanied by two other figures in stone, supposed to represent king Alfred, and his son Eldred, earl of Mercia.

In the year 1551, the abovementioned company of Haunse merchants prepared stone for rebuilding the said gate; but that company being dissolved about this period, a stop was put to the work, and the old gate remained till the year 1731, when it was quite taken down, and rebuilt, at the expence of the city, but not finished till 1735.

It is remarkable that when it was almost finished, the arch of the gate fell down; but though it was a great thoroughfare, and this accident happened in the middle of the day, no person was hurt.

* Strype.

On the top over the gateway, was a carving of the city arms, supported by dragons, and on each side of the gate was a postern for the convenience of foot passengers.

The rooms in the ancient gate were appropriated to the use of one of the Lord-Mayor's carvers; but in the stead thereof he has been of late years paid twenty pounds per annum by the city.

MOORGATE.

In the year 1415, during the mayoralty of Thomas Falconer, the wall of the city was broken near Coleman-street, and a postern built which was since called Moorgate, from its vicinity to Moorfields.

In the year 1511 this postern was re-edified, dikes and bridges were made, and the ground levelled and made more commodious for the citizens to pass to their adjacent fields and gardens.

The late edifice, which was one of the most magnificent gates of the city, was erected in the year 1674, and consisted of a lofty arch, and two posterns for foot passengers.

The arch (according to a late historian*) was built higher than the common rules of proportion, for the sake of the city trained-bands marching through it with their pikes erected; a weapon which is now out of use.

Other writers, however, are of opinion that its height was intended for the better convenience of carts and waggons loaded with hay coming into the city, a design having been formed of making a hay market in Little Moorfields; but this design was never carried into execution.

The upper part of the gate was adorned with corinthian pilasters, supporting their proper entablature, and with a round pediment, in which was the city arms: and the apartments over the gate were appropriated to the use of one of the Lord-Mayor's carvers. About the year 1636, the city wall between Bishopsgate was broken down, opposite Winchester-street, and a postern gate made there for the accommodation of foot passengers; but this has been taken away, and the foot-way considerably enlarged.

In the year 1635 the posterns of Basinghall and Aldermanbury were erected; but these also have been taken away, by order of the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common council; and the several passages through London-wall to Fore-street, (which is at this time† rebuilding in an handsome manner) are now open, elegant and modious.

CRIPPLEGATE.

At the distance of one thousand and thirty-two feet to the west of Moorgate, stood Cripplegate, so named from a number of cripples, who formerly begged there.

The great antiquity of this gate cannot be doubted; for in the history of Edmund, king of the East Angles, written by Albas Floriacensis, and since that, by John Lidgate, monk of Bury, it is asserted that in the year 1010, the Danes ravaging the kingdom of the East Angles, Alwin, bishop of Helmeham, caused the body of king Edmund the martyr to be conveyed from Bury St. Edmunds, ‡ through the kingdom of the East-Saxons, and into London by the way of Cripplegate, where it is pretended that the body wrought miracles, making some of the lame walk upright, praising God.

Its antiquity likewise appears from the Charter of William the Conqueror, confirming the foundation of the College in London, called St. Martin the Great, in which are these words: "I do give and grant unto the same church, and canons serving God therein, all the lands, and the Moor without the postern, which is called Cripplegate, on either part of the postern." This gate was formerly used as a prison, to which debtors, and persons charged with trespasses, were committed, as they now are to the compters of Woodstreet and the Poultry. This appears by a writ of king Edward I. in the following words: —Rex Vic. London Salutem. Ex gravi querela B. capt. et detent. in prisona nostra de Cripplesgate pro X. l. quas coram Radulpho de Sandwico, tunc Custod. Civitatis nostre London, et I. de Blackwell Civis recognit. debet &c.

In the year 1244 this gate was rebuilt by the company of Brewers of London; and in the year 1483, Edmund Shaw, mayor of the city, bequeathed by his will 400 marks, which, with the remains of the old gate, was to build a new one; and which was accordingly performed in the year 1491.

The last account we have of any reparation of this gate, is in the year 1663, when the following inscription was placed upon it:

" This gate was repaired and beautified, and the foot-postern new made, at the charge of the city of London, the 15th year of the reign of our Sovereign Lord king Charles II. and in the Mayoralty of Sir John Robinson, Knight and Baronet, lieutenant of the Tower of London, and alderman of this ward; A. D. 1663.

This gate which was a plain solid edifice, and void of all ornament, had more of the appearance of a fortification than any other gate of the city. The rooms over it were occupied by the water-bailiff of the city; and the gate had only one postern.

Mr. Maitland has given it as his opinion that in the year 1010 this was the only gate in the north-wall of the city, as it stood more convenient for one the original gates than Aldersgate; and he thinks that this gate was originally erected over the Roman military way, which was called * Maitland.

† January, 1769.

‡ Then called Bedrsworth

the Ermine street, and led from London to Hornsey.

It is not impossible that the custom of making proclamation at the end of Woodstreet, in Cheap-side, may have arisen from the circumstance of its having been one of the old Roman military ways.

ALDERSGATE.

This gate, which was situated 1265 feet south-west of Cripplegate, was, according to the opinion of Stow, one of the original gates of the city: but Maitland observes that its antiquity is by no means implied in the meaning of the word Alder, which some derive from Aldrich, a Saxon; others from the seniors or old men by whom the gate was built; and others from the great number of Alder trees which formerly grew in that neighbourhood: and he thinks that either of these derivations is more probable, than that this name was conferred upon it on account of its age, particularly as he could find no mention of it before the conquest; whence he concludes that it was not erected before that period.

In ancient times this gate was at several times enlarged with buildings; and John Day, an eminent printer, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, who lived in this gate, built considerably on the wall of the city, towards the parish church of St. Anne.

There is a book printed by this famous typographer, with a print in the title, representing Day with a whip in his hand, in a room at the top of this gate, where his boys being in bed, and the sun shining on them, he awakens them with these words; Arise, for it is Day.

This gate being in so ruinous a condition as to be in danger of falling, the Lord-Mayor, aldermen, and common council, ordered it to be taken down, which was accordingly done in the year 1616, when it was rebuilt in a substantial manner, Mr. William Parker, merchant-taylor, having bequeathed a thousand pounds towards the expence of the new edifice.

In a large square over the arch of the gate was the figure of king James I. on horseback, in the same posture as when he made his entry through this gate, on his coming to take possession of the crown. Above his head were quartered the arms of England, Scotland and Ireland.

In a nich on the east side was the prophet Jeremiah, with the words of the 25th verse of the 17th chapter of his book; "Then shall enter into the gates of this city, kings and princes, sitting upon the throne of David, riding in chariots, and on horses, they and their princes, the men of Judah, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem; and this city shall remain for ever."

In a nich on the west side stood the prophet Samuel, with the first verse of the twelfth chapter of the first book of that prophet; "And Samuel said unto all Israel, behold, I have hearkened unto your voice, in all that you have said unto me, and have made a king over you."

On the south side was the effigies of king James I. in his royal robes, sitting in a chair of state, done in relief.

This gate was very much damaged by the great fire in 1666; but was repaired and beautified, at the expence of the city, in the year 1670, during the mayoralty of Sir Samuel Stirling, knight.

The apartments over the gate were appropriated to the use of the common crier of the city; and by the sides of the gate were two posterns for the convenience of foot passengers.

It is observed by a modern writer, that this gate was so heavy and gothic a structure, that it hardly deserved notice, unless for the sake of the bas relief of king James, which, though in an awkward and elegant taste, was a very tolerable piece of workmanship, and might challenge some share of applause.

NEWGATE.

Newgate is at this time * situated at the distance of 1037 feet south west from the spot where Aldersgate did stand; and it is the opinion of most of our antiquarians, that it obtained its name from its being first erected in the reign of Henry I. several hundred years after the four original gates of the city.

Howel dissents from this opinion, and asserts that it was only repair'd in the abovementioned reign, and that it was anciently denominated CHAMBERLAIN GATE: but if this be true, it is very extraordinary that this gate is not once mentioned before the conquest.

It appears, however, from ancient records, that it was called Newgate, and was a common jail for felons taken in the city of London, or the county of Middlesex, as early as the year 1218; and that so lately as the year 1457, Newgate, and not the Tower, was the prison for the nobility and great officers of state.

In the year 1241, the Jews of Norwich were hanged for circumcising a christian child; their house, called the Thor, was pulled down and destroyed; and Aaron the son of Abraham, a Jew, who lived in London with several more of that people, were sentenced to pay 20,000 marks† at two payments within a year, or otherwise to be kept perpetual prisoners, in Newgate, and other prisons.

In the year 1255, one John Offrem, who was committed to Newgate for having killed a prior, finding means to make his escape out of that prison, king Henry III. was so much displeased with the city of London on that account, that he sent for the mayor and sheriffs to come before him to answer for the consequence.

The mayor blamed the sheriffs, to whom the

* January 1769.

† Matthew Paris says, that this money was raised on the Jews, to defray the extraordinary charge the king had been at, in entertaining Thomas earl of Savoy, the queen's uncle, who came into England that year to make him a visit.

custody of prisoners properly belonged; whereupon he was permitted to depart, but the sheriffs remained prisoners in the Tower upwards of a month, notwithstanding the bishops officers were principally to blame; for though the sheriffs had given leave for the offender to be imprisoned in Newgate, yet they ought to have seen him kept in safety.

On the Tuesday after Palm-Sunday, in the year 1431, all the prisoners of Ludgate were conveyed to Newgate, by the sheriffs of London; and on the 13th of April, on a false complaint made by the keeper of Newgate, eighteen freemen were conducted to the compters, chained as if they had been felons: but on the sixteenth of June, Ludgate was again appointed for the reception of such freemen as should be prisoners for debt; and on the same day, the said freemen were removed thither by order of the Lord Mayor, aldermen and commons.

Mr. Robert Dow, merchant-taylor, who died in the year 1612, appointed the sexton, or Bellman of St. Sepulchre's to pronounce two solemn exhortations to the persons condemned; for which, and for ringing the passing bell, as they are carried to the place of execution, he left £1 6s. 8d. yearly for ever.

The following is the exhortation to be pronounced to the condemned prisoners in Newgate, the night before their execution.

" You prisoners that are within,
" Who for wickedness and sin,

" After many mercies shewn you, are now
" appointed to die to-morrow in the forenoon:
" give ear, and understand, that to-morrow morn" ing the greatest bell of St. Sepulchre's shall " toll for you in form and manner of a passing
" bell, as used to be tolled for those that are at
" the point of death, to the end that all godly
" people hearing that bell, and knowing it is for
" you, going to your deaths, may be stirred up
" heartily, to pray to God to bestow his grace
" and mercy upon you, whilst you live; I be" seech you, for Jesus Christ his sake, to keep
" this night in watching and prayer, for the " salvation of your own souls, while there is yet
" time and place for mercy: as knowing to mor" row you must appear before the judgment seat
" of your Creator, there to give an account of " all things done in this life, and to suffer eter" nal torments for your sins committed against " him, unless upon your hearty and unfeigned
" repentance, you find mercy, through the me" rits, death, and passion of your only mediator
" and advocate, Jesus Christ, who now sits at the " right hand of God, to make intercession for as " many of you, as penitently return to him."

On the day of execution, as the condemned criminals pass by St. Sepulchre's church, the following words were appointed to be spoken:—

" All good people, pray heartily unto God for
" these poor sinners, who are now going to their
" death, for whom this great bell doth toll."

" You that are condemned to die, repent with " lamentable tears: ask mercy of the Lord, for
" the salvation of your own souls, through the me" rits, death, and passion of Jesus Christ, who

" now sits at the right hand of God, to make in" tercession for as many of you as penitently re" turn unto him.

" Lord have mercy upon you;
" Christ have mercy upon you;
" Lord have mercy upon you;
" Christ have mercy upon you;"

But the exhortation is not pronounced to such as have been guilty of murder.

Newgate being much damaged by the fire of London in 1666, was repaired, in the manner it now appears, in the year 1672.

The west side of this gate is adorned with three ranges of tuscan pilasters, with their entablatures, and in the intercolumniations are four niches, in one of which is a figure representing Liberty, having the word Libertas inscribed on her cap; and at her feet lies a cat, in allusion to the story of Sir Richard Whittington, a benefactor to the prison, who is said to have made the first step towards his good fortune by means of a cat.

The east side of the gate is likewise adorned with a range of pilasters, and in three niches are the figures of justice, mercy, and truth.

A late writer observes, that " Newgate con" sidered as a prison, is a structure of more cost
" and beauty than was necessary; because the " sumptuousness of the outside but aggravates
" the misery of the wretches within: but as a
" gate to such a city as London, it might have " received considerable additions both of design
" and execution, and abundantly answer the cost
" in the reputation of building. The gate of a " city, erected rather for ornament than use,
" ought to be in the style of the ancient triu-
" phal arches; and it must be allowed, that " hardly any kind of building admits of more
" beauty or perfection."

If we consider Newgate as a prison, it is indeed a very shocking one. The debtor, rendered unfortunate by the vicissitudes of trade, undergoes the ignominy of being confined in the same prison with the most abandoned villains; and it happens but too frequently, that his being in Newgate is imputed, by the ignorant, to crimes which his soul abhors!

On the other hand, those confined as criminals, are, even before the laws of their country have found them guilty, pent up so close together, that the air being corrupted by their stench and nastiness, occasions a contagious disease, called the jail distemper, which has frequently destroyed great numbers of them, and even carried its contagion to the court of justice, where the trials are held.

To prevent as much as possible these dreadful effects, a ventilator has been placed on the top of Newgate to expel the foul air, and make way for the admission of such as is fresh; and during the time that the sessions are held, herbs are also strewed in the court of justice, and in the passages leading thereto, to prevent infection.

However, there are in this prison several commodious and airy apartments, for the accommodation of such as are able to pay for them: and there is also a private passage behind the houses to the hall of justice in the Old Bailey, by which the

the danger of prisoners being rescued, while going to, or returning from their trials, is totally obviated.

It is much to be wished that the plan so long talked of for building a new prison for felons may soon be carried into execution, and that a separate prison may be erected for the reception of unfortunate debtors.

The following is a list of the donations belonging to the prison of Newgate.

	Per Annum.	l.	s.	d.
By Sir Thomas Gresham from the Chamber of Lond.	10	0	0
By Sir Roger Martin, from the Mercers Comp.	2	0	0
By Alderman John Heydon, from Ditto	5	0	0
By John Mursh, from Ditto	0	10	0
By Peter Blundel, from the Haberdashers Comp.	2	0	0
By Stephen Peacock, from Ditto	1	0	0
By the Lady Ramsay, from Christ's Hospital	2	10	0
By the Lady Morrice, from the Armourers Comp.	1	10	0
By Sir John Peachy, from the Grocers Comp.	0	5	0
By Sir Thomas Kniesworth, from the Fishm. Comp.	5	0	0
By James Smith, from Ditto	0	3	4
By John Meredith, from the Skinners Comp.	1	2	0
By John Draper, from Ditto	0	13	4
By John Knorrick, from the Drapers Company	2	0	0
By Peter Blundel, from the Merchant-Tayl. Comp.	2	0	0
By William Packer, from Ditto	2	0	0
By John Wooler, from Ditto	1	0	0
By Marg. Hargrave, from the Clothworkers Comp.	0	5	0
By Mr. Garret, from the Salters Company	0	6	4
By Mr. Horne, from Ditto	0	5	0
By Mr. Rogers, from the Leatherfellers Company	1	0	0
By Mr. Ferras, from Ditto	0	6	8
By the Leatherfellers Company	0	4	0
By the Company of Parish Clerks	1	0	0
By the Barons of the Exchequer	1	6	8
By Mr. Gnobham, from a House in Smithfield	4	10	0
By the Receiver General of the Land-Tax	2	13	4
By Sir Robert Hampton	1	0	0
By Mr. Crotbam, from the Cutlers Company	0	15	0
Total per Annum	52	5	8

By Margaret Deane, from the Ironmongers Company, 17 Stones of Beef, and 5 Dozen of Bread; from St. Dunstan's Parish in the East, 20 Stones of Ditto; from the Parish of St. Andrew Undershaft, 10 Stones of Ditto; from All-hallows Parish in Lombard-Street, 17 Stones of Ditto.

LUDGATE.

At the distance of 797 feet south of Newgate, was situated Ludgate, which, according to Geoffrey of Monmouth, derived its name from king Lud, a Briton, who, according to that author, built it about sixty years before the birth of Christ.

But as Geoffrey's pretended history is now universally acknowledged to be the mere production of an inventive brain, his assertion has no weight with the judicious; for it is certain that the ancient Britons had no walled towns. This name, therefore, is with much greater appearance of probability, derived from the rivulet Flood, Flud, Vloat, Fleote or Fleet, which ran into Fleet-ditch, and was very probably called Ludgate, instead of its original name, Fludgate.

In the year 1373 this gate was constituted a prison for poor debtors, who were free of the city; and it was afterwards greatly enlarged by Sir Stephen Forster.

This gentleman had been a prisoner there, and was begging at the gate, when a rich widow passing by, asked him what sum would procure his discharge; and on his answering twenty pounds (which at that time was a considerable sum) she generously advanced the money.

His liberty being thus obtained, his kind benefactress took him into her service, in which, by his indefatigable application to business, and his obliging behaviour, he gained the affections of his mistress, and married her; after which he had such great success in trade, that he became Lord-Mayor of London, and obtained the honour of knighthood.

In the midst of his prosperity, Sir Stephen thought of the place of his confinement, and acquainting his lady with a design he had formed of enlarging the prison, she also determined to contribute to the execution of so benevolent a plan.

Hereupon they caused several of their houses near the gate to be pulled down, and in their stead erected a strong square stone building, containing the following rooms, viz. the porch, the paper-house, the watch-hall, the upper and lower lumberies, the cellar, the long ward, and the chapel; in the last of which were the following inscriptions:

" This chapel was erected and ordained for
" the divine worship and service of God, by
" the Right Honourable Sir Stephen Forster,
" Knight, some time Lord-Mayor of this ho" nourable city, and by Dame Agnes his wife,
" for the use and godly exercise of the pris-
" ners in this prison of Ludgate, Anno 1454."

Devout Soules, that passe this way;
For Stephen Forster, late Maior, heartily pray,
And Dame Agnes, his Spouse, to God consecrate;
That of pitie this house made for Londoners in Ludgate.
So that for Lodging and Water Prisoners here nought pay,
As their keepers shall all answere at dreadful doomes-day.

These venerable founders not only settled a salary for a chaplain of this prison, but ordered that all the rooms in these additional buildings should be for ever free to all unfortunate citizens, and that they, on providing their own bedding, should pay nothing at their discharge for lodging or chamber rent: but the avaricious disposition of the keepers has long since broke through this appointment, and for many years past, took rent for the rooms built for the sole use of the poor, contrary to the express order of the generous donor.

Though at the taking down of the city gates, the prisoners in Ludgate were removed to the LONDON WORKHOUSE in Bishopsgate, which is at this time called NEW LUDGATE; yet, as the domestic government of the prison is, or ought to be nearly the same as it formerly was, and as it is in itself very singular and remarkable, we will now give a compendious account of it, from a work published some years ago, by a person who had been long a prisoner there.

For the government of the prison, and the punishment of crimes and misdemeanors committed therein, the master, keeper and prisoners chose from among themselves a reader of divine service; an upper steward, called the master of the box; an under steward, seven assistants, who

by

by turns officiate daily; a running assistant; two church-wardens; a scavenger; a chamberlain; a running post; and the criers or beggars at the grates, who were generally six in number.

The reader was chosen by the master, keeper, stewards, and assistants, and not at a general election, as the other officers were. Besides reading the prayers, he was formerly obliged to ring the bell twice a day for prayers, and also for the space of a quarter of an hour before nine o'clock at night, as a warning for all strangers to depart the prison: but on account of the dignity of his office, he has been for some years past exempted from these servile employments, and others have been appointed to perform them in his stead.

The salary of the reader was two shillings and eight-pence per month; a penny of every prisoner at his entrance, if his garnish amounted to sixteen-pence; and a dish of meat out of the Lord-Mayor's basket.

All the prisoners held the upper steward, or master of the box in equal esteem with the keeper of the prison; and to him was committed the keeping of the several orders of the house, with the accounts of cash received upon legacies; the distribution of all provisions sent in by the Lord-Mayor and others; and the cash received by garnish and begging at the grates, which he used to expend weekly, in bread, candles and other necessities.

He likewise kept a list of all the prisoners, as well those that were upon the charity as those who were not; to each of whom, by the aid of the assistant for the day, he used to deliver their respective shares of bread and other provisions.

It was also his business to receive the gifts of the poulterers, fishmongers, and other market people, sent in from the clerk of the market, by the running post, for which he gave a receipt; and afterwards, in the presence of the assistant for the day, exposed all to sale to the charity men, in a fair market; and the money arising therefrom was deposited in the common stock.

This officer, with the under steward, assistants, and church-wardens were elected monthly, by the suffrages of the prisoners; but all the other officers, except the chamberlain, were appointed by the master, keeper, stewards, and assistants.

The design of these frequent elections was to prevent frauds and abuses among the respective officers; but when they were known to be persons of probity, they were commonly re-elected, and frequently held their posts for several months together.

The under steward was an assistant to the upper steward, and used to perform the functions of his office, in case of his absence or indisposition.

The seven assistants were chosen monthly, with the stewards, and one of them used to officiate daily; whose business it was to attend in the hall, to enter all charities, and keep an account of the money taken out of the boxes, which were opened at five o'clock in the afternoon, and at nine at night. This money he pays to the upper steward, at the passing of whose accounts the stewards used to officiate as auditors.

If any person was nominated to the office of an assistant, and refused to serve, it was customary to fine him a shilling, in default of paying which it was customary to put him in fetters for three days.

The officiating assistant was invested with the power of a magistrate, and could commit a prisoner to the stocks or shackles, for abusing any person. His business was to see the cellar cleared of all the prisoners every night by ten o'clock; for which he received sixpence out of the charity money; two-pence of which was for the upper steward, two-pence for the running assistant, and two-pence for himself.

In ancient times this office was held in such esteem, that the assistant, on his entering upon it, used to be ushered into the hall at eight o'clock at night, by forty or fifty of the prisoners, each carrying a large lighted candle.

It was the business of the running assistant to attend on the criers at the grates to change money; to open the boxes; put up candles in their respective places; look after the clock; ring the bell for prayers, and perform the office of crier, at the sale of provisions. His salary was four shillings and eight pence per month, and an eighth part of the garnish-money.

The church wardens were chosen from among the younger prisoners. The business of the upper church-warden was to call to prayers on Sundays, after the bell had done ringing; and that of the under church-warden was to call the prisoners to prayers all other days. They likewise took cognizance of all persons upon the charitable foundation, who in default of attendance were fined one penny each.

The salary of the under church-warden was four-pence per month; and if a person was duly elected, and refused to serve the office, he was fined four pence.

The duty of the scavenger was to keep the prison clean, and to fetter offenders, or put them in the stocks: for which he was intitled to receive one penny from each criminal, together with a salary of five shillings and eight-pence per month, and two-pence out of every sixteen-pence of the garnish-money.

The chamberlain, who was chosen by the keeper of the prison, took care of all the bedding and linen belonging to the keeper; appointed the lodgings of the new-comers; furnished the prisoners with sheets, and gave notice to strangers to leave the prison by ten o'clock at night. In former times this officer was obliged to make the beds of the charity-men, for which he was paid two-pence a month.

The business of the running post was to fetch in a basket the broken meat from the Lord-Mayor's table, provisions from the clerk of the market, from private families, and the charities given in the streets; which, when so inconsiderable as not to admit of being divided among them all, were publicly sold. The salary annexed to this office was four shillings a month, one penny out of each man's dividend, and one penny out of every sixteen-pence of garnish-money.

The criers were six in number; two of whom daily begged at the grates; the person at the grate in Ludgate-street being allowed one fourth of

of what was given, and him on the Black-friars side, one half of the money collected there.

On the Monday following every election, the accounts were audited and passed, and the balance divided; but if it amounted to three shillings and fourpence per man, the keeper of the prison, without the least colour of right, used arbitrarily to extort two shillings and four-pence from each prisoner; but if the dividend did not amount to so much, he then took only fourteen pence, the other moiety of the two shillings and four-pence being placed to the account of the prisoner, to be paid at the time of his discharge.

Another great grievance the prisoners laboured under was, their being obliged to pay the turnkey twelve shillings per month, for no other service than that of opening the door to admit gifts and charities sent to the prison, which frequently amounted to little more than what he received.

Thus far our author: but it may be proper to inform the reader that the book * from which this account was extracted, was printed many years ago; and we hope that the grievances abovementioned have already been remedied, as far as the conduct of the New Ludgate in Bishopsgate-Street will admit.

The following is an account of the fees to be taken by the keeper of Ludgate, and the turnkeys under him, allowed of, and confirmed at a court of Aldermen, held on the 19th of January, 1686.

At the coming in of every prisoner one shilling to the turnkey, and two-pence to the officer who conducts him thither.

The keeper finding and providing beds, bedding, mats and cords, sheets, blankets and coverlets, the prisoners pay him for the best lodging three-pence per night; for the second lodging two-pence, and for the third or meanest lodging one penny per night.

The keeper is to provide clean sheets every month for all his beds, and the prisoners who lie in them are to pay monthly to the chamberlain for washing them, eight-pence between them, and no more.

But when the prisoners find their own beds and bedding, which the keeper is by no means to hinder, the prisoner is only to pay three-pence per week for bed-room; or for chamber-room four-pence at the most per week; and not above two to lie in a bed.

If the prisoner by his inability can go no farther than a couch, he is to pay only one penny per week for chamber-room, and only one penny per week for lamps and candles, which the keeper is to provide.

For every prisoner's discharge the keeper is to receive two shillings and no more. For all actions and writs against him, he is to pay the keeper only one shilling, and not one shilling for every action, and two shillings and six-pence for every writ, as was formerly taken.

The keeper shall not presume to take any other fees upon any pretence, demand, or allowance whatsoever, for execution-money, action-money, or writ-money.

The reader will judge by the following account, how these orders have been of late years obeyed:

A freeman being arrested by an action entered in either of the compters, may refuse to go thither, and insist on being carried immediately to Ludgate; but the officers will extort from him four or five shillings as their fee for carrying him thither, though their due is but two-pence.

On his being brought to Ludgate, the turnkey entered his name and condition in a book kept for that purpose; for which entry the prisoner used to pay fourteen pence; after which the chamberlain furnished him with a lodging at the rate of one penny, two-pence, or three-pence per night; but demanded one shilling and six-pence for sheets; and before he went to rest, his fellow-prisoners demanded four shillings for garnish, and if he did not pay it, his cloaths were privately taken from him at night, and not returned till he had raised the money the next day. The steward likewise demanded eighteen pence of him, for coals, candles, and the use of the house.

He was, however, allowed the liberty of going abroad; which he might do either with a keeper, or on giving good security to return at night. If he went out with a keeper, he was obliged to pay two shillings and six-pence to the head turnkey, and eighteen-pence to the keeper who attended him; and every day he went abroad afterwards, one shilling to the keeper, and the same sum to the turnkey. A bond was likewise given for the payment of his lodging to the master-keeper, for which the turnkey took at least five shillings as his fee.

If the prisoner paid the debt, and discharged all other actions against him in either or both of the compters, he, on his dismissal, paid two shillings to the master-keeper; fourteen pence to the turnkey; one shilling for every action entered against him; and if he was charged in execution, two shillings and six-pence for every action against him. These fees, together with his lodging, have frequently amounted to more than the whole debt.

The following is a list of the donations belonging to this prison.

	l. s. d.
By John Kendrick, from the Company of Drapers	1 10 0
By Sir Thomas Cullum, from ditto	3 0 0
By Sir Thomas Gresham, from the Co. of Mercers	10 0 0
By Sir Roger Martin, from ditto	2 0 0
By John Heydon, Alderman, from ditto	3 0 0
By John Marsh, from ditto	0 5 0
By Stephen Peachbeck, from the Comp. of Haberd.	1 0 0
By Sir Thomas Knetsworth, from the Fishmongers	5 0 0
By James Smith, from ditto	0 3 4
By the L. Eliz. Morrice, from the C. of Armourers	1 0 0
By John Bennet, from ditto	1 0 0
By John Wooler, from the Merchant Taylors Com.	1 0 0
By William Parker, from ditto	1 10 0
By Margaret Hargrave, from the C. of Clothw.	0 5 0
By Sir John Peachy, from the Grocers Company	0 5 0
By John Merideth, from the Skinners Company	1 2 0
By John Draper, from ditto	0 13 4
By Sir William Jones, from the Salters Company	0 5 0
By Peter Blundell, from ditto	2 0 0
By Mrs. Cock, from ditto	0 2 6
By Mr. Robert Rogers, from the Leatherfellers Co.	1 0 0
By Robert Farbras, from ditto	0 6 8
	<hr/> 36 7 10

* Johnson's description of Ludgate.

		l.	s.	d.
	Brought over	36	7	10
By the Leatherfellers Company	- - -	0	4	0
By Peter Blundel , from the Company of Ironmon.	- - -	2	0	0
By W. Roper , from the Comp. of Parish-Clerks	- - -	1	0	0
By Tho. Dawson , from St. Etibelburga's Parish	- - -	0	9	0
By the Lady Mary Ramsay , from Christ's Hospital	- - -	2	10	0
By Marg. Simcots , from the Chamber of London	- - -	2	9	0
By William Middleton , from ditto	- - -	3	2	6
By Joan Sambach , by St. Bride's Parish	- - -	1	0	0
By Tho. Chapman , by St. Pancras's Parish	- - -	0	6	0
By James Hodgson , by St. Sepulchre's Parish	- - -	0	10	0
By John Jucksey , from Moreclack in Berkshire	- - -	1	0	0
By Lancelot Andrews , bishop of Winchester	- - -	5	0	0
By John Stone , out of a Tenement in Bow-Lane	- - -	2	0	0
By the Lady Margaret North ; from the King's- Head Tavern, Newgate-Street	- - -	2	12	0
Total per Annum		60	10	4

By Tho. Cottels, a Hind Quarter of Beef, and a Peck of Oat-Meal, from the Tallow-Chandlers Company.
By Margaret Dean, 19 Stones of Beef, and 5 Dozen of Bread, from the Company of Ironmongers.
There is a gift to this prison, called Nell Gwin's dole, which used to be distributed in bread among the prisoners every ninth week.

DOWGATE.

According to the opinion of Stow, DOWGATE was originally called Downgate, from the steepness of the descent from the church of St. John, Walbrook, to the river Thames; and that it was anciently a principal key for ships and vessels to load and land goods and provisions.

It was likewise called Downgate, that is, the water-gate, and that it was one of the four original gates of the city, where was anciently the Trajectus, or ferry of Watling street, one of the four great military ways.

And it is farther observed, lest it should be objected that one gate was not sufficient to afford a passage to the several sorts of merchandize exported and imported at that time, that "before the destruction of the wall on that side, one gate was sufficient for that purpose, had the commerce of London been double to what it was, as much more merchandize is carried through the western gate-way of the custom-house in one year at present, than I imagine all the trade of London in those days could amount to in twenty."

Several other gates on this side of the city are mentioned by Stow, viz. Wolfgate, Ebgate, Oytergate, Buttolphsgate, Billingsgate, &c. but these so far from having been real gates in the wall of the city, were only wharfs appropriated to the landing of merchandize, and took their names from the kind of goods there landed, or from the names of other places in their neighbourhood; for as the wharf near Dowgate took its name from that gate, so, in emulation thereof, the creators of the other wharfs, or quays, dignified theirs with the epithet of gates.

BRIDGE GATE.

Stow is of opinion that this gate, which was situated on London-bridge, took its name from that circumstance; which is so obvious a truth, that there was no necessity for making so wise a remark.

He likewise thinks it was one of the four principal gates of the city, and that it was built long before the conquest, when there was only a bridge of timber over the Thames; but being a weak pile of building, it often stood in need of repair.

In the year 1436 this gate, with the tower upon it, fell down, and being rebuilt, it was burnt in the year 1471, by some rioters mariners of Kent, headed by the bastard Fauconbridge.

On the third of April, 1266, king Henry III. granted to the keepers of this, and the other gates of London, three-pence per day each; from whence Mr. Maitland concludes that they were only his collectors, and that the toll was appropriated to the use of his majesty.

This gate being very much damaged by fire in the year 1726, it was soon afterwards taken down and rebuilt, and was finished in the year 1728, when two posterns were made, and the following inscription was placed over the arch on the south side:

"This gate was widened from eleven to eighteen feet, in the mayoralty of Edward Becher, Knt.

S. P. Q. L.

And the king's arms was placed over this inscription.

CHAPTER III.

London first erected into the see of a bishop. First building of Westminster-Abbey. London almost destroyed by fire. Parliament held in London. Most of the inhabitants of London murdered by the Danes. King Alfred besieges and takes this city, and repairs its walls, &c. The Danes defeated by the citizens of London. Bricks and stones first used in the building of houses. The Londoners, under king Athelstan, defeat the Scots army. Singular law against drunkenness made by king Edgar. Remarkable sea-fight between the English and the Danes. Great ravages committed by the Danes. King Ethelred orders the Danes to be massacred, whereupon Sweyn, king of Denmark, invades and conquers the kingdom. First coronation in London. Canute besieges London, and, on the death of king Edmund, becomes sole monarch of England. A scene of bloodshed prevented by a compromise between king Edward and Godwin, earl of Kent.

HAVING in the two former chapters given an account of the name, situation, form, extent, and foundation of the city of London: together with many circumstances relative thereto, till the 368th year of the christian Æra; and likewise a description of the wall, gates and liberties of this city; we shall now continue our history in the most regular manner, and pay the strictest regard to the most authentic records; nor will we omit a single circumstance which we apprehend may contribute to the instruction or entertainment of the reader.

A Roman historian of great credit* informs us, that when Theodosius, the elder arrived in Britain, the city of London, then called Lundinium, was said to be an ancient town, and that in future times it was denominated Augusta: but be this as it will, it did not long retain the latter name; for when the Saxons arrived in Britain, they found it bore that of Caer Llundain, which was changed, in about eight years afterwards, to Lunden-Byrig, by which name it was known when Hengist, having defeated the Britons at Crayford† in Kent, they took refuge in this city.

Great numbers of the Saxons having been converted to the christian faith, by Augustine the monk; that priest was therefore ordained archbishop of the English nation, by the express order of pope Gregory; after which Augustine ordained Mellitus, bishop of the East-Saxons; and that nation being converted by the endeavours of Mellitus,‡ Ethelbert, of Kent, caused a church to be built for him in London, which was then the capital of East-Saxony. Thus did this city become the see of a bishop.

London, was, even at this time, famous for its extensive commerce; but it does not appear to have been dignified with the title of the metropolis, the city of Canterbury rather claiming that honour, as it was the residence of king

Ethelbert, to whom all the Saxon nations south of the river Humber were vassals, and Sebert, king of the East-Saxons, his feudatory.

In the year 605, or, according to other authors, in 610, Sebert built a church or minster in the island of Thorney§ situated to the west of London, which, at the desire of Mellitus, bishop of London, was dedicated to St. Peter: but it was destroyed by the Danes in a short time after its erection.

Sebert had three sons, Sexred, Seward and Sigbert, who, during the life of their father, professed the christian religion; but after his death, which happened about the year 616, they revolted to paganism, and expelled from their dominions Mellitus, bishop of London.

So extremely defective is the civil history of the Saxon heptarchy, that London is not even mentioned therein from the year 616 to that of 764; but of its ecclesiastical history we have the following particulars.

About the year 664, the church of St. Martin, Ludgate, was founded by Cadwallo, the valiant British king, who, according to the testimony of Robert of Gloucester, was buried there in the year 677.

After the expulsion of Mellitus, the see of London remained without a bishop, till the year 653, when Sigbert, king of the East-Saxons, embracing the christian religion, Cedda, or Chad, was advanced to the bishopric of this city.

This prelate was succeeded by Wine, who having been deprived of the bishopric of Winchester, by Kerewaltho, king of the West-Saxons, sat on the episcopal chair of London till the time of his death, which was about the year 675.

After the decease of Wine, the bishopric of this city was given to Erkenwald, son of Offa, king of the East-Angles, who had been educated under Mellitus, the first bishop of London.

* Tacitus.

† Then called Creceanford.

‡ Mellitus was abbot of a monastery of monks at Rome, and sent into England by pope Gregory, to assist Augustine in the conversion of its inhabitants.

§ This part of Westminster lay waste many years, and being overgrown with thorns and bramble bushes, and almost encompassed by the Thames and Long-ditch, was called Thorney Island.

Erkenwald

Erkenwald was so distinguished by the sanctity of his life, and by several religious foundations, that after his death, which happened at Barking in Essex, the canons of St. Paul's and the monks of Chertsey disputed the possession of his body: but the inhabitants of London, espousing the side of the canons, took away the remains of the bishop, and caused them to be honourably interred in his own cathedral, the revenues of which he had augmented, and enlarged its buildings.

Erkenwald was succeeded by Walter or Waldhere, in the reign of king Sebbi, who being wearied with the cares of a crown, acquainted the bishop with his resolution to abdicate, and to assume the monastic life: he accordingly passed through the forms of a recluse, and having received the habit from Waldhere, he gave that ecclesiastic a considerable sum of money, to be applied to the purposes of charity, and continued the monastic life ever after.

The collegiate church of St. Martin's-le-Grand, within Aldersgate, is said to have been founded by Victred or Wydred, king of Kent, about the year 700: but some writers, overfond of every appearance of great antiquity, carry the date of its foundation much farther back, and ascribe it to the king Cadwallain, or to some ancient Britons, in memory of that prince: but we find no foundation for such a supposition.

In the year 764 London suffered very considerably by fire; some time after which * it was almost wholly burnt down; and the streets being very narrow, and the houses built of wood, numbers of its inhabitants perished in the flames: nor was it nearly rebuilt before many of the new houses were destroyed by a third conflagration. †

In the year 833, Egbert king of the West Saxons, Ethelwolf his son, Withlaf king of Mercia, together with most of the bishops, and other great men of the realm assembled at London, where they held a Witenagemot, or parliament, in which they deliberated on the most effectual measures to be pursued, to prevent the invasions of the piratical Danes.

Notwithstanding all their precautions, it was not long before London severely felt the effects of Danish cruelty; for arriving with a large fleet of ships on the coast of Kent, they landed, and having destroyed Rochester and Canterbury, they marched to this city, which they sacked, and with a horrid rage of barbarity, murdered most of its inhabitants.

Flushed with the success of this and several other attempts, the Danes entertained serious thoughts of making a complete conquest of the whole island.

With this view they shipped a large army on board a fleet of three hundred and fifty sail, which arriving in the Thames, the troops were landed near London, which they soon reduced and plundered; and thinking it a proper fortress, from which to make incursions at their pleasure into the kingdom of the West Saxons, they placed a large garrison therein, and, notwithstanding the most solemn oaths to, and treaties with king Alfred, they made perpetual inroads among the neighbouring states, which they robbed and harassed with the most unrelenting rage of diabolical fury.

Alfred, resolved to punish these sons of violence, these infractors of the most solemn treaties, repaired all his old fortresses, erected new ones, and laying siege to London, attacked that city with so much bravery, that the Danes were glad to capitulate, after a very faint resistance.

As soon as Alfred had thus possessed himself of London, he began to rebuild its walls, towers, and gates, which had been almost destroyed by the Danes; and having driven out the Danish inhabitants who had settled there, he bestowed the government of the city on Ethelred, duke of Mercia, who had married his daughter Ethelfleda.

It appears to be evident that Ethelred was vested with powers superior to those of an ordinary governor; and it is probable that he held this city in fee, because, on his decease, Ethelfleda delivered it up to her brother, which, if her husband had been only an ordinary governor, she need not have done, since it would of course have fallen to her brother Edward, as being right heir to Alfred his father.

The ambition of conquering this kingdom still predominating in the breasts of the Danes, they were perpetually hovering over the coast of England, and at length, under the conduct of their general Hæsten, they landed in considerable numbers, on the coast of Essex, a little below Tilbury; and having erected a fort or castle at Beamsfleote, ‡ they made perpetual excursions thence into the adjacent country, committing great depredations wherever they went.

Hereupon Alfred dispatched Ethelred the governor of London, with a number of regular troops, which being joined by a large body of the citizens, they drove the ravaging Danes back to the castle, to which they laid siege, and took both the castle and a very rich booty, at the same time making prisoners of the wife and sons of the Danish general Hæsten, whom they conducted to London.

On this occasion the citizens distinguished themselves in such a manner, as evinced at once their great courage and loyalty.

On the approach of winter, another body of Danes, who had waited the success of their countrymen at the Island of Mærifige, § thought it prudent to retire with their fleet to a place of greater security; whereupon they sailed up the river Thames, and entering Lea river, at the place now called Bow creek, and passing up the river in their small vessels to the distance of

* A. D. 798.

† This is related on the authority of Simon Dunelmensis.

‡ New Southbenfleet, near the Isle of Canvey,

§ Now called Mearfy, a small Island at the mouth of the river Coln, or Colchester river.

twenty miles or upwards, erected a fortification at or near Ware in Hertfordshire.*

Thus situated, they gave no small uneasiness to the Londoners, who, in conjunction with the king's forces, with the brave Alfred at their head, marched against them, and attacked them with the greatest resolution; but in this attack Alfred had four of his chief officers killed, and was repulsed with considerable loss.

Alfred now gave a great proof of good generalship; for apprehending he should run too great a risk by renewing the attack, he disposed his army in such a manner as to cut off all supplies of provision to the enemy by land, and diverting the current of the river Lea into three channels, the water became insufficient to admit the return of their fleet to the Thames.

The navigation being thus cut off, and no provisions to be obtained, the Danes were obliged to break up their camp, and to leave their ships behind them: upon which the Londoners instantly demolished their works, restored the navigation of the river Lea, destroyed some of their ships, and conveyed the rest down the river to London.†

In the reign of king Alfred almost all the houses in London were built of wood; but that monarch beginning to build his palaces with stone and brick, his example was followed by the nobility, and many of the wealthy citizens; but it was some centuries afterwards before this practice became general.

Alfred was succeeded by his son Edward, who was troubled with the invasions of the Danes during the whole of his reign, though his successes against them in the field were far from being unfrequent or inconsiderable.

In the year 925, during the reign of Athelstan, who succeeded Edward, there was a great convention of the church and state at London, wherein many important regulations, for the good government of the kingdom, were resolved upon.

Constantine, king of Scotland, having invaded Northumberland in the year 938, Athelstan marched against him with a powerful army, and coming up with him at Brunanburgh, a terrible battle ensued; which continued from morning till night, when Constantine being slain, victory declared in favour of the English.

To the intrepid valour of the Londoners, this great conquest was chiefly owing; for their behaviour was valiant without description: nor was the king unmindful to reward their merit; for, by a law made soon afterwards respecting the coinage of money, the city of London was allowed eight coiners; whereas no other city or town in the kingdom, except Canterbury, had near that number.

The palace of king Athelstan (or Adelstan) was situated in Adle-street, near Aldermanbury, which, from his residing there, is called King-Adle-street, in some of our ancient records. The church of St. Alban, in Wood-street, was founded by this monarch.

In the year 940, King Edmund succeeded his brother Athelstan; and in the year 945 he held a Witenagemote, or parliament, in London; wherein divers good laws were passed, and among the rest one respecting marriage, in which it was ordained, 1. "That after a woman and her friends have given their consent to marry, the bridegroom is not only to make a solemn promise of the performance of articles, but likewise to declare his entering into an engagement, according to the tenor of the gospel. 2. That then the maintenance of the bride is to be adjusted, and the bridegroom and his friends are to give security upon this head. 3. That after this, the bridegroom shall make a declaration of his wife's dowry, and mention the particulars in which it is to consist. 4. That if she should happen to survive her husband, she shall be allowed the moiety of his goods and estate: and in case of their having no issue, that she shall enjoy the whole fortune till her second marriage: and that securities shall be given for the performance of the foregoing articles, by the man and his friends." And it was further ordained, "5. That when the conditions were agreed between the parties, the woman's relations shall engage for her virtue and good behaviour, and take security for the solemnity of the marriage. 6. That if the husband should remove her out of the jurisdiction of the thane or baron, where she was brought up, he was to enter into articles, that nobody should injure her. And on the other side, that in case she should do her husband any considerable damage, her friends were obliged to make him satisfaction."

Edmund, who was murdered in the year 946, left two sons, minors, who, by the intrigues of Dunstan, usually called St. Dunstan, confessor to their uncle Edred, were set aside from the throne in favour of that prince: but on the death of Edred, in the year 955, Edwy, the eldest son of Edmund, was advanced to the throne.

Edwy departing this life in the year 959, was succeeded by his brother Edgar, during whose reign great numbers of foreigners, attracted by the report of the king's great abilities and wise administration, resorted to London, bringing with them many vices and ill habits, and particularly that of drunkenness, which at length became so excessive, that Edgar made a law to restrain that vice, in which it was ordained that within every drinking cup there should be pins fixed at certain distances, and if any person presumed to drink beyond the mark, he should be liable to pay a penalty.

In the year 961, land sold for no more than one shilling an acre. In the same year, a dreadful malignant fever raged in the city of London, destroying great numbers of its inhabitants: and St. Paul's cathedral was destroyed by fire.

* Some writers are of opinion, that this camp or fortification was at Hertford.

† Part of the remains of these vessels, as planks, nail,

&c. were discovered a few years ago, on the erecting the present bridge at Swanfleet.

There were at this time but few houses within the walls of London, and those were scattered about in a very irregular manner: the greater number of buildings being to the west of Ludgate.

In the year 992, the Danes returned again to the coast of England; upon which king Ethelred, to hinder their landing, fitted out a very large fleet in the port of London, the command of which he gave to the Ealdermen Thorod and Ealfrick, and to two bishops.

The English fleet coming up with that of the Danes, the traitor Ealfrick, on the evening of the intended engagement, deserted with his ship to the enemy: but as soon as this was known, a signal was made to pursue, and the English coming up with the rear of the Danes, took one of their ships; and a squadron of the Londoners falling in with one of the enemy's squadrons, a desperate engagement ensued, in which several thousands lost their lives, and the treacherous Ealfrick narrowly escaped being taken.

In the year 994, Anlaf and Sweyn, kings of Norway and Denmark, attacked London with a fleet of ninety-four ships; but the valiant citizens gave them so warm a reception, that they were glad to raise the siege: but full of revenge for the loss they had sustained, they committed the most dreadful outrages in Middlesex, Essex, Suffex, Kent and Hampshire, murdering all that fell in their way, and burning their habitations to the ground.

It may be matter of curiosity to take notice of the price of provisions in the year 1000, when the price of an ox was only two shillings and sixpence, that of a cow two shillings, of a sheep one shilling, and of a swine eight pence.

The Danes, in the year 1009, having made an incursion as far as Oxford, burnt that city, and in their return therefrom committed the most shocking devastations on each side of the river Thames: but being informed that an army of the Londoners was marching to attack them, those on the north side of the Thames crossed over at Staines, and both parties being united, they hastened through the county of Surry to their ships on the coast of Kent; and having refitted their vessels, they wintered in the Thames, and made frequent attacks on the city of London, but they were constantly repulsed by the valour and military skill of the citizens.

In the year 1011 the inhabitants of this kingdom were plunged into the utmost distress: for all the countries about London being reduced by the Danes, king Ethelred had no place of importance in his possession but this city and Canterbury.

In this deplorable situation, he shut himself up in London, to which place he summoned a national assembly, to ask their advice in the present exigency.

If the authority of the Saxon annals may be relied on, the council determined to give the Danes eight thousand pounds to leave the kingdom; but other writers inform us, that the sum given was forty-eight thousand pounds; and indeed this seems to have been the real purchase of the Danes' absence, because in a former instance, even when less success had attended their arms, they had been presented with thirty-six thousand pounds, as the conditions of their relinquishing their conquests.

According to the value of money at that time, this must have been a very dear purchase; but dear as this peace had been bought, it was of no long continuance; for Ethelred, with a barbarity that does him infinite discredit, and a want of policy that renders him contemptible, ordered all the Danes in England to be massacred, without distinction of age, sex, or rank in life.

Among those who fell a sacrifice to this ill-judged piece of cruelty, was the princess Gunhild, sister to Sweyn king of Denmark, and her husband Pallingus, who had become hostages for the preservation of the peace so lately concluded.

This behaviour of Ethelred could not fail to engage the resentment of Sweyn, who in the year 1013 entered the river Humber with a numerous fleet of ships, and vowing vengeance and destruction, on the murderer of his countrymen, the people were terrified into a submission, and the countries near the place of his landing surrendered to him without opposition.

Sweyn taking his rout to the south, received the submission of the inhabitants of Oxford and Winchester, from which last place he marched to London, which he summoned to surrender: but the citizens were so animated by the presence of their king, that they refused all terms of submission, and boldly sallying forth on the enemy, he was soon compelled to raise the siege.

Sweyn, thus disappointed in his attempt upon the metropolis, marched into the western parts of the kingdom, where all places, as he advanced, submitted to his power.

All the kingdom having submitted, except London, Sweyn prepared to make a fresh attack on that city: but whilst he was making the necessary preparations for this enterprize, he was informed that Ethelred had withdrawn himself from the capital: and the citizens, being deserted by their king, prudently submitted to the conqueror; upon which Sweyn became king of England by conquest, and was proclaimed in London.

Ethelred had retired to Normandy; but upon the death of Sweyn which happened only a few months after his elevation to the throne, the nobility of England, and the citizens of London sent commissioners to their former sovereign, who returned to England and reassumed the reigns of government; which however he held but a short time; for dying in the year 1016, he was interred in the chancel of the old cathedral church of St. Paul.

On the demise of Ethelred, the citizens of London proclaimed his eldest son Edmund Ironside; who was crowned king * by the archbishop of York, by the general consent of the nobility and citizens.

Though the young king appeared altogether worthy of the crown to which he was raised, yet

* This is the first mention of a coronation performed in the city of London.

many of the nobility, and almost all the clergy, deserted his cause, and declaring in favour of Cnut, or Canute,† not only proclaimed that prince king of England at Southampton,‡ but publicly abjured the whole race of Ethelred.

The citizens of London, however, remaining steady in their loyalty to the line of Ethelred, Canute, incensed at this proof of their attachment, fitted out a powerful fleet, to reduce the city: but on his arrival, he found he could not pass London-bridge, which the citizens, apprehending he would make such an attempt, had strongly fortified.

Hereupon Canute determined to besiege the city by water as well as by land; in order to which he caused a cut or canal§ to be made thro' the marshes on the south side of the Thames, of a depth and breadth sufficient to convey his ships to the west of London-bridge, that he might prevent all supplies from entering the city, either by land or water.

The canal being finished, and the ships conveyed to the west side of the bridge, Canute immediately assaulted the city with great fury: but the citizens made so gallant a resistance, that Canute withdrew his army, leaving his ships, which formed a kind of blockade.

Canute retiring to the west, Edmund, at the head of his army, pursued him, and met with so much success in several battles, that Canute was obliged to relinquish all thoughts of conquering London, and gave orders for his ships to sail from the Thames.

After various trials for the superiority, a peace was at length concluded between Edmund and Canute, by which the kingdom was divided between them, and London becoming a part of Canute's territories, he ordered his fleet into the Thames, and took up his winter quarters in this city.

The death of Edmund, which happened soon after the making this peace, put Canute into possession of the whole kingdom; for that prince, summoning a parliament to meet at London, they swore allegiance to him, and renounced and abjured the sons of Edmund.

Having thus obtained possession of the throne, Canute determined on a refined stroke of policy, by sending back his fleet to Denmark, and disbanding his army, with a view to convince his subjects that his sole reliance was on their affections.

The parliament, then assembled at London, were so pleased with this instance of his majesty's confidence, that they granted him eighty-three thousand pounds,|| for the purpose of carrying this design into execution.

Of this sum, which was an immense one at that time, seventy-two thousand pounds were raised in the various parts of England, exclusive of London, and eleven thousand in this city;

† Son of Sweyn, the late king of Denmark.

‡ Some writers say at Winchester.

§ Some authors are of opinion, that the outflux of this canal was a little below Rotherhithe, and its influx at the lower end of Chelsea reach; while others, with greater probability, suppose, from the great time and labour requisite to finish so large a work, that the cut commenced at Dock-head, and by a much smaller winding, made its ina sufficient proof what a great proportion it then possessed of the whole national riches!

Canute dying in the year 1036, a Witenagemote, or convention of wise men, was held at Oxford, where earl Leofric, and most of the thanes on the north of the river Thames, together with the magistrates of London, made choice of Harold for their sovereign; who immediately taking possession of the whole kingdom, chose the city of London for the place of his residence.

On the death of Harold, in the year 1039, commissioners were sent from the nobility and citizens of London, to his brother Hardicanute, who was then at Bruges in Flanders, inviting him to come to England and accept the crown.

Hardicanute accepted the invitation; but was no sooner in possession of the throne, than he dispatched proper persons to dig up the body of his brother Harold, who was buried at Westminster, and cutting off his head, to throw both head and body into the Thames.

By this act of inhumanity; and Hardicanute's extreme partiality to the Danes, the English were so disgusted with their sovereign, that they resolved on a restoration of the Saxon line whenever his death should give them an opportunity.

Accordingly, on the death of Hardicanute, which happened in the year 1041, prince Edward, surnamed the Confessor, was recalled from Normandy, and chosen king of England, in the city of London, by the general voice of the whole nation.

Not long after Edward's elevation to the throne, so dreadful a famine happened to this kingdom, that wheat was sold at five shillings the quarter; * a prodigious price at that time.

A great council being held in the city of London, in the sixth year of the reign of king Edward, it was therein resolved to send out nine ships of war, to protect the coasts of England against the piratical attacks of the Danes; as five other ships were to remain in port as guard-ships.

The court of Edward was crowded with his Norman friends and dependants, who having, by many vile insinuations, exasperated the sovereign against Godwin, earl of Kent, that nobleman was summoned to answer the charge against him, before a great council assembled in London; to enquire into the truth of the allegations: but Godwin, assured that no endeavours, however unjustifiable, would be left untried, to accomplish his destruction, refused to appear, unless pledges were given for his safe conduct: this, however, being denied, a proclamation was issued to banish him the kingdom.

Godwin, resolved at all events to provide for his own security, having engaged many of the principal citizens to espouse his cause, soon raised a considerable army, and fitted out a powerful fleet, with which he sailed as high as London-bridge, and meeting with no opposition from the flux close above London-bridge, at St. Saviour's Dock:—for our part, we cannot hesitate to adopt the latter opinion.

|| By a careful comparison of the prices of land and provisions in those days, with the prices they now bear, this sum could be very little, if any thing, inferior to a grant of ten millions of our present currency.

* In the year 1043.

Londoners, he passed through the arches on the Southwark side, with an intention of attacking the royal navy, which consisted of about fifty vessels then lying off Westminster.*

In the interim, Godwin's army having arrived in Southwark, was drawn up on the south bank of the Thames where they made a very formidable appearance.

The king was preparing to give battle to Godwin, and all seemed ripe for bloodshed, when many of the nobility, anxious to prevent a needless effusion of blood, proposed a compromise between the king and the earl, by which the latter was restored to all his estates and honours, and the former engaged to dismiss all strangers from places of trust or profit in church or state.

CHAPTER IV.

London submits to William duke of Normandy, who grants two charters to the citizens. A translation of those charters. The building of the white square Tower of London. Account of a dreadful burricane, and fires in this city, with other remarkable events. King Henry I. grants a charter. The Londoners declare for king Stephen. Queen Maud divests the city of its privileges. London submits to that queen. London again declares for king Stephen. The great wickedness of many of the citizens.

ON the death of Edward the confessor, which happened in the month of January 1066, Harold, son of earl Godwin, seized the crown; but he had to maintain the possession by force of arms, against William duke of Normandy, who laid claim to the throne in consequence of the last will of the late king, and Sweyn king of Denmark, whose claim was founded on his right of succession from Canute.

The Danes backed the pretensions of their monarch, by sending a fleet and army into the river Humber, which laid siege to the city of York; but being entirely routed by Harold, they were obliged to return to Denmark, after having sustained considerable loss.

Harold now turned his arms against the duke of Normandy, with whom he had a most bloody battle near Hastings in Suffolk, in which Harold himself was slain by an arrow shot through his left eye into the brain, and almost his whole army was cut in pieces.

Hereupon Edwin and Morchar, earls of Northumberland and Mercia, who arrived safe in London from the field of battle, proposed to the citizens to place the crown upon the head of Edgar Atheling, as the most effectual method to save the kingdom from falling a prey to the victorious Norman, and to extricate themselves from their present distresses.

The public was greatly divided in its opinion how to act in so critical a conjuncture; some being for an immediate submission to the conqueror, and others for taking the advice of Morchar and Edwin: but at length the latter party prevailing, a majority of the nobility and citizens declared for Edgar, and determined on defending the city against the duke of Normandy.

William, however, having authentic information of their proceedings, had marched to prevent their carrying their designs into execution, and was actually arrived in Southwark, when the Londoners sallied out upon him, and fought so resolutely, that though they were repulsed by five hundred of the Norman horse, yet William was convinced that they would not be easily frightened into a submission.

Thinking, therefore, that the winter season, which was now advanced, was an improper time to lay siege to a place of so much importance, he laid Southwark in ashes, and marched to reduce the western counties, having first prevailed on the clergy to espouse his cause, and endeavour to engage the people in his interest.

Such was the influence of the clergy, that, according to a celebrated historian,† they prevailed on the citizens to make an abject submission to the conqueror.

As soon as this defection of the citizens was known to Edwin and Morchar, those noblemen consulted their own safety by retiring into the north of England; while the successful William began his march towards this city, into which he was received by the magistrates and principal citizens, who delivered to him the keys of the city gates, acknowledged him their sovereign, and in conjunction with the nobility and gentry entreated his acceptance of the crown.

The example of the capital was followed by the rest of the kingdom, so that in a short time William was in peaceable possession of the throne.

Preparations were now made for the coronation of the new king, which was solemnized in Westminster-abbey, on Christmas-day, in the year 1066, by Aldred, archbishop of York.

William, doubtful of the attachment of a people who had so tamely submitted to his dominion, in prejudice to the right heir, gave orders for the building of a strong fortress in London, in order to preserve, by the appearance of determined authority, what he had obtained by the

* It is evident that the ships of war must at this time have been very small, as they could pass through the arches of London-Bridge.

† Rapin.

Engraved for Chamberlain's History of London.

Bishops and Citizens Swearing Fealty to
WILLIAM the CONQUEROR.

success of his arms, and the fears of his adversaries.

The conqueror having made his public entry into London, and settled the mode of his government, made a visit to his Norman dominions; and on his return, in the year following, was received in London by a solemn procession, and with every external token of acclamation and joy.

William, resolving to conciliate the affections of his new subjects rather by acts of favour than those of severity, granted a charter to the citizens of London in the Saxon tongue; which, as the French language began then universally to prevail, was considered as an obligation of the highest kind.

This charter, of which the following is a faithful translation, is carefully preserved in the archives of this city.

The first CHARTER of WILLIAM the conqueror. ***

" WILLIAM the king salutes WILLIAM the bishop, and GODFREY the portreve, and all the Burgeffes within London, both French and English. And I declare that I grant you to be all law-worthy, as you were in the days of king Edward; and I grant that every child shall be his father's heir, after his father's days: and I will not suffer any person to do you wrong. God keep you." †

There is preserved in the same box with the above recited charter, a second, which was also granted by king William the conqueror, to the citizens of London; and this, as well as the former, is written in their own language. This second charter is very fairly written on a slip of parchment, of the length of six inches and a half, and the breadth of three quarters of an inch; ‡ the writing is quite legible, and in English runs thus:

* This charter is very fairly written in the Saxon character, on a slip of parchment of the length of six inches, and breadth of one, and consists of four lines and a quarter.

The seal of the charter is of white wax, but being broken into several pieces, they are sewed up and carefully preserved in an orange-colour'd silken bag. On one side is the conqueror on horseback; and, on the reverse, he is sitting in a chair of state:—the rim of the seal being almost gone, the only letters remaining are M. WILL.

† The following are the remarks of a learned and judicious antiquary on this charter. " 1. The burgeffes were declared all to be law-worthy. 2. That their children should be their heirs. Now there were two ways of being law-worthy, or having the benefit of the law. By the state and condition of mens persons; so almost all freemen had the free benefit of the law; but men of servile condition had not, especially such as were in Dominio, in Demefne; for they received justice from their lords, were judged by them in most cases, and had not the true benefit of the law: so neither as to the second observation in this charter, could their children be their heirs, for they held their lands and goods at the will of the lord, and were not sure to enjoy them longer than they pleased him. The second way of being law-worthy was, when men had not committed any crimes, or done any thing for which they forfeited the law, and deserved to be outlawed; then they were said to be legales homines, recti in curia or law-worthy, but not so properly as in the first sense of the word.

‡ From hence we may make a very probable conjecture at the meaning of this protection or charter. It is not to be

The second CHARTER of WILLIAM the conqueror.

" WILLIAM the king salutes WILLIAM the bishop, and SWEYN the sheriff, and all my Thanes § in East Saxony; whom I hereby acquaint, that, pursuant to an agreement, I have granted to the people my servants, the hide of land at Geddesdune. And also that I will not suffer either the French or the English to hurt them in any thing."

It is very extraordinary that this charter does not mention the persons to whom the grant was made: but our writers are of opinion that by the people, we are to understand the citizens of London in a collective body; and that the hide of land conveyed by this grant was at Gaddefsden in Hertfordshire.

King William the conqueror having brought with him a considerable number of Jews, from Roan in Normandy, they settled in London, in the ward of Coleman Street, in a place which is known by the name of the Old Jury to this day.

One of the greatest fires which ever happened in London was in the year 1077, which besides destroying the greater part of the city, had the farther ill effect of creating an enmity between the English and French, the former regarding the latter as the incendiaries; and this animosity increased so much, that the king, doubtful of the fidelity of the citizens, caused the present great white square tower of London to be erected, with a view to awe them into obedience.

This tower was built in the year 1079, under the inspection of Gundulph, bishop of Rochester, who, according to some historians, was esteemed the greatest architect of his age.

This metropolis had scarcely risen from the ashes of the dreadful fire abovementioned, when another conflagration broke out at Ludgate,

" doubted, but that the Burgeffes of London had obtained of the Saxon kings several liberties and immunities, amongst which this was one, to be so far free, as not to be in Dominio, or so obnoxious to any lord, but that, by reason of their state and condition, they might be law-worthy, that is, have the free benefit of the law; and likewise further (obtained, if it was not then a consequent of their personal estate and condition) that their children should be heirs of their lands and goods, and in both these were free from the injuries and unreasonable demands and power of any severe lord; so that all the application made by their bishop William, and not unlikely by Godfrey the portreve, to the conqueror for them, was, that their state and condition might be the same it was in king Edward's days, that their children might be their heirs, and that they might in both be protected from the injury and violence of imperious lords; which by the prevalency of their bishop were granted. Considering therefore, that by the foregoing instances it is clear, that many or most burgeffes of other burgs were in Dominio, either of the king, or some other lords or patrons in the time of king Edward, and that the Londoners might fear the conqueror would break in upon their privileges, and reduce them to the same condition; this was a great privilege obtained."

‡ The seal of this charter is likewise of white wax, but being broken into several pieces, they are sewed up and preserved in a silken bag. It is so much defaced, that something resembling a gate, with some steeples or spires, is all that can be now discerned of it.

§ The ancient word Thanes implies Nobles.

G

which

which consumed the cathedral church of St. Paul, and again rendered the greater part of the city a heap of ruins.

On the death of William the conqueror, which happened in the year 1087, the crown was placed on the head of his son William Rufus, to whom the Jews presented such large sums, that, in a ridiculous fit of gratitude, his majesty encouraged them to dispute with the Christians on the excellency of their respective faiths, promising that himself would embrace the Jewish religion, provided they came off conquerors: but history does not inform us that the debate was ever held.

In the month of November, in the year 1091, a most dreadful hurricane happened in this city, which blew down above six hundred houses, together with many churches, and shattered the Tower of London very considerably.

But the most extraordinary consequence arising from this hurricane was its blowing away the roof and part of the wall of the church of St. Mary-le-bow, in Cheapside, by the fall of which two men were killed: the roof was carried by the violence of the wind to a considerable distance, where it fell with such amazing force, that six of the rafters were forced above twenty feet deep into the ground, in almost the same position as they had stood on the church. *

A great part of this city was again destroyed by fire in the year 1093, and this calamity was succeeded by a great scarcity of corn, and almost all kinds of the necessaries of life.

In the year 1097, William Rufus imposed grievous taxes on his subjects throughout the kingdom, to defray the charges of rebuilding London-bridge (which had been carried away by a land-flood) of erecting a strong wall round the Tower of London, and building Westminster-hall as it now stands.

In the year 1099, the river Thames, by an extraordinary swelling of the sea, was driven westward with such violence, that it overflowed its banks in many places, by which several towns and villages were laid under water, many of the inhabitants were drowned, and the large estate of Godwin, earl of Kent, was encroached on by the sea, so that it could never afterwards be drained, but forms what is called the Godwin-Sands to this day.

There happened, in the year 1114, such an amazing deficiency of water in the river Thames, that numbers of people passed on dry ground below London-bridge, and through several of its arches.

William Rufus was succeeded on the throne of England by his brother Henry the first, in the twenty-sixth year of whose reign there was so dreadful a famine, that wheat was sold at the high price of six shillings for a horse load.

King Henry, at another period of time, being more in want of money to pay his army and his domestic servants, than of provisions to subsist them, issued an order that his tenants, instead of supplying bread for a meal for a hundred men, should pay one shilling; instead of a sheep, four pence; and instead of oats for twenty horses for one night, four pence.

The third charter we find granted to the city of London, was by this monarch; and the terms of it have always been considered as very advantageous to the city. The following is a faithful translation of it.

" Henry, by the grace of God, king of England, to the bishop of Canterbury, and to the bishops and abbots, earls and barons, justices and sheriffs, and to all his faithful subjects of England, French and English, greeting. Know ye, that I have granted to my citizens of London, to hold Middlesex to farm for three hundred pounds, upon accout to them and their heirs; so that the said citizens shall place as sheriff whom they will of themselves, and shall place whomsoever, or such a one as they will of themselves, for keeping of the pleas of the crown, and of the pleadings of the same, and none other shall be justice over the said men of London; and the citizens of London, shall not plead without the walls of London for any plea. And be they free from scot and lot, and daneguilt, and of all murder, and none of them shall wage battle: and if any of the citizens shall be impleaded concerning the pleas of the crown, the man of London shall discharge himself by his oath, which shall be adjudged within the city; and none shall lodge within the walls, neither of my household, nor any other, nor lodging delivered by force.

" And all the men of London shall be quit and free, and all their goods, throughout England, and the ports of the sea, of and from all toll and passage and leftage, and all other customs; and the churches and barons and citizens shall and may peaceably and quietly have and hold their fokes with all their customs; so that the strangers that shall be lodged in the fokes, shall give custom to none but to him to whom the foke appertains, or to his officer, whom he shall there put: and a man of London shall not be adjudged in amerciaments of money, but of one hundred shillings (I speak of the pleas which appertain to money) and further, there shall be no more miskenning in the hustings, nor in the folkemote, nor in any other pleas within the city; and the hustings may sit once in a week, that is to say, on Monday: and I will cause my citizens to have their lands, promises, bonds and debts within the city and without; and I will do them right by the law of the city, of the lands of which they shall complain to me: and if any shall take toll or custom of any citizen of London, the citizens of London in the city shall take of the borough or town, where toll or custom was so taken, so much as the man of London gave for toll, and as he

* However incredible and astonishing this account may appear, yet we have the united testimony of all our historians to the truth of it; and before we hastily determine against it, we should consider that the streets of London were not paved in those days, and that the ground whereon the roof happened to fall, was of a soft and boggy nature, which might easily be penetrated by so immense a weight.

" received

received damage thereby: and all debtors, which do owe debts to the citizens of London, shall pay them in London, or else discharge themselves in London, that they owe none; but, if they will not pay the same, neither come to clear themselves that they owe none, the citizens of London, to whom the debts shall be due, may take their goods in the city of London, of the borough or town, or of the county, wherein he remains, who shall owe the debt: and the citizens of London may have their chaces to hunt, as well and fully as their ancestors have had, that is to say, in the Chiltre, and in Middlesex and Surry.

Witnes the bishop of Winchester, and Robert son of Richard, and Hugh Piggot, and Almer of Totnes, and William of Albsprima, and Hubert Roger, Chamberlaine, and William de Mountfitchett, and Hangul Taney, and John Ballet, and Robert son of Steward of West.*

This charter being an excellent security of the liberties of the citizens, they began to reduce their various customs into writing, to be thenceforward observed as laws; and the members of their arts and mysteries, which till this time had been kept up only by prescription, were now established into companies and fraternities; but the appointment of the portreve, or chief magistrate of the city, still continued in the power of the king.

King Henry the first dying in Normandy, Stephen, earl of Bologn, nephew of the late king, and grandson, by the female line, to William the Conqueror, privately hastened to England; where by the assistance of the archbishop of Canterbury, and the bishops of Winchester and Salisbury, he found means to possess himself of the throne, in prejudice to the empress Maud, or Matilda, daughter of the late king, though these very ecclesiastics had solemnly sworn to support Matilda's claim.

The advancement of Stephen to the throne, which happened in the year 1135, was productive of a bloody war, by which the city of London suffered greatly; for these unconscientious prelates artfully prevailed upon the citizens to receive Stephen into the city, and to espouse his cause.

In the year 1136, a most dreadful fire broke out near London-bridge, which it destroyed, and raging in a furious manner to the westward as far as St. Clement's Danes, caused the most horrid devastation in its progress. †

The citizens of London, in the year 1139, purchased of king Stephen the right of chusing their own sheriffs, for which they paid his majesty one hundred marks of silver.

About the middle of the day on the 20th of

* A former historian has the following observations on this valuable charter.

1. The citizens had their ancient customs and immunities confirmed to them, and likewise the county of Middlesex added to their jurisdiction in fee-farm, without homage, fealty, service, or other consideration, than a quit-rent of £300 per annum; with a power of not only appointing a sheriff, but also a judiciary from among themselves, for holding the pleas of the crown: besides whom, in the reign of the said Henry, there appears to have been two other officers, under the appellation of sheriffs, who, together with the former, accounted to the exchequer for the farm of the city: the number of which officers were in a fluctuating condition, till fixed in the time of Richard the first.

2. The concession of Middlesex to the city was to prevent that county's being any longer an asylum for bankrupts, cheats, and other fraudulent persons; who, having deserted London with the goods and effects of their creditors, lived there securely in impunity, and open defiance of the injured.

3. The citizens valuable privilege, that they should not be compelled to plead without the walls of the city, was granted them, that, if any citizen should be impleaded or prosecuted concerning pleas of the crown, he might purge himself by an oath upon trial in the city.

4. The citizens by the said charter were also exempt from Scot, Lot, and Danegild; which were certain duties payable to the king by all his subjects.

5. And to be free from all murder; that is, when any murder shall happen in London, and the murderer or murderers make his or her escape, then, and in such case, the city shall not be amerced for not producing the malefactor.

6. And none of them shall wage battle:—In the Saxon times, a person accused of a crime, whereof he could not acquit himself by evidence, was obliged to challenge the accuser, and decide the same by a duel: this the citizens justly regarding as an intolerable grievance, were exempt therefrom by this charter.

7. That none of the king's household, or other person, shall take lodging in the city by force:—by this gracious concession the citizens got rid of a very great slavery; for, before this grant, the king's domestics, and whom else he pleased, were, by his arbitrary officer the portreve, quartered upon them at discretion.

8. That the citizens, with their goods and merchandizes, shall in all parts and sea-ports of the kingdom be exempt from toll, passage and liffage; that is, they shall not as formerly be liable to pay toll, at either fair or market, passage or ferriage for crossing of rivers; nor liffage, a certain duty paid in fairs and markets for each last of mercantile commodities.

9. That the churches, barons and citizens should peaceably enjoy their several fokes; that is, that the incumbent of no parish shall be molested on account of the glebe, or other lands belonging to the cure; nor the aldermen in respect of their wards, which then, being alienable, were sold, assigned and conveyed, like other possessions; whereby the purchaser or purchasers became an alderman or aldermen of his or their respective purchases; as is evident by an eminent historian: by whom it likewise appears, that part of the aldermen's office at that time was, to assign proper lodgings for strangers in their respective wards; for which they or their deputies received a certain pecuniary reward.

10. That no citizen shall be amerced beyond his ware; that is, the price of his head or life, which was valued at one hundred shillings.

11. There shall be no miskenning in the hustings, folkmote, or other pleas within the city: that is, no man shall unjustly prosecute another in any of the city courts, by deserting his first plea, and assuming another; and, for the more regular and better distribution of justice, the court of hustings is weekly to sit on Monday.

12. That the citizens shall enjoy their properties, both real and personal, according to the constitutions of the city; and whatsoever city, town or place shall extort toll or custom from any of them, they are by the said charter empowered to make reprisals in London, upon the inhabitants of such city, town or place where the same was exacted.

13. Upon the remissness of country debtors, in making proper payments, or in default of adjusting accounts with the Londoners, they are empowered to attach the effects of all such defaulters in London, for the discharge of their respective debts.

14. And the city privileges of hunting are confirmed in as ample a manner as their predecessors ever enjoyed the same in the counties of Middlesex and Surry, and the Chiltren.

† The above is the account of this fire by Matthew of Westminster; but Stow says, that "it began in the house of one Ailward, near London-Stone, and consumed all the way east to Aldgate, and west to St. Eckenwald's shrine in St. Paul's cathedral; both which it destroyed, together with London-bridge, which was then of wood."

March

March 1140, there was a total eclipse of the sun; and such was the ignorance of the people in that age, that the citizens were in the utmost consternation, from a supposition that the world was almost at an end. How much are we obliged to modern improvements in philosophical and astronomical knowledge, that even the lowest of our people are now freed from those needless terrors and apprehensions, with which the minds of our ancestors were agitated.

The army of king Stephen being routed, and himself made prisoner by the empress Maud, she resolved to wreak her vengeance on her enemies; and as she looked upon the Londoners as her most inveterate foes, she granted to Geoffrey, earl of Essex, all the possessions which his grandfather, his father, or himself, had held of the crown, in lands, tenements, castles and bailiwicks; among which were the Tower of London, and the sheriffwicks of London and Middlesex, which the grand father of the earl had held, at a fee-farm rent of three hundred pounds per annum.

Maud likewise granted to the said earl Geoffrey the office of justiciary of London, and of the county of Middlesex; so that without his special licence, no person could hold pleas either in the city or county.

By this compact, which was a direct violation of the charter granted by king Henry, the citizens of London were deprived of some of their most important privileges.

King Stephen was now deserted by many of his former adherents, and in particular by those very ecclesiastics who had been the chief instruments of his advancement to the throne: for the bishop of Winchester (who was brother to king Stephen) being at this time the pope's legate in England, having obtained from the empress Maud a solemn promise, ratified by an oath, that all the most important affairs both in church and state should be left to his direction, he forgot the oath of fidelity he had taken to king Stephen, and in a solemn assembly of the nobility and clergy, received the empress into the city of Winchester, and conducted her to the cathedral, where he pronounced sentence of excommunication against all the adherents of Stephen, and absolved such of his friends as would join the empress's party.

The legate having summoned a general convention of the clergy to meet at Winchester, proposed to them to recognize Maud as queen of England; and the whole council tacitly acceded to this proposal.

However, they postponed coming to a final resolution, till the arrival of the magistrates of London, who had been summoned to this convention: and these arriving on the second day of the convention, instead of concurring with the sentiments of the legate, earnestly recommended the release of king Stephen, as a circumstance much desired by the nobility residing in London, as well as by a great majority of the citizens.

In answer to this the legate advanced many arguments in defence of Maud's right to the crown, and concluded by observing that "it ill became the citizens of London, who made so respectable a figure in the kingdom, to take part

"with the cowardly barons, who had deserted their king in battle."

Notwithstanding all the arguments of the legate, the citizens could by no means be induced to abandon Stephen, to whom they had sworn obedience.

Hereupon the empress, who foresaw the difficulty of establishing herself on the throne, without the concurrence of the Londoners, entered into a treaty with them, and took up her residence at St. Alban's, to wait the event of their deliberations.

The city was now divided into different factions, one of which was for adhering to the interest of king Stephen, and the other for submitting to Maud; but the latter prevailing, the city was at length surrendered to her, and she was received therein with great pomp and solemnity.

The empress having succeeded to the height of her expectations, began to treat her subjects in general, and the Londoners in particular, with the greatest arrogance; and when the latter requested her to restore to them the laws of king Edward, and to ease them of part of the taxes with which they were loaded, she told them with the utmost disdain, that as they had heretofore espoused the cause of her enemy, they must expect no favour at her hands.

This insolent behaviour had such an effect on the citizens, that they entered into a conspiracy to seize her person, which would certainly have been accomplished, had she not privately withdrawn herself from the city, in consequence of information she had received of their intentions.

It was no sooner publicly known that the empress had fled, than the populous assembled, and plundered her palace, and at length, by the powerful assistance of the citizens of London, she was obliged to fly the kingdom, and king Stephen was restored to the throne.

Previous however, to the empress's leaving the kingdom, she besieged the castle of Winchester, but the citizens of London, and many of the barons of the kingdom, marched against her, and obliged her to raise the siege, after she had sustained considerable loss.

The castle of Farringdon in Berkshire, being occupied by the friends of Maud, king Stephen headed the citizens of London, who marching against it, soon took it by storm.

In the year 1145, the price of an ox in London was three shillings: and we are told that in the year 1150 the summer proved so extremely wet, that a dearth almost equal to famine ensued; and the winter of this year was remarkable for a severe frost, which commenced on the ninth of December, and continued till the beginning of March, during a great part of which time the Thames was frozen so hard, as to admit of carts and other carriages passing over the ice.

In the year 1158, the fourth year of king Henry the second, the citizens of London paid the king one thousand and forty-three pounds, which we apprehended to have been a gift from the city, to prevent its being tallaged.

In

In the same year there happened so remarkable a deficiency of water in the river Thames, that the citizens passed through the bed of the river on foot, without being wet.

In the respective years 1159, 1170, 1172, and 1173, the citizens of London made the king the following free-gifts, viz. one thousand marks; six hundred and sixty-six pounds, thirteen shillings and four-pence; and a farther sum of six hundred and sixty-six pounds, thirteen shillings and four-pence, for each of the two latter years.

In the year 1175, the degeneracy of the citizens of London arrived at a greater height than perhaps at any period before or since: for it was then no unusual thing, for the sons of the richest and most respectable citizens, to form combinations for the horrid purposes of robbery and murder.

This banditti having attempted one night to rob the house of an eminent citizen, the owner cut off the right hand of the first that entered, and some neighbours coming to his assistance, the rest of the gang made their escape.

The person who was disabled, on the promise of a pardon, made a full discovery of his accomplices, among whom was one Senex, a wealthy citizen, who lived in the highest degree of reputation.

This man being apprehended, was brought to his trial and convicted; whereupon he offered five hundred pounds of silver for his pardon; which, according to the value of money at that time, was a full proof of his great riches: but the offer was rejected, and Senex met with the reward of his crimes, being hanged, as a terror to other offenders.

CHAPTER V.

Account of the first building of London-bridge, and of the burning of the wooden-bridge. An architect for building the stone bridge recommended by king John. Account of London-bridge in its ancient and modern state, including every curious particular relative to that ancient structure.

IT is somewhat doubtful at what period of time the ancient wooden bridge of London was first erected; we shall therefore give the opinion of various writers, and leave the reader to form his own opinion.

Stow, in his survey of London, quotes the authority of Bartholomew Linted, alias Fowle, the last prior of St. Mary Overie's church, in Southwark, in the following words: "A ferrie being kept in the place where now the bridge is builded; at length the ferriman and his wife deceasing, left the same ferrie to their only daughter, a maiden, named Marie, which, with the goods left by her parents, as also with the profits arising of the said ferrie, builded a house of sisters, in a place where now standeth the east part of St. Mary Overie's church, above the queere, where she was buried; unto the which house she gave the oversight and profits of the ferrie: but afterwards the said house of sisters being converted into a college of priests, the priests builded the bridge of timber, as all other the great bridges of this land were: and from time to time kept the same in good reparations; till at length, considering the great charges of repairing the same, there was, by ayd of the citizens of London, and others, a bridge builded with arches of stone."

A more modern writer, who does not appear to credit a word of this story, says that, "to convince posterity of the truth of this relation, the prior ought by some authority, first to have shewn, that there anciently was a nunnery in that neighbourhood, and when and by whom the same was turned into a college of priests."

The same author likewise expresses his doubts whether there ever was any religious house in Southwark before the conquest: and he says that, after the strictest search, he could not discover, either by record or tradition, other than that of the abovementioned Linted, that there ever was such a place in those parts before that time: "For (continues he) the first religious house we read of on that side the river, within the bill of mortality, was the convent of Bermondsey, founded by Alwin Child, a citizen of London, in the year 1032; * and the second in that neighbourhood was the priory of St. Mary Overie's, founded by William Giffard, bishop of Winchester, in the reign of Henry the first."

In opposition to this opinion, a still later writer observes, that the author "in this place relies on the authority of Dugdale: but bishop Tanner, in his Notitia Ecclesiastica, is clear that this antiquarian was mistaken; and is of opinion, that Stow's account, making bishop Giffard no more than a good benefactor, and ascribing the building of the body of the church to him, is right: and though bishop Tanner confesses that nothing had occurred to him in any book, printed or manuscript, to support the contrary, except that of Stow, he gives us an extract from Doomsday-book, which seems to imply the truth of a monastic foundation on this situation."

Linted, the prior, having informed us, that the wooden bridge was not only erected, but kept in repair by the college of priests: a late writer on the contrary, says, "It is evident that

* This was the sixteenth year of the reign of William the Conqueror.

" the said bridge was supported at a public charge, as appears by a charter of Henry the first, granted to Ralph, bishop of Chichester, &c. for exempting the manor of Alcestone, and other lands (given by the conqueror to the abbot and canons of Battle in Suffex) from being charged to the work of London-bridge." This charter is as follows :

" Henry, king of England, to Ralph, bishop of Chichester, and all the ministers of Suffex, sendeth greeting: Know ye, &c. I command by my kingly authority, that the manor called Alcestone, which my father gave with other lands to the abbey of Battle, be free and quiet from shires and hundreds, and all other customs of earthly servitude, as my father held the same most freely and quietly; and namely, from the work of London-bridge, and the work of the castle of Peversey: and this I command upon my forfeiture. Witness William de Pontleatche at Berry.

Hereupon our author argues, that as it appeared only some religious foundations were exempt from the work of this bridge, and that even those were exempted by charter, it is manifest that all civil bodies and incorporations were liable to contribute towards the repairs thereof; and that consequently, Linsted, and those who adopt his sentiments, are wrong in ascribing the honour of so public a work to a small society of religious persons, whereas it is much more probable, that as they had been formerly supported by the ferry from London to Southwark, that they only gave their consent to the building of the bridge, on being allowed an equivalent for the loss of the ferry.

Upon the whole, this author is of opinion, that the first wooden bridge at London was erected in the reign of king Ethelred, between the years 993 and 1016, in the latter of which Canute, king of Denmark, caused a large canal to be made on the south side of the river Thames, for conveying his ships to the west side of the bridge, as hath been already observed in a note, on the 23d. page of this work.

This wooden bridge was in a great measure destroyed by fire in the year 1136, and notwithstanding the reparations then made, it was in so ruinous a condition in the year 1163, that it was thought necessary to build a bridge of stone; the superintendence of which was given to Peter, the curate or minister of St. Mary Colechurch, who was then a person of the highest reputation for his skill in architecture.

The ancient wooden-bridge abutted on Boltolph's wharf; but the new bridge of stone was ordered to be built a little farther to the westward; and a tax upon wool having been granted, towards defraying the expence of this great undertaking, a vulgar error arose from that circumstance, that the bridge was built upon woolpacks.

It appears from undoubted authority, that either through death, or the infirmities attendant on a very advanced age, Peter, the curate of Colechurch, was prevented from finishing the great work he had undertaken; for among the records in the Tower of London there is a letter, dated in the third year of the reign of king John, in which that monarch recommends to the mayor and citizens of London, one Isenbert, as a proper person to compleat the said bridge: and the following is a faithful translation of the said letter:

" John, by the grace of God, king of England, &c. to his faithful and beloved the mayor and citizens of London, greeting.

" Considering how the Lord in a short time hath wrought in regard to the bridges of Xaintes and Rochelle, by the great care and pains of our faithful, learned and worthy clerk, Isenbert, master of the schools of Xaintes; we therefore, by the advice of our reverend father in Christ, Hubert, archbishop of Canterbury, and that of others; have desired, directed and enjoined him to use his best endeavours in building your bridge, for your benefit and that of the public: for we trust in the Lord that this bridge so necessary for you, and all who shall pass the same, will, through his industry and the divine blessing, soon be finished. Wherefore, without prejudice to our right, or that of the city of London, we will and grant, that the rents and profits of the several houses, that the said master of the schools shall cause to be erected upon the bridge aforesaid, be for ever appropriated to repair, maintain, and uphold the same. And seeing the necessary work of the said bridge cannot be accomplished without your aid and that of others; we charge and exhort you kindly to receive and honour the above-named Isenbert, and those employed by him, who will perform every thing to your advantage and credit, according to his directions, you affording him your joint advice and assistance in the premises. For whatever good office or honour you shall do to him, you ought to esteem the same as done to us. But should any injury be offered to the said Isenbert, or to the persons employed by him (which we do not believe there will) see that the same be redressed, as soon as it comes to your knowledge. Witness myself at Molinel, the eighteenth day of April."

Notwithstanding this royal recommendation of Isenbert, it does not appear that the citizens accepted his services towards the rebuilding their bridge; for none of our historians make mention of him as the architect, and it is well known that, after the death of Peter of Colechurch, the care of this great work was committed to Serle Mercer, William Almaine, and Benedict Bote-write, merchants of this city, under whose inspection the first stone bridge was compleated in the year 1209.

When the building of the bridge was finished, there was a chapel erected thereon, which was dedicated to St. Thomas, and endowed for two priests and four clerks.

This chapel was erected on the east side of the bridge, on the ninth pier from the north end, and was sixty feet long, twenty feet and a half wide, and fourteen high.

Beside the entrance from the bridge, there was another from the river, and both of them were elegantly elegantly paved with black and white marble. There was a handsome sepulchral monument in the middle of the chapel, under which it is imagined that Peter of Colechurch was buried.

A commodious dwelling house, having been built over this chapel, it was occupied from time to time, by various persons in trade; and the last tenants, before the total demolition of the houses on London Bridge, were Wright and Gill, wholesale stationers, by whom this venerable old chapel was converted into a warehouse.

By a survey of the Bridge made in the year 1730, it appeared that the exterior part of the foundation, on which the stone piers are laid, consisted of huge piles of timber, driven close together, on the top of which were laid large planks ten inches in thickness, whereupon the bases of the stone piers were laid, three feet below the sterlings, and nine feet above the bed of the river.

It likewise appeared that the lowermost layers of the original stones, were placed with pitch instead of mortar, which we imagine was done with a view of preventing the water from damaging the work till it was advanced above the high water mark; for the modern method of building within a caisson, as hath been successfully practised at the erecting of the bridges at Westminster and Blackfriars, was then totally unknown.

In the year 1280, which was but about seventy years after this stone bridge was compleated, it was found to be in such a ruinous condition, that king Edward I. in the ninth year of his reign, granted to the keeper of the bridge, his licence to solicit the charitable donations of his subjects, towards keeping the same in repair.

The following is a faithful translation of this royal brief or license.

"The king, to all his bailiffs, and liege subjects, to whom these presents shall come, greeting. It hath been lately represented unto us, and it grieves us to see, that London Bridge is in so ruinous a condition, that, unless it be speedily repaired, it must inevitably fall down; and the great number of inhabitants dwelling thereon are in great danger of being destroyed: and that the work, which, taken in time, may now be prevented from falling, shall for want of sufficient help be reduced to so wretched a condition, as not to be recovered out of its ruins. Wherefore we, who are bound to take care of, and by all gentle means to provide for, both the public and private good, and affectionately to embrace those whom we perceive to be in need of our assistance, and to receive them under our royal protection: we command and require you, that, when the keepers of the said costly bridge aforesaid, or their messenger, or agent, shall come to you, authorized by our special licence and protection, to collect every where throughout our realm the assistance of our pious and well-disposed subjects, you do admit them friendly at the contemplation of God, and in regard of charity, and for shew of devotion, on this behalf; not bringing on them, or permitting to be brought, wrongs, molestations, loss, hindrance, or grievance: any, if and damage be done them, that ye make them amends without delay: and that, when the said keepers, or their messengers, shall apply for your assistance in the repairs of the said bridge, ye shall cheerfully contribute thereto, according to your respective abilities. And let each of you strive to out-run the other in such great works of charity; for which ye must needs merit of God, and have our thanks. In witness whereof, &c. witness the king at Walsingham, the eighth day of January."

This method of raising money not proving sufficient to defray the expences attending so large a work, his majesty, in the year following, granted his letters patent for the taking a toll, to be applied to the purpose of repairing the bridge; of which we have subjoined a translation.

The king to his mayor of London, &c. greeting.

"Whereas lately, by reason of the sudden ruin of London Bridge, we commanded, that, associating to you two or three of the most discreet and loyal men of the city aforesaid, ye should take unto our parliament after Easter next past, for the supply of the reparation of the aforesaid bridge, a certain custom; as in these letters patents, which we have caused to be made from that time to you, more fully is contained: we, being willing that the taking of the said customs be continued longer, command you, that from the feast of Margaret the virgin next coming, unto the end of three years next following, to be completed, ye take the under-written custom of the aforesaid bridge: to wit, of every man on foot bringing merchandize, or other things saleable, and passing over the said bridge, and he taking himself to other parts, as aforesaid, with merchandize, or other saleable things, one penny: of every saleable pack, carried and passing over the bridge one half-penny, nor will we, in the mean time; that any thing be taken there on this occasion; but in the subsidy of the reparation of the bridge: and our will is, that the foresaid custom shall cease, and become void, at the full end and term of three years. Witness the king at Chester, the sixth day of July."

It may seem extraordinary that the bridge should be in so decayed a condition within so short a time after its being built; but this was partly owing to a dreadful fire, which breaking out in Southwark, burnt a part of St. Mary Overy's church, and a strong south wind driving the flakes of fire to the north side of the bridge, prevented the return of great numbers of people who had run from London to assist in extinguishing the fire in Southwark; and while they were attempting to get back through the flames at the north end of the bridge, the fire had extended from the borough of Southwark to the south end of the bridge, so that more than three thousand persons either perished in the flames, or were drowned by the oversetting of boats and other vessels, which went to assist them.

A very severe frost, accompanied by a deep snow, in the year 1282, produced such prodigious floods and immense loads of ice, that five arches

arches of the bridge were broken down and destroyed; which, with the abovementioned accident of fire, easily accounts for the bad condition of the bridge, and the great need it had of repairs.

The reason of the crown interposing in the reparation of the bridge, appears from the following circumstances: king John having taken the custody of the bridge from the mayor of London, and given it to Friar West, his royal successors claimed the disposal of it, and in the year 1269, king Henry III. granted the custody thereof, with the liberties, and all matters thereto appertaining, to his queen consort, who made no scruple of applying to her own use all the profits arising therefrom, while she permitted the bridge to run to ruin.

In the reign of king Edward I. the citizens exhibited their complaint to the judges itinerant at the Tower, asserting their right to the custody of the bridge, which at length, by the most unwearied perseverance, they recovered.

There was antiently a tower on the north-side of the draw-bridge, which was first erected in the year 1426 and was built for the purpose of resist-ign the attempts of an enemy.

By a careful admeasurement made in the year 1725, it appeared that the length of the bridge was nine hundred and fifteen feet and one inch, the height of it forty three feet and seven inches, and the breadth of it twenty feet, exclusive of the houses on each side, which, together, occupied a space of fifty three feet, so that the whole breadth of the bridge was seventy three feet.

On the thirteenth of February in the year 1632, a dreadful fire broke out at a needle-makers near St. Magnus church, which burnt down two and forty houses on the bridge, an accident which was in a great degree owing to a scarcity of water, the Thames being almost frozen over at the time.

The bridge remained in this ruinous condition for several years; but at length, in the year 1645 and 1646, several houses, on the north side of the bridge, were rebuilt with timber, in a strong and handsome manner.

By the terrible conflagration which laid this city in ruins in the year 1666, most of the houses on the bridge were again destroyed, and the stone work received so much damage, that it cost fifteen hundred pounds to repair it, before the houses could be rebuilt.

In the year 1582 a water engine at London-bridge for the purpose of supplying the city of London with water, was erected under the inspection of Peter Morrice, a Dutchman, which having been considerably improved since that time, by the care of several ingenious persons, is at this time thought to be the best engine of the kind in the world.

In the year 1722 the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common council of this city, published the following order, to preserve a free passage over the bridge.

" This court being sensible of the great inconveniences and mischiefs which happen by the disorderly leading and driving of cars,

" coaches, and other carriages over London-bridge, whereby the common passage there is greatly obstructed, doth strictly order and injoin (pursuant to several former orders made by this court, for prevention of those mischiefs) that three sufficient and able persons be appointed, and constantly maintained; one by the governors of Christ's-Hospital, one by the inhabitants of the ward of Bridge within, and the other by the Bridge-master: which three persons are to give their diligent and daily attendance at each end of the bridge, and by all good means to hinder and to prevent the said inconveniences; and for that purpose to direct and take care that all carts, coaches, and other, carriages coming out of Southwark into this city, do keep all along on the west side of the said bridge; and all carts and coaches, and other carriages going out of this city, do keep all along on the east side of the said bridge; and that no carman be suffered to stand across the said bridge, to load or to unload; and that they shall apprehend all such who shall be refractory, or offend herein, and carry them before some of his majesty's justices of peace for this city and liberties, to be dealt with according to law. And further, to prevent the afore-said obstructions, it is ordered, That the collector of the tolls upon this the said bridge shall take care that the said duties be collected without making a stay of the carts, for which the same is to be paid."

In the year 1725, a fire breaking out at a brush-makers, greatly damaged the gate at the south end of the bridge, and destroyed several of the neighbouring houses. This gate was afterwards rebuilt with stone, with two posterns for the convenience of foot passengers, and was completed in the year 1728, at the expence of the city.

The want of a proper foot-path over the bridge having occasioned the loss of many lives, from the great number of carriages constantly passing over it, and the building leases being at length expired, a plan was projected for rebuilding the street over the bridge, with colonades on each side, so that the passengers might be sheltered from the inclemencies of the weather, at the same time that they were protected from any danger that might arise from the number of horses and carriages.

Not long afterwards a part of this plan was carried into execution, beginning at the north-east end; and the advantages resulting from this alteration were so great, that a wish to see the whole completed universally prevailed.

At length, in the year 1746, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common council, taking into their consideration the number of lives that were lost by the narrowness of the arches, which took up a fourth part of the bed of the river, and occasioned a fall of five feet at low-water; and likewise the great expence of repairing the bridge, which had cost no less than two thousand pounds per annum for several years past, they resolved to take down all the houses on the bridge, and to widen and enlarge one or more of the arches.

The

The court therefore gave orders to their surveyor to draw a plan, and make out an estimate of the expence of the intended work; which being done, the whole amounted to £95,000.

It was now immediately resolved not to grant or renew any lease or leases of the houses, but to let the unexpired leases run out, and the houses of course run to ruin.

Indeed Sir Christopher Wren and Sir John Evelyn, had offered a plan of this kind, soon after the great fire in the year 1666; both those gentlemen proposing, instead of houses on the bridge, to erect a strong ballustrade on each side of it.

The remarks of a gentleman who published a "Review of the public buildings of London" some years ago, are well worthy to be inserted in this place.

"As some people (says he) are ignorant enough to admire the bridge merely because it is encumbered with houses from end to end; it will not be amiss to observe, that nothing can be more ridiculous than this invention; nothing can possibly offend the eye more, or extinguish so many beauties as might take place, in case this popular nuisance was removed: suppose the present structure of the bridge was still to continue as it is, there would, at least, be room for a magnificent breast-work and ballustrade above, and the top would afford one of the finest prospects in the world: on one hand a fleet of merchant-ships, equal in value and importance to half a nation; on the other, two of the most considerable cities in Europe, stretching along the banks of a beautiful river, and ending with a distant view of the adjacent landscape."

For some years before the houses on London-bridge were taken down, they leaned in such a manner over the river, that a humane person could not look at them without terror, when he considered that many of them were inhabited; and while he dreaded the fate, he wondered at the folly and temerity of the inhabitants.

The elegant bridge at Westminster likewise contributed in a great degree to convince the citizens of the advantages that would arise from the pulling down of the houses; and it gave great satisfaction to the public, when, in the year 1756, the Lord-mayor, and common-council, applied to parliament to enable them to put this resolution in practice.

* The following is a copy of the deposition of Mary, wife of John Dennis, living in George-alley, Thames-street, taken the 14th day of April, 1758, before the right honourable Sir Charles Apgill, Knt. Lord-mayor of the city of London.

This deponent saith, That, about ten o'clock at night of the 11th of this month, she, this deponent, was in the watch-house belonging to Dyers-hall, near London-bridge. That she, being looking over the hatch of the said watch-house, observed a lanthorn in the chapel pier of London-bridge. That soon after she saw another lanthorn in the same place. That, soon losing sight of both lanthorns, presently afterwards she took notice of three lanthorns being upon the said spot. That, upon observing the first lanthorn, she supposed there might be some lighter or barge at the bridge; but when she saw the second lanthorn, she perceived the lights were amongst the wood-work of the said pier: and that when the three lanthorns were there together, she took notice one of them was held down. Another was

An act of parliament was soon obtained, which enabled them to provide for the expence, by collecting a toll for every horse and carriage that passed over the bridge, till the principal and interest of the money that should be borrowed and laid out upon it, should be repaid.

In a short time after the passing of the act, orders were given for taking down the houses on both sides of the bridge to a considerable distance north of the gate.

The houses and arches that extended across the bridge being taken down, a strong temporary bridge of wood was, with the most astonishing expedition, erected upon the western sterlings of the old bridge, for the passage of carriages, as well as of horsemen and persons on foot, till the proposed alterations should be made; and in the month of October, 1757, this temporary bridge was opened, and found to be extremely safe and convenient.

But when the pavement of the old bridge was taken up, and an opening made into the cavities of all the piers; when some of them were taken down almost to the edge of the water, and all the space on which the houses had stood was a confused heap of ruins, the temporary bridge burst suddenly into a flame, and was totally destroyed.

This fire began about eleven o'clock in the night of the eleventh of April, 1758, and by nine o'clock the next morning the temporary bridge was consumed; though some pieces of timber among the ruins of the old structure, together with the draw-bridge, continued on fire during the whole day.

There were various reports respecting the manner in which the bridge was set on fire. Some persons declared, that about ten o'clock at night, they observed several people who appeared in liquor, coming over the bridge with a torch, and while some of them endeavoured to get it from the person who held it, he, in play, strove to defend himself by burning them, and at length threw it over the boarded fence of the bridge, when the light disappeared, till the timber below burst into a flame.

On the contrary, the watchmen at the steel-yard, those on the custom-house quay, and many other persons, declared that about eleven o'clock they observed some lights under the bridge, which appeared in several places like candles in lan-at a small distance; and the third was held up towards the upper part of the wood-work: which made her suppose there were workmen employed to rectify some defect in the bridge. This deponent farther saith, that in a short space of time, the lanthorns being all gone, she soon after perceived, in the abovenamed place, a small flame, which being damp for a short time, it then rose again. That, after the flame's appearing damp the second time, it blazed out very much. Upon which she, this deponent, went to the next wharf to give notice London-bridge was on fire.

Note. This deposition was confirmed by some people, who declared they saw the lanthorns from Custom-house quay. It was also in part confirmed by the watchmen on the bridge. For these latter declared, that, upon the first alarm of fire, they ran down to the sterling of the pier that was then almost removed to make the present great arch, when they perceived, just under the very centre of the temporary bridge, a small flame, which, as they could not get near, soon spread itself with great velocity.

thomas,

thorns; and that soon after this, the bridge burst into flames from one end to the other.

This dreadful conflagration filled the citizens and the inhabitants of Southwark, with the apprehension that their intercourse with each other would in a great degree be prevented for a long time; and it was the universal opinion that the bridge was purposely set on fire.

The Lord-mayor, who attended almost the whole time of the fire, gave every necessary direction for stopping the progress of it; but all proved ineffectual; and in the morning his lordship waited on Mr. Secretary Pitt, with the shock-news of this disaster.

His majesty's pardon being immediately obtained for any person who would discover the authors of the calamity, except the persons who actually committed the fact, the Lord-mayor summoned a court of common council, who resolved to offer a reward of £200 for discovering the vile incendiaries; but no discovery was ever made respecting this very extraordinary affair.

The builders of the bridge were now asked how soon they could possibly render it passable for carriages; and the public were very agreeably surprized when they promised to compleat it within three weeks, on condition of being allowed to employ a great number of hands, and permitted to work sundays.

"But this surprize (says an ingenious writer) was greatly increased, when they found that by keeping men constantly at work, day and night, this great work was compleated, and the old bridge opened again in less than a fortnight; and that in this short time those arches that had been taken down, and the deep cavities in all the piers lately used for cellars, were covered over; the piers which had been demolished had stages formed of large beams of timber raised to support the upper works, and the whole track of ruins was covered "with rows of strong beams placed close together; these were gravelled over to a considerable depth, and a strong wooden fence, on each side, raised about six feet high, with places formed for foot passengers to stand in at proper distances, to secure themselves from being hurt by the carriages.

"This great work was no sooner finished with such amazing expedition, than preparations were made for a new temporary bridge, which was soon after begun, and in a short time was opened."

The great loss the city had suffered by the burning of the temporary bridge, induced the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council, to apply to parliament for relief; when that body, rendering the repairing and beautifying of London bridge a national concern, an act was passed the same year, for granting the city fifteen thousand pounds, towards the carrying on of that work; upon which two toll-booths that had been erected for receiving the toll granted by a former act, were immediately taken down, and all horses and carriages suffered to go toll free.

London bridge has been denominated by ancient writers "The bridge of the world," "The wonder of the world," and "The bridge of wonders:" but we shall hardly suffer ourselves to be deceived by these pompous titles, if we consider it even in its present much improved state; for the wretched disproportion of its arches, and the great fall of water, by which the lives of many of his majesty's subjects are annually lost, are a disgrace to this city: but we hope the time is advancing, when a sense of the dangers and inconveniences of this bridge, will inspire those in whose power it is, to apply for the aid of parliament towards erecting a superb and magnificent structure, which may do equal honour to the taste, policy, and humanity of the present age.

CHAPTER VI.

The mayor of London acts as chief Butler at the coronation of Richard the first. A great massacre of the Jews. Preparations made for the king's expedition into Palestine. Regulations respecting the building of houses in the city and liberties. A charter of confirmation granted by Richard I. The singular history of William Fitz-Osbert. The valuable charter of king Richard I. by which the city of London claims the jurisdiction and conservancy of the river Thames. A concise, but accurate account of that noble river.

IN the year 1189, the chief magistrate of London, claimed to act as chief butler at the coronation of king Richard the first; and as this claim was admitted, and he did actually officiate, there can be little doubt but the same office was exercised by his predecessors, though this is the first mention of this circumstance in history.

An intimation was given to the Jews residing in London, that they must not make their appearance at Westminster, on occasion of the coronation: but notwithstanding this, some of those people, prompted by motives of curiosity, did attempt to get into Westminster-abbey; where they were repulsed by some of the king's domestic servants, and a report was immediately propagated, that his majesty had given orders that all the Jews should be destroyed.

Hereupon the populace immediately attacked those poor people, and killed all they could lay their hands on; not content with which, they hastened into the city, where they massacred great numbers numbers of the unfortunate Jews, robbed their houses, and then set them on fire.

This horrid deed was applauded by the monks, who pretended that it was a meritorious action; but the king appears to have been of a very different opinion; for he immediately issued orders for apprehending the murderers, several of whom being taken, the ring leaders were hanged on the day after the dreadful massacre.

Not long after the coronation of king Richard, that monarch, having determined to fulfil a treaty, his father had concluded with the king of France, relative to a joint expedition to the Holyland, directed his precepts to Henry de Cornhil, then sheriff of London, to provide a certain number of helmets, steel caps, shields, spears, pavilions, and other military accoutrements; and also silken habits, mitres, caps, dalmatiques, coats, and wine, for the use of his majesty.

In the year 1191 the magistrates of London, taking into their consideration the great damages sustained by the citizens, on the breaking out of fires among houses built of wood, and thatched with straw or reeds, ordained that "all houses thereafter to be erected in London, or within the liberties thereof, should be built of stone, with party walls of the same, and covered either with slates or tiles;" and it was farther provided, "to appease contentions that might arise among neighbours, upon inclosure between land and land, that twelve aldermen of the city should be chosen in full husting, and these sworn to attend the mayor in making the proposed regulations."

These regulations were that "the party walls should be built with stone, and be at least three feet in thickness and sixteen in height, and these magistrates were likewise to give directions respecting girders, windows, gutters, and wells."

In the year above-mentioned the earl of Moreton, * attended by most of the bishops and the nobility, assembled in St. Paul's church yard, where they were met by the principal citizens of London, by whose joint concurrence, William Longchamp, chancellor, bishop of Ely, and one of the regents during the absence of the king, was unanimously degraded from the high offices which he held, for his proud, insolent and tyrannical behaviour.

The ready concurrence of the citizens to this act of degradation, gave so much satisfaction to the earl of Moreton, and the other members of the regency, that they confirmed the ancient privileges of the city, and swore to maintain the same during his majesty's pleasure.

In grateful acknowledgement of so singular a favour, the Londoners took an oath of fidelity to king Richard and his heirs, and engaged that in case of his death without issue, they would acknowledge his brother John for their sovereign, swearing fealty to him in preference to every other person except king Richard.

From the circumstances above recited, it is observable, that at this period the citizens of London were held in the most respectable light, as their advice was thought indispensably necessary, in an affair of so much consequence as the degrading an insolent and despotic minister.

On king Richard's return to England, he was received by his faithful citizens, with every testimony of the sincerest joy, and with a pomp and magnificence becoming the sentiments of loyalty which they expressed.

In grateful return for these tokens of loyalty, and in consideration of the fidelity of the citizens of London during his absence, king Richard granted them a charter of confirmation, of which the following is a faithful translation.

"Richard, by the grace of God, king of England, duke of Normandy, and earl of Anjou; to his archbishops, bishops, abbots, earls; barons, justices, sheriffs, ministers, and all others his faithful French and English people; greeting.

"Know ye, that we have granted to our citizens of London, that none of them may plead without the walls of the city of London, for any pleas, saving pleas of foreign tenures; (except our monyers and ministers): also we have granted to them acquittal of murder within the city, and in Portsoken; and that none of them may wage battle; and that they may discharge themselves of pleas belonging to the crown, according to the ancient custom of the city; and that none may take any lodgings within the walls of the city by force, or by delivery of the marshal.

"This also we have granted to them, that all the citizens of London be free from toll and leftage, throughout all England, and the sea ports; and that none be adjudged of amerciaments of money, but according to the law of the city, which they had in the time of king Henry, grandfather to Henry our father; and that there be no miskenning in any place within the city; and that the hustings be kept only once a week; and they justly have all their lands and tenures, and premises, and all other their debts, whosoever do owe them to them, and that right be done to them, according to the custom of the city, of all their lands and tenures, which they have within the city; and of all their debts which shall be lent at London, and of promises there made: the pleas shall be holden at London; and, if any in all England shall take toll or custom of the men of London, after he shall fail of right; the sheriff of London, may take goods thereof at London.

"Also we have granted to them, that they may have their huntings wheresoever they had the same in the time of king Henry, grandfather to Henry our father. Furthermore also, for the advancement of the city, we have granted to them, that they all be acquit of all Bridg-toll, Childwite, Jerisgive and Scotale; so that no sheriff of London, or any other bailiff, shall make any Scotale. The said customs we do grant to them, and all other liberties and free customs which they had in the time of king Henry, grandfather unto Henry our father, ther, * Afterwards king John.

"ther, when as they more better and freely had
 "the same. Wherefore we will and steadfastly "command, that they and their heirs have and
 "hold all their things aforefaid of us and our "heirs.

"Witness Hubert, archbishop of canterbury;
 "R. bishop of Lincoln; Ralph, earl of Chesh-
 "ter; R. earl of Clarence; Will. Marshall,
 "Rog. Bigolt. Jeophery, son of Peter; Hugh "Bardolph, Will. Brewer, and Will. Warren.
 "Given by the hand of William, bishop of
 "Ely, our chancellor, at Winchester, the "twenty third of April, in the fifth year of
 "our reign.

It would be superfluous to inform such of our readers as are acquainted with the English history, that king Richard, on his return from Palestine, was unjustly detained a prisoner by the Emperor Henry VI. * but it will be proper to observe, that soon after his majesty's return to England, the citizens of London paid the sum of fifteen hundred marks towards his ransom.

In the year 1195 the tranquillity of this city was greatly disturbed by one William Fitz-Osbert, alias Longbeard, and his adherents, the particulars of whose conduct we will faithfully recite, as given by our best historians.

The person of Fitz-Osbert was deformed, and he obtained the appellation of Long-beard, from his permitting his beard to grow to an unusual length, partly from an affectation of gravity, and partly in derision of the Norman custom of shaving the face.

The greatest enemies of Fitz-Osbert acknowledge, that being a person of most powerful elocution, he became the professed advocate of the poorer citizens, against the oppressions of the more wealthy; and having frequently pleaded the cause of the poor before the magistrates, he became the idol of the lower orders of the people, who were universally at his devotion.

Matters being thus situated, Fitz-Osbert began to act more openly, and made use of all his rhetoric to incense the people against a certain aid or tallage, which was to be raised for the service of the public.

Fitz-Osbert insisted that this tax was proportioned in a very unjust manner, for that the poor were to bear the burden of almost the whole, while the rich were in a manner exonerated: and this insinuation wrought so powerfully on the minds of the people, that a tumult ensued near St. Paul's church, in which many of the citizens were killed.

Advice of this insurrection being transmitted to Hubert, archbishop of Canterbury, who was the king's justiciary, that prelate summoned Fitz-Osbert to appear before him, at a fixed time and place.

Fitz-Osbert obeyed the summons, but was attended by such a numerous croud of his adherents, that the archbishop, instead of seizing his person, thought it necessary for his own safety to dismiss him with a gentle reproof, and his advice not to appear in any unlawful assembly for the future.

The more wealthy among the citizens being greatly terrified at the proceedings of Fitz-Osbert and his party, it was at length agreed that a number of men should lay in wait to seize him at a time when he had but few attendants; and an opportunity of this kind soon offered; but Fitz-Osbert, with the few friends he had with him, made a most desperate defence, and having possessed themselves of the church of St. Mary-le-bow in Cheapside, they fortified the steeple, with a full determination of defending themselves till further assistance should arrive.

The situation of Fitz-Osbert and his friends was no sooner known, than the populace, from all parts in and near the city, assembled in Cheapside, with the view of setting their champion at liberty: but the magistrates used such persuasive arguments, that the people were at length prevailed on to disperse.

Matters were in this situation, when a resolution was formed of setting fire to the steeple, so that Fitz-Osbert and his abettors had no chance, but to force their way through the flames and fight for their lives, or to be burnt on the spot.

It cannot be doubted but they chose the former expedient, as the less dreadful of the two; wherefore making an impetuous sally, they endeavoured to seek their safety by wading through the blood of their opponents: but being overpowered by superior numbers, Fitz-Osbert and eight of his adherents were made prisoners, and committed to the Tower of London.

The next morning they were brought to their trial; and sentence of death being passed upon them, they were allowed only one night to make their peace with heaven; for on the following day they were drawn by the feet through the city to a part of Smithfield then called the Elms; where they were publicly executed, and then hung in chains.

Still, however, the disturbances were not wholly appeased; for the body of Fitz-Osbert being taken down and carried away; a report was immediately propagated by a priest who was a kinsman of the deceased, that several miracles had been wrought at the place of his execution.

Hereupon vast numbers of people resorted to Smithfield, many of whom picked up and carried away, as holy relicks, pieces of the earth on which the blood of their champion had been spilt, while others continued there the whole night in the utmost fervors of devotion; nor did they quit the place till a military guard was sent, by whom they were at length, though with great reluctance on their part, dispersed to their respective habitations.

It was now thought necessary, in order to undeceive the deluded populace, to make public the life of Fitz-Osbert; which was accordingly done by authority; his relation, the priest, was excommunicated for attempting to deceive the people; who hereupon applied quietly to their

* A curious account of king Richard's expedition into the Holy-land, and every circumstance consequent thereon, may be found in CLARENDON'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND, vol. 1. page 197, to 205.

respective respective occupations, and all the riots and tumults subsided.

Such is the account of this extraordinary affair, as related by several of our historians; who, while they load Firz-Osbert with the opprobrious names of perfidious, turbulent and implacable villian, impostor, incendiary and traitor, do not advance one solid argument to prove that he was not a real friend to the poor, a staunch defender of the liberties of his fellow citizens. How contemptible are these writers rendered, by such egregious and scandalous partiality!

In the year 1197, king Richard the first granted a most valuable charter to the citizens of London, of which the following is a faithful copy:

“ Richard, by the grace of God, king of “ England, duke of Normandy, and earl of “ Anjou, to his archbishops, bishops, abbots, “ earls, barons, justices, sheriffs, stewards, con“ stables, bailiffs, ministers, and all his faithful “ subjects, greeting.

“ Know ye all, that we for the health of our “ soul, and for the soul's health of our father,
“ and all our ancestor's souls: and also for the “ commonweal of our city of London, and of all
“ our realm, have granted and stedfastly com“ manded, that all weirs that are in the Thames
“ be removed, wheresoever they shall be within “ the Thames: and that no weirs be put any “ where within the Thames: also we have quit-“ claimed all that which the keeper of our tower
“ of London was wont yearly to receive of the “ said weirs. Wherefore we will and stedfastly “ command, that no keeper of the said tower,
“ at any time hereafter, shall exact any thing of “ any one, neither molest or burden, or any de“ mand make of any person, by reason of the “ said weirs. For it is manifest to us, and by our “ right reverend father, Hubert, archbishop of “ Canterbury, and other our faithful subjects,
“ it is sufficiently given us to understand, that “ great detriment and discommodity hath grown
“ to our said city of London, and also to the “ whole realm, by occasion of the said weirs.
“ Which thing, to the intent it may continue “ for ever firm and stable, we do fortify by the “ inscription of this present page, and the put“ ting to of our seal: these being witnesses:

“ John of Worcester, Hugh of Coventry,
“ bishops; John earl of Moreton, Ralph earl
“ of Chester, Robert earl of Leicester, William “ earl of Arundel, William of St. Mary's church, “ Peter son of Hereb, Matthew his brother,
“ Simon of Ryma, Scherio de Quincero. Given
“ by the hand of Eustace dean of Salisbury, “ vice-chancellor, then agent at the Isle of “ Audlyer, the fourteenth day of July, in the “ eighth year of our reign.”

In consideration of this charter the citizens paid the king fifteen hundred marks: and if we consider the amazing importance of the river Thames, we must acknowledge that the purchase was a very valuable one.

As the jurisdiction of the Lord-mayor of the city of London over the river Thames is very extensive, and as this noble river is the principal source of the wealth of this metropolis, our readers will be pleased with a particular description of it; and we shall endeavour to be as entertaining as concise in our account.

If we consider the Thames with respect to its course and navigation, we must acknowledge that it is unequalled by any river in the known world.

This wonderful stream takes its rise from a small spring near the village of Hemble, in the parish of Cubberley, or Coberly, a little to the south-west of Cirencester in Gloucestershire; and taking its course eastward, becomes navigable at Lechlade for vessels of fifty tons, and there receives the river Colne, about one hundred and thirty-eight miles from London.

It continues its course north-east from Lechlade till it reaches Oxford, where it receives the Charwell; after which it runs south-east to Abingdon, and from thence to Dorchester, where it receives the Thame, and continuing its course to the south-east by Wallingford to Reading, flows through Berkshire, Buckinghamshire, Middlesex, Essex and Kent, and washes the towns of Henley, Marlow, Maidenhead, Windsor, Eaton, Staines, Chertsey, Weybridge, Shepperton, Sunbury, Hampton, Thames Ditton, Kingston, Twickenham, Richmond, Shene, Isleworth, Kew, Brentford, Mortlake, Barnes, Chiswick, Hammer-smith, Putney, Fulham, Wandsworth, Battersea, Chelsea, and Lambeth, from whence both shores may be considered as a continued city, through Westminster, Southwark, and the city of London, Horsleydown, Wapping, Rotherhithe, Shadwell, Ratcliff, Limehouse, almost to Deptford and Greenwich; and from thence this river proceeds to Woolwich, Erith, Grays, Gravesend and Milton.

It is not in the power of language to describe the beauties which adorn the banks of this noble river from Windsor to London, the numerous villages on each side being embellished with the magnificent houses, and elegant gardens of the nobility and gentry.

Those who have not been accustomed to such a sight, would view with wonder and surprize the prodigious number of barges and boats, as well those of pleasure as of burden, continually passing and repassing above London-bridge, for the convenience and supply of the towns and counties through which the Thames runs; and still greater would be their astonishment on beholding the vast fleets which constantly appear below bridge, which are continually exporting the manufactures of this kingdom, and bringing back the productions of every part of the globe.

In this place our readers will be pleased with Sir John Denham's most admirable description of this river, which for justness of sentiment and elegance of language, has never been excelled, possibly never equalled.

My eye descending from the hill surveys:
Where Thames among the wanton valleys strays:
Thames, the most lov'd of all the Ocean's sons,
By his old sire, to his embraces runs,
Hasting to pay his tribute to the sea,
Like mortal life to meet eternity.

K

Tho'

Tho' with those streams he no resemblance hold,
 Whose foam is amber, and their gravel gold;
 His genuin and less guilty wealth t'explore,
 Search not his bottom, but survey his shoar;
 O'er which he kindly spreads his spacious wing,
 And hatches plenty for the ensuing spring.
 Nor then destroys it with two fond a stay,
 Like mothers which their infants overlay.
 Nor with a sudden and impetuous wave,
 Like profuse kings, resume the wealth he gave.
 No unexpected inundations spoil
 The mower's hopes, nor mock the plowman's toil:
 But godlike his unwearied bounty flows;
 First loves to do, then loves the good he does.
 Nor are his blessings to his banks confin'd,
 But free and common as the sea or wind;
 When he to boast, or to disperse his stores
 Full of the tributes of his grateful shores
 Visits the world, and in his flying tow'rs
 Brings home to us, and makes both Indies ours;
 Finds wealth where 'tis, bestows it where it wants,
 Cities in deserts, woods in cities plants.
 So that to us no thing, no place is strange,
 While his fair bosom is the world's exchange.
 O could I flow like thee, and make thy stream
 My great example, as it is my theme!
 Tho deep, yet clear, tho' gentle, yet not dull,
 Strong without rage, without o'erflowing full;
 Heaven her Eridanus no more shall boast,
 Whose fame in thine, like lesser currents lost.

The great advantage from the river Thames arises from the tides flowing above seventy miles up it, twice in every twenty-four hours; and hence also arises its great convenience with respect to trade and navigation; and as the tide is influenced by the moon, so each tide is twenty-four minutes later than that preceding it, and therefore there is but twelve minutes wanting of a whole hour in twenty-four.

By this rule the return of the tide to London-bridge, at any distance from the new or full moon, may be easily computed by the following tide table.

N. Moon	Hour.	Min.
F. Moon.	3
1	3	48
2	4	31
3	5	14
4	6	52
5	6	30
6	7	3
7	7	36
8	8	24
9	9	27
10	10	30
11	11	28
12	12	26
13	1	19
14	2	12

A person desirous of learning when it will be high water at London-bridge, may by this table be immediately satisfied, provided he knows how many days it is since the last new or full moon; for supposing it is the eighth day after, by looking at the figure 8 in the first column, he will find the tide on that day to be at the eighth hour and twenty-four minutes, or twenty four minutes eight o'clock.

This table, however, can only be depended on when the tide is regular, and not interrupted by accidents; for if the wind blows hard at west or south west, it will prevent the tide from flowing to its usual height; and a contrary effect is produced by a hard gale at north-west.

The jurisdiction of the Lord-mayor of London over the river Thames, extends from Colne-ditch a little to the westward of Staines-bridge, to Yendal or Yenleet, to the east, including part of the rivers Medway and Lea; and his lordship has a substitute or deputy, called the water-bailiff, whose office is to search for and punish all persons infringing the laws made for the preservation of the river and the fish therein.

The Lord-mayor and aldermen hold courts of conservancy eight times in the year, in the counties of Middlesex, Surry, Kent, and Essex, in order to maintain the rights and privileges of the river Thames, and to charge four juries on oath to make enquiry after all offences committed on the river, in order to proceed to judgment against such as may be found offending.

There are many laws respecting the fishery and the preservation of the fry and spawn, from among which we have selected the following as the most important.

" No fisherman shall use any net under two inches and a half in the mesh above Richmond Crane, nor any net in the work called beating of the bush, flag or reed, of less than three in the mesh; nor use any weights or stones to their nets, upon the forfeiture of forty shillings for each offence.

" That no pike-net, or other net or engine be drawn over the weeds for catching of pikes, by any fisherman within the jurisdiction of the Lord-mayor, by reason it is destructive to, and occasions the driving of all the other fish out of the western rivers, that would otherwise lie, spawn, and breed in the weeds, upon the same penalty of forty shillings for every such offence.

" That no fisherman shall bend any net by anchors, or otherwise, across the channel, so as to draw another net into it, whereby the spawn of barbel and other fish may be destroyed, upon the forfeiture of the same sum for each offence.

" That no person shall draw any net for salmon, of less than three inches in the mesh, from the 10th of March till the 14th of September, in any part of the river Thames, from Kew pile westward, to the city of London mark stone above Staines-bridge, upon the forfeiture of forty shillings for every offence.

" That no person shall take or sell any fish contrary to the ancient assize: pike, fourteen inches; barbel, twelve inches; salmon, sixteen inches; trout, eight inches; tench, eight inches; roach, six inches; dace, six inches; and flounders, six inches.

" That every fisherman shall have on his boat both his christian and surname, and the name of his parish legibly painted, where any one may

" may see it ; on the forfeiture of twenty shillings for every offence.

" No person whatsoever shall fish for smelts or shads, or any other fish whatsoever, or lay leaps, or rods for eels, in any place within the jurisdiction of the Lord-mayor, without a licence from the water-bailiff, who shall appoint the proper seasons for fishing : and upon every such occasion, all the fishermen shall, upon due summons or notice given, repair to the water-bailiff at the chapel at Guildhall, to take out their several licences for going to fish, and to hear the ordinances for the preservation of the fisheries publicly read, that they may be the better able to preserve and keep them ; and that none go out to fish without such a licence ; and that every fisherman offending herein, shall pay five pounds for every such offence."

For the better preventing the use of unlawful nets or engines, it is farther ordained that, Any person or persons authorized by the water-bailiff, may enter any fishermen's boats or vessels, to view and search for all unsizeable nets and engines, and for any fish they shall suspect to be taken contrary to the laws of this kingdom ; to seize and carry such nets to the water-bailiff, with the names of the offenders, that they may be brought to justice ; likewise to seize the fish taken contrary to law, and distribute it among the poor ; and whosoever shall resist or disturb the water-bailiff, or his deputies, in their searching for and seizing unlawful nets, engines, or fish, shall forfeit twenty marks."

There is no doubt but these laws are admirably calculated for the preservation of the fish, or for an increase of their breed ; and we wish we could say that these laws were at all times properly enforced, and the offenders against them punished in an exemplary manner ; as, in that case, there can be little doubt but that the immense numbers of fish with which providence has enriched the river Thames, would afford such a large and constant supply, as would, in a great degree, tend to reduce the exorbitant prices of other provisions in this metropolis.

Although the river Thames is said to be navigable one hundred and thirty-eight miles above London bridge, yet in that course there are such a number of flats, that a total stop would be put to the navigation westward, in the summer time, when the springs are low, were it not for a number of Locks, or machines made of wood, placed quite across the river, and so contrived as to confine the current of water as long as is found convenient ; that is, till the water rises to such a height as to allow depth enough for the barges to pass over the shallows ; which being effected the confined water is set at liberty, and the loaded vessel proceeds on its voyage, till another shoal requires the same contrivance to carry it forward.

These conveniences are undoubtedly very great, but they are attended with a very considerable expence ; for a barge passing from Lechlade, to London pays no less than thirteen pounds, fifteen shillings, and sixpence for passing through these locks ; and one from Oxford to London pays twelve pounds eighteen shillings.

This expence, however, is incurred only in the summer, when the water is low : and from London-bridge to Bolter's-lock, which is a distance of fifty-one miles and a half, there is no lock on the river.

We shall conclude this account of the river Thames, by giving a catalogue of the greater part of the fish with which this celebrated river, by the goodness of providence, is most bountifully stored : The salmon, flounder, smelt, shad, trout, graylin, perch, carp, tench, barbel, chub, roach, dace, gudgeon, pike, eel, lamprey, bleak, ruffee, sturgeon, bass, mullet, turbot, sole, maid, plaice, dab, skate, thornback, halibut, pearl, whiting, haddock, oyster, muscle, cockle, buntin, crab, prawn, red and white shrimps, craw fish and others.

CHAPTER VII.

Charters granted by king John to the City of London. A council of thirty-five persons chosen to hold the assizes in London. The fraternity of weavers expelled the city. The exchange of London farmed. Title of mayor first bestowed. King John summons a Parliament to meet at Bridewell. Pope Innocent lays the city under an interdict. The exchequer removed to Northampton. The walls of London encompassed with a ditch. The barons and citizens compel king John to grant Magna-charter. The contents of that famous charter of liberty. King John breaks through his engagements and procures absolution. The citizens invite Lewis, son of king Philip of France, to the crown of England. He accepts it. The French defeated. King John dies. Peace concluded between Lewis and the young king Henry. Lewis leaves England. Henry makes a public entry into London.

IN the year 1198, the king issued his orders to the sheriffs of London and Middlesex, to provide measures, gallons, iron rods, and weights, to be sent to the several counties of England, to be used as one general standard for weights and measures.

King Richard dying in the year 1199, was succeeded on the throne by his brother John, earl of Moreton, who had no sooner assumed the reins of government, than he granted three charters to the city of London.

The first of these charters was only a recital and confirmation confirmation of the charters granted by former monarchs with this additional privilege; "that all the citizens of London shall be quit from toll or lastage, and every other custom, throughout all our lands, on this side and beyond the seas."

For this charter the citizens presented the king with three thousand marks; and immediately received a second charter, a copy of which we have subjoined.

"John, by the grace of God, king of England, lord of Ireland, duke of Normandy, Aquitaine, and earl of Anjou; to his archbishops, bishops, abbots, earls, barons, justices, sheriffs, stewards, castle-keepers, constables, bailiffs, ministers and all his faithful subjects, greeting:

"Know ye all, that we for our soul's health, and for the souls health of Henry our father, and all our predecessors; and also for the commonweal of our city of London, and all our realm; have granted and steadfastly commanded, that all the wares [or wears] which are in the Thames or in the Medway, be amoved, where-soever they shall be within the Thames and the Medway; and that no wares from henceforth be put any where in the Thames or Medway, upon forfeiture of ten pounds sterling; also we have clearly quit-claimed all that, which the keepers of the Tower of London were wont yearly to receive of the said wares: wherefore we will and steadfastly command, that no keeper of the said Tower, at any time hereafter, exact any thing from any body, nor trouble or molest any person, by reason of the said wares; for it is sufficiently manifest to us, by the right reverend Hubert, archbishop of Canterbury, and other our faithful subjects, it is given us sufficiently to understand, that very great detriment and discommodity hath grown to our said city of London, and also to our realm, by occasion of these wares; which to the intent it may continue both firm and stable for ever, we do fortify the same by inscription of this present page, and putting to our seal:

"These being witnesses, William of London, Eustace of Ely, Godfrey of Winchester, bishops; Jeffrey, son of Peter, earl of Essex; William Marshall, earl of Pembroke; H. earl of Warren; earl Rogers Pigott; R. earl of Clare; earl de Braos; Robert, son of Roger, Hugh Bord, William Brewer, Stephen Turnham, William Warren, Simon of Pattishel: given by the hands of Hubert, archbishop of Canterbury our chancellor, at Shoreham, the seventeenth day of June, in the first year of our reign."

This charter extends the jurisdiction of the city of London over the river Medway, as it before had the conservancy of the Thames, and granted a power to inflict a penalty of ten pounds, on any person who should erect a wear or wears in either of those rivers.

The third charter which was granted but a few days after the second, exhibits peculiar marks of the kings regard to the city of London; for his majesty therein grants them the fee-farm of the sheriffwicks of London and Middlesex at the ancient rent; and likewise allows them the power of chusing their own sheriffs.

The following is a copy of this charter:

"John, by the grace of God, king of England, lord of Ireland, duke of Normandy, Aquitaine, and earl of Anjou; to his archbishops, bishops, abbots, earls, barons, justices, sheriffs, rulers, and to all his bailiffs and loving subjects:

"Know ye, that we have granted, and by this our present writing confirmed, to our citizens of London, the sheriffwicks of London and Middlesex, with all the customs and things to the sheriffwick belonging, within the city and without, by land and by water, to have and to hold to them and their heirs, of us and our heirs, paying therefore three hundred pounds of blank sterling money, at two terms in the year; that is to say, at the easter exchequer, one hundred and fifty pounds; and at Michaelmas exchequer, one hundred and fifty pounds; saving to the citizens of London all their liberties and free customs.

"And further, we have granted to the citizens of London, that they amongst themselves make sheriffs whom they will; and may amove them when they will; and those whom they make sheriffs, they shall present to our justices of our exchequer, of these things, which to the said sheriffwick appertain, whereof they ought to answer us; and unless they shall sufficiently answer and satisfy, the citizens may answer and satisfy us the amerciements and farm, saving to the said citizens their liberties as is aforesaid; and saving to the said sheriffs the same liberties, which other citizens have: so that, if they which shall be appointed sheriffs for the time being, shall commit any offence, whereby they ought to incur any amerciament of money, they shall not be condemned for any more than to the amerciament of twenty pounds, and that without the damage of other citizens, if the sheriffs be not sufficient for the payment of their amerciements: but, if they do any offence, whereby they ought to incur the loss of their lives or members; they shall be adjudged, as they ought to be, according to the law of the city; and of these things, which to the said sheriffs belong, the sheriffs shall answer before our justices at our exchequer, saving to the said sheriffs the liberties which other citizens of London have.

"Also this grant and confirmation we have made to the citizens of London for the amendment of the said city, and because it was in ancient times farmed for three hundred pounds: wherefore we will and steadfastly command, that the citizens of London and their heirs may have and hold the sheriffwick of London and Middlesex, with all things to the said sheriffwick belonging, of us and our heirs, to possess and enjoy hereditarily, freely and quietly, honourably and wholly, by fee-farm

Engraved for Chamberlain's History of London.

Henry Fitzalwine Lord Mayor of London
FIRST LORD MAYOR OF LONDON

Sir William Wallworth
LORD MAYOR OF LONDON

" farm of three hundred pounds; and we forbid
 " that none presume to do any damage, impediment or diminishment to the citizens of London
 " of these things, which to the said sheriffwick
 " do or were accustomed to appertain: Also we " will and command, that if we or our heirs, or " any of our justices, shall give or grant to any " person any of those things which to the farm
 " of the sheriffwick appertain, the same shall be " accounted to the citizens of London, in the " acquittal of the said farm at our exchequer.
 " Witness Edward of Ely, Savarick of Bath,
 " bishops; William Marshal, earl of Pembroke,
 " &c. &c."

This is the first conveyance on record, in which we find the terms, to have and to hold, which have been since, and still are considered as essential to all conveyances.

If we may credit the authority of Arnold's Chronicle, in the year 1200, thirty-five persons were made choice of by the wise men of the city, and formed into a council to hold the assizes in London.

In the year 1201, king John granted a fourth charter to the city of London, by which the guild or fraternity of weavers were expelled the city, as it is imagined for some great offence; but what their crime was, is not recorded; tho' a certain writer is of opinion that it must have been very heinous, as the whole community were expelled, for so trifling an addition as two marks annually to the royal revenue.

The following is a copy of this fourth charter:

" John, by the grace of God, king of England, lord of Ireland, duke of Normandy and Aquitaine, and earl of Anjou; to his archbishops, bishops, abbots, earls, barons, justices, sheriffs, and to all his bailiffs and faithful subjects, greeting: Know ye, that we, at the request of our mayor and citizens of London, have granted, and by this our present writing confirmed, that the guild of weavers shall not from henceforth be in the city of London, neither shall be at all maintained: but, because we have been accustomed yearly to receive eighteen marks in money, every year, of the said guild; our said citizens shall pay unto us and our heirs twenty marks in money, for a gift, at the feast of St. Michael, at our exchequer.
 " Witness Hubert, archbishop of Canterbury,
 " &c. &c."

It appears from the great roll of the exchequer, that in the first year of the reign of king John, the farm of the Cambium, or Exchange of London, was let upon lease for a term of years, to one Guy de Von, who in the fourth year of the same reign stood indebted to the crown, in the sum of one thousand and sixty-six pounds, eight shillings and four-pence, for the farm of the said exchange; which proves the trade of London to have been very considerable at that time.

The office of chamberlain of London likewise appears to have been very profitable, about the same period of time; for in the year 1204, William de St. Michael paid the king a fine of one hundred pounds for the same, and agreed to pay a rent of one hundred marks annually; by which it is also evident that this office was then vested in the crown.

In the same year 1204, a severe frost began on New-year's day, which, according to some authors, held till the nineteenth, and according to others, till the twenty-fifth of March: which occasioned the price of wheat to be advanced to twelve shillings the quarter, a great part of the seed having been damaged in the ground by the frost.

In the year 1207, Henry Fitz-Alwyn, the chief magistrate of this city, by the title of Bailiff, or Custos, was honoured with that of Mayor.*

Matthew Paris informs us, that in the year 1210, king John summoned a parliament to meet him at his palace in St. Bride's parish, (on the spot of ground where Bridewell hospital now stands) when he exacted one hundred thousand pounds from the clergy and religious houses, and forty thousand pounds from the white friars or monks in particular.

In the same year the bishops of London, Ely, and Worcester, laid the city of London, and other parts of the kingdom, under an interdict, by command of pope Innocent, because the king refused to obey the imperious orders of the see of Rome.

In consequence of this interdict, almost all ecclesiastical ceremonies ceased, the churches and church-yards were shut up, the bodies of the deceased were buried in the highways and ditches; and no burial service read over them.

King John being offended with the citizens; though historians do not relate the cause of his anger, he this year removed his exchequer from Westminster to Northampton, as a punishment for the offence.

The weakness of this monarch having induced him to take such measures as lost him in a great degree the affections of his subjects, and the public safety becoming every day more and more precarious, the citizens of London determined to put that city into a proper posture of defence:

In consequence of this resolution, they, in the year 1211, began to encompass the wall of the city with a ditch two hundred feet wide, and of a great depth; and this great work was completed in the year 1213.

Robert Fitzwater, castellan and standard-bearer of the city of London, having espoused the cause of the malecontent barons, and refused to give security for his fidelity to king John, fled into France: upon which the king gave orders for the demolishing of Fitzwater's stately palace, called Baynard's-Castle, which was situated at the south-end of Thames-street.

Soon after this the king summoned a convention of the states to be held in St. Paul's cathedral, where, in the presence of Nicholas, bishop of Frescati, the pope's legate, he acknowledged and renewed a scandalous subjection of his crown to the pope, which he had before made to a former legate named Pandulph; to whom the king's charter, sealed with wax, having been heretofore delivered, it was now re-delivered to Pandulph, with a seal of gold.

* This is related on the authority of

ARNOLD, in his Chronicle.

The king having agreed to pay the pope a large sum of money for taking off the national debt, the citizens of London were obliged to pay two thousand marks towards the same: but to prevent as much as possible those murmurs which he had but too much reason to apprehend, he granted the citizens his fifth and last charter, a copy of which we have subjoined:

" John, by the grace of God, king of England, duke of Normandy, Aquitain, and earl of Anjou; to his archbishops, bishops, abbots, earls, barons, justices, sheriffs, rulers, and to all his faithful subjects, greeting:

" Know ye, that we have granted, and by this our present writing confirmed, to our barons of our city of London, that they may choose to themselves every year a mayor, who to us may be faithful, discreet, and fit for government of the city, so as, when he shall be chosen, to be presented unto us, or our justice, (if we shall not be present); and he shall swear to be faithful to us; and that it shall be lawful to them, at the end of the year, to amove him, and substitute another, if they will, or the same to retain, so as he be presented unto us, or our justice, if we shall not be present. We have granted to the same our barons, and by this our present charter confirmed, that they well and in peace, freely, quietly, and wholly, have all their liberties, which hitherto they have used, as well in the city of London as without, as well by water as by land, and in all other places, saving to us our chamberlainship: Wherefore we will and streightly command, that our aforesaid barons of our aforesaid city of London may chuse unto themselves a mayor of themselves, in manner and form aforesaid; and that they may have all the aforesaid liberties well and in peace, wholly and fully, with all things to the same liberties appertaining, as is aforesaid.

" Witness the lords, P. of Winton, William of Worcester, William of Coventry, bishops; William Brigword; Peter, son of Herbert, &c. &c.

The citizens of London, by this charter, received a confirmation of their antient rights and privileges, with the additional one of chusing their own chief magistrate, the king reserving to himself the nomination of a chamberlain only.

King John appears to have been, upon the whole, an enemy to the liberties of the people; but his subjects were not of that kind who would easily submit to resign those rights, which ought ever to be held sacred in the esteem of every free-born Englishman; this will sufficiently appear in the sequel.

The barons of the kingdom, determined to assert their rights and liberties, assembled in great numbers at St. Edmundsbury, under pretence of devotion, and there took a solemn oath at the altar of the church, that they would repair to the king, and demand a re-establishment of king Edward's laws, and a confirmation of all the constitutional acts, contained in the charter of Henry the first; and if the king refused to comply with their demand, to compel his acquiescence by force of arms.

In pursuance of this resolution, they, in the beginning of January 1214, repaired to London, and going to the new temple (where now stand the inns of court) the residence of the king, they made their demands; alledging, that they required nothing but what he had solemnly sworn to grant at the time of his absolution at Winchester.

John could not deny that he had made such a promise; but in order to put off the evil day, he desired till Easter to give his answer. This was complied with; but instead of giving an answer to the satisfaction of the barons, he then treated their demand with the utmost contempt.

Hereupon the barons, resolving to effect by force what they could not obtain from the favour and justice of the king, set on foot a private negotiation with some of the principal citizens of London, who soon prevailed on their fellow citizens to join in opposing a prince who had always considered his own arbitrary will as a law, and had oppressed his subjects to a degree not to be borne by a free and spirited people.

The army of the barons was at this time encamped at Bedford; where private messengers arrived from London, with advice that the city was ready to admit them, provided they made their approaches with secrecy and resolution.

On receipt of this agreeable intelligence, they proceeded to Ware in Hertfordshire, and marching from thence in the night, arrived at London early in the morning of Sunday the twenty-fourth of May, without the king's receiving the least intelligence of their approach, notwithstanding he was at that time in the Tower of London.

The gates being opened for their reception, they entered the city by Aldgate, and being joined by their friends, took possession of the city, while the greater part of the inhabitants were employed at their devotions.

They now began to plunder the houses of the royalists and Jews, the latter of which they pulled down, and repaired the city walls with the ruins thereof.

Their next step was to besiege the Tower of London; and as their numbers increased every day, by the junction of the nobility and gentry, the king found himself under a necessity of endeavouring to compromise all matters in dispute between him and his discontented subjects.

With this view he offered to refer the decision of the matter to four noblemen to be chosen from each party, and to leave the arbitration of the whole to the pope: but this proposal being rejected, he submitted at discretion, promised to grant them all their demands, and consented to send commissioners to a conference to be held between Staines and Windsor.

Accordingly, on the fifteenth day of July, the barons made their appearance, and after a conference of a few days, the deputies adjusted the

the articles of the two valuable charters, called MAGNA CHARTA, and Charta de Foresta, in the former of which it is expressly stipulated, that "the city of London shall have all its ancient privileges and free customs, as well by land as by water."

These noble charters were most solemnly ratified and confirmed at Runnymede, near Staines; and as that called Magna Charta has been always considered as the great basis of English liberty, and every reader must consequently be greatly interested therein, we shall subjoin an abstract of the principle heads thereof as we find it recorded in Clarendon's History of England:

"Magna Charta, or the great charter, confirmed what was lately granted to the clergy, relative to the freedom of elections; allowed persons to leave the kingdom without special licence, except in time of war; ordained that no clergyman should be amerced in proportion to his benefice, but according to his lay tenement; secured to the lay nobility, the custody of vacant abbeys and convents, which were under their patronage; ascertained the reliefs for earldoms, baronies, and knight's fees, which before were arbitrary; decreed that barons should recover the lands of their vassals, forfeited for felony, after they should have been a year and a day in the possession of the crown; that they should enjoy the wardships of their military tenants, who held no other lands of the crown by a different tenure; that a person knighted by the king, though a minor, should enjoy the privileges of an adult at law, provided he was a ward of the crown; but such knighthood conferred on a ward of a baron, should not deprive that baron of his wardship; that widows should not be forced to marry against their inclination, or to pay any fine for their dower; that the wardships of minors should not be sold; that guardians should not take unreasonable profits from the lands of their wards, or commit waste, but keep the houses in good repair, leave the farms well stocked, and dispose of their wards in marriage, without disparagement; that no scutage should be levied in the kingdom without the consent of the common-council of the realm, except in the cases of ransoming the king's person, knighting his eldest son, or marrying his eldest daughter; that no freeman shall be taken, imprisoned, or disseized of his freehold, liberties, or free customs, but by the lawful judgment of his peers, or by legal process; that sheriffs should not hold county courts above once a month; that they, as well as castellans, coroners, and king's bailiffs, should be restrained from holding pleas of the crown; that sheriffs who had the management of the crown revenues within their several districts, should not raise the farms of counties, hundreds, and tythes according to their pleasure, except in the king's demesne manors; that the people should not be unjustly prosecuted, and put to canonical purgation, without legal proof, in regard to carriages, purveyance of victuals and other services; that amerciaments should be proportioned to the offence, and circumstances of the offenders, so as not to affect his landed estate, or disable him from following his vocation, but be rated by the verdict of twelve creditable men in the neighbourhood."

The king, however, was so far from being sincere in his engagements, that he made no scruple of breaking through most of them, and applied to the pope for absolution, and to several foreign princes for their assistance; agreeing at the same time, that should he through their means conquer his rebellious subjects, he would immediately make them masters of their possessions: in consequence of this promise, a prodigious number of mercenary troops from Flanders, Gascony, Brabant, Poictou and Normandy, arrived in England, and entered into his service. Upon this, the barons retired to London, convinced they should not be able to withstand a power so far superior to their own; at which place a messenger from the pope arrived almost as soon as themselves, and announced a bull of excommunication not only against the barons, but the whole city, for having joined them.

The barons and citizens alike affected to treat the pope's bull with contempt; and John, taking advantage of their inactivity, destroyed all their castles, and committed great devastations upon their estates.

This roused them; and, determined to be revenged on their perfidious monarch, they sent ambassadors to France, with an invitation to Lewis, the eldest son of king Philip, to accept the crown of England.

The predominant passion of the young prince was ambition; no wonder then if he embraced the proposal. Messengers arrived from France with acknowledgements of the signal proof the Londoners had given him of their esteem, which were soon followed by himself at the head of a most powerful army.

On his arrival, he received oaths of allegiance from the barons and citizens, and he swore to restore their laws, their liberties, and their possessions.

The citizens kept their engagements; but John dying, William, earl of Pembroke taking the part of Henry his son, persuaded about fifty of the barons to desert Lewis, and acknowledge him for their sovereign.

Lewis, upon this, was constrained to agree to a truce: and going over to France soon returned to London with fresh supplies: previous to his arrival, however, the king's troops had taken the field, and lay encamped before the castle of Mount Sorrel in the county of Leicester: Lewis immediately dispatched 600 knights from London, and upwards of 20,000 regular troops to relieve the besieged; and upon their appearance in the field, the earl of Chester raised the siege.

However, Lewis was not every where successful, for a prodigious number of the French being defeated at Lincoln, and much about the same time, a fleet, with powerful supplies, destroyed by some ships fitted out by the cinque ports, he was constrained to keep close in London, where being reduced to great straits; he desired a negotiation for peace might take place; adding that he hoped hoped and expected, from the known generosity of the English, no terms would be offered but such as he might, consistent with his honour, acquiesce in.

In short, a treaty was concluded, in which Lewis took care to have the rights and privileges of the citizens confirmed; and, as a testimony of their gratitude, the citizens lent him 5000 marks to discharge the debts he had contracted, after doing which, he returned home.

Upon the departure of Lewis, the young king made his public entry into London with great pomp, and was received with every possible demonstration of sincere affection; notwithstanding which, the court had conceived a violent dislike to the citizens, which it was no easy matter to subdue.

CHAPTER VIII.

The forest of Middlesex disforested. The goal of Newgate repaired at the expence of the crown. A great riot in consequence of a wrestling-match between the citizens of London and the inhabitants of Westminster. The rioters executed, and sureties given for the good behaviour of the citizens. Magna Charta confirmed in parliament. A terrible storm of thunder and lightning. An order that sheriffs should hold their office only one year. Hubert de Burg, the justiciary, narrowly escapes the vengeance of the citizens. The original of paying a quit-rent of six horseshoes into the exchequer. King Henry's splendid entrance into London. Water first brought in pipes to the city, and preserved for use in conduits. Custom of the Lord-mayor and aldermen hunting annually on the eighteenth of September. The Jews of London compelled to pay the king a tax of twenty thousand marks. The falling down of part of the Tower of London. An inundation of the Thames. The wonderful death of Griffith, son of Leoline, prince of Wales. The king seizes the liberties of the city. The Lord-mayor and citizens purchase the fee-farm of Queenhithe.

IN the year 1218, being the second year of Henry the third, the citizens paid a tax of forty marks for the privilege of selling a certain kind of cloth, which was not two full yards broad, which was the breadth limited by law.

In the same year the forest of Middlesex was disforested, and many of the citizens purchasing different parts of it to build on, the city and suburbs were greatly enlarged. About the same period the sheriffs of London, agreeable to an order from the king, began to repair the gaol of Newgate, for the expence of which the crown became answerable, which shews that the government of this goal was not then vested in the city. And in the same year, the citizens paid to his majesty, for the confirmation of their ancient rights and privileges, a fifteenth of their personal estates.

The ministry, in the year 1222, were furnished with a plausible pretext to execute their designs against the citizens of London, who had, as has been before observed, greatly offended the court, by their endeavours to fix the crown on the head of Lewis. A wrestling match being held at Matilda's hospital (now St. Giles's in the Fields) and the citizens greatly excelling the people of Westminster both in strength and activity, the abbot of Westminster's steward, mortified at the superiority of the Londoners, offered a ram as a prize to be wrestled for on the first day of August; and the unsuspecting citizens accepting the invitation, were set upon by a set of desperate, armed ruffians, who wounded many of them, and drove the rest from the field in the utmost confusion.

The Londoners, in revenge for the affront that had been offered them, resolved to punish the authors of it, and a prodigious number of them being assembled, and headed by one Constantine

Fitz Arnulph, a citizen of great property, they proceeded to Westminster, crying, "Mount Joye, Mount Joye, God help us and our lord Lewis," and returned to London in triumph, after having pulled down several houses which were the property of the abbot and his perfidious steward.

The citizens hearing that a complaint was made to Philip Dawbney, one of the king's council, of the damage done to the abbot's property, beset his house, beat his servants, and took away twelve of his horses; and the abbot, endeavouring to make his escape by means of a back-door, was discovered by some of the mob, and pelted to the river-side, where he took water, and escaped their fury.

Shortly after this transaction, the mayor, and principal citizens were summoned to attend Hubert de Burg, the chief justiciary, at the tower of London; where it being demanded who was the ringleader of the rioters, Fitz Arnulph said he was happy that he could say it was himself; upon this bold confession, the justiciary dismissed all the company except Fitz Arnulph and his nephew, and though he offered fifteen thousand marks for his pardon, they were hanged the next morning.

Many others of the rioters were afterwards apprehended by the justiciary, who, without the least form of trial, ordered their hands and feet to be cut off, and their bodies burnt: and not contented with the grievous cruelties he had inflicted, he degraded the mayor and aldermen, obliged thirty persons of great property to become sureties for the good behaviour of the citizens, and set a guard over the city: and the king obliged the citizens to pay him many thousand marks before he would be reconciled to them.

In the year 1224, the Londoners addressed the king, king, soliciting that he would be pleased to confirm to them their rights and privileges, which he at last agreed to. Notwithstanding an ordinance made to the contrary, Henry, the next year, exempted the citizens from prosecutions for manufacturing lifted cloth, called Burells.

In the same year, in the parliament held at Westminster, Magna Charta was confirmed; and a right to have a common seal was granted by the king to the commonalty of the city.

Henry grew every year a greater tyrant; and in the year 1227, he extorted from the citizens of London five thousand marks, observing, that they could not hesitate paying a sum to their king, which they had voluntarily given to Lewis, his enemy. However, the king, in the same year, granted to them five charters; the first of which is nothing more than an exemplification of that granted by king John, confirming to the citizens of London the sheriffwick of London and Middlesex. The second of these charters is a recital of king John's charter for confirming to the citizens the right of electing a mayor of London; the third the same that was granted by that monarch, for granting to the city the conservancy of the rivers Medway and Thames; the fourth a repetition of the charters of king Henry the first, and Henry the second, relative to acquittal of murder, pleadings, toll, recovery of debts, right of hunting, and release from bridol, childwite, jerisgive, and scotale. But by the fifth the citizens of London and others, who had purchased lands in the disforested warren of Staines, were exempted from all taxes and exactions, and had many other freedoms granted to them and their heirs for ever.

Henry at the same time, granted two clerks and two serjeants to the sheriffs of London. In the year 1229, fresh exactions were made by the king on the citizens, who patiently submitted and raised him a prodigious sum, by several taxes, which were collected by the aldermen.

On St. Paul's day, in the following year, while Roger Niger, bishop of London, was celebrating mass in St. Paul's, the atmosphere was suddenly overspread with darkness, loud claps of thunder were heard, and it lighten'd incessantly; which so terrified the congregation, that they left the bishop and one deacon, and ran out of the church in great disorder and confusion.

About the same time, it being discovered that many of the preceding sheriffs had taken bribes of victuallers, and extorted money from their fellow citizens, an ordinance was made by the magistrates of the city, that, in future, the sheriffs should continue no longer than one year in office.

A great fire breaking out in the year 1232, destroyed a great part of the city: and in the same year, the sum of twenty thousand pounds was extorted from the citizens for the use of the king.

It is the opinion of most writers, that Hubert de Burg was the adviser of every arbitrary and oppressive measure put in execution against the citizens: the villain, however, was at length disgraced, and, the king demanding an account of his receipts and disbursements relative to the public, he fled for sanctuary to the priory of Merton, which so exasperated Henry, that he issued a proclamation that all such persons as had any complaint to make of the justiciary, should immediately make application to him, with a full state of their grievances. Upon which the citizens accused him of arbitrarily and illegally putting to death Constantine Fitz-Arnulph; they also charged him with being guilty of extortion; and many other acts of injustice; and the king immediately sent a precept to the Lord-mayor of London to repair to Merton priory, and seize Hubert, and bring him to London.

The citizens no sooner heard the commission than they assembled to the number of twenty thousand, resolving to fulfil the king's command with alacrity, and were preparing to set forward on their expedition; when several of the graver citizens, fearing some ill consequences might arise from the appearance of so many men in arms; they requested the advice of the bishop of Winchester, who told them that the king's orders must be obeyed at all events.

However, Ranulph, earl of Chester, applying to the king in favour of the justiciary, his majesty was prevailed on to revoke his former orders, to the great mortification of the citizens, who were thus disappointed of wreaking their vengeance on their inveterate foe.

In the year 1235, one Walter le Bruin, a farrier, obtained of the king the grant of a piece of ground, in the parish of St. Clement Danes, for the purpose of erecting a forge; which lease was granted on the following very singular terms.

Le Bruin was bound to deliver annually into the exchequer, a quit-rent of six horseshoes, with the nails thereto belonging: and though this piece of ground is not at present in possession of the city of London, yet the custom of making this tender at the exchequer, by the hands of the sheriffs, is still kept up.

The marriage of king Henry with Eleanor, second daughter of Raymond, earl of Provence, having been solemnized at Canterbury, the royal pair set forwards to make their public entry into London; on which occasion they were met on the road by the mayor, aldermen, and chief citizens, to the number of three hundred and sixty; mounted on fine horses, dressed in robes of embroidered silk, and each man carrying in his hand a cup of gold or silver, as an emblem of the office claimed by the mayor of London, of being chief butler at the coronation of the kings of England.

This pompous procession was preceded by the king's trumpeters, and those streets of the city through which they passed, were most splendidly adorned with pageants, rich silks, and a great variety of elegant exhibitions.

In this manner the cavalcade proceeded to Westminster, where the citizens attended the coronation of the queen: at night the city was illuminated in the most beautiful manner by lamps; &c. and every mark of joy and loyalty was shewn on the occasion.

About this period, a great want of water prevailing in London, occasioned in a great degree by the encroachment of buildings on the fresh water canals about the city, many of the more substantial citizens contributed in a liberal manner to a scheme for bringing water from six fountains in the town of Tyburn; which was accordingly carried into execution, and is the first instance on record of water being conveyed to the city by means of pipes.

M

ner

In several parts of the city were erected conduits for the reception of this water, the first of which was built in the year 1285, at the west end of Cheapside; * and these conduits were found so convenient, that they soon increased to nineteen in number, and were supplied by water pipes from different wells or fountains in the neighbourhood of the city, and from the river Thames.

But these conduits having been long since rendered useless by the present method of conveying water from the Thames and New-River, they have been totally removed for some years past; by which the passage through the principal streets of the city is much less obstructed than it was in former times.

We are told by an ancient writer, that when these conduits were in use, it was customary for the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and principal citizens, to repair on horseback, annually, on the eighteenth of September, to visit the heads from whence the conduits were supplied, and to hunt a hare in the morning, and a fox after dinner, in the fields adjacent to the town of Tyburn.

In the year 1241, the Jews of the city of Norwich having presumed to circumcise a christian child, were punished in an exemplary manner; and though the Jews of London were supposed to have had no concern in, or knowledge of this transaction, yet the king made this circumstance a pretence for extorting twenty thousand marks from that people, which they paid, to avoid perpetual imprisonment, which was threatened in case of their refusal.

About this time an accident happened which gave great pleasure to the citizens. The king having, in the year 1239, added some fortifications to the Tower of London, these buildings fell suddenly to the ground, and were totally destroyed. The satisfaction of the citizens on this event arose from their having been informed that these additional buildings had been erected as prisons for such of the Londoners as should assert their ancient rights and privileges, in opposition to the will of their arbitrary sovereign.

The river Thames having overflowed and broken down its banks at Lambeth, in the year 1242, a great inundation followed, which laid the country totally under water for the space of six miles, by which the inhabitants sustained prodigious damage.

In the year 1243, Beatria, countess of Provence, mother to the queen of England, paid a visit to this kingdom, and was received by the Londoners with a splendor and magnificence, which are great testimonies of their loyalty to a prince, who by his frequent exactions and arbitrary sway, does not seem to have merited so great a compliment.

The countess of Provence was attended by her daughter Ciacia, bride to Richard, brother to the king, whose nuptials were celebrated soon after their arrival, with a degree of pomp, which perhaps has been hitherto unequalled in this kingdom; for if the authority of Matthew Paris may be relied on, there were no less than thirty thousand dishes served up at the wedding dinner.

A very singular accident happened in the year 1244, to Griffith, eldest son of Leoline, prince of Wales, who being imprisoned in the Tower of London, attempted to make his escape from the top of that building, by the help of tablecloths, sheets, and hangings, tied together; but being a very corpulent man, he fell to the ground, and in such a position, that his neck was broke, and his head was driven between his shoulders, quite into his body.

In the year 1244, king Henry extorted fifteen hundred marks from the citizens of London, under the pretence of punishing them for permitting one Walter Buckerel, (who had been banished twenty years before) to reside in the city; though this very king had himself pardoned Buckerel, by his letters patent, before he presumed to return to his native country.

In the year following the king extorted a thousand marks more from the citizens; and not long afterwards he seized upon the liberties of the city, and degraded the magistrates, for a false judgment given against Margaret Veil, a poor widow; on which occasion William Haverel, and Edward of Westminster, were by the king appointed Custodes of the city of London.

At this period the mayor and commonalty of this city, purchased the fee-farm of Queenhithe, of Richard, earl of Cornwall, brother to the king, as will more fully appear by the following charter:

“ Henry, by the grace of God, king of England, lord of Ireland, duke of Normandy, and Aquitaine, and earl of Anjou; to all archbishops, bishops, priors, earls, barons, justices, sheriffs, rulers, ministers, and all bailiffs, and his faithful subjects, greeting.

“ Know ye, that we have seen a covenant made between Richard earl of Cornwall, our brother, on the one part, and the mayor and commonalty of the city of London, on the other part, in these words: In the thirtieth year of the reign of Henry, the son of king John, on the day of the translation of St. Edward, this covenant was made at Westminster, between the right honourable man, Richard earl of Cornwall, on the one part, and John Gisors, then mayor of the city of London, and the commonalty of the same city of London, on the other part, for and concerning certain exactions and demands belonging to Queenhithe, of the city of London; that is to say, that the said earl hath granted for him and his heirs, that the said mayor and all the mayors after him, and all the commonalty of the said city, may have and hold the said Queenhithe, with all their liberties, customs, and other things to the same belonging, in fee-farm, paying therefore yearly to the said earl, his heirs and assigns, fifty pounds, at two terms in the year, at Clerkenwell; that is * Then called Westbeap.

“ is to say, at the close of Easter twenty-five “ pounds; and in Octavis of St. Michael twenty-“ five pounds; and for the more surety thereof, “ to the part of the chirography remaining with
 “ the mayor and commonalty of London, the “ said earl hath put his seal; and to the writing “ thereof remaining with the said earl, the “ foresaid mayor and commonalty have set their “ common seal. We therefore, allowing and “ approving the said covenant, do; for us and “ our heirs, grant and confirm the same: These “ same being witnesses, Ralph, son of Nicholas, “ Richard de Grey, &c. given by our hand at “ Windsor, the twenty sixth day of February,

 “ in the twenty-first year of our reign.

CHAPTER IX.

London damaged by an earthquake. The original of Tothill fair. King Henry's cruel extortion of money from the citizens. Quarrel between Richard the king's brother and the citizens. The mayor deposed. Charter granted by Henry. Escape of John Gate from Newgate, with its consequences. The goods of the citizens seized by order of the king. The sheriffs committed to the Marshalsea, but bailed by the whole body of the citizens. The king grants the citizens the liberty of pleading their own cause without employing a lawyer. The city wall repaired. A servant of William de Valence, half-brother to the king, stoned to death by the populace. Bakers convicted of Mal-practices, exposed in the streets in a dung-cart. The first gold coined in London. Account of a terrible famine.

ON the thirteenth of February 1247, there happened a dreadful earthquake, which threw down many of the houses in the city of London and occasioned other considerable damage.

King Henry lived in so profuse and extravagant a manner, that he was perpetually in want of money; and at length was reduced to such extremity for a supply, as to entertain serious thoughts of selling his plate and jewels; and enquiring where he could find a purchaser, he was told in London, to which he replied “ those clownish Londoners
 “ who call themselves barons, are an immense
 “ treasure of themselves;” adding his opinion,
 “ that “ if the treasure of Augustus Cæsar was
 “ to be sold, the city of London could purchase
 “ it.”

Henry, however, did not dispose of his jewels, but had recourse to a method full as effectual, to raise the sums he wanted. This was no other than the passing a grant to Richard de Crokeley, abbot of Westminster, to hold an annual fair, for the space of fifteen days, at Tothill, where the street of that name now stands.

This grant being made, his majesty issued strict orders, that during the time of Tothill fair the citizens should carry on no kind of trade, either publicly or privately; the consequence of which was, that the Londoners paid the king a large sum of money, to be rid of such an intolerable grievance.

Henry spent his Christmas, in the year 1249, among the citizens of London; begged considerable sums of them by way of new-years gift, and soon after he left the city, compelled them to pay two thousand pounds at once; not content with which arbitrary proceedings, he even encouraged his dependants to enter the shops of the citizens, and forcibly take away their goods.

Henry's tyranny was now increased to such a degree, that many of the most eminent of the citizens retired into the country, being resolved to live no longer under the immediate eye of so rapacious a tyrant.

The king dreading left the depopulation of the city of London should deprive him of his usual resources in time of necessity, issued an order for the magistrates of the city to attend him in Westminster Hall, where, in the presence of the nobility, he solemnly promised never to oppress them again; but that they should live in the quiet possession of the fruits of their industry.

This, though it appeased the minds of the citizens for the present, appears to have been nothing more than a vile piece of dissimulation; for in the year 1251, the king ordered prosecutions to be commenced against a body of Italian usurers in London, who, under pretence of being the pope's merchants, had for a long time carried on a most pernicious and destructive trade of usury.

Hereupon several of the usurers were taken up and imprisoned, while others took sanctuary until the affair could be accommodated with the king; which, in fact, was easily effected, for upon paying his majesty a large sum of money, they were permitted to renew their pernicious trade, and to continue it without molestation.

About the same time the citizens were summoned to Westminster, where the king proposed to them the undertaking of the holy war, which being declined by the whole assembly except three persons, Henry upbraided them in the most ignominious terms; and shortly after not only obliged them to pay him a fine of twenty marks in gold (200 in silver) but ordered all the shops in the city to be kept shut, Tothill fair to be held in the dead of winter, and four-pence a day to be paid by them for the maintenance of a white bear in the Tower of London, and its keeper.

A quarrel happening, the next year, between some of the king's domestics, and some young citizens (which quarrel was secretly set on foot by Henry) he ordered the citizens to pay him one thousand thousand marks, and afterwards issued a writ for distraining the citizens for a tax called the queen's gold.

Shortly after, upon a quarrel between the citizens, and Richard, the king's brother, relative to the exchange of some lands, the latter accused the mayor of conniving at the iniquitous practices of bakers who sold bread short of weight; upon which the king deprived the city of its most valuable liberties, ordained a guard to be set over the inhabitants, and deposed the mayor: However, Henry, granted them the following charter, upon their paying six hundred marks to Richard, and five hundred marks to himself:

" Henry, by the grace of God, king of England, lord of Ireland, duke of Normandy, and Aquitaine, and earl of Anjou; to his archbishops, bishops, abbots, priors, earls, barons, justices, sheriffs, rulers, ministers, and all his bailiffs and faithful people, greeting.

" Know ye, that we have granted for us and our heirs, and confirmed it by this our present charter, that our mayor and citizens of London may have and hold all their liberties and free customs, which they had in the time of king Henry our grandfather, and which they had by charters of our ancestors, kings of England, as they more better and freely had the same, and they most freely and fully have and use the same for ever.

" Also we have granted to the said citizens, that every mayor, whom they shall chuse in our city of London, (we being not at Westminster) they may yearly present to the barons of our exchequer, that he may be admitted by them as mayor, so notwithstanding, at the next coming of us or our heirs to Westminster or London, he be presented to us or our heirs, and so admitted mayor. And we will and command, for us and our heirs, that, out of the farm of our city of London, there be allowed to our sheriff of the said city yearly, in his said account, seven pounds, at our exchequer, for the liberty of St. Paul's, London: and that our said citizens throughout all our dominions as well on this side the sea as beyond, be quit of all toll and custom for ever, as in the charters of the aforesaid kings is granted. And we forbid, upon our forfeiture, that none presume henceforth to vex or disturb the said citizens, contrary to this liberty, and our grant: these being witnesses, the reverend father P. bishop of Hereford; Richard, earl of Cornwall, &c."

In the year 1254 the sheriffs of London were committed to the Marshalsea prison for the non-payment of a tax they had agreed to pay to the royal consort, called Aurum Regina, * for the restitution of their liberties; and in the same year the same persons, together with the mayor, were again committed to the same prison, for arrears of a sum agreed by them to be paid towards the king's voyage into Gascony.

About the same time a prisoner in Newgate, named John Gate, otherwise Offrem, † having made his escape, the king ordered the mayor and sheriffs to attend him at the Tower of London, where, being satisfied of the innocence of the mayor, he suffered him to depart, but notwithstanding the charge against the sheriffs was unsupported by the least shadow of truth or argument, he confined them in the Tower for a month.

It seems the state of the case was this: the bishop of London, as soon as the above criminal was apprehended, desired leave of the sheriffs to commit him to Newgate, which the sheriffs agreed to, on condition that the bishop should appoint proper persons to prevent his escaping; the bishop accordingly set a guard over him, which guard assisted him in his elopement.

Notwithstanding the truth of this appeared on the examination of the sheriffs at the Tower, the king compelled the citizens to pay a fine of three thousand marks, and degraded both the sheriffs.

Shortly after this the citizens were summoned to attend the king, to have their city ‡ tallaged, when Henry demanded the sum of three thousand marks; but after some deliberation with the principal citizens, Ralph Hardel, the mayor, told the king that two thousand marks should, if he pleased, be immediately paid into the hands of his treasurer, but that they could not—they would not give him any more.

Upon this, the king ordered his lawyers to seek for a precedent for tallaging the city, and several being found, the citizens paid the sum demanded without farther hesitation.

The sheriffs being to distrain the citizens for the Aurum Regina, they at the return of the writ told the barons that they had not brought the money, not being able to find purchasers for certain Vadia, § which they had seized; upon which, they were ordered to attend the barons, and bring the said Vadia, on a day appointed.

The sheriffs attended agreeable to their instructions, when they informed the barons, that above a thousand citizens, consisting of drapers, spicers, and other tradesmen, had made a stout resistance, and would not suffer their property to be carried off.

Upon this declaration the sheriffs were immediately committed to the marshalsea, but were speedily bailed by the whole community of London, represented in the persons of Michael Tony, Robert Hardel, Thomas Adrian, and Simon de Cobham.

This incensing Henry, he degraded the mayor, appointed his under treasurer Custos of the city, and seized upon the liberties of the citizens, for the restoration of which they were obliged to pay the enormous sum of four thousand marks.

In the year 1257, the following articles was * The queen's gold.

† This man had been convicted of murdering a prior, who was related to the queen.

‡ The word tallage is derived from the French word

tailler, to share or cut out a part, and implies a share or part of the value of any man's goods or chattels; and was used as a general term, including all subsidies, taxes, &c.

§ Goods.

made use of by * Henry, by the means of which he continued his shameful exactions, and oppressed the citizens in a greater degree, if possible, than ever.

Under pretence of having found at Windsor, a roll of crimes committed by the city magistrates, he ordered John Mansell, his chief justice to summon a † folk-mote at St. Paul's church, to read the accusations, and to order the aldermen to chuse an inquisition of thirty-six persons out of their respective wards; the aldermen appeared according to their summons, but peremptorily refused to act contrary to the rights and established customs of the city.

Hereupon Mansell withdrew, and making the king acquainted with the behaviour of the citizens, they were next day ordered to attend him at Westminster, but he sent them back without seeing them, and ordered Mansell, attended by his council, to return to the city: the citizens, by order, being assembled at Guildhall, Mansell, with great plausibility, told them that the king, his master, intended to punish severely all such persons as had been accessory to oppressing his faithful commonalty of the city of London, and asked them, if such a proceeding would not be agreeable to them: the unthinking multitude unanimously cried out "yea, yea."—And Mansell immediately issued his orders for electing the constable of the Tower, Custos of the city, and John Adrian and Michael Tony, sheriffs: the people instantly saw their error, and breaking up the assembly, returned sorrowfully to their respective habitations.

A short time after, Mansell summoned the citizens to attend him at Guild-hall, where he chose out of them an inquisition of thirty-six, who, like the former, not acting, they, together with the mayor, aldermen, and four men from each ward, were ordered to attend the king in Westminster-hall, where Ralph Hardel, the late mayor, Nicholas Batt, Nicholas Fitzjosne, Matthew Buckerell, John Toleham, and John le Mynourie, were informed that they were found guilty, by the inquisition of their fellow citizens; and the charge being read, they solemnly avowed their innocence of every article, and begged they might be allowed to put themselves upon trial, and be condemned or acquitted by a jury of their countrymen.

This was denied, and they were again ordered to attend the king and council, at the same place, the next day, when Henry speaking with much warmth, two of them were so greatly terrified, that they directly threw themselves upon his mercy, while the rest desired to be tried by the laws of the city; but this request not being complied with, the charge was again ordered to be read to them, when each of them answered fully to every article, and they were for that time dismissed.

* Tho' most authors are, with us, of opinion that Henry was the contriver of this fraud, Mamwood tells us, that the roll of fictitious crimes was dropped in the king's wardrobe at Windsor, by some discontented citizens.

† The word Folk-mote signifies a general assembly of the people, which used to be held in St. Paul's church-yard, to

The day after, a folk-mote was, by order of the king, held at St. Paul's cross; and; the assembly being very numerous, the accused aldermen were fearful that the artful insinuations of Mansell might prejudice the populace so much in their disfavour, as to approve of the measures taken against them; they therefore threw themselves on the king's mercy, which being made known to him, they were ordered to attend the next day at Westminster, when they were told that the court had awarded, that they should be fined at their discretion, but that the king had been graciously pleased to mitigate their fines; for which they returned thanks in court upon their knees: but notwithstanding this shew of mercy, Henry was no sooner departed than they were all put under an arrest; however, they soon procured sufficient security, and, after paying immense sums, were restored at once to their former offices and the favour of the king.

At a folk-mote held at St. Paul's cross the day before the feast of St. Leonard, Henry acquainted the citizens with his design of visiting his foreign dominions; declaring that he would ever preserve their rights and liberties; and at the same time granted them the following very advantageous privilege, viz.

"That for the future every citizen should have liberty to plead his own cause, without being obliged to employ a lawyer, except in pleas that might concern the crown; that the wisdom of the court being certified of the truth of the affair, without any colouring, they might decree equal and just judgment to the parties concerned."

The walls and bulwarks of the city being in a ruinous condition, the citizens, by the command of Henry, repaired the same at a prodigious expence.

In the same year a person in the service of William de Valence, half brother to the king, having, without the smallest degree of provocation, dangerously wounded several of the citizens, was stoned to death by the populace; at which Henry was so highly offended, that he commanded the mayor immediately to attend him.

The mayor obeyed the summons, and, in his defence, said, that it was not possible for him to stop the resentment of the affronted populace, with which excuse the king appeared satisfied.

Shortly after, a court of itinerancy was held in London by Sir Hugh Bigot, when a great number of bakers, convicted of selling bread short of weight, and other mal-practices, were carried through the streets in a dung cart, and exposed to the resentment of the populace; and at the same time the above named judge ordered many persons to be punished for having been guilty of divers proceedings totally inconsistent with the rights and privileges of the citizens.

A penny of pure gold, was, this year, coined, which they were summoned by the ringing of a great bell, in a tower erected near the east end of St. Paul's church, which meeting was looked upon as the supreme assembly of the city, and was empowered to call the magistrates to account for misgovernment, to examine and determine the liberties and customs by a majority of voices, &c.

N

by

by order of the king, weighing two sterlings, and which is supposed to have been the first gold coined in England.

Towards the end of the same year a dreadful famine happened, occasioned by too much rain, when wheat was sold for no less than one pound four shillings per quarter.

We are informed by an ancient historian, that at this severe season he saw a number of citizens fighting for carrion and dead dogs, and that they drank the wash, which was usually given to swine; and by another historian we are told, that it occasioned the death of about twenty thousand persons.

To heighten the distress of the citizens, money was, at the same time exceedingly scarce, the king's extortions, together with those of the pope, and the sum of seven hundred thousand pounds, being carried into Germany by Richard, king of the Romans, having drained the nation to such a degree, that it was with great difficulty the most eminent citizens supported themselves and their families.

CHAPTER X.

A parliament held at Oxford, in which the ancient rights and privileges of the people were established. The citizens entertain king Henry and his brother the king of the Romans. Proceedings in the city during Henry's absence in France. The houses of several Jews plundered. Prince Edward robs the knights templars of ten thousand pounds. Resolution of the mayor to expel all aliens from the city. A regular watch appointed in every ward of London. Above five hundred Jews massacred in London. A battle between the king and his subjects, in which his majesty is taken prisoner. An act to divest the citizens of their liberties. Several citizens imprisoned at Windsor. Matters accommodated between the Londoners and the king, who grants them a charter of remission.

THE whole nation severely feeling the ill consequences of the oppressions of their avaricious and tyrannical monarch, it was determined in a parliament held at Oxford in the year 1218, at once to shake off the burden; and they accordingly took such measures as soon procured a ratification of many ancient rights and privileges which had been infamously violated by Henry.

Messengers were dispatched to London to inform the citizens of the steps the parliament of Oxford had taken, to shew to them a confirmation of their liberties, signed by Henry and his brother, and to know if they would upon every occasion act in defence of the said rights and privileges.

The citizens, after calling a folk-mote, and debating on the subject, assented, and solemnly swore to maintain their rights from the smallest infringement.

In consequence of these statutes passing into a law, except two tons of wine, at two pounds per ton, which the king was allowed out of every ship, the king's purveyors were obliged to pay ready money for every thing they had in London.

At the close of this year, the persons appointed to collect money for repairing the city walls were detected in embezzling considerable sums, but, contrary to expectation, through the intercession of Mansell, they were pardoned, on paying a considerable sum of money to the king's treasurer.

In February 1259, Henry, his brother Richard, king of the Romans, and their queens, made a public entry into the city, where they were received with every mark of respect, and the city was embellished in a most sumptuous manner; and shortly after the king, confirmed the privileges of the company of German or Anseatic merchants, at the request of the king of the Romans.

Henry desirous to visit France, summoned a folk-mote, which was held on the sixth of November, the same year, when he assured the citizens in an affectionate speech, that he would preserve their liberties free from all encroachments; and enjoined the mayor to be doubly vigilant, during his absence, to preserve peace and good order among the citizens.

A great dissention happening, during the king's absence, between the earl of Gloucester and prince Edward, a parliament was summoned to meet at Westminster, where the prince and earl, attended by numerous and armed retinues, soon arrived to support their opposite interests in parliament; and both parties desirous to lodge in the city, the mayor thought it prudent to advise with the regency; who, after calling to their assistance the king of the Romans, determined that the mayor should not give admittance to either of them, but that every citizen of the age of fifteen should be immediately furnished with arms, in order to defend themselves on the occasion, if force should be attempted; and, at the same time, a prodigious number of armed men were brought by the king's brother, and two of the regency, into the city, where they continued till the dispute was ended.

The king arriving, during the sitting of parliament, from France, he ordered the prince to reside at Westminster, and the earl in London, lodging lodging himself at the bishop of London's palace; and the affair was shortly after compromised to the entire satisfaction of the parties concerned.

Henry, dissatisfied with the statutes made and signed at Oxford, determined to break through the restrictions there laid upon him: but, sensible that he must first gain the Londoners to his interest, he summoned a folk-mote, which was held at St. Paul's cross the day before valentine's day in the year 1260, where he ordered every citizen more than twelve years of age to be sworn, before the mayor and aldermen, to be true and faithful to their king and his heirs, and enjoined the mayor always to have a number of armed men in readiness to suppress any commotions in, or attempts upon the city.

The next year Henry renewed his precaution, and after having the city wall, together with the fortifications of the Tower of London repaired, he, a third time, swore the citizens to adhere to him, and then sent a powerful body of guards into the city, and ordered proclamation to be made, that he would maintain all persons that would enter into his service.

All this management was nearly overturned by an injudicious seizure of several ships loaded with corn, by the constable of the Tower, which so greatly irritated the citizens, that they were with great difficulty appeased; however, it was determined by the chief justice Basset, that the keeper of the Tower should, in future, come to the market in the city to purchase corn for the king and the inhabitants of the Tower, and that it should be sold to him for two pence in the quarter less than the assize fixed by the mayor.

A quarrel happening on the ninth of November following, between a christian and a jew, in the church of St. Mary Cole, at the corner of the Old Jury in the Poultry, the latter dangerously wounded the former, and attempted to escape, but being pursued, he was overtaken and stabbed; and the mob, in the height of their fury, plundered and destroyed the houses of several other jews.

The year following, the river Thames was frozen over in such a manner, that not only men, women, and children, passed over it, but it became a highway for the heaviest carriages.

In the year 1262, a cause was tried between the Londoners and the abbot of Westminster, when it appeared by the verdict of the jury, which consisted of twelve knights of the county of Middlesex, that the sheriff of London had a right to enter the town of Westminster, and all the houses in Middlesex belonging to the abbot, and to distrain his tenants in case of non-appearance on a proper summons.

Prince Edward returning from Wales in the year 1263, repaired to the temple of the knights templars, which he broke open, and took from their treasury the sum of ten thousand pounds; at which the citizens were so highly irritated, that they instantly took to their arms, and assaulted and plundered the houses of lord Gray and divers other courtiers, and unanimously resolved to join the barons, who, being informed, that the king had violated his oath made to them at Oxford, were raising a powerful army.

A messenger arriving, at the same time, from the barons, to know if the Londoners would join them, the mayor, Thomas Fitz Thomas, carried the letter to the king, who then held his court in the Tower of London, and who directly asked the mayor his opinion, as to the measures proper to be taken. The mayor desired he might be permitted to consult his brother citizens, which request not being complied with, he told the king, "that he and his brethren, the aldermen and commonalty of London had been frequently sworn to obey all such ordinances as had been made to the honour of God, the interest of the king, and the good of the kingdom; which oaths they thought themselves obliged in conscience to keep; and that to prevent any further misunderstanding between him and his nobility, on account of foreigners residing in London, they had taken a resolution to expel all aliens from the city."

To this the king made no reply, conscious that the present period was a very improper one to shew any kind of resentment; and the mayor, on his return, gave the barons a particular account of the whole transaction.

While these affairs were in agitation, it was thought a point of prudence that the city should be well guarded; upon which a strong guard was appointed in the day time, and in the night time there was a regular patrol of horse and foot guards.

A set of thieves, taking advantage of this circumstance, pretended to be a part of the foot guard, and entering the houses of many of the citizens, with the plea of searching for strangers, committed a great number of robberies. To prevent these practices, a regular watch was appointed in every ward; and the barons were admitted into the city soon afterwards.

Hereupon the king concluded a treaty with the barons and citizens, in which he engaged to abide by the statutes made at Oxford, soon after which he removed from the Tower to Westminster, and sent a message to the mayor and citizens of London, in which he enjoined them to preserve the peace of the metropolis.

But the barons, with a view to ingratiate themselves still farther, into the good opinion of the Londoners, undertook to procure the king's charter to confirm all their ancient liberties, and to grant them such farther privileges, as they thought might contribute to the prosperity of the city.

In this, however, the barons engaged for more than they could perform; for Henry had no other view in making his last concessions, than to gain time to strengthen his party, which he soon effected, by prevailing with some of the barons to espouse his cause.

Affairs were in this situation, when the citizens, resolved to submit no longer to the arbitrary will of so despotic a monarch, marched into Lambeth Fields to give him battle: but it was there agreed by both parties, that Lewis, king of France, should arbitrate the matters in dispute between them.

During the interval in which they waited for the determination of the French monarch, it happened, in the week preceding Easter, in the year 1264, that a jew having demanded more than than legal interest for the loan of twenty shillings for a week, the populace assembled in all parts of the city, attacked the jews with so diabolical a rage, that above five hundred of them were most inhumanly murdered, their synagogue and their houses destroyed, and those who escaped through the humanity of particular persons, were secured in the Tower of London from farther insult.

The French king having given his award in favour of Henry, the barons accused Lewis of partiality, had immediate recourse to arms, and easily engaged the populace of London to embark in the same cause; and these imagining that some of the aldermen and principal citizens were in the interest of the king, they usurped the government of the city, re-chose Thomas Fitz-Thomas for mayor, and engaged to take up arms on a signal given by the tolling of the great bell of St. Paul's.

The constable of the Tower, with a body of men under his command, having joined the citizens, they marched to Illesworth, where they destroyed the palace of the king of the Romans; and on their return pulled down the king's summer house in the neighbourhood of Westminster.

These feats being atchieved, they returned in triumph to the city, joined the earl of Leicester, and marched, under his command, to give battle to the king: but his majesty retreated into Kent, where he prevailed upon the cinque ports to send a number of ships to block up the river Thames, so as to prevent the port of London from receiving a supply of provisions or merchandize.

The forces under the command of the earl of Leicester, together with a great body of Londoners, immediately marched in pursuit of the king; and encamping at a place called Flexenwith, in Sussex, within five miles of the royal army, dispatched the bishops of London and Worcester, to propose terms of accommodation.

Henry rejecting their proposals with disdain, a battle ensued, in which prince Edward, with the troops under his command, attacked that wing of the army which consisted of Londoners, who being altogether undisciplined, were soon put to flight.

Prince Edward pursued them four miles, making a terrible slaughter; but this injudicious conduct occasioned the royal army to be totally routed; and the earl of Leicester took the king of England, the king of the Romans, and prince Edward prisoners.

Leicester now presuming to usurp the government into his own hands, his party were so greatly disgusted that many of them joined that of the king; and prince Edward making his escape from imprisonment, marched against Leicester, and gave him battle, in which the earl and one of his sons were killed.

About Christmas the king summoned a parliament to meet at Westminster, who were so extremely subservient to the will of his majesty, that they made a law, ordaining, "that the city of London, for its late rebellion, should be divested of its liberties, its posts and chains taken away, and its principal citizens imprisoned, and left to the mercy of the king."

Notwithstanding the passing of this law, some of the citizens were for defending themselves to the last extremity; but the fears of the majority prevailing over their courage, it was finally resolved to submit themselves to the king's clemency.

In consequence of this resolution, an instrument in writing was drawn up, to which the seal of the city was affixed, and after great application had been made, the king determined to accept their submission, and gave his safe-conduct to the mayor, aldermen, and forty of the principal citizens, to attend him at Windsor.

The citizens, considering this safe-conduct as a full security to their persons, repaired to Windsor, where they were treated with great indignity, and committed to the care of the constable of the castle, who confined them in a large tower, where they were very meanly accommodated.

On the evening of the following day they were all removed to lodgings prepared for them, except Fitz-Thomas, the mayor, Michael Tony, Stephen Buckerell, Thomas Pywelldon, and John Fleet, who being considered as ringleaders in the late rebellion, were, notwithstanding their safe-conduct, delivered to prince Edward, to be dealt with as he should think proper; and by his orders they were closely confined in prison, till they paid what was demanded for their ransom.

His majesty having dismissed the city magistrates from their offices, appointed Humphrey de Bohun, earl of Hertford, John de Baliol, Roger de Leyburn, and Roger de Walerand, guardians of this city; and issued a writ to them, in which he recited, that "Whereas the mayor, citizens, and whole community of London, had submitted themselves, both as to their lives and limbs, together with their lands, tenements, and estates to the king's mercy, they were to cause proclamation to be made, that his peace should be kept in the city and parts adjacent. Given at Windsor the sixth of October."

Not content with this, his majesty seized on the estates of many of the chief citizens, and gave to his domestics their houses, moveable effects, lands and chattels. He likewise caused the sons of other citizens to be imprisoned in the Tower, as a security of the good behaviour of their parents; and he detained four of the richest citizens, among whom was Thomas Fitz-Thomas, prisoners at Windsor, till they purchased their liberty at a most exorbitant price.

The unfortunate citizens, wearied out with these continual oppressions, and dreading still greater and more accumulated miseries, most humbly addressed themselves to the king, and besought him to name a sum which he would accept, as a full token of his reconciliation, and a remission of all past offences.

The tyrant demanded sixty thousand marks, an immense sum at that period of time! but this the Londoners declared themselves unable to pay, without involving many innocent families in ruin; and therefore intreated the king to lower his demands to such a sum as they should be able to collect for him.

At length Henry agreed to accept twenty thousand marks, as a full restitution for all offences; and the citizens having given security for for the payment of this sum, the king granted them the following charter of remission.

" Henry by the grace of God, king of England, lord of Ireland, and duke of Guyan, to all men greeting.

" Know ye, that in consideration of twenty thousand marks, paid to us by our citizens of London, as an atonement for their great crimes and misdemeanours committed against us, our royal consort, our royal brother Richard, king of the Romans, and our dear son Edward: That we have and do by these presents remit, forgive, and acquit, for us and our heirs, the citizens of London and their heirs, of all crimes and trespasses whatsoever; and that the said citizens, as formerly, shall enjoy all their rights and liberties; and that from Christmas last they shall and may receive the rents and profits of all their lands and tenements whatsoever: And also, that the said citizens shall have all the goods and chattels of such criminals, as have or shall be indicted

" on account of the late rebellion; except the goods and chattels of the persons already mentioned, which we have given to our son Edward; and also, all the lands and tenements that shall escheat to us, by reason of the fore-said rebellion. And we likewise grant, that all the citizens confined in our several prisons shall be discharged; except those given as pledges to our son Edward for his prisoners, and those for citizens that are fled. In witness whereof we have made these letters patents.

" Witness myself at Northampton, the tenth day of January, in the fiftieth year of our reign."

Hereupon the king, on the day following, signed a warrant for the discharge of all the prisoners not excepted in the pardon above recited; and two seneschals whom his majesty had appointed to govern the city, being dismissed, the citizens made choice of William Fitz-Richard for mayor, and Thomas le Ford, and Gregory de Rockelly were chosen sheriffs.

CHAPTER XI.

The citizens collect the twenty thousand marks for the king. Contested election of a mayor.

London surprized by the earl of Gloucester. Matters accommodated between the king and the earl, and an important charter granted to the citizens of London. The sheriff's or bailiffs account of profits arising to the king in the city. A desperate battle by night, between the Goldsmiths, Merchant-Tailors, and other citizens. A severe frost in 1269, and excessive rains in the year following. A dreadful famine. Several persons killed by the falling of the steeple of Bow-church.

THE government of the city being thus settled, and affairs beginning to wear a more favourable aspect than they had done for a considerable time past, the citizens lost no time in collecting the twenty thousand marks which they had engaged to pay to the king: when not only the house-holders, but lodgers and servants were assessed towards raising this sum; and many persons, unable to bear the weight of this tax, were disfranchised.

Not long after this, the king issued an order for the payment of three-pence per day to each of the keepers of the seven gates of this city.

In the year 1267, the citizens presented an humble petition to the king, for permission to chuse two bailiffs, to take the custody of London and the county of Middlesex; which being accepted, his majesty ordered the barons of the exchequer to admit the said bailiffs, when regularly presented to them; upon which the Londoners made choice of two of their fellow citizens, who took an oath of fidelity to the king, and to the citizens of London.

In the year abovementioned, there was a violent dispute between the magistrates and the common citizens respecting the election of a mayor; when a folk-mote being held on the occasion, the aldermen and the principal citizens were for electing Allen Souche to that office; but the inferior people declared for Thomas Fitz-Thomas, tho'

he was not yet discharged from his confinement at Windsor.

At length, Souche's party, being supported by the court, carried the election by force, and seizing many of their opponents, committed them to prison; whereupon Souche was declared duly elected.

In the same year likewise, Gilbert de Clare, earl of Gloucester, together with many of the barons, having raised a numerous army, under pretence of assisting the king in a war against France, but in reality favouring the designs of a number of rebels in the Isle of Ely; the earl procured the regent's permission to quarter a part of his forces in the city of London.

The forces had been thus stationed but a short time, before the earl began to discover his real intentions, and a strong party of the rebels arriving in Southwark, he then threw off the mask at once.

Hereupon the magistrates drew up the draw-bridge, and shut the gates of the city: but the earl took the keys from the mayor, and delivered them to persons attached to his cause; so that the rebels had free admission into the city; and the citizens were so alarmed that many of them absconded; whereupon the earl immediately seized their effects, and began to secure the city by additional fortifications.

The populace now secured the persons of such of the aldermen as were known to be in the interest of the king, committed them to prison, and divided their effects among themselves. They likewise degraded the mayor and sheriffs, and chose others in their stead.

Matters were in this situation when the earl of Gloucester invested the Tower of London; but he was vigorously opposed by the pope's legate, and a great number of jews who had retired thither for security.

This opposition gave time to the king, who was then at Cambridge, to march to the relief of the Tower, with an army of thirty thousand French and Scots, which his son Edward had raised.

The king taking Windsor in his way to London, halted at that place; when the idea of his majesty's near approach so terrified the earl of Gloucester that he made proposals of accommodation. These, however, the king rejected with disdain; upon which a day was appointed to decide the affair by a battle on Hounslow Heath.

The king and his army attended at the appointed place; but their opponents not making their appearance, his majesty marched towards London, and wheeling to the east, encamped near Stratford, from whence he attempted to assault the city, at several different times, for the space of two months, but without effect.

In the interim, Gloucester dispatched different parties to ravage and lay waste the counties of Kent and Surry, where they met with no opposition, and returned laden with booty.

They now repaired to Westminster, where they did great damage to the abbey, broke the doors and windows of the king's palace, and seized upon his wine and the richest of his furniture.

Four of these banditti being taken, were discovered to be servants of the earl of Derby; upon which that nobleman ordered them to be tied up in sacks, and thrown into the Thames, which sentence was accordingly executed.

By this time the earl of Gloucester was reduced to great extremities, his army being absolutely in want of provisions; so that he made a virtue of necessity, and by the interposition of the king of the Romans, at length accommodated all matters in dispute between him and Henry, and the citizens of London were included in this accommodation.

Though Henry granted the Londoners a full pardon, yet he insisted upon their paying a thousand marks to the king of the Romans, for the damage they had heretofore done to his palace at Miesworth.

The behaviour of the citizens in the late transactions being esteemed rather the effect of compulsion than choice, his majesty in the year 1268 granted them the following charter.

" Henry, by the grace of God, king of England, lord of Ireland, duke of Aquitain; to his archbishops, bishops, abbots, priors, earls, barons, sheriffs, justices, rulers, ministers, and all bailiffs, and his faithful subjects, greeting.

" Know ye, that we have granted to our citizens of London, for us and our heirs, whom

" of late we have received again into our grace and favour, after divers trespasses and forfeitures of them and their commonalty to us made, for the which, both for life and member, and all other things belonging to the said city, they have submitted themselves to our will; that none of them be compelled to plead out of the walls of the said city, for any thing except foreign tenures, and except our monyers and officers, and except those things which shall happen to be done against our peace, which, according to the common law of our realm, are wont to be determined in the parts where those trespasses were done; and except pleas concerning merchandizes, which are wont to be determined according to the law-merchant in boroughs and fairs, so yet notwithstanding that those complaints be determined in the boroughs and fairs, by four or five of the said citizens of London, who shall be there present; saving to us the amerciaments in any wise coming, which they shall faithfully answer us and our heirs, upon pain of grievous forfeitures.

" We have also granted to our same citizens acquittal of murder in the said city and in Portsoken; and that none of the said citizens may wage battle; and that for the pleas belonging to the crown, chiefly those which may chance within the said city and suburbs thereof, they may discharge themselves according to the ancient custom of the said city; this notwithstanding except, that upon the graves of the dead, for that which they should have said, if they had lived, it shall not be lawful precisely to swear; but instead and place of those deceased, which before their deaths, to discharge those which for concerning the things belonging to the crown, were called and received, there may other free and lawful men be chosen, which may do and accomplish that without delay, which by the deceased should have been done, if they had lived; and that within the walls of the city and in Portsoken none may take lodgings by force, or delivery of the marshal.

" We have also granted to our said citizens throughout all our dominions, wheresoever they come to dwell with their merchandizes and things, and also throughout all the sea ports as well as on this side as beyond the seas, they shall be free of all toll and lastage, and of all customs, except every where our due and ancient custom and prices of wines; that is to say, one tun before the mast, and of one other behind the mast, at twenty shillings the tun, to be paid in such form as we and our ancestors have been accustomed to have the said prices; and if any in any of our lands, on this side or beyond the seas, or in the ports of the said sea, on this side or beyond the seas, shall take of the men of London toll, or any custom contrary to this our grant, (except the aforesaid prices) after he shall fail of right, the sheriff may take goods therefore at London.

" We have also granted to them, that the Hustings might be kept in every week once

" the

" the week, and that only by one day; or as
 " notwithstanding that those things within the " same day cannot be determined, may continue
 " till next morning, and no longer; and that " right be holden to them for their lands and
 " Tenures within the same city, according to
 " the custom of the said city; so as nevertheless,
 " that as well foreigners as others may make
 " their attorneys, as well in pleading as defend" ing, as elsewhere in our courts; and they " may not be questioned as miskenning in any
 " their pleas; that is to say, if they have not
 " declared altogether well; and of all their debts
 " which were lent at London, and promises there
 " made, pleas be there holden, according to the
 " just and ancient custom.

" Furthermore, we do also grant, toward the " amendment of the aforesaid city, that all be
 " quit of childwite and jeresgive, and from
 " scotale; so that our sheriffs of London, nor
 " any other bailiff, shall not make any scotale:
 " and also, that the said citizens may justly have
 " and hold their lands, tenures or premises;
 " and also their debts, whosoever do owe them;
 " and that no merchant or other do meet with
 " any merchant coming by land or by water,
 " with their merchandizes or victuals, towards
 " the city, to buy or sell again, 'till they come " to the said city, and there have put the same
 " to sale, upon the forfeiture of the things
 " brought, and pain of imprisonment; from " whence he shall not escape without great
 " punishment; and that none shew out their
 " wares to sell, who owe any custom, 'till the " custom thereof be levied, without great pu" nishment, and upon pain of forfeiture of all
 " that commodity, of him that happens to
 " do otherwise: and that no merchant, stranger,
 " or other; may buy or sell any wares, which
 " ought to be weighed or troned, unless by our " beams or trone, upon forfeiture of the said
 " wares.

" Moreover, those debts, which of their
 " contracts or loans shall be due unto them,
 " may cause to be enrolled in our exchequer,
 " for the more surety of them upon the recog" nizance of those who shall stand bound unto
 " them in the said debts: so as nevertheless,
 " that no debts be enrolled upon the recogni-
 " zance of any person who is not there known;
 " or unless it be manifested concerning his person
 " by the testimony of six or four lawful men,
 " who be sufficient to answer as well for the debt

" as for the damages, which any may have of " such recognizances, if the same happen to be " falsly done under their names: And for every " pound to be enrolled in the exchequer, one
 " penny to be paid to our use, for the charge
 " of sustentation of those which must attend to " such enrolling: These liberties and free cus" toms we grant to them, to hold to them and
 " their heirs, so long as they shall well and " faithfully behave themselves to us and our
 " heirs, together with all their just and reason" able customs, which in time of us and our " predecessors heretofore they have had, as well
 " for manner of pleading of their tenures, debts,
 " and promises, as for all other causes whatso-
 " ever, concerning both them and the same
 " city: So long as the customs be not contrary
 " to right, law and justice; saving in all " things the liberty of the church of Westmin" ster to the abbots and monks of the same " place, to them granted by the charters of us
 " and our predecessors, kings of England: but,
 " as touching our jews and merchant strangers,
 " and other things out of our foresaid grant
 " touching us or our said city, we and our heirs
 " shall provide as to us shall seem expedient.

" These being witnesses; Richard king of " Almain, our brother; Edward our first
 " son; Roger of Mortimer; Roger de Clif" ford; Roger Leybourn; Robert Watrand;
 " Robert Aquiln. Mi. Godfrey; Gifford our " chancellor; Walter de Merton; John
 " Chesil, archdeacon of London; John
 " de la Lind; William de Aette, and
 " others. Given by our hand at Westmin" ster, the twenty-sixth day of March, in
 " the two and fiftieth year of our reign."

His majesty, by the above-recited charter, grants a remission of all past offences, confirms all their ancient privileges except the chusing of their magistrates, and prohibits the forestalling of the markets, under severe penalties.

Soon after this, his majesty issued his precept to Allen Souche the mayor, to present to him six persons eligible to the office of sheriff, two of whom, viz. Walter Harvey and William de Durham, were appointed to that office by the name of bailiffs.

The said bailiffs having delivered to the king an account of the profits arising to his majesty in the city for the space of half a year, we shall subjoin it as a curiosity, as we find it in Madox's
History of the Exchequer.

	l.	s.	d.
By the amount of tronages (the king's weigh-house) and petty strandages.	97	13	11
By the amount of customs of all sorts of foreign merchandizes, together with the issues of divers passages	75	6	10
By the metage of corn, and customs at Billingsgate	5	18	7
By the customs of fish, &c. brought to London-bridge-Street	7	0	2
By the issue of the field and bars of Smithfield	4	7	6
By toll raised at the city gates, and duties on the river of Thames, westward of the bridge	8	13	2
By stallages, duties arising from the markets of Westcheap, Grafs Chirche and Wool Chirchew, and annual scottage of the butchers of London	42	0	5
By the produce of Queenhithe	17	9	2
By the chattels of foreigners, forfeited for trading in the city, contrary to the laws and customs thereof	10	11	0
By places and perquisites within the city	86	5	9
By the produce of the Waidarii and Ambiani of Corbye and Neele, French merchants of those towns	9	6	8
Sum total	364	13	2½
	In

In the same year, 1268, a violent dispute arising between the company of Goldsmiths and that of the Merchant-Tailors; and several other companies taking part with one or the other, their passions were at length so inflamed, that more than five hundred people, completely armed, assembled in the night, and engaged with such fury, that many persons were killed and wounded of both parties: nor did the battle cease, till the sheriffs, having raised a considerable body of the citizens, seized several of the combatants; thirteen of whom being tried and convicted, received sentence of death, and suffered accordingly.

The year 1269 is remarkable for an uncommon severe frost, which beginning in the month of November, continued till the month of February, during almost all which time the navigation was so totally obstructed, that no ships could sail up the Thames, and foreign merchandize was brought to London by land, from the several sea-ports.

In the year 1270 the rains were so excessive that the fruits of the earth were in a great measure destroyed, and the river Thames breaking down and overflowing its banks in many places, did inconceivable damage both to houses and land.

The consequence of these inundations were severely felt; for wheat raised to the enormous price of six pounds eight shillings the quarter,* and the famine at length raged to such an astonishing degree, that, if the authority of ancient writers may be relied on, many of the poorer people were reduced to the dreadful necessity of eating their own children.

At the latter end of this year many people unfortunately lost their lives, by the sudden falling of the steeple of the church of St. Mary le Bow, in Cheapside.

CHAPTER XII.

The death of king Henry III. and the commencement of the reign of Edward I. Animosities among the Citizens respecting the choice of a mayor. Orders for fixing the prices of provisions. The Jews forbidden the practice of usury. The mayor of London appointed an ambassador. An earthquake. The foundation of the convent of Black-friars. First ordinance of the common-council of London. Jews executed for diminishing coin. Letters patent granted to receive a toll for repairing London-bridge. Extinction of the kings of Wales. Murder of Lawrence Ducket. The mayor degraded. Murders and robberies frequent in the city. Regulations for preserving the peace of the city. Foreigners permitted to settle in London. King Edward's brief relative to Bartholomew fair. Writ directed by the king to the mayor and aldermen in favour of the clergy. Edward by a charter confirms many ancient privileges to the citizens. Prices of meat and poultry. First recorder of London. The use of sea coal prohibited.

PRINCE Edward having undertaken an expedition to the holy land, he there received advice of the death of his father, Henry the third, who departed this life at Westminster, on the twentieth of November 1272, after an oppressive and inglorious reign of more than fifty-six years.

On being made acquainted with the death of Henry, the young king immediately dispatched letters to the mayor, sheriffs, and citizens of London, in which he recited many injuries his subjects had sustained from the Flemish; he therefore ordered proclamation to be made that no Fleming should be permitted to reside in London, on the penalty of forfeiting his whole effects.

His majesty likewise directed the magistrates carefully to preserve the peace of the city during his absence, which he promised to make as short as possible; and not having the seal of England with him, that of the king of Sicily was affixed to these dispatches.

The citizens were so pleased with having been honoured with these letters from their sovereign, that on his majesty's return to England, he was received into London with the utmost pomp and magnificence; the fronts of the houses being adorned with the richest tapestry and silks; the wealthy citizens scattered gold and silver among the populace, and the conduits were supplied with a variety of the most delicious wines.

From such appearances the public entertained hopes of enjoying great ease and happiness under their new sovereign: but their pleasing dream was soon at an end; for on the choice of the next mayor, there arose such a dissention among them, as might have had the most fatal consequences, if they had been ruled by a monarch more disposed to arbitrary measures than Edward appears to have been.

In this case, however, the king only interposed so far as to appoint a custos of the city, till the passions of the contending parties should subside.

By this appointment the citizens began to see the ill consequences that might arise from their civil dissentions, as they might at any time furnish the king with a plausible pretence for interfering in the government of the city.

* This sum is equal to above sixty pounds for a quarter of wheat at this time!

They

They therefore unanimously made choice of Walter Harvey for mayor, who was the very man that the populace had proposed at first: but soon finding that Harvey was a man of bad character, they, in the year following, degraded him from the office of alderman, declared him incapable of being a member of the city council, and obliged him to give security for his good behaviour during life.

The iniquitous practices of engrossing and forestalling, being now carried to the most enormous height, it became necessary to provide laws against all who should be found guilty; and in particular against the bakers who accustomed themselves to make bread short of weight, and the millers who sold their meal by a short measure.

The legislator having passed laws for the redress of these grievances, the king issued his orders for the mayor and sheriffs of London to enforce them, and to regulate the prices of the various kinds of provisions, and particularly of poultry and fish, which were the articles that were chiefly engrossed.

By these laws the baker was to forfeit his bread for the first offence, to suffer imprisonment for the second, and to be impilloried for the third.

The punishment ordained for the miller who should be convicted of offending against the statute, was to be carried through certain streets of the city, in a tumbrel or dust cart, exposed to the contempt of the people.

In obedience to these laws, the magistrates of the city published an ordinance to the following purpose. "By the command of the lord the king, and with the assent and consent of the gentlemen of the kingdom, and citizens aforesaid, it is ordained that no huckster of fowl (or poulterer) go out of the city to meet them that bring poultry into the city, to make any buying from them; but buy in the city, after the buyers of the lord the king, of the barons, and of the citizens, have bought and had what shall be needful for them, namely, after three o'clock, and not before."

After this hour the following provisions were to be sold at the undermentioned prices:

	s.	d.	qrs.
The best hen, at	0	3	2
The best pullet at	0	1	3
The best capon, at	0	2	0
The best goose, from Easter to Whit-	0	5	0
sunday
Ditto, from Easter to St. Peter ad vincula	0	4	0
Ditto, at all other times of the year, at	0	3	0
The best wild goose, at	0	4	0
The best young pigeons, three for	0	1	0
The best mallard, at	0	3	2
The best cercel, at	1	6	0
The best wild duck, at	0	1	3
The best partridge, at	0	3	2
The best begaters, four for	0	1	0
The best larks, a dozen for	0	1	0
The best pheasant, at	0	4	0
The best boter, at	0	6	0
The best heron, at	0	6	0
The best corlune, at	0	3	0
The best plover, at	0	1	0

5

	s.	d.	qrs.
The best swan, at	3	0	0
The best crane, at	3	0	0
The best peacock, at	1	0	0
The best coney, with the skin, at	0	4	0
One ditto without the skin, at	0	3	0
The best hare without the skin, at	0	3	2
The best kid, from Christmas to Lent, at	0	10	0
Ditto, at other times of the year	0	6	0
The lamb, from Christmas to Lent	0	6	0
Ditto, at other times of the year	0	4	0

It was also ordained, "that no huckster of fish; [or fishmonger] who sells fish again to others, go out to meet those that bring or carry fish to the city, to make a forestall thence; nor have any partnership with a stranger who brings fish from the sea to the city: but let them seek for fish in their own ships; and permit foreigners to bring it, and to sell when they are come, in their own ships. Because, by such partnership, they who are of the city, when they cannot sell as they will, lay it up in cellars, and sell dearer than the strangers would do, if they came without partnership, and knew not where they might be harboured; nor let them buy any thing in the city, until the king's servants, &c. have bought, and not before three o'clock. And if they who have bought fish, shall come after three o'clock, let them not sell that day; but let them sell on the morrow morning. And if they expect more, let the fish be taken into the lord the king's hands: and let them keep no fish, except salt-fish, beyond the second day of their coming; which, if it happen to be found, let them lose their fish, and be at the mercy of the lord the king. [to fine them.]"

The order for the sale of fish was as follows:

	s.	d.	qrs.
The best plaice, at	0	1	2
The best soles, the dozen, at	0	3	0
The best fresh mulvel, at	0	3	0
The best salt mulvel, at	0	3	0
The best haddock, at	0	2	0
The best barkey, at	0	4	0
The best mullet, at	0	2	0
The best conger, at	1	0	0
The best turbot, at	0	6	0
The best dorac, at	0	5	0
The best bran, sard, and betule, at	0	3	0
The best mackarel, in Lent, at	0	1	0
Ditto, out of Lent, at	0	0	2
The best gurnard, at	0	1	0
The best fresh merlings, four for	0	1	0
The best powdered ditto, twelve for	0	1	0
The best pickled herrings, twenty for	0	1	0
The best fresh herrings, before Michaelmas, six for	0	1	0
Ditto, after ditto, twelve for,
The best Thames, or Severn lamprey, at	0	4	0
The best bugie, stock-fish, at	0	1	0
The best mulvil stock-fish, at	0	0	3
The best croplings, three at	0	1	0
The best fresh oysters, a gallon for	0	2	0
The best fresh salmon, from Christmas to Easter at	5	0	0

P

Ditto

	s.	d.	grs.
Ditto, after ditto, at ———	3	0	0
A piece of rumb, gros and fat, at ———	0	4	0
The best new pickled balenes, the pound ———	0	2	0
Ditto of the preceding year, the } pound, at ———	0	1	0
The best sea hog, at ———	6	8	0
The best eels, a strike, or a quarter } of an hundred ———	0	2	0
The best lampreys, in winter, the } hundred at ———	0	8	0
Ditto, at other times, the hundred at ———	0	6	0
The best smelts, the hundred, at ———	0	1	0
The best roche, in summer, at ———	0	1	0
Ditto, at other times ———	0	0	2
The best lucy, at ———	6	8	0
The best lamprey of Nautes, at first ———	1	4	0
Ditto, a month after, at ———	0	8	2
The Thames or Severn ditto, to- } wards Easter, at ———	0	2	0

In the year 1275, it was ordained by act of parliament, that no jews should follow the practice of usury, and that for the future all usurers should wear a badge on their breast, or immediately quit the kingdom.

In the same year the mayor of London being appointed the king's ambassador beyond the seas, his majesty entrusted the government of London to four persons of eminence who were recommended by their brother citizens.

About this time a most terrible earthquake happened, which threw down many houses and churches in London, damaged many others, and extended its dreadful effects to many other parts of the kingdom.

In this same year, 1275, Robert Kilwarby, archbishop of Canterbury, by licence from the crown, founded the convent of preaching friars, commonly called Black-friars, which was erected partly out of the ruins of a part of the city wall taken down on that occasion, and partly out of the stones of the tower of Mount-Fitchet, which was likewise pulled down to make way for the building the said convent.

The king likewise commanded the citizens to erect a new wall, to run westward from Ludgate, behind the houses to Fleet-ditch, and then south as far as the Thames; and at the head of this wall to erect a tower for his majesty's reception.

Towards the expence of completing this work, king Edward granted the city a duty to be raised on several kinds of merchandize for the space of three years; and sent them the following letter soon afterwards.

"Whereas we have granted you, for aid of the work of the walls of our city, and the closure of the same, divers customs of vendible things, coming to the said city, to be taken for a certain time; we command you, that you cause to be finished the wall of the said city, now begun near the mansion of the

"friars preachers, and a certain good and comely tower at the head of the said wall; within the water of the Thames there, wherein we may be received and tarry with honour, to our ease and satisfaction in our comings there, out of the pence taken and to be taken of the said customs, &c.
"Witness myself at Westminster, the eighth day of July, in the fourth year of my reign."

It was ordained in the fifth year of this king's reign, that no market should be held on London bridge, or in any other place, except such as should be by a common-council appointed. It was also ordered that no person should go to Southwark to buy wares, which might be purchased in the city. This is the first ordinance of common-council relative to the order of holding of markets in the city of London.

In the year 1278, a great number of jews being convicted of clipping and diminishing the king's coin, the jews throughout England were seized and imprisoned in one day; and of those apprehended in London, two hundred and eighty of both sexes were executed.

London-bridge being in a very ruinous condition, the citizens, in the year 1281, procured letters patent of the king, empowering the bridge keeper to receive a toll of all such persons as should pass over it.

In the year 1282 the Anseatic company of merchants were called upon to fulfil their engagements with respect to repairing Bishopsgate, which was in a very ruinous situation; which demand of the city being rejected by the company, the affair was carried by writ into the exchequer, and the company were obliged to perform their agreement.

In the same year, upon the citizens paying to the king a considerable sum of money, he granted them a pardon for every infringement they had made, contrary to their charters, to that time; and in the following year he granted letters patent for the repairing and inclosing the city.

This year, 1283, Llewellyn, the last Welsh prince who reigned in Wales, having lost a battle, fled for safety to Blith castle, where he was betrayed into the hands of Roger le Strange, who, taking him when he was not in the least apprehension of danger, with a stroke of his broad sword took off his head, at the moment he was railing against the English.

The head being directly sent to Edward, he ordered it to be carried to London, and the citizens met the messenger who brought it, and conducted him into the city with drums and trumpets, and proceeded in grand cavalcade through Cheapside, with the head fixed upon a lance with a chaplet or circle of silver; * it was then fixed for the remainder of the day upon the pillory in Cheapside, and afterwards upon the tower of London, crowned with a wreath of ivy.

A most intense frost happened the winter fol-

* According to an ancient author, this was done by way of sheer, the prince having been told by a Welsh fortune-teller, that his head should one day pass through Cheapside adorned with a silver coronet.

lowing

lowing, at the breaking of which five arches of London-bridge were carried away.

In the year 1284, a goldsmith, named Lawrence Ducket, having wounded Ralph Crepin in Westcheap, (now Cheapside) he fled for safety to Bow church, and concealed himself in the steeple; he was, however, surprized in the night by Crepin's friends, who hung him up in one of the windows in such a position, that upon an inquest being taken on the body, the jury brought in their verdict Felo de se, and he was accordingly buried in a ditch; however, the murderers were at last informed against by a boy who had concealed himself in the church during the shocking transaction, and sixteen men were hanged, and a woman, the perpetrator of it, was burnt alive: The body was dug up, put into a coffin, and decently buried.

In the year following the conduit in Cheapside was built; and it was ordered that only an half-penny should be paid for grinding a quarter of wheat.

The same year the jewish synagogues in London were destroyed by command of John Peckham, archbishop of Canterbury.

At a time when the affairs of the city seemed to wear a most favourable aspect, a disgust was unfortunately given to the lord treasurer by the mayor, who refused to attend to give an account of the measures taken by him and the aldermen for the preservation of the peace; and upon their attendance being insisted on, the mayor went to Barking church, where he delivered the city seal and the ensigns of mayoralty to Stephen Aswy, and retired to the tower.

The treasurer was so highly incensed at this behaviour, that he ordered the mayor, together with many of the principal citizens to be taken into custody, and committed to prison; and Stephen Sandwich was by the king appointed custos of London, in which office he remained only till the February following, when another person was appointed.

The pretence for degrading the mayor was, that he had connived at the unlawful practices of the bakers; and under colour of punishing them for offences, which every citizen knew had never been committed, for twelve years the city of London was without a mayor.

The city soon felt the ill effects of being deprived of its first magistrate; robberies, and even murders became frequent throughout the city and suburbs; which occasioned the following regulations to be made. "That no stranger should wear a weapon nor be seen abroad after the ringing of the corseu-bell; that all taverns and victualling-houses should be shut up after the ringing of the said bell; that no fencing-school should be kept in the city; that the aldermen in their respective wards should make diligent search for such offenders, in order to bring them to justice; that no person not free of the city should be suffered to reside therein; and that such freemen as were suspected, should give security for their good behaviour:" amongst whom were Thomas Pywelldon and fifty-seven others, who were exiled for life.

A great number of foreign merchants were about this time permitted to settle in London, and obtained leave soon after to dispose of their goods without employing a broker, which was as advantageous to them as disadvantageous to the citizens; for before this time, they were obliged to keep in their lodgings, and their landlords, who were citizens, officiating as brokers, were very great gainers.

The foreigners, however, making use of many villainous practices, by which the fair traders were considerably hurt, many of them were apprehended and carried to prison, and were obliged to pay large sums for their enlargement.

In the fifteenth year of his reign, Edward commanded the court of exchequer to be removed to Guildhall, at which time it appeared, that the citizens were five hundred and thirty-eight pounds, six shillings and eight-pence, indebted to the king.

One of the sheriffs of London carrying a prisoner to gaol in the year 1293, the mob seized on the prisoner and conveyed him away; for which offence, three persons soon after had their hands cut off, at the standard in Cheapside, by the common hangman.

In the year 1295 Ralph Sandwich was again appointed custos of the city, and a dispute arising between him and the prior of St. Bartholomew's, relative to the profits arising from the fair of that name held in Smithfield, the custos insisting that as the privileges of the city were forfeited, all the benefits arising therefrom must of course belong to the king: the affair coming to the knowledge of Edward, who was then at Durham, he ordered that the controversy should be determined by the barons, and his treasurer, and the following brief was dispatched to the custos and sheriffs of London, for that purpose:

"The lord the king hath commanded the custos and sheriffs in these words: Edward, by the grace of God, to the custos and sheriffs of London, greeting: Whereas the prior of St. Bartholomew in Smithfield, in the suburbs of London, by the charter of our progenitors, kings of England, and our confirmation, claimeth to have a certain fair there every year, during three days, viz. on the eve, on the day, and on the morrow of St. Bartholomew the Apostle, with all liberties and free customs belonging to the fair; a contention hath arisen between the said prior and you the said custos, which sue for us, concerning the use of the liberties of the said fair, and the free customs belonging to it: And hindrance being made to the said prior by you the said custos, as the same prior asserteth, to wit, concerning a moiety of the said eve, and of the whole morrow before said; concerning which, we will, as well for us, as for the foresaid prior, that justice be done, as is fit, before our treasurer and barons of the exchequer, from the day of St. Michael next, for one month. We command you, that sufficient security be taken of the said prior, of restoring to us the said day the issues of the aforesaid fair, coming from the moiety of the aforesaid eve, and of the whole morrow, if the said prior cannot then shew something for himself, why the said issues ought not to belong to us.

We

" We command you, that ye permit the same prior, in the mean time, to receive the foresaid issues, in form aforesaid. And you have therefore this brief.

" Witness myself at Dunelm, the ninth day of August, in the twentieth year of our reign."

Edward having been informed, that several of the clergy had been committed by the laity to the Tun, a prison so called in Cornhill, on pretence of their having committed crimes of which they were entirely innocent, he shewed his disapprobation of such measures, by directing the following writ to the mayor and citizens.

" Edward, by the grace of God, &c. Whereas as Richard Gravesend, bishop of London, hath shewed unto us, that by the great charter of England, the church hath a privilege, that no clerk shall be imprisoned by a layman, without our commandment and breach of peace; which notwithstanding, some citizens of London, upon mere spite, do enter in their watches into clerk's chambers, and, like felons, do carry them to the Tunney, which Henry de Walleys, some time mayor, built for night-walkers. Wherefore, we will that this our commandment be proclaimed in full hustings; and that no watch hereafter enter into any clerk's chamber, under the forfeit of 20l. Dated at Carlisle, the 18th of March, in the 25th year of our reign."

The citizens being highly offended at this mandate, a number of them assembled, broke open the tun, and suffered several of the prisoners to escape; for which behaviour they were personally punished, and the city was fined twenty thousand marks, which sums the citizens were obliged to pay, together with three thousand marks more, for which they obtained full confirmation of their ancient rights and privileges; for the king returning victorious from Scotland, and the citizens testifying their joy on the occasion, he ordered the aldermen, together with the principal magistrates, to attend him on Easter Wednesday at Westminster, at which time and place he restored them the power of electing a mayor; and Henry Walleys being chosen into that office the Friday after, was presented to the king at Fulham, the Wednesday following, when he was very graciously received, and next day sworn in before the barons of the exchequer.

A charter of confirmation of the rights and privileges of the citizens immediately followed the above act of royal favour, in which charter, among other things it is enacted.

" That whereas our said citizens, by the charters of our said progenitors, have been accustomed hitherto to present every mayor, whom they have chosen in the said city yearly, before the barons of the exchequer, (our progenitor, or we not being at Westminster) that he may be admitted by the said barons as mayor for us, notwithstanding that, at the next coming of our progenitor or of us unto Westminster or London, he may be presented to our progenitors, or to us, and so admitted mayor. We, willing to shew more ample favour to the said citizens in that behalf, do grant to them for us and our heirs, the mayor of the said city, when he shall be chosen by the said citizens, we, and our heirs, and our barons, not being at Westminster or at London, they may or shall be presented or admitted to and by the constable of our Tower of London, yearly, in such sort as before they were wont to be presented and admitted; so as nevertheless, that, at the next coming of us or our heirs to Westminster or London, the said mayor be presented to us or our heirs, and admitted for mayor.

" And also, we have granted for us and our heirs, to our said citizens, that they and their successors, citizens of the said city, be forever quit and free of pannage, pontage and murage throughout all the realm, and all our dominions: and that the sheriffs of the said city, as often as it shall happen them to be amerced in our court for any offence, they shall be amerced according to the measure and quantity of the offence, as other the sheriffs of our said realm have been amerced for the like offence.

" Wherefore we will, and streightly charge and command, for us and our heirs, that the said citizens and their successors have all the liberties, freedoms, quittals and free customs aforesaid, and then may or shall use according to our confirmation, renovation, and grants aforesaid, for ever; as by the aforesaid charter (amongst other things) more fully appear-eth."

All which the king certified by the following brief to his officers of his exchequer:

" Edward, by the grace of God, &c. to his treasurers and barons of the exchequer, greeting. Whereas, for the good service that our beloved citizens of London have hitherto done us, by our letters patent we have rendered and restored to the same our foresaid city, together with the mayoralty, all their liberties (which city, mayoralty and liberties we have long since caused to be taken into our hands) to be had and held to the same citizens, according to their will, as freely and intirely as they had and held them on the day of the said taking them away, as is contained more fully in our said letters: we command you, that ye permit the same citizens to use and enjoy the liberties which they have reasonably used on the day of the foresaid taking, before you in the exchequer before said, according to the tenor of our foresaid Letters. Witness myself at York, the eight and twentieth day of May, in the six and twentieth year of our reign."

The additional privileges granted in this charter are 1. The mayor elect is to be presented and admitted by the constable of the Tower of London, in the absence of the king and the barons. 2. To be free and quit from pannage. * 3. To be likewise free from pontage. † 4. And to pay no murage. ‡

in

An order to the mayor and sheriffs at London accompanied this brief, commanding them to punish personally such bakers, brewers, and millers, as should be found guilty of bad practices, and all malefactors, who were detected in carrying fire-arms about with them in the night; and to oblige millers to return flour according to the weight of grain given to them to be ground.

In the twenty-seventh year of this reign, on the feast of St. Simon and Jude, Elias Russel was unanimously chosen, by the mayor, aldermen, and commonalty of London, into the office of mayor of this city, and was sworn, accordingly, and received by the constable of the Tower, (by the king's writ, directed for that purpose,) without the Tower gate.

An act of common-council was passed during this mayoralty, by consent of the king and nobility, for regulating the prices of provisions sold in London, the butchers, poulterers, &c. having by fixing exorbitant prices upon their different commodities, greatly distressed the poorer sort of the citizens: the following is the table of the prices the different sorts of poultry were fixed at

	s.	d.	grs.
A fat cock, at	—	0	1 2
Two pullets, at	—	0	1 2
A fat capon, at	—	0	2 2
A goose, at	—	0	4 0
A mallard, at	—	0	1 2
A partrich, at	—	0	1 2
A pheasant, at	—	0	4 0
A heron, at	—	0	6 0
A plover, at	—	0	1 0
A swan, at	—	3	0 0
A crane, at	—	1	0 0
Two woodcocks, at	—	0	1 2
A fat lamb from Christmas to Shrovetide	1	4	0
One ditto for all the year, at	—	0	4 0

A celebrated antiquary tells us, that in the * Pannage signifies a certain duty payable to the king, for the liberty of sending swine or cattle to feed in any of his forests.

† Pontage was a duty paid for liberty to pass over bridges with horses, carts, or other carriages; or under them with thirtieth year of this king's reign, the prices of various sorts of provisions were as follows:

	s.	d.	grs.
A quarter of wheat, at	—	4	0 0
A quarter of ground malt	—	3	4 0
A quarter of pease	—	2	6 0
A quarter of oats	—	2	0 0
A bull	—	7	6 0
A cow	—	6	0 0
A fat mutton	—	1	0 0
One ewe sheep	—	0	8 0
A capon	—	0	2 0
A cock or hen	—	0	1 2

In the year 1304, Geoffrey de Hartilepole, alderman, was elected recorder of this city, which is the first account of a recorder of London we meet with in history.

The year following, the celebrated Scotch champion, Sir William Wallace, being taken prisoner, was, contrary to the laws of nature and of nations, put to an ignominious death in Smithfield for no other crime than defending his native land against the attempts of an inveterate enemy.

In the year 1306 the king conferred the order of knighthood on the young prince of Wales, on which occasion the mayor, aldermen, and citizens of London, presented his majesty with the sum of two thousand pounds.

In the same year the brewers and dyers of London, and others whose professions required the use of great quantities of sea coals, burning great quantities of that article, the air was so infected by the smoke arising therefrom, that the health of the inhabitants was thought to be in danger; whereupon, at the request of the nobility and gentry, the king issued a proclamation, strictly forbidding the use of sea-coals: but little regard being paid to this proclamation, a commission of oyer and terminer was appointed, to punish the delinquents, who were fined for the first offence, and had their furnaces and kilns destroyed for the second.

barges, boats, &c. which duty was applied and put to the use of repairing the said bridges.

‡ The term murage signifies a duty paid towards repairing or building the walls of the cities and towns throughout England;

CHAPTER XIII.

Edward II. makes his public entry into London. Royal Mandate respecting the finishing the wall and tower near Ludgate. The king's debts discharged by the citizens. London exempted from being taxed as a royal demesne, on lending the king a thousand pound. Prices of provisions regulated by parliament. Proclamation concerning the election of mayor and sheriffs. The making of wheat into malt forbidden. Dreadful famine and pestilence. The king's brief for revoking the regulation respecting the prices of provisions. The citizens fined a thousand marks for pulling down a mud wall. The city sends representatives to a parliament held at York. A strong watch kept night and day in London. The two Spencers, favourites of the king, banished. A charter exempting the citizens from serving the king in a military capacity out of the city. Two thousand marks extorted from the city. The Londoners join the queen's party, which being successful, the king is taken prisoner, and obliged to resign the crown to his son.

HAVING in the preceding chapter faithfully recorded every material transaction respecting this city, during the reign of Edward I. we now proceed to that of his son Edward II. who having married the princess Isabella, daughter to the king of France, made a solemn entry into London, in the year 1308, and was received by the citizens with a degree of splendor and elegance, that sufficiently testified their loyalty.

His majesty being informed that part of the new city wall near Ludgate, and the Tower, which his father had ordered to be built at the extremity of the said wall, were not finished; a royal mandate was immediately issued to the mayor and citizens of London, enjoining them to lose no time in completing the said buildings.

At the same time his majesty granted the following charter, which will sufficiently explain itself.

"Edward, the son of king Edward, &c. To all, &c. Whereas Gregory de Rockesley, our mayor of London, and the other barons of the said city, at our instance, have commonly and unanimously granted to the venerable father Robert, archbishop of Canterbury, and his assigns, two lanes, contiguous to his place of castle baynard and the tower of Mountficher, to be stopped up for the enlarging of the foresaid place, and to enclose them; while yet he shall assign a like way to them, and as convenient for the commonalty of the said city. And we, understanding from the foresaid mayor and barons of the said city, that the said archbishop hath already prepared a better way, and more convenient for the said commonalty, than the foresaid lanes were: we to the said archbishop and his assigns, for us and our heirs, as much as in us is, do grant, ratify, and confirm the foresaid grant. So that our said barons of London, by occasion of their foresaid grant, nor the archbishop, nor his assigns, on account of the said changing of the ways, be accused or molested for time to come before our justices itinerants at the Tower of London, upon cause of perpresture made of "the foresaid lanes. In testimony whereof, &c.

"Witness myself at Westminster, the tenth day
"of June, in the fourth year of our reign."

In the year 1311, the mayor and aldermen of London undertook to pay several debts which the king had contracted with the merchants in London, and others, for necessaries for the royal wardrobe and household, amounting to about seventeen hundred pounds, and the king, in return, assigned to them, the farm of the city, together with other issues arising by aids, tallages, &c. to the amount of that sum.

In the same year the mayor and aldermen of London were made acquainted with the king's intention to tax his several demesnes; and the city of London being included under that appellation, the magistrates were sent for by the privy council then sitting at Whitefriars in Fleet-street, and asked if they would fine for their tallage, or raise the sum required by a pole-tax, and an assessment on their estates.

The mayor and his brethren desired they might be permitted to consult the commonalty; which request being complied with, they gave for answer, that the king's demesnes were liable to taxation whenever his majesty should think it necessary; but that the city of London was undoubtedly free from such tallage, not only by the rights, privileges, and immunities, granted to them by magna charta, and so often confirmed by other charters, but by their paying the king a sum of money annually for the fee-farm of the city: they therefore solicited the deferring of the said tallage till the parliament should meet, as they should then have an opportunity of conferring with many of the nobility who were proprietors of lands and tenements in the city.

They were told that if they would lend two thousand marks to the king, the tax should be deferred, agreeable to their request. The citizens refused to agree to this proposal; whereupon commissioners were appointed to assemble at Guildhall to assess the said tallage.

This circumstance alarmed the mayor and citizens to such a degree, that they offered to lend the the king a thousand pounds, on condition that the assessment might not be permitted to take place till after the meeting of the parliament.

This proposal being acceded to, his majesty granted letters patent to the citizens in the following form :

" Edward, by the grace of God, &c. To all
" to whom the present letters shall come, greet" ing. Know ye, that whereas our beloved the " mayor and aldermen, and the rest of the citi" zens of our city of London, have lately caused
" to be lent to us a thousand pounds sterling;
" we, willing to satisfy them, the mayor, alder-
" men, and citizens, of the same sum of money,
" as we are bound, have granted unto them, that
" in the next aid to be granted unto us in our
" foresaid city, or in the county of Middlesex,
" or in levying money in the said city and county
" for our need, for whatever cause next to be " levied, we will cause the foresaid thousand " pounds to be allowed them.

" We have granted also to the same mayor,
" aldermen, and citizens, that we will by no
" means cause to be assessed any tallage singly
" by poll, or in common upon them, their " goods, chattels, lands and tenements, or
" rents in the said city, or suburbs of the same,
" before our next parliament, or to be levied
" upon them; saving always to the mayor, alder-
" men, and citizens of the said city, the " assignments made before by us to them for " debt, concerning which they undertook to " satisfy us; as in our letters patent made to them
" thereupon more fully is contained: In witness
" whereof we have caused these our letters to be " made patents. Witness myself at Windsor,
" the thirteenth day of February, in the sixth
" year of our reign."

On the same day that these letters patent were granted, the king issued an order, commanding that the assessors of the county of Oxford should not assess the citizens of London trading to Hen-ley, and not being inhabitants of the said town, and paying scot and lot.

In the year 1314, provisions of all kinds were so greatly advanced in price, that the distresses of the poor were almost insupportable; upon which the parliament interposed its authority, and fixed prices of the several articles here undermentioned :

	l.	s.	d.
The best grafs fed ox, alive, at	0	16	0
The best grain fed ox, at	1	4	0
The best cow, at	0	12	0
The best hog of two years old, at	0	3	4
The best shorn mutton, at	0	1	4
The best goose, at	0	0	3
The best capon, at	0	0	2½
The best hen, at	0	0	1½
The best chickens, 2 for	0	0	1½
The best young pidgeons, three for	0	0	1
Twenty eggs, at	0	0	1

It was enacted, by the authority of the king and parliament, that if any person refused to sell the articles abovementioned at the fixed prices, they should be forfeited to the king.

For several years past it having been a common practice with the populace to disturb and interrupt the regular election of the mayor and sheriffs of this city; the king, to prevent the like irregularities for the future, issued the following letter by way of proclamation,

" Edward, by the grace of God, &c. to the " mayor and sheriffs of London, greeting.
" Whereas by the charters of our progenitors;
" kings of England, it was granted to our citi" zens of our city aforesaid, that they should
" chuse a mayor and sheriffs from themselves;
" when they would, and present them, we not
" being at Westminster, to the treasurer and " barons of our exchequer, and there to be " admitted according to custom; and such " election by the mayor and aldermen, and
" more discreet persons of the said city, espe" cially summoned and warned for this purpose;
" hath been accustomed in former times: and
" now we have understood, that some of the " popular and plebian sort, making a conspi" racy among themselves, causing contentions,
" differences, and innumerable mischiefs, day
" and night, in the said city, and making
" among them clandestine conventicks in pri" vate places, and being not called nor sum" moned, do thrust and mingle themselves of " their own accord into such elections; and by " threatenings and clamours hindering the due
" making of such elections, endeavour to chuse
" such as for time to come may favour their er" rors; that their wickedness, by defect of con-
" grous government, may pass unpunished un" der dissimulation, by such persons so elected,
" to the hurt of our crown and dignity, and the " subversion of the state of the foresaid city, and
" the manifest oppression of our citizens abiding
" in it: we willing to provide for the quiet and " tranquillity of the people under us, as we are " bound, and to meet with such malice, com" mand, firmly enjoining you, that, before the " time of the election of the mayor and sheriffs
" next to be chosen, ye cause it be publicly " proclaimed through the whole city, and firmly
" to be forbid, that none, unless he shall be to
" this especially called or summoned, or is " bound thereto, come thither at the time, nor " intrude himself in making the election, nor
" hinder it any way, under pain of imprison" ment; from which he may not escape without
" our special command: and that the foresaid
" election be made by the aldermen, and the " other more discreet and powerful citizens of the " said city, as in the same it hath been anciently
" accustomed to be done: taking notice for the " future, that, if ye shall present any election,
" otherwise than is mentioned before, to the " treasurer and barons of our exchequer afore-
" said, we will by no means admit them. Wit" ness myself at Westminster, the fourth day of
" July, in the eighth year of our reign."

Proper application to parliament having been neglected to be made on the part of the citizens,

citizens, to prevent their being tallaged at the pleasure of the king; his majesty's want of money impelled him to take advantage of this circumstance, whereupon he appointed commissioners to tax the citizens, of which he informed the sheriffs by two precepts, issued in the months of October and November 1314.

The citizens, to prevent this tax being levied, granted the king a loan of six hundred marks; upon which the tallage was again respite.

In the year 1316 there was an excessive scarcity of corn in London, which being thought to arise from the vast quantities of wheat made into malt, an act of parliament was passed, ordaining that from that time forward no wheat should be made into malt.

The mayor and aldermen published an order for carrying this act into execution; and another for regulating the prices of ale, by which the stronger sort was to be sold for three halfpence the gallon, and the smaller at a penny.

The price of wheat still continued to advance, till it was sold at four pounds the quarter; which produced such a scene of misery and distress, that, if the ancient historians may be credited, several parents, attacked with the intolerable pains of excessive hunger, devoured even their own children, and the malefactors in prison preyed upon each other: and this calamity was succeeded by such a raging pestilential disorder, that those who escaped the contagion were scarcely numerous enough to bury those who died of it.

About this time it was represented to the king, that the ordinance of the preceding year, respecting the prices of provisions, was found to be very prejudicial, as it prevented the country people from supplying the city markets; his majesty therefore revoked the said ordinance by a brief, of which the following is a copy.

"The king to the sheriffs of London, greeting.
 "Although we lately commanded you, that in each place in the foresaid city, where it should seem to you to be the best expedient, ye shall cause it to be publickly proclaimed, that oxen, cows, hogs, sheep, geese, capons, hens, chickens, pigeons and eggs, should be sold at a certain price; because nevertheless we have understood, that such a proclamation, which at that time we believed would be for the profit of the people of our realm, redounds to their greater damage than profit; we command you, that in the said several places ye cause publickly to be proclaimed, that oxen, cows, hogs, sheep, geese, capons, hens, chickens, young pigeons and eggs, be sold for a reasonable price, as was accustomed to be done, before the said former proclamation; certifying all and singular, that the former proclamation was not made by virtue of the ordinances late made by the prelates, earls, and barons, and nobles of the same realm, and by us accepted, nor was contained in them. Witness myself at Lincoln, the twentieth of February, in the ninth year of our reign.

A mud wall having been erected by the order of king Henry III. without the tower of London, and within the wall of the city, the Londoners looking upon it as an unreasonable encroachment, assembled in the year 1316, and pulled down the said wall: but they suffered for their indiscretion; for the king made this a pretence to extort a thousand marks, which he compelled them to pay in the year following.

About the year 1318 the magistrates of the city of London were so greatly favoured by the courtiers, and were so entirely attached to that party, that, indifferent about the sentiments of their fellow citizens, they arrogantly assumed the sole right of appointing officers, and of continuing them in office as long as they pleased.

They likewise imposed arbitrary taxes, in which they favoured themselves, while they greatly oppressed the lower orders of the people.

The freemen having made frequent complaints to the judges itinerant at the tower, for a redress of these grievances, but without effect, they at length determined to submit no longer to the yoke; but compelled the magistrates to submit to the following constitutions, from a full conviction that the city would otherwise have again fallen a prey to the crown.

For the citizens of London concerning new articles then made to be observed.

"The king, to all whom, &c. greeting.

"Know ye, that whereas our beloved and faithful the mayor and aldermen, and other citizens of our city of London, had lately ordained and appointed among themselves, for the bettering of the same city, and for the common benefit of such as dwell in that city, and resort to the same, certain things to be in the same city perpetually observed and had, instantly beseeched, that we would take care to accept and confirm the same.

"We having seen certain letters, patentwise, signed with the common seal of that city, and the seal of the office of the mayoralty of that city, upon the premises, and to us exhibited, have caused certain articles to be chosen out of the foresaid letters, and caused them in some things to be corrected, as they are underneath inserted, viz.

"1. That the mayor and sheriffs of the same city be elected by the citizens of the said city, according to the tenor of the charters of our progenitors, heretofore kings of England, made to them thence, and no otherwise.

"2. That the mayor remain only one year together in his mayoralty.

"3. That the sheriffs have but two clerks and two serjeants; and that they take such for which they will answer.

"That the mayor have no other office belonging to the city, but the office of mayoralty; nor to draw to himself the sheriffs plea in the chamber of London, nor hold other pleas than those the mayor, according to ancient custom, ought to hold.

"5. That the aldermen be removed from year to year, on St. Gregory's day, and not re-elected; and others chosen by the same wards.

"6. That tallages or aids henceforth to be assessed for the king's business, or for the state and benefit

" benefit of the city, after they shall be assailed
 " by the men of the wards elected and deputed
 " for this, be not increased or heightened but by
 " the common consent of the mayor and com" monalty. And that the money coming from " these tallages and aids be delivered into the " custody of four honest men, commoners of the " city, to be chosen by the commonalty, to be " further delivered by the testimony of the said
 " four men; so that they may inform the com-
 " monalty to what profit, and for what uses, those
 " monies go.

" 7. That no stranger be admitted into the " freedom of the city in the hustling; and that
 " no inhabitant, and especially English merchant,
 " of some mystery or trade, be admitted into
 " the freedom of the city, unless by surety of six
 " honest and sufficient men of that mystery or
 " trade he shall be of, who is so to be admitted
 " into the freedom; which six men may under" take for him, of keeping the city indemnified
 " in that behalf. And that the same form
 " of surety be observed of strangers to be ad" mitted into the freedom in the hustling, if " they be of any certain mystery or trade. And " if they are not of some certain mystery, then
 " that they be not admitted into the freedom,
 " without the assent of the commonalty. And " that they who have been taken into the free" dom of the city (since we undertook the go" vernment of our realm) contrary to the forms
 " prescribed; and they who have gone contrary
 " to their oath in this behalf, or contrary to
 " the state of the city, and are thereof lawfully
 " convicted, lose the freedom of the said city.

" Saving always, that concerning apprentices
 " the antient manner and form of the said city
 " be observed.

" 8. That each year in the same city, as often
 " as need shall be, inquiry be made, if any of
 " the freedom of the same city exercise mer-
 " chandizes in the city, of the goods of others
 " not of the same freedom, by calling those " goods their own, contrary to their oath, and
 " contrary to the freedom of the said city; and
 " they that are lawfully convicted thereof, to " lose the freedom of the said city.

" 9. That all and every one being in the li" berty of the said city, and that would enjoy
 " the liberties and free customs of the said
 " city be in lot and scot, and partake of all
 " burthens for maintaining the state of the said
 " city, and the freedom thereof, according to
 " the oath they have taken, when they were ad" mitted into their freedom; and who so will not,
 " to lose his freedom.

" 10. And that all and every one, being of " the freedom of the city, and living without
 " the city, and that either by themselves, or by
 " their servants, exercise their merchandizes
 " within the city, be in lot and scot with the
 " commoners of the said city, for their mer-
 " chandizes, or else to be removed from their " freedom.

" 11. And that the common seal of the city
 " remain in the custody of two aldermen and
 " two others commoners, to be chosen for this " purpose by the commoners; and that that seal

" be not denied neither to poor nor rich com" moners, when they shall need it; yet so that
 " they reasonably prove the cause of their de" mand: and that for the putting to of the seal
 " nothing be taken. And that the giving of " judgments in the courts of the city, and espe" cially after the verdicts of inquisition taken,
 " in cases where inquisitions have been taken,
 " be not deferred, unless difficulty intervene.
 " And if difficulty intervene by reason of this,
 " giving judgment shall not be put off beyond
 " the third court.

" 12. That weights and scales of merchan-
 " dizes to be weighed between merchants and
 " merchants, the issues coming of which belong " to the commonalty of the said city, remain
 " in the custody of honest and sufficient men;
 " of the same city, expert in that office, and
 " as yet to be chosen by the commonalty, to be " kept at the will of the same commonalty; and " that they be by no means committed to others
 " than those so to be chosen.

" 13. That the sheriffs for the time being " commit toll, and other customs belonging to
 " their farm, and other publick offices belong" ing to them, and to be exercised by others,
 " to sufficient men, for whom they will answer,
 " and not commit them to others. And if any
 " deputed by the said sheriffs to any of the " aforesaid offices, take undue custom, or car" ry himself otherwise in that office than he " ought, and is thereupon convicted at the suit
 " of the complainant, let him be removed from
 " that office, and punished according to his
 " demerits.

" 14. Merchants, who are not of the freedom
 " of the city, not to sell, by retail, wines or
 " other wares, within the city or suburbs.

" 15. That there be no brokers hereafter in
 " the city of any merchandizes, unless elected
 " to this by merchants of the mysteries, in which
 " the brokers themselves may have to exercise
 " their offices; and at least of this to make oath
 " before the mayor.

" 16. That the common harbourers in the " city and suburbs, although they are not of
 " the freedom of the same, be partakers of the " contingent burdens for maintaining the said
 " city, according to the state of it, as long as " they shall be so common harbourers, as other
 " like dwellers in the city and suburbs shall par-
 " take, on the account of those dwellings.
 " Saving always, that the merchants of Gascoigne,
 " and other foreigners, may, one with another,
 " inhabit and be harboured in the said city, as
 " hitherto they have accustomed to do.

" 17. That the keeping the bridge of the " said city, and the rents and profits belonging
 " to that bridge, be committed to be kept to
 " two honest and sufficient men of the city,
 " other than the aldermen, to be chosen to this
 " by the commonalty, at the will of the said
 " commonalty, and not to others; and who
 " may answer thereupon to the said common-
 " alty.

" 18. That no serjeant of the chamber of " Guyhald take fee of the commonalty of the " city, or do execution, unless one chosen for
 " this

" this by the commonalty of the city; and that
 " the chamberlain, common clerk, and common
 " serjeant be chosen by the commonalty of the " city, and be removed according to the will of " the same city.

" 19. And that the mayor and recorder, and
 " the foresaid chamberlain and common clerk, be " content with their fees antiently appointed and
 " paid on account of their offices, and take not
 " other fees for the abovesaid offices.

" 20. That the goods of the aldermen, in aids,
 " tallages and other contributions, concerning
 " the said city, be taxed by the men of the wards
 " in which those aldermen abide, as the goods of
 " other citizens, by the said wards.

" Which articles, as they are above expressed,
 " and the matters contained in the same, we ac" cept, approve and ratify, and we yield and grant
 " them, for us and our heirs, as much as in us
 " is, to the foresaid citizens, their heirs and suc" cessors in the foresaid city and suburbs, for the " common profit of those that inhabit therein,
 " and resort thither, to obtain the same, and to
 " be observed perpetually.

" Moreover, we willing to shew ampler grace
 " to the mayor, aldermen and citizens, at their " request, have granted to them, for us and our " heirs, that the mayor, aldermen, citizens and
 " commonalty of the commoners of the city, and
 " their heirs and successors, for the necessities and
 " profits of the same city, may, among them" selves, of their common assent, assess tallages
 " upon their own goods within that city, as well
 " upon the rents as other things, and as well
 " upon the mysteries as any other way, as they " shall see expedient, and levy them, without " incurring the danger of us or our heirs, or our " ministers whomsoever. And that the money
 " from such tallages remain in the custody of four
 " honest and lawful men of the said city, to be " chosen to this by the commonalty, and be laid " out, of their custody, for the necessities and " profits of the said city, and not otherwise. In " witness whereof, &c.

" Witness the king at York, the eighth day
 " of June."

It is worthy of remark, that the articles above recited were afterwards added to the charters of the city, and confirmed by the parliament, in the seventh year of the reign of Richard II.

In this same year, 1318, the king summoned a parliament to assemble at York, and issued his writ to the sheriffs of London to chuse two of the citizens to represent the said city: but instead of two, they made choice of three representatives, to whom, or to two of them, they delegated the power of acting for the public good in the said parliament.

* The sentence of banishment against the Spencers was soon reversed; whereupon they presented a petition to the king, setting forth the damages they had sustained; and by this petition it appeared that the real estate of the elder Spencer (if the authority of our ancient writers may be relied on) consisted of " Sixty-three manors, and his personal of two crops of corn, one in barns, and the other upon the ground; in cash, jewels, silver and golden utensils, &c. ten thousand pounds; armour for 200 men, war-

The populousness and riches of London at this period may be judged of from the following circumstance; for in this parliament it was enacted that this city should provide and furnish two hundred men, to march against the Scots; which is five times the number that was supplied by any other city in the kingdom.

In the year 1321, complaint was made to the justices itinerant at the Tower, that the mayor and aldermen had presumed to turn out some members of the common-council at their pleasure; which was particularly instanced in the case of Walter Henry, who was ejected from the common-council because he would not permit the rich to tax the poor, till they themselves had discharged their arrears of former tallages.

Hereupon Sir John Gisors, a former lord-mayor, and several other persons of consequence, were summoned to attend the said justices; but conscious of their guilt, they fled, and concealed themselves till the affair was dropt.

The two Spencers, favourites of the king, having at this period so entirely engrossed his majesty's confidence, that he resigned the whole management of public affairs to their guidance, the barons highly resented this unmanly conduct of their sovereign; and this occasioned the summoning of a parliament to meet at London, to which the nobility repaired with a prodigious number of armed attendants, who quartered themselves in the suburbs.

Hereupon the magistrates thought it prudent to guard against any unexpected attack, by appointing a guard of a thousand citizens, who being completely armed, watched the gates and walls of the city from four o'clock in the morning till six in the evening, when they were relieved by the same number, who kept watch during the night.

Besides these, two aldermen, with a proper number of attendants, patrolled the streets during the whole night, to keep the watch to their duty; and the gates of the city, which were shut at nine o'clock at night, were not opened till the next morning at seven.

By this good conduct the peace of the city was preserved, till the king gave permission to the Londoners to receive the barons and their army within the walls: and in a short time afterwards an act of parliament was passed, and signed by the king, by which the Spencers were doomed to perpetual banishment.*

This careful defence of the city gave the king a great opinion of the fidelity of his citizens of London; and he had soon afterwards occasion to put their loyalty still farther to the trial; for the governor of the castle of Leeds in Kent, having refused the queen a lodging in that castle, the king raised an army consisting chiefly of Lon-

" like engines, and the destruction of his houses, 30,000
 " pounds; the furniture of his chapel and wardrobe, 5,000
 " pounds; 28,000 sheep; 1000 oxen and heifers; 1200
 " cows, with their calves for two years; forty mares, with
 " their foals for two years; 560 cart-horses; 2000 hogs;
 " 400 kids; 40 tons of wine; 600 bacon; 80 carcases of
 " beef; 600 muttons in larder; ten tons of cyder, and
 " thirty-six sacks of wool; with a library of books."

doners,

doners, with whom he marched and summoned the castle to surrender: but the governor being resolved to defend it, his majesty besieged it in form, and compelled it to surrender at discretion.

In return for this service, the king granted the following charter to his faithful citizens of London:

“Edward, by the grace of God, king of England, lord of Ireland, and duke of Aquitaine; to all to whom these present letters shall come, greeting.

“Know ye, that whereas the mayor and the good men of the city of London have, of late, thankfully done us aid of armed footmen at our castle of Leeds in the county of Kent; and also aid of like armed men now going with us through divers parts of our realm for divers causes: we, willing to provide for the indemnity of the said mayor and good men of our city of London in this behalf, have granted to them, for us and our heirs, that the said aids, to us so thankfully done, shall not be prejudicial to the said mayor and the good men, their heirs and successors; nor shall they be drawn into consequent for time to come. In witness whereof we have caused these our letters to be made patents. Witness myself at Aldermanston, the twelfth of December.”

Soon after the granting of this charter the citizens made the king a present of two thousand marks, towards defraying the expences of a war against the Scots; and it is not improbable that this sum was given in consequence of receiving the charter.

But this friendship between the king and the citizens of London does not appear to have been of any long continuance; for the king having been successful against the barons, and caused the earl of Lancaster to be beheaded; he took advantage of some dissensions which were still subsisting between the citizens, on account of the last presentment to the justices itinerant, and made this pretext for seizing the liberties of the city, by which he extorted two thousand marks for their redemption, which was paid him in the year 1322.

The Spencers being re-established in the king's favour, the queen was so disgusted with the ascendancy they had gained over her husband, that she prevailed on him to permit her and her son to visit her brother the king of France; but her real intention was to solicit aid to compel the Spencers to fly the kingdom.

Her majesty was so successful as to conclude a treaty with the earl of Hainault, in order to invade England; of which Edward receiving advice, demanded a supply of men and money of the citizens of London.

To this demand the Londoners replied, “That they would at all times revere their sovereign lord the king, the queen, and the prince their son, the indubitable heir of the crown; and shut their gates against, and to the utmost of their power, resist all foreigners and traitors; but that they were not willing to march out to fight, unless, according to their ancient privileges, they could return home the same day before sun-set.”

The king, being greatly disgusted with this reply, appointed Walter Stapleton, bishop of Exeter, custos of the city; he also furnished the Tower of London with military stores, and having placed therein his son, John of Eltham, he went into the western counties of England to raise an army.

Soon after the departure of the king, the mayor and citizens received a pathetic letter from the queen, entreating their speedy and effectual assistance in the great cause of liberty and their country.

This letter from the queen being stuck upon the cross in Cheapside, many copies were taken from it, and fixed in other parts of the city; whereupon the bishop of Exeter demanded the keys from the mayor; but the populace, determined to prevent the keys being delivered up, seized the mayor, and would have put him to death, if he had not sworn an implicit obedience to their orders. They likewise entered into a solemn agreement to destroy the enemies of the queen, of all ranks and degrees, wherever they could lay hold of them.

The first victim to their fury was John Marshall, a servant to the younger Spencer, whose head they cut off without ceremony; and then attacking the palace of the bishop of Exeter, they set his gates on fire, carried off his household goods, jewels and plate; and pursuing the prelate, who was going to take sanctuary in St. Paul's, they overtook him at the north door of the cathedral, where they beat him in a terrible manner, then dragged him into Cheapside, where they declared him a traitor, and having cut off his head, and the heads of two of his domestics, they buried their bodies among the rubbish of a tower which the bishop was building on the banks of the Thames.

On the day following, the mob happening to meet Sir John de Weston, constable of the Tower of London, they compelled him to deliver up the keys; and taking immediate possession of that fortress, they discharged all the king's officers, set the prisoners at liberty, and appointed John of Eltham, the king's second son, guardian of the city and kingdom.

In a short time after this transaction, Robert Baldock, the chancellor, was brought from Hereford, a prisoner, and committed to the bishop's prison: but this person being the real or supposed author of most of the miseries in which the kingdom was involved, the populace dragged him from thence, and lodged him in Newgate, but in the way thither they beat him in such an unmerciful manner, that he soon died of the wounds.

By this time the queen's party was become so powerful, that the king was obliged to retreat into Wales to conceal himself; but he was soon discovered and made prisoner; and the queen and her son Edward being received into London with every demonstration of joy, the parliament speedily assembled, and compelled Edward to resign the crown to the young prince.

C H A P.

CHAPTER XIV.

The first charter of Edward III. to the citizens of London. The village of Southwark granted to the citizens of London by charter. Account of dreadful riots, with a copy of the king's letters for suppressing them. The king's letters to the mayor to try rioters. Account of a tournament in Cheapside. His majesty's orders respecting the punishment of regrators. Provisions sold at very low prices. King Edward's third charter confirming the city liberties.

IN a short time after Edward III. had assumed the reigns of government, he, by the consent of his parliament, granted the following charter to the citizens of London.

“ Edward, by the grace of God, king of England, lord of Ireland, and duke of Aquitaine; to his archbishops, bishops, abbots, priors, earls, barons, justices, sheriffs, rulers, ministers, and other his balliffs and faithful subjects greeting.

“ Know ye, that we for the bettering of our city of London, and for the good and laudable service which our beloved mayor, aldermen and commonalty of the said city heretofore have often done to us and our progenitors, with the assent of the aforesaid earls, barons, and all the commonalty of our realm, being called to this our present parliament at Westminster, have granted, and by this our charter, for us and our heirs, confirmed to the citizens of the aforesaid city, the liberties here underwritten, to have and to hold to them and their heirs and successors for ever.

“ First, whereas in the great charter of the liberties of England it is contained, that the city of London have all their ancient liberties and customs; and the same citizens, at the time of the making of the charter, from the time of St. Edward the king and confessor, and William the conqueror, and of other our progenitors, had divers liberties and customs, as well by the charters of those our progenitors, as without charter by ancient custom, whereupon in divers the circuits, and other the courts of our said progenitors, as well by judgments as by statutes, were invaded, and some of them adjudged; we will and grant, for us and our heirs, that they may have the liberties according to the form of the above-said great charter; and that impediments and usurpations to them in that behalf made shall be revoked and annulled.

“ We have further granted, for us and our heirs, to the said citizens, their heirs and successors aforesaid, that the mayor of the aforesaid city, which for the time shall be one of the justices to be assigned of the goal-delivery of Newgate, and be named in every commission thereof to be made; and that the said citizens may have infangtheft and outfangtheft, and chattels of felons, of all those which shall be adjudged before them within the liberties of the same city, and of all being of

“ the liberty aforesaid, at the aforesaid goal to be adjudged.

“ And whereas also, by the charters of our progenitors, it was granted to the same citizens, that they should hold the sheriffwicks of London and Middlesex, for three hundred pounds yearly, to be paid at our exchequer, and they are charged with the payment of four hundred pounds yearly, every year to be paid at our exchequer, for the sheriffwicks, contrary to the form of the said charters;

“ We will and grant, for us and our heirs, that the said citizens, their heirs and successors, may henceforth the aforesaid sheriffwicks hold for three hundred pounds yearly, to be yearly paid at our exchequer, according to the tenor of the aforesaid charters; and that they may be from henceforth acquitted of the said hundred pounds.

“ Furthermore, we have granted, for us and our heirs, to the said citizens, that their heirs and successors may bequeath their tenements within the liberties of the aforesaid city, as well in Mortmain as in other manner, as of ancient time they have been accustomed to do.

“ And whereas in a certain charter of the lord Edward, late king of England, our father to the said citizens made (amongst other things) it is contained, that the sheriffs of the said city, as often as they shall happen to be amerced for any offence in the court, shall be amerced according to the measure and quantity of their offence, as other the sheriffs of our realm were wont to be amerced for like offences; and the sheriffs of the aforesaid city, after the making of that charter, were otherwise amerced for the escape of thieves, than other sheriffs were on this side Trent, for such-like escapes are amerced only, as it is said, one hundred shillings.

“ We will and grant, for us and our heirs, that the sheriffs of the same city, which for the time shall be in no ways amerced or charged for the escape of thieves in any otherwise than as other the sheriffs on this side Trent; and that the aforesaid citizens shall not be charged for the custody of those that fly to the churches within the aforesaid liberty, for to have immunities, otherwise than of old hath been accustomed to be charged; any thing in the last circuit at the Tower of London made or adjudged notwithstanding.

“ And that the said citizens may remove and take

“ take away all the wears in the waters of Thames
“ and Medway, and may have the punishments “ thereof to us belonging.

“ Also we will and command streightly, that
“ all merchant strangers, coming to England, “ shall sell their wares and merchandizes within “ forty days after their coming thither; and “ shall continue and board with free hosts of the “ said city, and other cities and towns in Eng“ land, without any households or societies by “ them to be kept.

“ And also we will and grant, for us and our “ heirs, that the marshal, steward or clerk of “ the market of our household, may not sit from “ henceforth within the liberty of the aforesaid “ city, nor exercise any offence there, nor any “ way draw any citizen of the said city to plead “ without the liberties of the said city, of any “ thing that happen within the liberties of the “ same; and that no escheator, or other officers,
“ may, from henceforth, exercise the office of “ the escheator within the liberties of the said “ city: but that the mayor of the said city for “ the time being may do the office of the “ escheator within the said liberty, so as always
“ he take his oath that he exercise the said office,
“ and that he answer thereof to us and our heirs,
“ as he ought to do. And that the said citizens,
“ from henceforth, shall not be compelled to go
“ or send to war out of the said city. And that “ the constable of the Tower of London for the “ time being, shall not make any prizes, by land
“ or by water, of any victuals, or other thing “ whatsoever, of the men of the said city, or “ going thence: neither shall or may arrest, or “ cause to be arrested, the ships or boats bring“ ing victuals or other like goods to or from the “ said city.

“ And forasmuch as the citizens, in all good “ fairs of England, were wont to have among “ themselves keepers to hold the pleas touching
“ the citizens of the said city, assembling them“ selves at the said fairs: we will and grant, as “ much as in us is, that the said citizens may have “ such like keepers, to hold such pleas of their “ covenants, as of ancient time they had, (ex“ cept the pleas of the land and of the crown).

“ Furthermore, we grant, for us and our heirs,
“ That the sheriffs of the said city, for the time “ being, shall not be compelled to take any oath
“ at our exchequer, but upon yielding up of “ their accounts.

“ And whereas the said citizens, in the circuit
“ of Henry Stanton, and fellow justices of the “ lord Edward, late king of England, our fa“ ther, last circuit at the Tower of London,
“ were compelled, contrary to their ancient cus“ toms, to claim their liberties and free-customs,
“ and thereupon did claim divers liberties, by
“ the charters of our said progenitors, and of “ other their liberties and free-customs of old
“ use and custom; which said claims do as yet “ hang before us undecided.

“ We will and grant, for us and our heirs,
“ that the same citizens, their heirs and succes“ sors, may have the liberties and free-customs,
“ and may use them as of old time they were “ wont; and that they may record their said

“ liberties and free-customs, before us, our ju“ stices, and other ministers whatsoever, in such “ sort as they were wont to do before the said
“ circuit; notwithstanding that the said citizens “ in the said circuit were impeached upon some “ like record and liberties; and free-customs,
“ aforesaid; and also notwithstanding any statutes
“ or judgments made or published to the contra“ ry: and that to the allowance of their charters,
“ to be had before us in our exchequer, and other “ pleas whatsoever, one writ shall suffice in all “ pleas for every king's time: and that no
“ summons, attachment, or executions, be made
“ by any of the officers of us or our heirs, by “ writ or without writ, within the liberty of the “ said city, but only by ministers of the said
“ city: and that the sheriffs of the same city “ (which shall be toward the aid of the same of “ the said city) may lawfully have the forfeiture
“ of victuals, and other things and merchandizes,
“ according to the tenor of the charter thereof “ made to the said citizens, and shall not be de“ barred thereof hereafter, contrary to the tenor
“ of the same charter.

“ And that the same citizens, in the circuits of
“ the justices, from henceforth sitting at the “ Tower of London, shall be guided by the same “ laws and customs, whereby they were guided “ in the circuits holden in the time of lord John
“ and Henry, sometimes kings of England, and “ others our progenitors; and if any thing in
“ the last circuit was done or attempted, contrary “ to their liberties and free-customs, we will “ they be not prejudicial unto them, but that “ they may be guided as of old time they were.

“ We have also granted, for us and our heirs,
“ that the same citizens from henceforth, in and “ towards subsidies, grants and contributions “ whatsoever to be made to the use of us or our “ heirs, shall be taxed and contributory with the “ commonalty of our realm, as common persons,
“ and not as men of the city; and that they be “ quit of all other tallages; and that the liberty “ of the said city shall not be taken into the “ hands of us or our heirs for any personal tres“ pass or judgment of any minister of the said “ city: neither shall a keeper in the said city for “ that occasion be deputed, but the same minister “ shall be punished according to the quality of “ his offence.

“ And that no purveyor and taker, officer, and “ other minister of us and our heirs, or of any “ other, shall make any prizes in the said city, “ or without, of the goods of the citizens of the “ said city, contrary to their will and pleasure; “ unless immediately they make due payment for “ the same, or else may have respite thereof with
“ the good will of the seller: and that no price “ be made of the wines of those citizens, by any
“ the citizens of us or our heirs, or otherwise “ against their wills; that is to say, of one ton “ before the mast and behind it: nor by any “ other means: but shall be quit thereof for “ ever.

“ Furthermore, we forbid that any officer of “ us or our heirs, shall merchandize, by himself “ or others, within the said city, or without, of “ any thing touching their offices.

“ Also

“ Also we grant, that the lands and tenements (lying without) of the said citizens, which have been, or hereafter shall be, ministers of the said city, be bound to keep the said city harmless, against us and our heirs, of those things which concern their offices, as their tenements be within the said city: and that no market shall be henceforth granted, by us or our heirs, to any within seven miles in circuit of the said city. And that all inquisitions, from henceforth to be taken by our justices or ministers of the said city, shall be taken in St. Martin’s [le Grand] in London, and not elsewhere; except the inquisitions to be taken in the circuits at the Tower of London; and for the goal delivery of Newgate: and that none of the freemen of the said city, shall be impleaded or troubled at our exchequer, or elsewhere, by bill; except it be by those things which touch us and our heirs. Wherefore we will and straightly command, for us and our heirs, that the said citizens, their heirs and successors, have all their liberties and free customs, and the same may use and enjoy for ever, in form aforesaid. Given at Westminster, the 6th of March, in the first year of our reign.”

By this charter all the antient rights and immunities of the citizens are confirmed, and a grant is made of the following additional privileges; viz. The mayor of London to be one of the judges to sit on the trial of prisoners confined in Newgate.—The citizens to enjoy the right of infang-theft, that is the privilege of trying a thief or robber, apprehended within the jurisdiction of the city; and of outfang-theft, which is the liberty of reclaiming a citizen taken in any other place, in order to bring him to his trial within the city:—a right to the goods and chattels of all felons convicted within the jurisdiction of the city:—a remission of three hundred pounds a year, which had been formerly illegally extorted from the city for the fee-farm rent of the county of Middlesex, in violation of ancient charters:—the privilege of devising lands in mortmain:—the sheriffs of London and Middlesex to be amerced no otherwise than other sheriffs south of the river Trent:—foreign merchants obliged to sell their merchandize within forty days, to prevent an advance in the prices:—the citizens not to be chargeable with the custody of such as take sanctuary:—an exemption from the authority of the king’s marshal, steward, and clerk of the household:—the mayor of London made perpetual escheator:—permission for the Londoners to hold a court of pye-powder, in all country fairs:—the citizens exempted from all tallages, except being assessed in common with their fellow subjects:—the liberties of the city not to be seized for a personal offence, or iniquitous judgment of any of its magistrates:—none of the king’s purveyors to rate any sort of goods belonging to the citizens, or to deal in any kind of merchandize within the city:—and, lastly, that no market be held within seven miles of London.

The village of Southwark being, about this time, the general rendezvous of thieves and other disturbers of the public peace, the king, at the time of granting the above-recited charter to the citizens, granted them likewise the following:

“ Edward, by the grace of God, king of England, lord of Ireland, and duke of Aquitaine; to all to whom these present letters shall come, greeting.

“ Know ye, that whereas our well-beloved, the citizens of the city of London, by their petition exhibited before us and our council, in our present parliament at Westminster assembled, have given us to understand, that felons, thieves, and other malefactors, and disturbers of the peace, who, in the said city and elsewhere, have committed manslaughters, robberies, and divers other felonies, privily departing from the said city, after those felonies committed, into the village of Southwark, where they cannot be attached by the ministers of the said city, and there are openly received: and so for default of due punishment are more bold to commit such felonies: and they have beseeched us, that, for the confirmation of our peace within the said city, bridling the naughtiness of the said malefactors, we would grant unto them the said village, to have to them, their heirs and successors, for ever, for the farm and rent therefore yearly due to us, to be yearly paid at our exchequer: We, having consideration to the premises, with the assent of the prelates, earls, barons, and commonalty, being in our present parliament aforesaid, have granted, for us and our heirs, to the said citizens, the said village of Southwark, with the appurtenances, to have and to hold, to them and their heirs and successors, citizens of the said city, of us and our heirs for ever, to pay to us by the year, at the exchequer of us and our heirs for ever, at the accustomed times, the farms therefore due and accustomed: In witness whereof, we have caused these our letters to be made patents. Witness myself at Westminster, the sixth day of March, in the first year of our reign.”

By this charter we find that the village of Southwark is granted to the citizens of London, and their heirs for ever: but it does not appear that it answered the end proposed by the grant; for in the following year there was a very dangerous insurrection in the city, which being began by a number of people of various professions, they were joined by a crew of execrable villains, who strolled about the streets with swords and bucklers, beating and wounding those they met, and sometimes even perpetrating murder.

These outrages occasioned the king’s issuing a writ directed to the mayor and sheriffs of London, for the apprehending and prosecuting all rioters; but this proving ineffectual, the king sent a letter to the mayor and sheriffs, a copy of which is as follows.

“ The king to the mayor and sheriffs of London, greeting. Whereas it is given us to understand, that very many evil doers, and disturbers of our peace, have made divers riots, confederacies, and unlawful conventicles, with-
“ in

" in the aforefaid city, and fuburbs thereof, fince
 " we have taken the government of our realm,
 " and do wander about and run here and there,
 " beating, wounding, and mifufing the people,
 " and wickedly killing fome of them, and fpoil-
 " ing others of their goods and poffeffions; and
 " taking and imprifoning others; as well of the " city and fuburbs, as thofe that come to the " faid city and fuburbs about their bufinefs, and
 " detaining them in prifon, until they have made
 " them give fines and redemptions; and com" mitting other mifdemors, and not defifting
 " daily to commit them, to the breach of our
 " peace, and the terror of our people in thofe
 " parts, and manifefly tending to commotion:
 " We, willing to have fuch malefactors punifhed,
 " and the tranquillity of our people inviolably
 " kept, as we are bound to do by our oath, com" mand you, that by the oath of honeft men, in
 " your bailiffwick, ye diligently enquire of the " names of the aforefaid malefactors, and of them
 " that knowingly receive and maintain them,
 " and find out the truth concerning other articles,
 " more fully touching the premifes. And all
 " thofe, whom thereupon it fhall happen to be " judged, and all thofe whom ye fhall find doing
 " fuch things, as are premifed, ye caufe, with" out delay, to be taken, and to be fafely kept
 " in our prifon, until ye fhall have farther com" mand from us thereupon: and that ye fo be-
 " have yourfelves in this behalf, that the damages
 " and lewdnefses aforefaid, may not happen there
 " any more: whereby we might take heavily of
 " you, as of them to whom we have committed
 " the cuftody of the faid city, under the danger
 " that is incumbent. In witnefs whereof, &c."

The mayor and fheriffs of this city, being refolved to enforce that obedience which the king had by the above-recited writ required, immediately apprehended a confiderable number of the offenders; in confequence of which his majesty fent the following letter to the judges, mayor, &c.
 for the speedy profecution of the delinquents.

" To Oliver de Ingham, John Matravers,
 " John de Stoner, Robert de Mabbethorpe, and
 " John de Grantham; to the mayor, &c. For-
 " asmuch as our city of London is our chamber;
 " and, on that account, the men of the faid city
 " of London are more firmly obliged to the de" fence of our perfon, and confervation of our " rights; we more heavily bearing the premifes,
 " and willing that they be punifhed, as it is fit,
 " have commanded you our faid mayor and fheriffs
 " of London, that ye fhall enquire diligently
 " of the premifes, and fhould take thofe whom
 " ye fhould find culpable by the fame inquifition,
 " and keep them fafe, until ye fhould have fome
 " further command thereupon from us. And " becaufe the premifes do fpecially touch us, and
 " the ftate of our crown, willing to determine
 " the faid inquifitions, and all other things touch" ing the premifes, according to the exigence of " law, we have affigned you our juftices to hear
 " and determine the inquifitions and indictments
 " made by the fame inquifitions, &c."

In the year 1329, feveral ambaffadors from foreign courts being arrived in England, the king treated his illuftrious vifitors with a folemn tournament, of thirteen knights on a fide, which was exhibited between the ends of Queen-ftreet and Wood-ftreet in Cheapfide.

On this occafion, the ftreet was covered with fand, to prevent the horfes flipping down, and a grand fcaffold, in the form of a tower, was erected for the accommodation of the queen, and the ladies of her majesty's train; but during the exhibition this building fell fuddenly down, though happily, the ladies received no other injury than being dreadfully frightened. His majesty, however, would have feverely punifhed the builder for his carelefsnefs, had not the queen, with great humanity, interceded in his behalf, and obtained his pardon.

In the year abovementioned, the practice of adulterating wines being carried to fuch a height
 as to endanger the health of his majesty's fubjects, an order was iffued to the mayor and fheriffs, directing them in the king's name, to make public proclamation, that " no perfon fhould prefume in
 " any manner to mingle fuch wines, nor to fell
 " any mixed, but good and pure; and to punifh
 " the offenders by levying a forfeit upon them
 " for the ufe of the king."

The meafures which had been heretofore taken, for the punifhment of the desperadoes who wounded, robbed and murdered people in the ftreets, being found infufficient to refrain the horrid practices of thefe daring offenders, the king iffued a proclamation, ftrictly enjoining that " no per-
 " fon fhould prefume to wear any coat of plate,
 " or any weapon whatever, in the city of Lon" don, or town of Weftminfter, or in the fuburbs
 " thereof, upon pain of forfeiting all his poffef-
 " fions."

In the fpring of the year 1335, there fell fuch exceffive rains, that the corn was rotted in the ground, fo that the following harveft was fo extremely bad as to caufe a general fcarcity, which raifed provisions to an enormous price.

Befides this misfortune, the prices were likewife greatly advanced by the regrators, and of thofe
 who fold by defective weights and meafures.

Hereupon the king, with the advice of his council, fent a fevere reprimand to the mayor and fheriffs of London, for having been fo inattentive to the welfare of the city, as not to provide a proper ftore of provisions againft a time of fcarcity.

He likewife cenfured them for paying fo little regard to their oaths, as to permit the fale of bread, wine, beer, and other articles at fuch high prices, and for not punifhing thofe who made ufe of bad weights and meafures.

His majesty alfo ftrictly enjoined the mayor, on the penalty of his whole fortune, immediately to fummmon the aldermen and other citizens, to debate upon and fix the prices of all kinds of provisions, with proper regard to the prime coft of the refpective articles. At the fame time the king fent the following charge to the mayor of the city:

" That your oath as mayor remain inviolable;
 " do you chaftize and punifh all from time to
 " time who act againft right, and reform all
 " other

“ other things which you shall know to be repugnant to the good government of the said city and suburbs; that, by your diligence exhibited in this behalf, the city may be reduced to its due state, and excessive regrators wholly taken away: and that you publicly proclaim all and singular the premises in the foresaid city and suburbs, in the accustomed places. but if they should not appoint a speedy remedy for all these excesses, that then the grieved should complain thereof to him and his council; and he, in that defect, would cause a remedy to be applied to these excesses without delay.”

In obedience to the royal command, measures were immediately taken to fix the prices of provisions; and a great scarcity of money arising from the large sums which had been levied on occasion of a war with the Scots, the provisions undermentioned were sold at the following low rates:

	s.	d.
The best wheat, the quarter, at	2	0
The best ox, at	6	8
The best sheep, at	0	8
The best pigeons, six for	0	1
The best goose, at	0	2
The best pig, at	0	1

Certain privileges having been granted to foreigners residing in London, the citizens began to be alarmed for fear their rights and immunities should be invaded; upon which the king, to ease their apprehensions, granted them the following charter:

“ Edward, by the grace of God, king of England, lord of Ireland, and duke of Aquitaine, to all to whom these present letters shall come, greeting.

“ Know ye, whereas in our parliament at York holden the morrow after the ascension of our Lord, in the ninth year of our reign, it was enacted, that all merchant strangers and English-born, and every of them, of what estate or condition soever, who would buy or sell corn, wine, powderable wares, fish or other victuals, wool, cloth, wares, or other vend-

“ ible things whatsoever, wheresoever they were, either in cities, towns, boroughs, ports of the sea, fairs, markets, or other places in the realm, whether within liberties or without, might, without impediment, freely sell the same victuals or wares to whom they pleased, as well to foreigners as to English born; the enemies to us and our realm only excepted; notwithstanding the charters of liberties to any cities or places afore said granted to the contrary, or custom or judgment upon the said charters, as in the afore said statute is more plainly contained: yet, nevertheless, because in the statutes as well in our said parliament, as in other parliaments of our progenitors, sometimes kings of England, made by us and our progenitors, with the common consent of the prelates, earls, barons, and commonalty of our realm, it was granted and established, that the great charter of the liberty of England, in all and singular its articles, should be maintained and firmly observed. And in the same charter, amongst other things it is contained, that the city of London may have its ancient liberties and free-customs unhurt: and it hath been the intent and meaning, as well of us as our progenitors, and yet is, that the said great charter, in all the articles thereof, may be still observed; and that by pretext of the said statute, or any other, nothing shall be done to the prejudice or infringement of the said charter, or of any article therein contained, or of the ancient liberties or customs of the said city, may be unjustly burdened, touching their said liberties and free-customs, contrary to such intent, with the consent of the prelates, earls, and barons, assisant with us in this our parliament, have granted, for us and our heirs, that the citizens of the said city, their heirs and successors, may have all their liberties and free customs unhurt and whole, as before these times, they more freely had the same; the afore said statute for the said merchants made to the hurt of the liberties and customs of the said city notwithstanding. In witness whereof we have caused these our letters to be made patents. Witness myself at Westminster, the 26th day of March, in the 11th year of our reign.”

CHAPTER XV.

Twenty thousand marks advanced by the city. Commission issued to the citizens for preserving the public peace. A battle between the Fishmongers and Skinners. Two rioters beheaded. Patent granted to the citizens. The king's judges not permitted to sit in the city. A general pardon granted to the citizens. Writ to compel all citizens having £40 per annum to take upon them the order of knighthood. The sheriff's answer to this writ. Orders respecting the choice of a mayor in future. Proclamation enjoining leprous persons to depart the city. A dreadful plague in London, by which the price of provisions is greatly reduced. A charter granted by king Edward to the citizens. The mayor of London allowed to have gold or silver maces carried before him. A present of archers from the city to the king. The Black prince, and the king of France his prisoner, received into London. The king's order concerning the slaughter of cattle. A return of the plague. The Lord-mayor entertains four kings, &c. Ordinance ascertaining what goods a tenant must leave on quitting his house.

THE parliament, in the year 1339, granted the king a subsidy for the support of the war, but money being immediately wanted, the citizens supplied him with twenty thousand marks, which was to be deducted from the sum they were to raise towards the subsidy.

This is the first general assessment we remember to have read of; and the following is the table of rates by which each ward was assessed.

The Assessment.

	l.	s.	d.
Tower-Ward	365	0	0
Billingsgate-Ward	763	0	0
Bridge-Ward	765	6	8
Dowgate-Ward	660	10	0
Langburn-Ward	352	6	8
Wallbroke-Ward	911	0	0
Bishopgate-Ward	559	6	8
Lymestreet-Ward	110	0	0
Cornhill-Ward	315	0	0
Cheap-Ward	517	10	0
Broadstreet-Ward	588	0	0
Vintry-Ward	634	16	8
Breadstreet-Ward	461	16	8
Queenhithe-Ward	435	13	4
Cordwaynerstreet-Ward	2195	3	4
Faringdon-Ward within	730	16	8
Faringdon-Ward without	114	13	4
Cripplegate-Ward	462	10	0
Colemanstreet-Ward	1051	16	8
Candlewickstreet-Ward	133	6	8
Aldgate-Ward	30	0	0
Portoken-Ward	27	10	0
Castle-Baynard's-Ward	63	6	8
Bassishaw-Ward	79	13	4
Aldersgate-Ward	57	10	0
Sum Total	12385	13	4

The same year, in consequence of the king's resolution to cross the seas, a commission was granted to the mayor, aldermen and commonalty of London, whereby they were empowered and commanded to exert themselves to the utmost of their abilities for the preservation of the public peace; and which likewise ordered, that they should cause proper and speedy punishment to be done upon such malefactors as should be apprehended in the absence of the king.

A quarrel happening between the Fishmongers and Skinners soon after the departure of the king, the parties met in the streets, and several skirmishes ensuing, many persons were mortally wounded. In order to suppress this lawless tumult, the mayor, aldermen and sheriffs, repaired to the place of riot, where they apprehended several of the rioters, and were conveying them to prison, when two of the mob, the one named Thomas Haunsart, the other John le Brewere, assisted by several accomplices, assaulted the mayor, and rescued the prisoners; however, they were soon overcome, and carried to Guildhall, where they were tried and convicted, and the same day, pursuant to their sentence, beheaded in Cheapside, then called Westcheap.

The king, on his return, was so highly pleased with the spirited conduct of the first magistrate, and his brethren the aldermen, and sheriffs, that on the fourth of June, at which time his majesty was at the Tower, he signed the following patent:

"We, considering if so great rashness of the foresaid Thomas and John had been passed over unpunished, it had yielded boldness to others of doing the like things; and so thinking the said punishment very seasonable for the conservation of our peace, and to be well done; and willing, by the consideration aforesaid, that the said mayor, sheriffs, aldermen and commonalty be secure; and to provide that they may not be troubled, by reason hereof, in future times; what hath been done by the mayor, sheriffs, &c. as much as belongs to us, we approve and confirm. So that they may not hereafter be sued, either by ourselves, our heirs, successors, or our justices, on occasion of these deaths. Witness the king at the Tower of London, on the fourth day of June."

Shortly after, the king's itinerant judges were commanded commanded to make inquisition throughout the kingdom concerning the public conduct of his collectors of duties; but the citizens being convinced that such a step would be contrary to their privileges, would not permit any of them to hold a sitting in the city. In consequence of which the king ordered them to appear immediately before him at the Tower, which they likewise positively refused; and the people in general behaving, on this occasion, with the same spirit they ever have done when their liberties were invaded, the judges very prudently declared that they would not hold a session on that account till after Easter.

The king, who was highly displeased with the behaviour both of his judges and citizens, ordered strict search to be made after all persons who had behaved themselves in a tumultuous manner; but, being well assured that the citizens had been actuated by no other motive than a fixed resolution of maintaining their rights, he gave them a general pardon.

In the year 1342, a general inspection was made into the charters of Henry the third, relative to the mayoralty and sheriffwick of London and Middlesex, and of the articles made in the reign of Edward the second for the better governing the city, which conclude with the following interesting clause:

“ Moreover we, being willing to shew more “ abundant favour to the citizens of the city “ aforesaid, have granted to them, for us and “ for our heirs, and by this our charter have “ confirmed, that although they, or their pre“ decessors, citizens of the city aforesaid, have “ not hitherto fully used, upon any emergent oc“ casion, any of the liberties, acquittals, articles,
“ or free-customs, contained in the said charter
“ and letters; yet, the same citizens, and their “ heirs and successors, citizens of that city,
“ may henceforth fully enjoy those liberties, ac“ quittals, articles and free-customs, and any of “ them, for ever. 15 Edward III. June the 3d.
“ at the tower of London.”

In the year 1344, the king, in order to raise a sum of money for carrying on the war with France, determined, as the best expedient, to oblige every citizen possessed of forty pounds a year to take upon him the order of knighthood; and the following writ was sent to the sheriffs of London:

“ We command, firmly enjoining you, that “ in the city aforesaid, when you shall think “ convenient, ye cause it publickly to be pro“ claimed, that all who have forty pounds of “ land or rent, as they have revenue by the “ year, and have held them for three whole
“ years, and are not knights, take upon them
“ the order of knighthood, about the feast of “ St. Laurence next, (August 10) or at most on “ the feast, upon danger, which followeth: And “ that ye diligently enquire of the names of “ those who have forty pounds per annum of “ land or rents in the said city; and that ye cer“ tify us of those names in our chancery before
“ the foresaid feast: And by no means omit ye
“ this.

“ Witness myself at Westminster, the thirtieth “ day of June, in the year of our reign
“ over England the eighteenth, but of our “ reign over France the fifth.”

The sheriffs returned the following answer to this brief.

“ We have caused to be proclaimed through“ out our whole bailiffwick all the articles con“ tained in the brief, as it is commanded in the “ same. We have caused also inquisition to be “ made, by the oath of honest and lawful men
“ of our said bailiffwick, if any have forty “ pounds of land or rent, by the year, in our “ said bailiffwick, and have held them for three “ whole years; and of those that hold a part in “ our bailiffwick, and a part elsewhere, of the “ said value. By whose oath we find, that all “ the lands and rents in the said city are held of
“ the lord the king in capite, as free burgage
“ in fee-farm. Nor is there any that hath forty “ pounds in land or rent in the same by the year “ certain; because the lands in the said city,
“ some are lett for more, some for less, and often “ stand empty, and are not lett, yet frequently “ have divers burdens, and require repairs and “ amendments. And for those causes, and the “ burning of houses, and divers other dangers “ happening, the certainty of the true value of “ them cannot be known. And as to the lands “ or rents, which the citizens have out of the “ bailiffwick, the sworn men say, that they know “ nothing of the value of them by the year, nor “ can enquire.”

The same year, the king granted Reginald de Conductu, an annuity of twenty-one pounds, arising from several messuages in the city belonging to the crown, in consequence of the said Reginald having, during his mayoralty, in the ninth and tenth years of the reign of Edward the third, expended large sums of money for the benefit of the citizens in general; and for other reasons which did him honour both as a man and a magistrate.

The year following, it was ordered that in future the new mayor should be chosen by the mayor and aldermen for the time being, and by such of the principal inhabitants of each ward as should be summoned to attend. It was at the same time resolved, that if the person chosen on St. Edward's day should be absent at the election, or refuse to serve that office, he should forfeit an hundred marks, to be paid to the person elected in his room, on the feast of St. Simon and Jude; also, that the sum of twenty pounds should be paid by every alderman absenting himself, without a reasonable cause, from the election of a mayor.

In the year 1346, a bloody battle was fought at Nevill's Cross, near the city of Durham, between the English and Scots, when David king of Scotland was, after a gallant resistance, taken prisoner, and conveyed to the Tower of London.

In the year 1347, a proclamation was made by order of the king, that all leprous persons inhabiting the city should depart from thence within fifteen days; upon which the citizens claimed claimed the right of sending fourteen persons afflicted with that disease to be maintained in St. Giles's Hospital, which right they derived from queen Matilda, who was the foundress thereof.

In the year following, a great plague, said to have been brought from India, broke out in London, and carried off prodigious numbers of people; by which the consumption of all sorts of provisions was so exceedingly lessened, that,

	s.	d.
A fine horse, formerly worth forty shillings, was sold at	6	8
The best fed ox, at	4	0
The best cow, at	1	0
The best heifer or steer, at	0	6
The best weather, at	0	4
The best ewe, at	0	3
The best lamb, at	0	2
The best hog, at	0	5
A stone of wool, at	0	9

This shocking distemper continued to rage so violently, that the common burying places were not large enough to receive the dead bodies, and people were obliged to purchase ground for the purpose; particularly Ralph Stratford, bishop of London, who bought a piece of ground, inclosed it with a brickwall, and dedicated it to the purpose of burying the dead; and it is recorded that Sir Walter Manny purchased a piece of ground adjoining to St. Bartholomew's Hospital, in which fifty thousand persons who died of the plague were buried, and a latin inscription was afterwards fixed upon a stone cross near the premises of which the following is a translation.

"A great plague raging in the year of our lord 1349, and within the bounds of the present monastery, were buried more than fifty thousand bodies of the dead, besides many others thenceforward to the present time; whose souls the lord have mercy upon! Amen."

In the year 1354, the following charter was granted by Edward to the citizens of London:

"Edward, by the grace of God, king of England and France, and lord of Ireland, to all to whom these our letters shall come, greeting.

"Know ye, that we being worthily careful of the conservation and increase of the name and honour of our city of London, and at the supplication of the mayor, sheriffs, and commonalty of the said city to us humbly made, will and grant for us and our heirs, that the serjeants appointed to bear the maces in our said city may lawfully carry them of gold or silver, or silvered or garnished with the sign of our arms, or others, every where in the said city, and in the suburbs of the same, and in the county of Middlesex, and other places to the liberties of the said city appertaining; and also without the said city to meet with us, our mother, consort, or the children of us or our heirs, or other royal persons, when we or any of us shall come to the said city, and also in going forth with us, or any of us, when we shall depart from the said city; as also in the presence of us, our mother, or consort, or our children, when the said mayor, or sheriffs, or aldermen of the said city, or any of them, shall come to us or our heirs, at or without the command or warning of us, or any of us; and as often as it shall happen any of the said serjeants to be sent to foreign places, and without the city, to do their offices, at the command of us, or of the mayor and sheriffs aforesaid, they may lawfully carry going and coming publicly, as our own serjeants at arms, attending our presence, do carry their maces; any ordinance or commandment made to the contrary notwithstanding.

"In witness whereof, we have caused these our letters to be made patents. Witness myself at Westminster, the tenth day of June, in the twenty-eighth year of our reign of England, and of France the fifteenth."

The citizens were highly pleased with their monarch for granting the favour of gold or silver maces being carried before the mayor, it being a privilege peculiar to the city of London, as every other city and town in the kingdom was expressly forbid to use any maces that were not made of copper.

As our ancient historians are silent respecting the time when the title of lord was conferred on the mayor of London for the time being; it is the concurrent opinion of the more modern writers, that it was bestowed at this time, when the honour of having maces as grand as those of the king himself, was allowed to the chief magistrate.

In gratitude for this favour, the citizens presented his majesty with twenty-five men at arms, and five hundred archers, all dressed in one uniform, in order to assist in the prosecution of his designs on France. The year 1357 is distinguished by the grandest triumphal entry that ever was made into this, or, perhaps, any other city; of which our readers will be pleased with seeing a particular account.

Edward, prince of Wales, commonly called the black prince, having routed the French army at Poitiers, and taken John, king of France, prisoner, finding his army insufficient to improve the advantages he had obtained, agreed on a truce for two years, that he might have an opportunity of conducting his royal captive to England, where he arrived in the beginning of the month of May.

When they came to Southwark they were met by upwards of a thousand of the citizens of London on horse-back, dressed in a superb manner, and by a prodigious concourse of people on foot.

The captive monarch was clad in royal apparel, and mounted on a white courser, remarkable for its size and beauty, while the victorious prince rode by his side, on a little black horse, in ordinary trappings.

When they arrived at the foot of London-Bridge, they were received by the mayor, aldermen, sheriffs, and the several city companies, dressed in their formalities, and attended by stately pageants.

In

In this manner they were conducted through the streets of London, which were decorated with the richest tapestries, while the citizens exhibited to public view their plate, silks, and other furniture, as a proof of their riches; and as a testimony of their warlike genius, they exposed, in the balconies and shop windows, an incredible number of bows, arrows, helmets, shields, crosslets, breast and back pieces, coats of mail, gauntlets, vambraces, * swords, spears, battle-axes, harness for horses, and other military accoutrements.

The cavalcade was so numerous, and the concourse of people assembled to behold it so prodigious, that it continued from three o'clock in the morning till noon, when the victorious prince presented the king of France to his father, who received him with the utmost politeness.

Soon after this affair, a dispute happened between the citizens, and the steward of the king's household, who, notwithstanding the known privileges of the city, used frequently to oblige them to plead out of the city.

Hereupon the citizens determined to apply to the king for the redress of this grievance, and his majesty was pleased to give them the following answer :

" That the king willeth, that, if a transgression be made to any of the king's household, within the liberty of the city of London, and within the verge of the king, the plea of such transgression be held before the steward and marshal of the king's household; and, if inquisition must be made, let that inquisition be taken within the said city." And his majesty was pleased to confirm the said answer in parliament, in the 30th year of his reign, with this additional clause.—" And this the lord the king granted in favour of the poor workmen of the said city, who lived of the work of their own hands, that they want not their food, or be more impoverished."

The French having invaded the coast of Sussex, in the year 1360, the city of London, to revenge the depredations they had made, did, in the same year, in conjunction with some of the sea-port towns, fit out a fleet of one hundred and sixty sail of ships, having on board them fourteen thousand men, who landing on the coast of France, ravaged, burnt, and destroyed the country wherever they came.

In the year 1361, a dreadful plague broke out in France, and as it was apprehended that it might either be communicated to London, or that this most dreadful disorder might be revived therein, by the putrifying of the blood and entrails of beasts, which the butchers used to throw into the streets, the king issued his commands to the mayor and sheriffs, in a letter to the following effect.

" Because by killing of great beasts, &c. from whose putrified blood running down the streets,

" and the bowels cast into the Thames, the air in the city is very much corrupted and infected, whence abominable and most filthy stinks proceed, sicknesses and many other evils have happened to such as have abode in the said city, or have resorted to it; and great dangers are feared to fall out for the time to come, unless remedy be presently made against it :

" We, willing to prevent such danger, and to provide as much as in us lies for the honesty of the said city, and the safety of our people, by the consent of our council in our present parliament, have ordained, that all bulls, oxen, hogs, and other gross creatures, to be slain for the sustenance of the said city, be led as far as the town of Stratford on one part of London, and the town of Knightsbridge on the other; and there, and not on this side, be slain; and that their bowels be there cleansed, to be brought, together with the flesh, to the said city to be sold: and if any butcher shall presume any thing rashly against this ordinance, let him incur forfeiture of the flesh of the creatures which he hath caused to be slain on this side the said towns, and the punishment of imprisonment for one year. This ordinance to be publickly proclaimed and held; and all butchers doing otherwise to be chastized and punished according to the form of the ordinance aforesaid. Witness the king at Westminster, the twenty-fifth day of February."

Notwithstanding this precautionary care, the pestilence reached England, where it raged to such an astonishing degree, that in the city of London only, no less than twelve hundred persons fell a sacrifice to its insatiable fury, in the space of two days: a prodigious number indeed, if we consider the great difference of population between those times and the present!

The kings of Scotland, France, and Cyprus, being in England in the year 1363, on a visit to king Edward, Henry Picard, a late lord mayor of London, had the honour of giving a sumptuous dinner to the four monarchs, together with the prince of Wales, and most of the nobility; and perhaps such an honour never yet fell to the lot of any other private subject in the whole world.

In the year 1365 the parliament made an ordinance to ascertain what things a tenant should be obliged to leave behind him, on his quitting a house that he had rented in the city, or within the liberties of London; of which the following is a translation. †

It was ordained, that " if any person hire a tenement, house or houses, in the city of London, or in the suburbs thereof, to hold the same for the term of life, or for years, or only from year to year, or from quarter to quarter; if the said tenant shall make, or cause to be made, any pentyses or other case-

* A kind of armour to cover the arms.

† At this time the acts of parliament were in the Latin tongue.

ments in the said tenement, house, or houses, fixed with nails of iron or wooden pegs to the premises, or to the soil thereof; it shall not be lawful for such tenant to remove such pentyses or easements at the end of the term, or at any other time to destroy them; but they shall always remain to the landlord of the said premises, as a parcel thereof." In consequence of this ordinance, the mayor and aldermen published the following confirmation thereof: "Whereas nowe of late, amonge divers people, was sprongen matter of doute upon the most olde custom had and used in this cyte of London, of such thyngys which by tenauntys for terms of lyfe or yerys, have been affyxed unto houses, without specyall lycence of the owner of the soyle, whether they owe to remayne unto the owner of the soyle, as parcel of the same; or ellys whether it shall be lawful unto suche tenauntys, on the end of her terme, all suche thyngys affyxed to remove.

"Whereupon, olde bokys seen, and many records, olde processys, and engagementys of the sayd cyte, it was declared by the mayor and aldermen, for an olde prescrybed custom of the cyte aforesayd, that all suche easementys fyxed unto houses, or to soyle, by suche tenauntys, without specyall and expresse lycence of the owner of the soyle, yf they be affyxed with nayles of irne or of tree, as pentyses, glasse, lockys, benchys, or any suche other: or elles if they be affyxed with mortar or lyme, or of erther, or any other mortar, as forneys, leedys, candorous, chemyneys, corbels, pavemetitis, or suche other; or elles yf plantys be roetyd in the ground, as vines, trees, graffe stounks, trees of frut, &c. it shall not be lawful unto suche tenauntys, in the end of her terme, or on any other tyme therein, nor any of them, to put away, move, or plucke up in any wyse, but that they shall alway remayne to the owner of the soyle, as parcels of the same soyle or tenement."

At this period the citizens of London appear to have discontinued the use of archery, which had been much practised by, and in general esteem with their ancestors; whereupon the king sent the following letter to the sheriffs of London, to revive and establish the practice of shooting with arrows.

"The king to the sheriffs of London, greeting. Because the people of our realm, as well of good quality as mean, have commonly in their sports before these times exercised the skill of shooting arrows; whence it is well known, that honour and profit have accrued to our whole realm, and to us, by the help of God, no small assistance in our warlike acts; and now the said skill being, as it were, wholly laid aside, the same people please themselves in hurling of stones and wood and iron; and some in hand-ball, foot-ball, bandy-ball, and in cambuck, or cock-fighting; and some also apply themselves to other dishonest games, and less profitable or useful; whereby the said realm is likely, in a short time, to become destitute of archers.

"We, willing to apply a seasonable remedy to this, command you, that in places in the foresaid city, as well within the liberties as without, where you shall see it expedient, you cause publick proclamation to be made, that every one of the said city, strong in body, at leisure times on holidays, use in their recreations bows and arrows, or pellets, or bolts; and learn and exercise the art of shooting; forbidding all and singular on our behalf, that they do not after any manner apply themselves to the throwing of stones, wood, iron, hand-ball, foot-ball, bandy-ball, cambuck, or cock-fighting, nor such other like vain plays, which have no profit in them, or concern themselves therein, under pain of imprisonment. Witness the king at Westminster, the twelfth day of June."

CHAPTER XVI.

A person elected mayor fined for not serving the office. Plague in London. Citizens petition to the king and parliament for a confirmation of their ancient privileges. Practice of usury suppressed. Grand tournament in Smithfield. Two charters granted. Citizens restored to their ancient right of selling wine. Their petition to choose their own coroner rejected. A grand masquerade at the palace at Kennington. Account of a dangerous riot, and its consequences. Richard, prince of Wales, invited to reside in the city. Death of Edward III.

IN the year 1368, Walter Berneye having been elected chief magistrate of this city, and not appearing on the feast of St. Simon and Jude, to take upon him the said office; Simon de Mordon was elected mayor, and on the day following he was sworn in before the batons of the exchequer.

Hereupon a warrant of distress was issued, to levy one hundred marks on the effects of the said

Walter Berneye, for the use of the said Simon de Mordon the mayor, pursuant to an order of the city, made in the year 1345.

The citizens of London were again visited with the plague, in the year 1369, by which great numbers were destroyed; and notwithstanding the number of inhabitants was thus lessened, a wet harvest, in the same year, occasioned so great a scarcity of corn, that wheat raised to the the extravagant price of one pound, six shillings and eight-pence the quarter.

Notwithstanding the several charters that had been granted to the citizens of London, they could not but remark that their liberties were still occasionally invaded, by foreigners obtaining private grants from the crown; whereupon they made application to the king and parliament, in the following terms.

" To our lord the king, and his noble council, the citizens of London do shew, that they have nothing to live upon but their industry and franchise, upon which franchise the said city was founded; and by reason of which franchise, they were wont to travel by land and by sea, in divers countries for their profit; by which travel they used to bring divers merchandizes, to the great common profit of the whole realm of England, to the great aid and maintenance of the said city, sustenance and increase of the navy of the said land.

" And of late their franchises are taken from them, against the grant of our said noble lord the king, and his noble progenitors, sealed with their seals, and against the great charter; to the great destruction as well of the said city, common damage of the land, as also of the navy.

" Whereupon they pray, that the king would please to have regard, and take notice that the said city was founded upon the said franchises, without which they could not maintain the city, nor bear the taxes and other charges, as they were wont to do: for which cause they pray they may have their franchises, according to the grant of the king, and his noble progenitors, and the great charter; and that all such grants and confirmations of franchises, may be made to all other cities and burghs of the realm."

In the year 1375, the destructive practice of usury was arrived at such an enormous height, as tended greatly to the injury of trade in general, and the oppression of many persons in particular; whereupon John Not, the mayor of London, took such measures to enforce the laws against extortioners, as soon stopped the growing evil; which proceeding was highly approved by his majesty and the parliament; and the whole nation was enjoined to follow the example of the mayor of London.

This year, the king, who was very old, became enamoured of Alice Pierce or Perrers, his attachment to whom led him to the commission of many things highly unbecoming his dignity; and this lady gained so much the ascendant, that she prevailed on him to convert to her use several large sums of money raised for the service of the state, at which the nation in general was highly displeased. The king, however, making it his whole study to please his mistress, among many other expensive diversions, ordered a tournament to be held in Smithfield, at which lady Alice appeared most elegantly dressed, in a triumphal chariot; she was on this occasion dignified with the title of the LADY OF THE SUN, and attended by a great number of ladies, each of whom led a horse on which a knight was mounted; many of the principal noblemen, richly accoutred, were likewise present at this tournament, which lasted seven days; during which time many gallant feats were performed by the young nobility and gentry.

In the fiftieth year of his reign Edward granted two charters; the first, which was to explain the right of choosing aldermen, runs as follows:

" Edward, by the grace of God, king of England and France, and lord of Ireland, to all men to whom we send, greeting. Among other articles which our lord Edward, some time king of England, our father, the year of his reign XII. by his letters patents hath granted and confirmed to the citizens of the said city of London, for the amendment and common profit of them that dwell in the same city, and of them that repair thereto. In the same letters it is contained, that the aldermen of the foresaid city, that every year they be removed on the day of St. Gregory, by the commonalty of the said city, and that they so removed be not chosen again the next year ensuing; but, instead of them that have been removed, others be chosen by the same wards from which such aldermen were removed, as in the same letters plainly it is contained, concerning which, on the part of the commonalty of the foresaid city, by their petition before us in our great council, now again asked, to us meekly it is besought, that since divers opinions and divers strifes have been sprung between the aldermen and the commonalty of the said city, upon the removing of aldermen, for the wrong interpretation of words in the foresaid articles contained, that is to say, that the foresaid aldermen affirm, that by the two words, viz. sint amobiles per communitatem, &c. i. e. let them be removed by the commonalty, they ought not to be removed from the office of aldermanship, without sufficient reason, or for some notorious offence to be found in them. But others of the said citizens being of a contrary opinion, and willing to abolish this article, they have besought us to explain the said article, so as to remove all doubt about the premises: We being willing, as much as lieth in us, to contribute to the peace and tranquillity of the said mayor, aldermen, and commonalty, and their successors, henceforward, concerning the interpretation of the said article, do, by and with the advice of our said council, declare, that all and every alderman of the said city, every year, for ever, on the feast of St. Gregory the pope, from the office of an alderman utterly and precisely shall cease, and shall not be chosen again; but that, instead of those removed, other aldermen shall be chosen every year, for ever, out of the discreet citizens of good fame, by the said wards from which the said aldermen were removed. In witness whereof we have caused these our letters to be made patents. Witness myself at Westminster, the twelfth day of November, the fiftieth year of our reign in England, and the thirty-sixth over France."

The

The other charter was in answer to the citizens petition against private licence being granted to foreigners, and is recited as follows :

" Edward, king of England and France, and lord of Ireland, to all to whom these letters shall come, greeting.

" Know ye, that whereas, amongst other liberties granted to the citizens of our city of London, by the charters of our progenitors, sometime kings of England, which we have confirmed, and by ours, it hath been granted unto them, that all merchant strangers coming into England, shall remain at board with the free hosts of the city aforesaid, and of other cities and towns in England, without keeping any houses or societies by themselves; and that there should be no brokers of any merchandizes from henceforth, unless they were chosen thereunto by the merchants in the mysteries in which the said brokers exercise their offices, and thereupon at the least do take their oaths before the mayor of the said city : and also, that the merchants who are not of the freedom of the said city, should not sell by retail any wines or other wares within the said city, or the suburbs thereof. And now our well-beloved subjects, the mayor, aldermen, and other citizens of the said city, have humbly beseeched us and our council in the last parliament by their petition exhibited in these words :

" To our lord the king and his good council, your liege subjects the mayor, aldermen, and commonalty of the city of London, shew, that whereas they have often sued in divers parliaments to have consideration how that they are impoverished and undone, by reason their liberties by him and his progenitors to them granted are restrained, and great part taken away; and now at the last parliament held at Westminster, it was answered to them, that they should declare their griefs specially, and they should have good remedy therefore : of which griefs (amongst divers others) these be; that every stranger might dwell in the said city, and keep a house, and be a broker, and sell and buy all manner of merchandizes by retail; and one stranger to sell to another to sell again, to the great increasing the prices of merchandizes, and a cause to make them remain there more than forty days; whereas, in time past, no merchant stranger might use any of these points, contrary to the franchises of the said city, before these times had and used : by which grievance the merchants of the said city are greatly impoverished, and the navy impaired, and the privities of the land by the said strangers discovered to our enemies by spies and other strangers into these houses received.

" May it therefore please your majesty and council to ordain in this parliament, that the merchant strangers may be restrained in the points aforesaid, and the mayor, aldermen, and commons in the said city, may enjoy the said franchises.

" We, for the special affection we bear to the said citizens, willing to provide for the tranquillity and profit of the said citizens in that behalf, with the assents of our prelates, nobles, &c. have granted for us and our heirs, to the said mayor and aldermen, and citizens of the said city, and their successors upon condition that they put the said city under good government, to our honour, and the profit of our realm of England, and right govern the same, that no strangers shall from henceforth sell any wares in the same city, or suburbs thereof, by retail, nor shall keep any house, nor be any broker in the said city or suburbs thereof; any statute or ordinance made to the contrary notwithstanding. Saving always to the merchants of High Almaine their liberties by us and our progenitors to them granted and confirmed.

" In witness whereof we have caused these our letters to be made patents. Witness myself at Westminster the fourth day of December, in the fiftieth year of our reign over England, and of our kingdom of France the thirty-sixth."

Upon these charters being granted, prosecutions were immediately commenced against divers persons for having obtained unconstitutional grants from the king; among these were John Peach, wine-merchant, and Richard Lyons, merchant, both of London.

The former was charged with having obtained a licence for the sole privilege of selling sweet wine in London, by which he had acquired prodigious sums of money; and being convicted, he was committed to prison till he made ample satisfaction to the injured parties.

The latter was accused of frauds, extortions, and other illegal acts, in obtaining licences, taking bribes, tampering with the council, &c. and being likewise found guilty of the crimes laid to his charge, his estates real and personal were confiscated, and himself committed to prison, till he should make the sufferers amends.

In consequence of the success of these prosecutions, the citizens were restored to their ancient right of selling wine, the price of which was always to be regulated by the first magistrate of the city.

In the year 1377, the house of commons petitioned the king that the charter which he had lately granted the citizens might be confirmed by act of parliament; but Edward not being willing to comply with their request, returned for answer, that " he would be further informed."

At the same time the house of commons likewise humbly petitioned that, as divers mischiefs happened in the city, occasioned by the mayor not being allowed to punish the coroner for neglect of duty, his majesty would be pleased to grant them the privilege of chusing from amongst themselves a person to act in the above-mentioned capacity; and that they might remove him when they should think proper: however, though the citizens asked no more than what was allowed to many towns and cities in England, the king rejected their petition.

Shortly

Shortly after this the mayor, aldermen, and citizens addressed the king, requesting him to confirm their liberties with respect to punishing all misdemeanours in Southwark, and that the marshal should not be allowed to intermeddle with that part of Southwark which is guildable; but this petition met with as little success as the two preceding; for the king told them, that were he to grant their petition, he should do great wrong to divers of his other subjects.

The king's behaviour to the citizens did not lessen their regard to the royal family; for, in the same year, they entertained the princess of Wales, her son prince Richard, and their attendants at Kennington, with a grand masquerade on horseback: The procession, which set out from Newgate, marched through the city, over London-bridge, and through the Borough of Southwark, to Kennington, in the following manner:

1. Flambeaux
2. A grand band of music.
3. One hundred and thirty citizens, on horseback, in divisions; the first of which consisted of forty eight persons dressed in the habits of esquires, with red coats, say gowns, and well-fancied vizors; the next division consisted of the same number, apparelled like knights, these were followed by a person in a most elegant habit, and the third division was headed by one resembling a pope, who was attended by twenty-four others habited like cardinals, after whom came ten men dressed like legates, in frightful black vizors, who closed the cavalcade.

The princess and her son were highly pleased with this mark of the citizens esteem, and after supper, they had the honour of dancing with the prince and the nobility, after which they returned in the same manner to the city.

Shortly after, the lord marshal, (who had his prison in London) contrary to the right, and privileges of the city, committed a citizen. In consequence of which the mayor and common-council assembled to consult on the measures to be taken against him; but the commonalty, impatient of redress, went in great numbers to the Marshalsea, * which they broke open, and carried off the prisoner; they then went in search of the lord marshal, and not being able to find him, they wreaked their vengeance on his house, which they pulled almost down.

Being disappointed at not meeting with the marshal, and recollecting that the duke of Lancaster had endeavoured to retrench the liberties of the city, they set forward for his palace in the Savoy, with an intent to revenge themselves.

The duke was at that time at dinner at the house of John de Ipres, in the city, to which place a knight of the duke's, who had heard of the design of the rioters, went to apprise him of the danger; the duke instantly arose from table, hastened to the Thames, and took boat for Kennington palace, the residence of the princess dowager and her son.

When the populace had got to the Savoy, they were asked by a priest what they wanted; they answered the persons of the duke and the marshal, who had unjustly detained in prison Sir Peter de la Mere: the priest replied, Sir Peter was a traitor,—which so incensed the mob, that, insisting on the priest being the marshal in disguise, they dragged him forth, and knocked him on the head.

During this tumult, the bishop of London arrived at the Savoy, where in a most pathetic speech, he exhorted them to forbearance, urging that it was the holy time of Lent, and promising that their grievances should be redressed; which so gained upon the minds of the populace, that they desisted, otherwise in all probability they would have razed the duke's palace to the ground.

The citizens, very shortly after received a message from the princess dowager of Wales, persuading them to beg pardon of the duke for the outrages they had committed; which they, out of respect to her, consented to, at the same time begging she would use her influence to have Sir Peter de la Mere brought to a fair and legal trial.

The mayor and aldermen being apprehensive of the king's displeasure, resolved, if possible, to award it; and accordingly, a number of the principal citizens waited on his majesty, and were, contrary to the inclination of the duke, admitted to an audience, when they declared themselves innocent of the late insurrection, protesting that they had done every thing in their power to suppress the same; though they had unfortunately been unsuccessful in their endeavours.

They further told the king, that his faithful citizens were in general under great anxiety of mind, having heard that by act of parliament they were to be deprived of what were dearer to them than their lives—their liberties!

The king told them not to be uneasy on that head, for that so far from infringing their liberties he most earnestly desired on all occasions to enlarge them.

The citizens, highly pleased with the behaviour of their monarch, returned to the city; where they were received by their brethren with every demonstration of joy, who most heartily congratulated them on their good success.

Though the mayor had very wisely taken every precaution to preserve the public peace, he could not prevent a few seditious persons sticking up papers in different parts of the city, tending to inflame the minds of the populace against the duke of Lancaster; it therefore was judged necessary to pronounce sentence of excommunication upon such persons as should, in future, presume to write or disseminate any paper derogatory to the duke's character; and this was accordingly done by the bishop of Bangor, assisted by the mayor and aldermen.

Affairs remained in this situation till the dissolution of the parliament, when the resentment of the duke of Lancaster against the citizens began to be more apparent than ever; for the mayor and aldermen being summoned to attend the king

* Our historians say that the lord Marshal's prison was in London; but it appears from this circumstance that they included Southwark under this denomination.

Engraved for Chamberlain's History of London!

CEREMONY of the CHAMPION'S CHALLENGE
at the Coronation.

at Shene, near Richmond, they were severely reprimanded, and urged to ask pardon of the duke: but instead of so doing, they asserted their innocence, and promised to use their utmost endeavours to apprehend the offenders, and compel them to make a retaliation proportioned to their crimes.

This, however, was thought insufficient; whereupon the mayor and several of the aldermen were discharged from their offices, and others, more attached to the duke of Lancaster, were appointed in their stead, by virtue of a writ which the king issued on the occasion.

The citizens being informed that the king lay at the point of death, they deputed several of the most eminent of their body to wait on prince Richard, who was then with his mother at the palace of Kennington; when John Philpot, in the name of his fellow-citizens, acquainting the prince with the advices they had received of the king's extreme danger, besought his favour to the inhabitants of London, assured him of their readiness to devote their lives and fortunes to his service, and requested that he would come and reside among them.

On the twenty-second of June, 1377, died Edward the third, one of the most accomplished princes that ever swayed the scepter of this kingdom, whether we consider him as a warrior, a monarch, or a man.*

CHAPTER XVII.

The accession of Richard II. to the throne. First mention of a champion at a coronation. Office of chief butler claimed by the citizens. King Richard's charter of confirmation. The differences between the city and the duke of Lancaster adjusted. The young king's grand entry into London. Sir John Philpot's expedition against the Scotch privateers. Account of Wat Tyler's insurrection, with the suppression of the insurgents, in consequence of the death of their leader.

IMMEDIATELY on the death of king Edward the third, the citizens of London proclaimed Richard, son of Edward the black prince, king of England, and having notified the same to the young king, they solicited his majesty to exert his influence to adjust the differences which had subsisted between the duke of Lancaster and the citizens.

At this time the young monarch resided at Kingston upon Thames, where, having received the compliments and congratulations of the citizens, on his accession to the throne, he was conducted to Westminster-hall, where he was crowned with the usual magnificence, on the fifteenth day of July, 1377.

It is at this coronation that our historians make the first mention of a champion, who appeared in a compleat suit of armour, entered Westminster-hall, where the king dined, and throwing his gauntlet on the ground, challenged any person who should presume to dispute the king's title to the crown of these realms.

It is impossible to trace the origin of this custom; but there remains no doubt of its being of a more ancient date than the coronation of Richard II. since Sir John Dimmock, who performed the office at that period, was admitted thereto, by virtue of a right annexed to the manor of Scrivelby in Lincolnshire.

At this coronation the citizens claimed their right to the office of chief butler; which being admitted, was discharged in the person of the Lord-mayor.

A petition from the city, for a confirmation of their charters, being depending at the death of Edward III. they immediately renewed it to their young sovereign; and in this application they were seconded by the house of commons, who presented an address to his majesty, humbly requesting that the citizens of London might enjoy all their ancient rights, privileges, and immunities, as they had been granted and confirmed by his majesty's royal predecessors.

To this reasonable request the king yielded a ready compliance, as will appear by the following charter of confirmation:

“Whereas the said citizens, by their petition exhibited to us in parliament, did set forth, that although they, for a long time past, have used and enjoyed certain free customs, until of late years they have been unjustly molested; which customs are as followeth, viz. That no foreigner do sell or buy of another foreigner any merchandizes within the liberties of the said city, upon pain of forfeiting the same. Nevertheless, being desirous, for the future, to take away all controversies about the same, We do by these presents, with the assent aforesaid, will and grant, and by these presents, for us and our heirs, do confirm unto the said citizens, and their successors, that, for the future, no foreigner sell to another foreigner any merchandizes within the liberties of the said city; nor that any foreigner do buy of another foreigner any merchandize, upon pain

* See CLARENDON'S History of England, vol. i. page 352 and 353, for an account of the death and character of Edward III.

“ of forfeiting the same; the privileges of our “ subjects of Aquitaine in all things excepted, “ so that such buying and selling be made be“ twixt merchant and merchant.”

Soon after the grant of this charter, the king sent a message by lord Latimer, Sir Richard Adersbury, Sir Nicholas Bond, and Sir Simon Burley, to acquaint the citizens that his majesty entertained the sincerest regard for the city of London; also with his determination to take up his residence therein, and of the progress he had made towards accommodating the differences which had subsisted between the Londoners and the duke of Lancaster.

The abovementioned gentlemen likewise acquainted the citizens, that the duke of Lancaster had entirely, on his part, submitted the affair to the king's determination; and it was his majesty's request that they would do the same; in which case the king would exert his utmost influence to adjust the affair to the mutual satisfaction of both parties.

The citizens, however, did not receive this message with all the complaisance that might have been expected; for considering that the king was not arrived at years of discretion, and being very doubtful of the sincerity of his majesty's advisers, as well as dreading the power and influence of the duke, they hesitated in complying with the king's request.

At length, after considerable debates, it was resolved, that if lord Latimer, and the other three gentlemen, would promise upon oath, that the submission of the Londoners to his majesty's request, should not be of the least prejudice to the city, they would cheerfully accede to the royal requisition.

The deputies having readily taken this oath, several of the chief citizens accompanied them to Shene, where the king, with his royal mother, and the duke of Lancaster, attended by many of the nobility, waited their arrival.

They were admitted to an immediate audience of the king, who received them in the most gracious manner, and the whole affair being debated in council, so perfect a reconciliation was effected, that the duke embraced the citizens respectively, in the presence of the king, and all animosities immediately subsided.

The citizens, highly delighted with the success of their journey, returned to London; where, on the day following, public proclamation was made at the usual places, that the duke of Lancaster and the citizens were mutually reconciled to each other.

Soon after this happy compromise, preparations were made for the king's grand entry into London, which was performed in the following manner.

The young monarch being mounted on a fine horse, was attended by the duke of Lancaster, lord high steward of the kingdom, lord Piercy, earl marshal, and many of the nobility.

This pompous cavalcade set out from Shene, the king's horse being led by Sir Nicholas Bond, and the sword of state carried by Sir Simon Burley; while his majesty was followed by several divisions of the young nobility, (nearly of his own age) each division being preceded by trumpets sounding.

When they arrived at London, his majesty was received by the mayor, aldermen, and citizens, and conducted to Cheapside, where was erected a grand conduit in the form of a castle, which ran with wine during the procession.

Four beautiful girls, about the age of the king, supplied their sovereign with a part of this wine in golden cups, and also threw gilt flowers on his head, and scattered florins, resembling gold, among the populace.

The duke of Lancaster particularly distinguished himself by his polite and affable behaviour, which gained him the love of the citizens in a high degree; while the nobility in general accommodated their behaviour to the pleasing occasion in so polite and proper a manner, that the day was spent in all that delightful order, and elegant decorum, which is the natural consequence of the whole of a large company, resolving to be pleased with themselves, and with each other.

The year 1378 is distinguished by the remarkable expedition of Sir John Philpot, a worthy citizen of London, against one Mercer, a Scotch privateer.

Mercer, having observed the declining condition of the English navy, fitted out several privateers in Scotland, to cruise against the English merchant ships, which he did for some time with such considerable success, that he at length ventured to enter the port of Scarborough, and seized all the vessels in that harbour.

The constant depredations made by this pirate, occasioned many applications to the people in power for redress; but these proving ineffectual, Sir John Philpot at length determined to do justice to his fellow subjects; for which purpose he fitted out a fleet, at his own expence, which he manned with a thousand able hands, and went on board himself, as commander in chief, with a resolution to chastise Mercer, or perish in the attempt.

It was not long before Sir John fell in with the pirate, whom he found greatly embarrassed with the number of ships he had taken, among which were fifteen Spanish vessels with very valuable cargoes.

Mercer was determined not to give up his acquisitions, and Sir John was equally determined to compel his submission; on which a desperate engagement ensued, wherein Mercer was defeated, and most of his ships taken by the victorious Londoner, who then returned home, and when he sailed up the Thames in triumph, he was welcomed by the applauding shouts of his fellow-citizens.

Notwithstanding this spirited conduct of Sir John, which one would imagine should have gained him the thanks of the whole kingdom, he was, at the instigation of a set of weak, indolent, and wicked ministers, summoned before the king and council, to answer for his conduct, in presuming to undertake an affair of such high importance, without an authority superior to his own.

Sir John attended in obedience to the summons, when he gave such weighty reasons in defence fence of the part he had acted, and behaved in so modest and unassuming a manner, that he was honourably acquitted.

In this same year 1378, the parliament granted a subsidy, by which persons of all ranks were assessed according to their respective stations in life; for hereby all tradesmen with their wives and children, (being above fourteen years of age) were taxed at four-pence per head; the aldermen of London were rated, equal with the barons at forty shillings each; and the Lord-mayor, as an earl, at four pounds; from which circumstance our historians are of opinion that the title of Right Honourable was then bestowed on the mayor of London.

This tax, however, was the occasion of one of the most extraordinary insurrections that ever happened in this country, of the particulars of which our readers will be glad to be informed.

The king having farmed this tax to some of his nobility, they employed a set of rapacious collectors, who extorted the money with such rigour as inflamed the minds of the people in a very high degree.

The inhabitants of the county of Essex were particularly alarmed, by a report which was industriously propagated, that the country people were doomed to destruction, that their farms would be plundered and their houses burned to the ground.

While this report was generally believed, some of the collectors of the poll-tax going to the house of Wat Hilliard, a tyler, of Dartford in Kent, demanded payment of the tax for his daughter; which he refused to pay, alledging that she had not arrived at the age specified in the statute.

The brutal officer, however, insisted that she was arrived at years of puberty, and in order to prove the truth of his assertion, he proceeded to shocking acts of indecency, which irritated the father to such a degree, that he knocked out the collector's brains.

Every one who was present applauded the resolute behaviour of the tyler; and the populace betaking themselves to their arms, and great numbers flocking in from the adjacent towns and villages, Wat soon found himself at the head of a numerous army, who determined to attempt to extricate themselves from the heavy load of taxes under which they had long groaned.

The insurgents taking the road to Maidstone; released from the goal of that town one Ball, an excommunicated priest, who had been long confined for seditious practices; and who was no sooner at liberty than he commenced chaplain to his deliverers, and to encourage them in their proceedings he preached a sermon to them, taking this proverb for his text.

“ When Adam delv'd, and Eve span,
“ Who was then a gentleman ?

From these words he laboured to prove, that all mankind, as the descendants of one common parent, were upon an equality: he therefore advised them to go to the king, and demand their liberties, which if they could not obtain by gentle measures, to use force for the recovery of them.

The people were highly animated by this discourse, and making an unanimous choice of Wat Tyler for their leader, they, by his direction, took an oath “ to be true to king Richard and “ the commons of England; never to receive a “ king whose name was John; * to persuade their “ neighbours to join in the common cause, and “ never to submit to the payment of any other “ tax than a fifteenth.”

The flame of rebellion having spread with the utmost rapidity through the counties of Sussex, Essex, Surrey, Kent, and Hertford, Wat Tyler's army increased every hour; and marching from Maidstone he encamped at Blackheath, where he soon found himself at the head of an hundred thousand men.

The professed view of the insurgents was to abolish all bad laws and customs; and they particularly declared against the intolerable exactions and corruptions of the lawyers; carrying their resentment so far as to murder every one of that profession, and even every nobleman who happened to fall in their way.

While they were thus encamped on Blackheath, they sent a deputation to the king, who had taken refuge in the Tower, desiring that his majesty would come and hear their proposals.

There were great debates in council respecting the propriety of his majesty's complying with this request, and some of the counsellors were of opinion that the king's presence would be the only means of appeasing the rioters; but this was strenuously opposed by Simon Sudbury, archbishop of Canterbury, and lord chancellor, and Sir Robert Hales, prior of St. John of Jerusalem, and lord high treasurer, who urged that his majesty could not attend with safety to his person.

The advice of these counsellors being followed, the rioters were so enraged, that they vowed to destroy them; and leaving Blackheath, they hastened toward London; and arriving in Southwark on the tenth of June 1380, they broke open the prisons of the King's Bench and Marshalsea, and set all the prisoners at liberty.

The greater part of the released prisoners immediately joined the insurgents, a part of whom marching to Lambeth, burnt the palace of the archbishop, with all its furniture, and the books, registers and writings belonging to the court of chancery.

Those who remained in Southwark, having, by the assistance of the prisoners, discovered the dwellings of the lawyers, jurors, and questmongers, they immediately pulled them down to the ground; as they likewise did the common stews, or bawdy-houses along the bank-side, which were kept by Flemish bawds who rented them of the city.

The mayor of London dreading the consequence of the rioters advancing into the metropolis, ordered the bridge gate to be shut and fortified;

* This was a reflection on John, duke of Lancaster, to whom they had an invincible hatred.

but on the following day it was thought more prudent to admit them into the city, to prevent the total destruction of the Borough of Southwark.

As soon as they entered London, the shambles and wine-cellars were set open for their accommodation; and being soon joined by great numbers of the inferior citizens, they repaired to the duke of Lancaster's palace of the Savoy, which was at that time the grandest pile of buildings in this kingdom; and having destroyed all the rich furniture, plate, and jewels, they reduced the palace to a heap of ashes and ruins.

While this building was on fire, thirty-two of the rioters were carousing in the duke's cellar, where becoming intoxicated with liquor, they seemed to have forgot or despised the danger they were in; for they staid till the rafters were consumed, and the house fell down, whereby the passage was stopped up, so that they could not return: and in this place they perished, after crying out for help for seven days successively, during which no person attempted to relieve them.

From the Savoy the rioters proceeded to the Temple, which they burnt down, together with all the books, papers and records: after which the other inns of court shared the same fate.

They now divided themselves into three bodies, one of which repairing to Clerkenwell, burnt the rich priory of St. John of Jerusalem; from whence they hastened to the seat of Sir Robert Hales, at Highbury, near Islington, which they likewise burnt and destroyed.

The second division having encamped at Mile-end, sent a message to the king, demanding a parley; and Richard, with the advice of his council, went to them, and asked their demands; which were as follows:

1. That thenceforward all his majesty's subjects should be free from servitude or bondage.
2. That there should be a general pardon, of all manner of actions for debt, insurrections, treasons, felonies, transgressions, and extortions.
3. That all persons, from that day forward, should have full liberty to buy and sell in every county, city, borough, fair, market, and other place, within the realm of England.
4. That no acre of land held in bondage or service, should hold it for more than four-pence; and if it had been held for less in former times, it should not be enhanced in future.

The king having heard these, and several other demands, complied with them all, on condition of their immediate return to their own habitations, leaving a few of each parish, to receive the charters of freedom, which were drawn up with all expedition, and sealed the next morning.

This body, having carried their point, immediately dispersed, and returned to their respective habitations; but in the mean time the third division of the rioters, which were encamped on Tower-hill, found means to enter the Tower, notwithstanding it was garrisoned by six hundred men at arms, and the same number of experienced archers, who had been placed there to defend the person of the king.

The insurgents having thus obtained entrance into the Tower, (while the king was gone to the party at Mile-end) they entered the royal apartments, abused every person at their pleasure, kissed the queen-mother, and having seized the archbishop of Canterbury and Sir Robert Hales, they dragged them out of the Tower and beheaded them.

Many arguments were used by the archbishop, to prevail on them not to embroil their hands in the blood of innocent men; but finding it in vain to remonstrate, he cheerfully submitted his neck to the axe; but no less than eight strokes were given before his head was severed from his body; after which the latter remained some hours before it was buried, and the former was carried to London-bridge, where it was fixed upon a pole.

During these transactions, Wat Tyler and his followers committed the most dreadful outrages and cruelties in the cities of London and Westminster, murdering many eminent citizens, and in particular, wreaking their vengeance on the Flemish merchants.

They likewise broke open the prisons of Newgate and the Fleet, released all that were confined, set fire to the city in several places, and made public proclamation for the beheading all lawyers, and persons belonging to the exchequer.

The king having returned from Mile-end to the Tower, found his mother and some of his faithful counsellors had retired to the wardrobe for safety; where his majesty having informed them of the success of his negotiation at Mile-end, it was resolved to propose the same terms to the rest of the insurgents.

In consequence of this determination no less than three different plans of accommodation were sent to, and rejected by Wat Tyler; and from what follows it will appear that he had no intention of complying with any terms of pacification.

Hereupon Sir John Newton was sent to invite Tyler to a conference with the king in Smithfield, in order that such articles as he demanded might be inserted in the charter to be granted by his majesty: one of which conditions was "that he (Tyler) should have a commission to behead "all lawyers, escheators, and others, whosoever "were learned in the law, or had any communication therewith;" that all the nation might receive their laws from his mouth only, as he had been heard to boast some days before.

After some debate, Tyler consented to follow Sir John to the appointed place, and proceeded slowly at the head of his army; but as soon as he came within sight of the king, he directed his confederates to keep at a distance, till he should give them a signal, whereupon they were to murder all the company, except the king himself, who was to be seized and imprisoned.

This being agreed on, Tyler set spur to his horse, galloped forward, and did not stop till he came close to the king, whom he addressed in the following terms: "Sir king, seest thou all yonder people?"—"Yea truly," replied the king, "wherefore sayest thou so?"—"Because," said he

Engraved for Chamberlain's History of London.

RICHARD II. Appeases the REBELS
on the Death of Wat Tyler in Smithfield

he, "they be all at my command, and have sworn to me their faith and truth, to do all that I would have them." — "In good time," replied the king, "I believe it well." — "Then," said Tyler, "believest thou, king, that these people, and as many more as be in London at my command, will depart from thee thus, without having thy letters?" — "No," said the king, "they be ordained for you, and shall be delivered to every one of them."

At the time the king made this reply, Tyler observing Sir John Newton, who carried his majesty's sword, on horseback, told him it would become him better to be on foot in his presence: to which Sir John replying, that he thought there was no impropriety in his present situation, Tyler was so incensed, that he called him traitor, and drew his dagger, with an intention to stab him.

Newton likewise drew his dagger, and gave Tyler the lie; on which the latter demanded the sword which was carried by Sir John; but he replied, "No, it is the king's sword, of which thou art not worthy: neither durst thou ask it of me if we had been by ourselves."

This reply so enraged Tyler, that he swore he would not eat till he had destroyed Sir John; and was absolutely preparing to attack him, when the king commanded the knight to dismount, to prevent any fatal consequences.

During Tyler's conference with the king, he demanded, exclusive of all that had been granted to the insurgents at Mile-end, that all the ancient laws of the kingdom should be abolished, and that all forests, parks and warrens should be free to the poor as well as the rich.

Tyler, at length, behaved with so much insolence, that the king's attendants told his majesty, that the conduct of the traitor was not less dangerous than intolerable: they therefore advised that he might be arrested on the spot, which the king complied with, though he dreaded the consequence.

As the spot on which they were was within the jurisdiction of London, the king commanded William Walworth, the mayor, to arrest Tyler; which the gallant magistrate was willing enough to do; for boldly riding up to him, he struck him with his sword so violent a blow on the head as brought him to the ground; and Sir John Sandwich, with others, hastening to Walworth's assistance, he was quickly dispatched.

Tyler's followers seeing him fall, cried out, "Our captain is slain! revenge! revenge!" and bent their bows for that purpose: nor can it be thought but that the king and his adherents must instantly have fallen a sacrifice to the power of superior numbers, had it not been for the admirable courage and presence of mind which Richard displayed on this occasion.

The young monarch having commanded his attendants to stop, advanced by himself towards the enraged multitude, and addressing them with a cheerful yet resolute air; "What, my friends, (said he) will you kill your king?—Be not troubled for the loss of your leader; I will be your captain; follow me; I will grant all your reasonable desires."

The insurgents were so struck with the death of their leader, and the magnanimity of their sovereign, that, without hesitation, they marched under his conduct into St. George's Fields; and before they could recollect themselves, Sir Robert Knowles appeared at the head of a thousand citizens, who had been collected together, and completely armed, by the vigilance of Walworth, immediately after the death of Wat Tyler:

The nobility and gentry residing in the remote counties of England, had no sooner heard of this terrible insurrection, than they armed their friends and vassals, and hastened to London, so that the king soon found himself at the head of an army of forty thousand men.

The insurgents, awed by the sight of the troops, and allured by the promise of a general pardon, as well as of charters similar to those already granted to their companions, instantly laid down their arms, and submitted to the mercy of their sovereign.

Thus ended an insurrection, which threatened greater danger to this kingdom than any before or since; if we may judge from the confession of a person called Jack Straw, who was next in command to Wat Tyler; and who, after the death of his leader, endeavoured to conceal himself in London; but being taken in an eating house, a few days after the insurrection was suppressed, was tried before the Lord-mayor, and received sentence of death.

The following is the substance of the confession made by Jack Straw, a short time before he was executed: "That when they assembled at Blackheath, and sent to the king to come to them, they had resolved to have killed all his attendants, and carried him along with them wherever they went, that the populace might with the greater assurance join them; and when, by the help of the king's presence, sufficient numbers had got together in the several counties of England, they were to have murdered all those from whom they could expect resistance, the nobility and gentry, and at last the king, with all the clergy, both regular and secular, except only the friars mendicants, whom they thought were sufficient for the celebration of divine service through the kingdom. These things being performed, they would have made such laws as they judged proper for the government of the people. Wat Tyler was to have been made king of Kent, and the other ringleaders of the rebels were to have been appointed kings over the other counties, each being to be made a distinct kingdom: and in the evening of that day whereon Tyler was killed, they were to have been joined by the London rabble, when they were to have sacked and burnt the city."

The peace of the city was no sooner restored, than the head of the archbishop was taken down from London-bridge, and those of Tyler and Straw, with some of their associates, fixed up in the same place.

The king, determined to reward the services which his faithful citizens of London had done, towards suppressing the late dangerous insurrection, granted a fee farm of one hundred pounds per annum to William Walworth the mayor, and forty pounds each on John Philpot, Nicholas Brembre, and Robert Laund, aldermen; and likewise conferred the honour of knighthood on each of the above-mentioned gentlemen.

It is the opinion of many writers that the dagger in the arms of the city of London was granted at this period, in commemoration of Wat Tyler's having received from the sword or dagger of the mayor the blow which was the prelude to his death.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Lewdness punished by the mayor of London. Victuallers rendered incapable of serving the office of mayor. Fishmongers company disfranchised. Letter of king Richard II. confirming the privileges of the constable of the Tower of London. A petition of the parliament for confirming the charters of the city. The Lord-mayor's proclamation of the charter of confirmation. Northampton, the late mayor's riot and punishment. Choice of common-councilmen by the several Wards. The sheriffs of London sworn before the barons of the exchequer. The privileges of the constable of the Tower confirmed.

SIR William Walworth was succeeded as chief magistrate of this city by John Northampton, who observing that the bishops and inferior clergy permitted licentious and debauched persons to go on in their irregular course of life, without restraint, he took the reformation of these abuses into his own hands, and severely punished all such as were found guilty of whoredom, causing the common prostitutes to be carried through the streets with their heads shaved, and with pipes and trumpets sounding before them.

This proceeding of the mayor gave great offence to the clergy, who looking upon it as an infringement of their authority, enjoined him to desist; but he, equally regardless of their commands or threatnings, proceeded to reform these abuses to the utmost of his power.

This same magistrate procured an act of parliament, by which it was ordained that "no victualler should exercise any judicial office in London, or in any other city, borough, feaport, or town in the kingdom, except in such towns where no other person could be found qualified for such an office;" in which case every such person was to "abstain from the exercise of such trade, during the time of his office, upon pain of forfeiting all the victuals he should sell during that time."

According to the meaning of this act, all butchers, grocers, and fishmongers, were rendered incapable of serving the office of mayor, as they were deemed victuallers.

By the management of Northampton an act of parliament was likewise procured, by which the trade of the fishmongers was laid open, so that all foreigners in friendship with the king of England, were permitted to sell fish in London and elsewhere, either by wholesale or retail; by which the fishmonger's company became one of the poorest in this city, though it had been one of the most flourishing.

In the year 1382, king Richard II. sent a letter to the mayor and commonalty of London, confirming the privileges of the Tower of London; which we have recited at large, not only as it is a valuable piece of antiquity, but because we shall have occasion to give a particular account of the said Tower in the next chapter of this work.

"Richard, by the grace of God, king of England and France, and lord of Ireland, to the mayor and sheriffs of London sendeth greeting. Forasmuch as we have understood, that the constables of our Tower of London, time out of mind, even to the time now last past, and in particular John Darcy, John de Beaucamp, Robert de Morle, Richard de Vache, and Alan de Buxhill, hitherto constables of the said Tower, have had the customs, pence, and profits underwritten, by right belonging to the foresaid Tower; and in quiet manner taking them by themselves, or their servants; to wit, of every boat laden with rushes, brought to the said city, such a quantity of rushes, to be laid upon Tower-wharf, as may be contained within a man's arm: of every boat accustomed to bring oysters, muscles, and cockles, to the foresaid city, one maund, thence to be brought and laid upon the said wharf: from every ship laden with wines, coming from Bourdeaux, or elsewhere, unto the said city, one flagon before the mast, and another behind the mast: whatsoever ship, barge, or boat, or other vessel, which shall go loose by reason of storm or wind, or the ropes and cordage being broken, shall float from London-bridge to Gravesend, or from thence to the said bridge, to be taken by the constable of the said Tower, or his servants, and to be applied to the use of the said constable: what swanssoever coming under the said bridge towards the sea, or from the sea towards the said bridge: all manner of horses, cows, oxen, hogs, and sheep, which have fallen from the said bridge into the water of Thames, which the foresaid constable, or servants, may take: any such like creature swimming through the middle of the said bridge to the foresaid Tower, which the same constable or his servants afore said have taken: of every foot of such like creature feeding within the ditch of the foresaid

"foreſaid Tower, one penny: every cart, empty or laden, which ſhall fall into the aforeſaid ditches, as forfeiture or fee of the conſtable: and that the foreſaid conſtables, as well thoſe afore-named, as others, have uſed and enjoyed the uſages underwritten, from the time beforeſaid; to wit, that no cart, empty or laden, which ſhall fall into the foreſaid ditches, as forfeiture or fee of the conſtable, and that the foreſaid conſtables, as well thoſe afore-named as others, have uſed and enjoyed the uſages underwritten, from the time beforeſaid; to wit, that no cart, empty or laden, ought to come from the end of the ſtreet called Petty-wales, upon the ſaid Tower-hill, nor near the foreſaid ditch, to the high ſtreet, called Tower-ſtreet, unleſs it be taken and brought within the ſaid Tower; and that no cart ſhall paſs beyond the bridge, between the ditch of the ſaid caſtle and the ditch of the hoſpital of St. Catharine's, without the licence of the conſtable of the ſaid Tower; and if it do, and break the bar, that cart ought to be brought within the ſaid Tower, and to make ſatisfaction for the tranſgreſſion, according to the ſaid conſtable's will; We, willing to maintain all and ſingular the rights and liberties of our Tower aforeſaid, that they periſh not, or be unlawfully taken away, command you, that you permit our beloved and loyal Sir Thomas Murriex, our conſtable of the Tower, to take and have the cuſtoms, pence and profits, by himſelf and his ſervants, in form aforeſaid, and to uſe and enjoy the foreſaid uſages freely, without any impediment, as he ought to take and have ſuch cuſtoms, pence and profits, and to uſe and enjoy the aforeſaid uſages, as he and all other conſtables of the ſaid Tower have reaſonably accuſtomed to take and have thoſe cuſtoms, pence and profits, and to uſe and enjoy the foreſaid uſages, from the time aforeſaid; and that by no means ye neglect this. Witneſs myſelf at Eltham, the ſixteenth day of November, in the ſixth year of our reign.
"By the king."

The citizens of London conſidered this grant as a violation of their ancient rights and privileges, and therefore applied to the king, through the mediation of the next parliament, for a confirmation of all their rights, liberties, free-cuſtoms, ordinances, &c. and were ſucceſſful enough to obtain their requeſt.

In the year 1383, the houſe of commons, apprehenſive that the ancient government of the city might be again infringed, as in many former inſtances it had been, by the crown; petitioned the king for a confirmation of the liberties of the ſaid city; which petition is recorded in French, of which the following is a faithful tranſlation.

"The commons in this preſent parliament aſſembled pray, for the greater quiet and nourishing of the peace amongſt your liege ſubjects, and for common benefit, that your citizens of your city of London be entirely in this preſent parliament reſtored to their franchises and free uſages, and that it may pleaſe your highneſs, of your ſpecial grace, to grant and confirm to your ſaid citizens, and to their ſucceſſors, by your letters patents, all their liberties and free uſages, as entire and full as they or their predeceſſors have enjoyed at any time by the favour of your noble progenitors, with the claſe of Licet uſi non fuerint, vel abuſi fuerint; (i. e. whether the ſame were not uſed, or ever abuſed;) in like manner with the franchises, which they enjoy by your own moſt gracious charter, and are confirmed: any ſtatutes, judgments, ſurrenders, ordinances, or any charters or grants of your majeſty, or your progenitors aforeſaid, in time paſt made and granted, to the contrary notwithstanding, &c."

To this petition his majeſty answered, "Le Rio le veut;" that is, "ſo the king willet;" and in conſequence of the royal aſſent, a charter paſſed in that ſame parliament, reciting the ſeveral charters of confirmation, and others paſſed by king Edward the ſecond, Edward the third, and Henry the third, as well as a charter of confirmation, granted by Richard himſelf, in the firſt year of his reign.

Soon after the paſſing of this charter, the ſame was, by command of the king, fully ſet forth and publiſhed, in a proclamation of Sir Nicholas Brembre, lord mayor; which proclamation being carefully preſerved among the records of this city, as an affair of the higheſt importance to poſterity, we have ſubjoined a faithful tranſlation thereof, from the original latin.

A proclamation made in the mayoralty of Nicholas Brembre, knight, mayor, on Friday after the feaſt of the B. V. Mary, and in the ſeventh year of the reign of Richard II. concerning the liberties lately granted to the citizens of London, by the lord the king in his parliament, and alſo concerning certain ancient liberties renewed by the lord the king, and newly confirmed to the ſaid citizens by his royal charter.

"It is proclaimed on the part of the lord our king, and of the mayor of the city of London, by virtue of the confirmation and conceſſion made by the ſaid lord the king, concerning the liberties and ancient cuſtoms of the ſaid city, as well by charters of the kings of England, granted unto them, as without charters, that it may be made known to all foreigners concerning the following liberties of the ſaid citizens, eſpecially touching the ſaid foreigners, as the citizens of the city aforeſaid.

"So that no ſummons, attachments on executions, be made by any miniſters or officers of the lord the king, or of his heirs, either with or without a warrant, within the liberties of the city aforeſaid, but by the officers of the city only.

"Alſo the ſame lord our king hath, out of his ſpecial grace, by his charter granted and confirmed, as will fully appear by having reſourſe to the ſaid charters and letters, the gifts, grants, confirmations, innovations, and the ordinances aforeſaid; and alſo all the articles, and

“and all other and every thing contained, recited, and explained in all the charters and letters, as well of him the lord the king, as any of his progenitors; ratifying and granting all and each thereof, at the instance and request of the commons of the realm of England in his last parliament, for the nourishing greater quiet and peace among his liege subjects, and for the public good, and by and with the assent of the prelates, lords, nobility, and great men, assisting him in the said parliament, for himself and his heirs, as much as in him lies, to the citizens of the foresaid city, and to their heirs and successors, citizens of the same city.

“Also the same our lord the king has further granted, at the instance and request as aforesaid, and by the assent aforesaid, and also by his own charters confirmed, for himself and his heirs aforesaid, that the foresaid citizens and their successors, citizens of the city aforesaid, shall be as entirely and fully restored to all their liberties and free-customs, as ever they or their predecessors have at any time more freely and fully enjoyed the same under the predecessors of him the lord the king.

“Also the same lord our king, willeth, that, though the same citizens, or their predecessors, citizens of the city aforesaid, have not on any occasion whatsoever, hitherto fully used any or either of the liberties, acquittances, grants, ordinances, articles, or free-customs, or other things granted in the said charters or letters, or perhaps, have abused any or all of the acquittances, grants, ordinances, articles, or free-customs, or any other things in the same charters or letters, as aforesaid, contained; nevertheless the same citizens, their heirs and successors, citizens of the city aforesaid, may for the future fully enjoy and use all and singular the liberties, acquittances, ordinances, articles, grants, free-customs, and whatsoever else is contained in the same charters and letters aforesaid, whether the same were not used, or perhaps abused, and every one of them, without let or impediment, of the same the lord the king, or of his heirs, justices, escheators, sheriffs, or of any other his bailiffs or ministers whomsoever; any statutes or ordinances published, or judgments given, or any charters of the same the lord the king, or his progenitors aforesaid, in times past made and granted, to the contrary notwithstanding.”

The citizens of London in general, and the company of fishmongers in particular were extremely gratified by this instance of the royal favour, whereby all their ancient rights and privileges were restored, except that of holding courts; all affairs being to be determined in the mayor's court, in conformity to the late charter.

Soon after this, John Northampton, the late mayor, who appears to have been a man of a very turbulent disposition, raised great tumults in the city, by assembling large numbers of people, and walking through the streets in a riotous manner.

Brembre, the present mayor, exerted all his authority to prevent any ill consequences that might arise from these irregularities; and in the necessary exertion of this authority, one Constantine, a shoe-maker, being apprehended for encouraging the populace to espouse the cause of Northampton, was immediately carried before the magistrates at Guild-hall, where he was tried and convicted, partly on his own confession, and partly on the evidence of others, and beheaded soon afterwards.

About the same time Northampton was impeached by his own chaplain of being the principal actor in the late sedition, and of conspiring against the king and government; and being carried before a convention of the nobility at Reading, he was sentenced to be imprisoned for life, and all his effects to be appropriated to the king's use; which sentence was carried into execution by his imprisonment in the castle of Tintagel in Cornwall.

The peace of the city being again restored, its inhabitants began to think of establishing a respectable common-council; and at a common hall assembled for this purpose, petitions were presented to the mayor, setting forth, that “for want of sufficient persons chosen, divers things were passed in the common-council, more by clamour than reason.”

To remedy this grievance for the future, several articles were proposed to be tried, and if found useful and necessary, to be confirmed: one of which articles was, that the common-council might consist of sufficient people; and it was determined that, for the future, four persons should be chosen out of each ward, under the inspection of the alderman, to represent the said ward in the court of common-council.

This appears to have been a very excellent regulation; because, in former times, the members of the common council had been chosen by persons professing certain mysteries, or crafts, and not by the inhabitants of the respective wards.

Soon after this establishment, Nicholas Brembre, then mayor, prevailed on the members of the common-council, to turn out almost all the aldermen, and to elect new ones in their room: a proceeding which seems to have been encouraged, if not proposed, by the court; for the new elections were confirmed by a warrant from the king, dated the eighth of March, which was the very day on which the election of the new aldermen took place.

As this new method of electing the members of the common-council was thought to advance the good government of the city, the mayor, aldermen, and common council, did on the thirty first of July, 1384, make the following order respecting the choice and time of meeting of the common-council, viz. “That they should be chosen by the wards, fifteen days after St. Gregory; and that the inhabitants should chuse those who had served the year before, or others: and, that the common-council should be assembled once a quarter, or oftener, to consult and take care of the affairs of the city.”

In the year 1385, Hammon Godcheap, and William de Buddle, having been elected sheriffs, were

Engraved for Chamberlain's History of London.

View of the TOWER from the River Thames.

VIEW of the? CUSTOM HOUSE .

were presented to the mayor and aldermen; to the treasurer and barons of the exchequer, who required them to take an oath for their good behaviour in the said office.

Hereupon, John Gysors, the mayor, replied; that "the persons presented by them to that office, were not obliged, nor ought they, to take an oath, concerning the exercise of their office any where but before the mayor and aldermen of the city; and that since the first concession made to the citizens, of chusing the sheriffs of London and Middlesex, and of discharging them at pleasure, it had not been known that ever any such oath had been taken; except once, when the city was seized into the hands of Edward the first."

For these reasons the mayor and aldermen, in the name of the city, desired that "the said Hammon and William might be admitted to the said office, upon their presentation, according to custom."

This plea however, notwithstanding its reasonableness, had no weight with the barons, who would not permit the sheriffs to execute their office, without taking the oath; though at the same time they did not pretend to invalidate the election.

Soon after this, the citizens received another mortification, not inferior to the former; for notwithstanding the late confirmation of the city privileges, the constable of the Tower continued to demand the customs and profits annexed to his office in the sixth year of this king's reign.

The citizens conceived this practice to be highly prejudicial to the city; and therefore determined to petition the king for a revocation of the grant: but so far from obtaining redress, they had the mortification to find that the grant was confirmed by the king and parliament, as will appear by the following recital.

"We, with the advice and assent of the prelates and other noblemen in our parliament, have graciously consented on our part to the foresaid supplication of the constable; according to his petition. And therefore we command you, that on your part ye take care that all and singular the liberties and franchises belonging to our said Tower be published; proclaimed; and pronounced distinctly within your city aforesaid; and its suburbs, in such places as shall be most proper: and that we will, that our said Tower may enjoy and use the liberties and franchises aforesaid in the form aforesaid; the liberties and franchises granted by us to the said citizens and the commonalty notwithstanding: and that ye permit the said constable to have and receive, by himself or by his servants, the rights and profits aforesaid, belonging unto the said Tower. Witness myself at Westminster, the twenty-second of November, in the ninth year of our reign."

Notwithstanding this; the privileges of the constable of the Tower furnished a constant source of contention for a long space of time afterwards, till, in the reign of king James the first, that monarch determined the affair in favour of the city of London.

As this leads us, with great propriety, to treat of the Tower; we shall, in the next chapter, give a full and particular account of that ancient fortress; agreeable to the plan we have hitherto pursued, of completing our descriptions of particular parts of this city, wherever those descriptions can be introduced with the greatest propriety.

CHAPTER XIX.

A concise historical view of the Tower of London. Of its foundation, increase, and present state. Its government, customs, and privileges. Its antiquities and records. Of the lions and other wild beasts. Of the spoils of the Spanish Armada. Of the small armory, the royal train of artillery, and the horse armory. Of the Jewel office, and the regalia used at the coronation of the king's of England. Particulars of colonel Blood's attempt to steal the crown. Account of the mint, with its officers and the manner of stamping money. An account of the office of ordnance, with a list of its officers.

THE Tower of London, which is situated on the east-side of the city, near the bank of the river Thames, was originally a royal palace, and consisted of no more than what is now called the white Tower, which was built by William the conqueror, to over-awe the citizens, and secure to himself a safe retreat, in case of necessity.

In the year 1098, during the reign of William Rufus, son to William the conqueror, it was surrounded with walls, and fortified with a deep ditch, which is, in some places, no less than one hundred and twenty feet wide.

Henry I. built the lions tower for the reception of the foreign animals presented to him by the emperor Frederic; and from this time it has served to accommodate the beasts, birds, &c. presented to the kings of England.

In the year 1240, Henry III. ordered a stone gate, bulwark, and some other additions to be made to this fortress; and the outside wall of the square Tower to be whitened, from whence

whence it obtained the appellation of the white Tower.

The church of St. Peter ad Vincula, within the Tower was built by king Edward III. and in the year 1465 the fortifications of this place were greatly enlarged by Edward IV.

In the year 1638 the white Tower was rebuilt; and after the restoration of Charles II. it was thoroughly repaired, and a great number of additional buildings made to it; so that the Tower of London has at present more the appearance of a town than a fortress.

The Tower is separated from the river Thames by a narrow ditch and a convenient wharf, to which it has a communication by a draw-bridge, for the readier issuing and receiving ammunition, and naval or military stores.

On this wharf, there is lately made a long and beautiful plat-form, on which are planted sixty-one pieces of cannon, mounted on new and very elegant iron carriages. The pieces of ordnance are chiefly used to fire on the days of state, or to promulgate any joyful news to the public.

Parallel to the wharf, within the walls, is a platform 70 yards in length, called the ladies line, because much frequented by the ladies in the summer, as within it is shaded with a lofty row of trees, and without it has a delightful prospect of the shipping, with boats passing and repassing on the river Thames.

You ascend this line by stone steps, and being once upon it you may walk almost round the walls of the Tower without interruption, and in your course will pass three batteries; the first called the Devil's battery, where is also a platform on which are mounted seven pieces of cannon, tho' on the battery itself are only five; the next is called the stone battery, and is defended by eight pieces of cannon; and the third and last is called the wooden battery, mounted with six pieces of cannon, all nine pounders.

The chief entrance into the Tower is by a gate to the west, large enough to admit coaches and heavy carriages; but these are first admitted through an outer gate, and must pass a stout stone bridge, built over the ditch, before they can approach the main entrance. There is beside an entrance for persons on foot, over the draw-bridge, to the wharf, which wharf is only divided from the main land by gates at each end, opened every day at a certain hour for the convenience of a free intercourse between the respective inhabitants of the Tower, the city, and its suburbs.

Besides these entrances there is a water-gate, commonly called Traitor's gate, through which it has been customary to convey traitors, and other state prisoners, to or from the Tower, perhaps for greater privacy, and which is seldom opened on any other occasion; but the lords committed to the Tower on account of the late rebellion were publicly admitted at the main entrance.

Over this gate is a regular building, terminated at each end by two bastions, or round towers, on which are embrasures for pointing cannon, but there are at present none mounted. In this building are placed the infirmary, the mill, and waterworks that supply the Tower with water.

At the opening and shutting the principal gate night and morning, there is a great deal of ceremony used; of which the following is a description. A little before six in the morning in summer, and as soon as it is light in the winter, the yeoman porter goes to the governor's house for the keys, from whence he proceeds to the innermost gate, attended by a serjeant and six men of the main guard; this gate being opened to let them pass, is again shut, while the yeoman porter and the guard proceed to open the three outermost gates, at each of which the guards rest their firelocks, as do the spur-guard while the keys pass and repass.

When the yeoman porter returns to the innermost gate, he calls to the wardens in waiting, to take in king George's keys; upon which the gate is opened, and the keys lodged in the warders hall till the time of locking, which is usually about ten or eleven at night, with the same formality as when opened.

After they are shut, the yeoman and guard proceed to the main guard, who are all under arms with the officers upon duty at their head. The usual challenge from the main guard to the yeoman porter is, Who comes there? His answer is, The keys. The challenger says, Pass keys; upon which the officer orders the guard to rest their firelocks; the yeoman porter then says, God save king George. Amen, is loudly answered by all the guard.

The yeoman porter with his guard proceeds, from the main-guard, to the governor's, where the keys are left; after which no person can go out or come in upon any pretence whatsoever till next morning, without the watch-word for the night, which is kept so secret, that none but the proper officers and the serjeant upon guard, ever come to the knowledge of it; for it is the same on the same night in every fortified place throughout the king's dominions.

When the watch-word is given by any stranger to the centinel at the spur-guard (or outer-gate) he communicates it to his serjeant, who passes it to the next on duty, and so on till it comes to the governor, or commanding officer, by whom the keys are delivered to the yeoman porter, who attends as before; the main-guard being put under arms, brings them to the outer gate, where the stranger is admitted, and conducted to the commandant. Having made known his business, he is conducted to the outer-gate, dismissed, the gate shut, and the keys re-delivered with all the formality above described.

The constable of the Tower is the principal officer to whom the care of this fortress is committed; and he is usually of the highest quality, as his post at all coronations and other state ceremonies is of the utmost consequence, having the crown and other regalia in his custody. He hath under him a lieutenant and a deputy-lieutenant, commonly called governor, whose offices are likewise of great dignity, a tower-major, gentleman porter, yeoman porter, gentleman gaoler, four-quarter gunners, and forty wardens, whose uniform is the same with the king's yeomen of the guard.

Upon their heads they wear round flat-crowned caps, caps, tied round with bands of party-coloured ribbands: their coats are of a particular make, but very becoming, with large sleeves and flowing skirts, and are of fine scarlet cloth, laced round the edges and seams with several rows of gold lace, and girt round their waists with a broad laced girdle. Upon their breasts and backs they wear the king's silver badge, representing the thistle and rose, on which are the letters G. R. in capitals.

Besides these, and other inferior officers, there is always a battalion of foot guards on duty quartered in barracks, which have been lately rebuilt. The principal buildings within the walls are the church, the white Tower, the offices of ordnance, of the mint, of the keepers of the records, the jewel office, the horse-armory, the grand store-house, the new or small armory, handsome houses for the chief officers residing in the Tower, with many other houses for the inferior officers, and barracks for soldiers on duty, besides prisons for state-delinquents, which are commonly the warders houses.

As the church has nothing worth a particular observation belonging to it, we shall not detain the reader by describing it: but only remark, that it is famous for being the burial place of the following persons of eminence.

John Fisher, bishop of Rochester, who was beheaded on Tower-hill, the 22d. of June, 1535.

George Bullen, lord Rochford, beheaded on the 17th of May, 1536.

Anna Bullen, beheaded on the 19th of May, 1536.

Thomas Cromwell, earl of Essex, beheaded in the year 1540.

Catherine Howard, beheaded February the 13th 1541.

Edward Seymour, duke of Somerset, beheaded January the 24th, 1552.

John Dudley, duke of Northumberland, beheaded on the 22d. of August, 1553; and James Scott, duke of Monmouth, son of Charles II. beheaded on the 15th of July, 1685, for asserting his right to the crown, against James the second.

Besides these, within the rails of the altar, were deposited the remains of the infamous judge Jeffries, who died of grief, in the Tower, towards the end of the year 1688.

The white Tower is a large square irregular building, situated almost in the center, no one side answering to another, nor are any of its watch towers, of which there are four that ornament the top, built alike: one of these towers is now converted into an observatory, and indeed seems well adapted to that use.

The building itself consists of three very lofty stories, under which are most spacious and commodious vaults, chiefly filled with salt-petre. It is covered at top with flat leads, from whence there is an extensive and noble prospect of the shipping in the Thames, and the adjacent country.

In the first story are two spacious rooms, one of which is a small armory for the sea-service, having various sorts of arms very curiously laid up in it, for more than 10,000 seamen. In the other room are closets and presses in abundance, all filled with warlike tools and instruments of death without number. Over these are two other floors, one filled principally with arms; the other with arms and armorers tools; such as cheveaux de frize, pick-axes, spades and shovels.

In the upper story is kept match, sheep-skins, tanned hides, &c. And in a little room some records, containing the antient usages and privileges of the place. In this tower are likewise kept models of the new invented engines of destruction, that have from time to time been presented to the government.

On the top of this tower is a large cistern or reservoir for supplying the whole garrison with water in case of need; it is about seven feet deep, nine in breadth, and about sixty in length, and is filled from the Thames by means of an engine very ingeniously contrived for that purpose.

The office of ordnance is kept in Cold Harbor; to which office all other offices for supplying artillery, arms, ammunition, or other warlike stores to any part of his majesty's dominions, are accountable; from which office are issued all orders for the disposition of warlike materials for every kind of service.

The mint is also a separate division, which comprehends near one third of the Tower, and contains houses for all the officers belonging to the coinage; of this, as well as of the office of ordnance, a particular account will follow in their proper places.

The office of keeper of the records is opposite the platform already described. It has lately been adorned with a fine carved stone door-case at the entrance, and finely wainscotted within. All the rolls from king John to the beginning of the reign of Richard III. are deposited in fifty-six wainscot presses in this office; those since that time are kept at the rolls in Chancery-lane.

The rolls and records kept in the Tower contain the ancient tenures of all the lands in England, with a survey of the manors; the originals of all laws and statutes; the rights of England to the dominion of the British seas; leagues and treaties with foreign princes; the achievements of England in foreign wars; antient grants of our kings to their subjects; the forms of submission of the Scottish kings; writs and proceedings of the courts of common law and equity; the settlement of Ireland as to law and dominion; privileges and immunities granted to all cities and corporations during the period before mentioned; with many other important records; all regularly disposed by the diligence of Sir William Dugdale, and others under his direction, and properly referred to in near a thousand folio indexes. The price of searching here is half a guinea, for which you may peruse any one subject a year. In the months of December, January, and February, this office is open only six, but all the rest of the year eight hours in a day.

The jewel-office is a dark strong stone room, about twenty yards to the eastward of the grand store-house. The regalia kept in this office will be spoken of when we come to treat of the curiosities within the tower.

The horse-armory is a little eastward of the White Tower. It is a plain brick building, rather ther convenient than elegant. Its contents are likewise among the curiosities commonly shewn at the Tower, and will be distinctly described hereafter.

The grand store-house is a noble building to the northward of the White Tower, and extends in length 245 feet, in breadth 60. It was begun by king James II. and by that prince built to the first floor, but finished by king William, who erected that magnificent room called the New or Small Armory, in which he, with queen Mary his consort, on its being finished, dined in great form, having all the warrant workmen and labourers to attend them, dressed in white gloves and aprons, the usual badges of the order of freemasonry. This noble structure is of brick and stone, and on the north side is a stately door-case adorned with four columns, an entablature, and triangular pediment of the dorick order. Under the pediment are the king's arms, with enrichments of trophy work very ornamental.

The other buildings within the Tower having nothing remarkable, we shall proceed to the description of those curiosities that are usually shewn to strangers.

Of the Lions and other wild beasts in the Tower.

PERSONS whose inclination leads them to see the rarities in the Tower of London, generally take a view of the wild beasts before any other curiosity, as by their situation they first present themselves; for when you have entered the outer gate, and passed what is called the spurguard, you will see the keeper's house just before you, which you will know by the figure of a lion being placed against the wall, and over the door where you are to enter is another figure of a lion; there you are to ring, and for six-pence each person, you will instantly gain admittance, and be shewn such a noble collection of wild creatures, as is well worthy the admiration of the curious.

As soon as you enter you are carried into a range of dens in the form of a half moon, most of them inhabited by lions and lionesses of different ages and various countries.

The first they shew you is a young he-lion named MARCO, which was presented to his majesty by his royal highness the duke of Cumberland; he is still very savage, and cannot be tamed by all the art of the keepers.

This den was formerly occupied by a lioness, who lived above forty years in the Tower, and bred several times, to the no small satisfaction of her keepers.—She was the oldest that ever was known here, tho' it is more than five hundred years since these sort of beasts first began to be kept in this place. Of her whelps NERO lived to the age of ten, and died about nine years ago, and NANCY lived to the age of twenty.

These were both brought up in the Tower, with great care and expence; for hardly any creature is more tender when young than a lion's whelp, notwithstanding the great strength of those animals when grown to maturity.

In this country they would infallibly perish, if they were not immediately taken from their dams as soon as whelped; and it is remarkable, that in Barbary, where they are a part of the wild inhabitants of the woods and forests, many of them die in breeding their teeth, in strong convulsions. Those nursed in the Tower were kept twelve months in a warm room, and fed mostly with milk diet before they were put into dens; they were as gentle as lambs when about five or six weeks old, but it was observed that, as they grew older, their savage nature increased.

The following is the account given of Nero; "that when he was two years old, he was indeed a very beautiful creature, and exceedingly well educated; for, says he, upon my expressing a desire of visiting his lodgings, at a word speaking he marched down with great condescension from his upper into his lower apartment, and gave me the opportunity of entering into his den; where having satisfied my curiosity in viewing his dining-room, kitchen, and bed-chamber, his manner of living, particular ceremonies in eating, drinking, &c. at my departure from thence he would have taken me by the hand, but our acquaintance being but slender, I declined accepting so great a mark of his friendship, till I had known him better. Upon the keepers putting into his den a piece of lights, he seemingly took very little notice of it, but couched down on his belly, with his fore-feet out like a cat that is going to leap at a mouse, and in an instant gave a sudden spring from the farthest side of the den, and seized it with amazing fierceness." Nancy it seems, was more shy; she would admit of no familiarity with strangers; and was looked upon as the fiercest beast in the Tower.

The next den is inhabited with master Dunco, a young he-lion, and miss Groggery, a fine young tygress, which were presented to his majesty by lord Anson. Tho' these creatures are full grown, they live together in the most perfect amity and friendship; and the king of beasts permits his fair partner to share with him his empire without controul.

The lion is so perfectly tame and good-natured, that he will suffer his keepers to do any thing with him; and there is one circumstance, respecting his behaviour, which I must relate, as in tenderness he seems to have come near to human nature, and in friendship to have surpassed it.

When Dunco was in the den alone, and accident happened to the lower part of it, which so impaired the wood work that he could not be kept with safety; the carpenter was therefore called to mend it, who wisely stood at a distance, and could not approach the den for fear of the lion. Upon this one of the keepers stepped into the den, and agreed to keep Dunco in the upper part of his house, while the carpenter was at work beneath. It happened, however, that the keeper, after playing some time with the lion, fell fast asleep. The carpenter continued his work, without knowing to what danger he was exposed, and when he had done called the keeper to come down and fasten the door; but receiving no answer, he ran out of the den, and was greatly surprized to see, through the grate, both the keeper and the lion, stretched upon the floor and sleeping together. He again called William, but William was too sound asleep to make any answer; however, the lion reared up his head, and, after looking looking at the carpenter some time, threw his great paw over William's breast, and laying his nose upon his head again composed himself to rest. The carpenter, already terrified with his own situation, was still more alarmed when he saw the keeper thus incircled with the paws of the lion; and ran into the house for aid. Some of the people came out, and, having bolted the den-door, which the carpenter had neglected in his precipitate retreat, they roused William, who shaking the lion by the paw took his leave; but Duncto first rubbed his nose against the keeper's knees, then held him by the coat, and, at length, attended him quite to the door.

It is an old maxim, that evil communication corrupts good manners; and as a companion to this adage, we may assert, that good company and kind treatment will tame the most savage animals. We have an instance of this, in the courteous behaviour of miss Groggery, who is altogether as kind and familiar as her companion, and, though a tygress, discovers no marks of ferocity.—But notwithstanding the polite and friendly behaviour of these beautiful creatures, I would not advise my friends to be too great with them; for, like other couples, they may sometimes happen to be out of temper.

The tyger is in shape not much unlike a cat, only much larger, and when wild is prodigious fierce and ravenous. It lurks in the woods, and seizes its prey by a sudden spring. Men in traversing the woods, are frequently surprized by this animal. Tygers are finely spotted; they are of a yellowish colour, and their spots black; they are very playful, and leap a prodigious height, when they are playing their gambols.

In the third den, you were formerly shewn Zara a celebrated lioness, lately dead. She was brought from the dey of Algiers, as a present to his majesty, by commodore Kepple, when he went to that prince, some years ago, to settle the peace, and ransom the English prisoners. This lioness was married in the Tower, and there bred, and in the same den are now shewn Pompey and Dido, her son and daughter. These she brought forth about four years ago, and was so tenderly fond of them till her death, that she eat no meat till they had done, though they were then grown almost as large as herself. These two are remarkably tame, and fond of their keepers.

In the next den reigns alone Cæsar, a mighty lion, born in Barbary, and presented by the dey of Algiers to his majesty. He was brought over with Zara, by commodore Kepple, and has the honour to be father to Pompey and Dido. He may be a good father, but we cannot allow him to be a good companion, for he is both saucy and surley.

In the last den of this yard may be seen Sir Richard, a fine young tyger, presented to his majesty by the duke of Northumberland.

From this range of dens you are carried into the next yard, and shewn:

1. Miss Fanny, a beautiful young lioness, brought from Bombay by captain Webb, and presented to his majesty. This is a very handsome beast and good tempered, but she is somewhat lame, occasioned by her paws being scared, when young; with a red hot iron by the negro who took her, which was done, we are told, to make her tame; and tame she is, indeed, more so than many of the human race, for some time ago, when she seemed indisposed, and refused to eat her meat, the two keepers commenced doctors, and having prepared a drink for her, one opened her jaws with his hands, while the other poured it down her throat; and this dose they repeated four different times, without any other opposition from the good natured creature than a sour look, and a growl of disapprobation.

In a second den is a large wolf from Saxony, in form not unlike a dog of a mixed breed. These are ravenous creatures, which inhabit the immense forests in Germany and other parts, and are a terror to men and cattle. In the severe season of the year, when the frosts and snows have locked up every kind of vegetable, these creatures come from the woods, and fall ravenously upon every living thing they meet. Children have been torn from the breasts of their mothers by them upon the road; and they have even entered houses in search of food.

The third den is occupied by Hector, a fine young lion, sent from the emperor of Morocco, as a present to his majesty.

Next to him you are shewn Miss Jenny, a Bengal tygress, brought from Madras by governor Piggot, and presented to his majesty as a great curiosity. She is a most beautiful creature, and indeed more so than any other in the Tower.

In the next den, you are shewn Nero, the emperor, the oldest lion in the Tower, now greatly upon the decline. He was brought from the river Gambia in Africa, and is of a noble and majestic appearance. His looks strike the stoutest beholder with astonishing awe. His head is large, being covered with a long shaggy mane that reaches to his shoulders, and adds rather to the terror than majesty of his countenance, for his eyes being very fiery and far set into his head, and darting as it were a kind of red flame through his long, shaggy, and dishevelled hair, raises such an idea of fierceness, as cannot be excited in the mind unaccompanied with fear; nor can we conceive it possible for human courage to encounter a creature of such a dreadful aspect, without the intervention of some lucky circumstance; notwithstanding the stories that have been told of men killing lions in equal combat. His mouth opens wide, and discovers a frightful set of teeth, and when he roars (which he generally does, if not disturbed or interrupted by company) about five in the evening, he may be heard at a great distance, indeed the voice of the lion is said to be so terrible, when wild in the forest, that all creatures that hear it tremble.

The lion we are speaking of, if we do not mistake in describing him, is a kind of yellowish cream colour, about four feet high, his body small in proportion to his head, but his legs have the appearance of amazing strength; his large muscles being very visible through the skin that covers them. The bone of his fore leg seems to be about the bigness of a man's wrist, and his fore feet are armed with five prodigious claws, sheathed like those of a cat, with which he seizes his prey, like that animal; his hinder feet with only four.

A a

his

This stately creature had his shoulder slipped by an accident, which makes him go lame, and seemingly in pain; yet he appears to be very gentle and tractable to his feeder, and will lie down to let him play with him like a spaniel; but we would advise no stranger to be so familiar with these beasts; for there are some whose countenances they do not like at first sight, and therefore when they have conceived a disgust, it would be dangerous to come within their reach.

We have been informed, that a spaniel dog being once thrown into a former lion's den in the Tower, instead of hurting it, the lion cherished it, and contracted such a fondness for it, that he would never suffer it to be taken out again, but fed it till he died, which happened several years afterwards.

The next den is inhabited by a leopard and leopardeſs, two beautiful creatures sent to his present majesty by the dey of Algiers, and presented by the late Algerine ambassador.

The next beast that is shewn is a young leopard, named Sir Robert, which was brought from Tripoly by capt. Birch, and presented to the late king. This is a most beautiful creature, of a shining yellow colour intermixed with bright spots.

In the next den is Miss Lucy, a panther, from Buenos Ayres. She is a most beautiful creature, her coat being of a shining yellow colour, decorated with great variety of round black spots, each enclosed in a compartment of an hexagonal form. Though Miss Lucy is pretty in appearance, she has some sly, mischievous tricks. She is surly even to the keepers, and very lately tore a woman's arm in a terrible manner, who attempted to be familiar with her. This we mention as a caution to others.

You are next shewn Cleone, a young lioness from the coast of Barbary, which is very tame, and full of play. This creature is esteemed very beautiful, her coat being of a cream colour, with brown spots. She was presented to the present queen by the earl of Bute.

There was formerly shewn here a black bear, brought from New-York by captain Lee, and presented to the duke of York, who gave it to his majesty. This creature was very docile, and would open the door of his den, and do several other feats at the word of command; but he was not so droll and dexterous as the Maryland bear; for that creature would shew you the humours of the beggars on Tower-hill, would make the side steps in the Prussian exercise, and usually closed his entertainment with a fine boarding-school courtesy.

The next thing shewn you is a capuchin monkey, which is all that now remains of the famous school of apes, with which the public has been so often entertained. Besides the creature above mentioned, this school originally consisted of two Egyptian night-walkers, and two apes from Turkey. Of the largest of these creatures they used to tell abundance of very surprising stories; and indeed these sort of animals are capable of such variety of droll imitations of human actions, that their whimsical tricks, were they to be re-membred, would fill a volume. The male Egyptian having one day broke his chain, in the twinkling of an eye mounted to the top of one of the offices, and there set his keepers at defiance.

When they prepared to set ladders to attack him by storm, he played the tiles about their heads with such dexterity, strength, and nimbleness, that he fairly beat them off; when they attempted to surprise him by stratagem, he was no less vigilant than before he had been active, and discovered as much sagacity in defeating their plots, as he had shewn courage in opposing their attacks.

Finding him neither to be overcome by force or stratagem, they had recourse to milder methods, and thought to entice him down by feasting his companions openly in his sight; but that too failed of success. He seemed to divert himself much, by the chattering he made, in baffling all the arts they could devise to catch him; and at length, after untiring almost all the place, and laughing as long as he thought proper at those that thought themselves wiser than himself, he came down of his own accord, and retired to his own apartment.

But what surprized, and indeed infinitely delighted the keeper, was an amour he had with a favourite female of his own species, by whom, after more than twenty years cohabitation, he at length had issue. The little ape she brought forth was esteemed the greatest curiosity the kingdom ever produced; these animals having never been known to breed in these cold regions before.

Nobody suspected the pregnancy of the dam till she had brought forth the young one, which she nursed with the same tenderness as mothers do infants, and much in the same manner. She carried it in her arms and sometimes on her back, and danced it round the room with much drollery; but what is most remarkable is, that there was a dry nurse in the same room, who was as fond of it as the dam. This old creature that used to run loose about the room, one day took it upon her back and ran away with it. She mounted the ridge of the dens, and when she thought she had it safe to herself, she seemed so highly pleased, that the keepers by her antics were afraid she would have dropped it; but having recovered it from her without any hurt, they ever after chained her up. Sometimes the dam and she quarrelled about the nursery.

A gentleman observing the particular tenderness of these animals, cried out one day, "We are certainly all in an error, and have been wrong from the beginning; these are the rational, and we are the apes. Is it no so, Mr. keeper?"

The next beast shewn is Helen, a lioness from the coast of Barbary. She still remains in the cage which brought her over, there being no den empty, though three new dens have been lately built.

The next curiosity you see is a Muscovy cat, sent from the dey of Algiers, and presented to his majesty by the late Algerine ambassador. This creature, which is beautifully spotted, is made very long in the back, head and tail, somewhat like a ferret.

You

You are next shewn Miss Nancy, a fine large tygres from the coast of Guinea, which was presented to his late majesty by captain Scott. She is a fine beast but does not seem to have the most amiable disposition.

After this you are shewn an eagle of the Sun, taken in a French prize by admiral Boscawen, and by him presented to his late majesty. This bird is supposed to soar the highest of all the feathered tribe; and is able to look steadfastly at the sun, even in his most refulgent splendor; whence it obtained the name by which that species of eagles is distinguished. Here you are also shewn a brown eagle, which was brought from Philadelphia by captain Fitzroy, who presented it to king George the second.

The eagle is accounted the king of birds, as the lion is the king of beasts; because of all the subordinations of their respective species, they have the superiority in point of fierceness and power to overcome and destroy; for though there are of each kind others of far greater strength; as the bull for instance in one species, and the ostrich in the other; yet nature has withheld from these the weapons of destruction, or the agility to use them, which she has, for wise purposes unknown to us, bestowed upon the others; and though the dominion is frequently disputed in the wilderness and forest, and sometimes the lion is vanquished by the tyger, and the eagle by the vulture; yet nature has sufficiently confirmed their respective dignities by this, that no beast, though ever so fierce, and made ravenous by hunger, will attack the lion for prey, nor any bird the eagle; an observation that has escaped the generality of writers on this subject.—

The eagle is generally of a dark brown colour, has a large hooked bill, and vast talons, and has such strength, that it has been confidently affirmed by persons of undoubted credit, that they have been known to carry infants to their young, when they have failed of other food. An instance whereof happened, as Sir Robert Sibbald reports, while he was in the Orkney Isles; for a woman there, being at harvest work, and leaving her child, about a year old, at some distance from her, an eagle in search of prey espied it, seized it in his talons, and carried it to his nest upon a neighbouring rock; which some fishermen from the shore accidentally observing, pursued and attacked the eagle and brought off the infant yet alive.—

Lambs, hares, fawns, pheasants, and even kids, are the ordinary food with which these birds bring up their young; and in the remote parts of France, if we may credit the following story, a gentleman who happens to have an eagle's nest or two on his estate, thinks them equivalent to a good farm's rent.

The story we have from a gentleman lately arrived from his travels, who says, that while he was in the neighbourhood of Mende, an officer of distinction invited him and some other travellers to pass a few days at his country seat, where they were all entertained in the politest manner. "At the first collation he gave us, (says he,) we observed with some surprize, that all the wild

"fowl that were brought to table wanted either a head, a wing, a leg, or some other part, which occasioned our gentlemen to say very pleasantly, that we must pardon the voraciousness of his caterer, who was such a brute, as always to be the first that tasted what he had provided."

It is remarked by historians, that the eagles shed their feathers every year, as the hart does his horns, and the serpent his skin; and that they live to an exceeding great age. The benedictine monks of the abbey of St. Bertin, at St. Omer's, have an eagle now living, which they report to be three hundred years old.

The next animal shewn is a Raccoon from the coast of Guinea, which is small, but much more beautiful than those brought from America. This creature lives on the sea-sands, and chiefly on shell-fish, which it takes in a very safe and dexterous manner; for whenever the fish opens its shell to receive either air or nutriment, this creature, we are told, puts a small pebble in, so that the shell may not close again, and then picks out the fish with its claws.

Near to this is a tygres-cat, brought from Bombay by captain Fletcher, and presented to his present majesty. It is a beautiful creature, much larger than the largest boar-cat, delightfully coloured, and fierce beyond imagination.

The last animal shewn is a large Hyena, a fierce creature, and said to be endued with great subtilty; but the noise he makes alarms travellers, and gives them notice to avoid the danger. Yet to those who are unacquainted with them, this noise may have a contrary effect; for they so perfectly imitate the human voice by a sort of moan and groan which they make, that a stranger might easily mistake it for the voice of a human creature in extreme torture.

Some writers affirm that the Hyena will dig human bodies out of their graves, but perhaps this is only when pressed by the severity of hunger. He naturally limps upon one of his hind legs, notwithstanding which imperfection he is tolerably swift; his neck is remarkably stiff, so that in looking behind, or snatching at any thing obliquely, he is obliged to move his whole body in the same manner as the hog, or the badger. He is of a dun colour, inclining to be reddish with some streaks of a dark brown; and the hair upon his neck is near a span long, and often set up like the bristles of a hog.

We are unwilling to quit this subject, without lamenting the loss of a fine large Ostrich, which lately died here, and of whom we shall give some account. This creature was sent as a present to his late majesty by the dey of Tunis. His shape and colour was not very unlike that of a turkey cock breed, only greyer; but the size vastly bigger; being formerly accounted the largest bird in the world; but later discoveries have proved the contrary. Its legs were as much as a man could well grasp, and very long, as was the neck, of which it had great command, carrying it as erect and stately as the swan does, so that when it walked, its bill was higher than the tallest man's head. Its bulk may be judged of by its eggs, of which she had lain fourteen since she came to England,

England, several of which are now to be seen, each weighing upwards of five pounds, and when first laid weighed above six.

It had a pretty large warm room to live in, which was often cleaned, and the straw therein shifted, otherwise it would have died sooner; for the climate of this country seems by no means fitted to its tender nature, tho' by its large bones, and vast bulk, it appeared to be very strong. There was some time ago a couple of these birds, but one died before the other, by swallowing a large nail that stopt its passage.

The vulgar error, that the ostrich can digest iron, has been long since exploded: for in the year 1659, the Morocco ambassador to the states general, among other rarities, having brought over to Holland an ostrich, as a present, it died at Amsterdam in a few days, by swallowing iron nails, which the populace threw to it, upon a presumption that it could digest them like other food; but the ostrich being opened, about eighty nails were found entire in its stomach.

All the creatures that are here shewn are regularly fed with food proper for them, and attended with the greatest care. This takes off much of their savage nature, and makes them tame and submissive, and perhaps contributed not a little to disappoint the expectations of king James I. when he made trial of the fierce nature of a lion; for that prince having ordered a lion to be put out of his den, and a bear to be put to him; the lion refused to attack the bear; they tried another, and at length two together, but in vain; the lions discovered plain symptoms of fear, by making to their dens: such were the effects of indolence and high feeding, upon animals the most remarkable of any for courage and ferocity.

Account of the spoils of the SPANISH ARMADA.

HAVING entered the great gate of the Tower, one of the warders will attend you, and carry you in a regular order to several places where the curiosities are shewn; the first of which is situated to the southward of the White Tower, and in it are repositied the spoils of the Invincible Armada, as it was stiled by Philip II. of Spain, in order to perpetuate to latest posterity, the memory of that signal victory obtained by the English, over the whole naval power of Spain, which will ever make the reign of queen Elizabeth glorious in the British annals.

This Armada, when it rendezvoused in the Groyne, under the command of the duke of Medina Sidonia, consisted of 132 ships, including transports, on board of which were embarked 19290 soldiers, 8350 sailors, 2080 gally slaves, and 2630 pieces of cannon, which at that time of day, when ships of 1200 tons carried hardly sixty pieces of ordnance, was a prodigious force.

On the twenty-first of July 1588, this formidable fleet appeared off Plymouth, and was met there by the English under the command of lord Effingham, lord high admiral; Drake, Hawkins, and Forbisher; when both fleets immediately formed the line of battle.

The van of the Spanish fleet was led by Alphonso de Levya; the duke of Medina commanded the center; and Juan Martinez de Ricaldo in the rear.

The lord high admiral of England in his own ship, called the Ark Royal, seconded by the rest of his squadron, fell upon Levya's division, and a terrible engagement ensued; but Drake, Hawkins, and Forbisher, mutually supporting each other where the danger was greatest, and taking the advantage of the enemy where they observed them weakest, put their rear into disorder, and forced them upon the center, which occasioned some confusion; but night coming on, obliged both parties to lie by; and the English being ill provided with ammunition and stores, were in no haste to renew the engagement; well knowing that every day would weaken their adversaries, and increase their own strength.

Accordingly, the very night after the first engagement, one of the ships of the line, by some accident or other, blew up, and the fire from her communicating itself to the ship whereof Don Pedro, de Valdez was captain, she fell an easy prize to admiral Drake, who sent her into Dartmouth. This was looked upon as a favourable omen of a compleat victory.

Two whole days, however, were spent in repairing the damages sustained on both sides, in which time the English were reinforced from the neighbouring forts, with men, ammunition and ships, which enabled them on the twenty-third, after some time spent in striving to gain the wind, to fight the enemy on more equal terms than in the preceding engagement, and having gained their point, fell upon Ricaldo's squadron with their whole force, and would certainly have destroyed it, had not the Spanish admiral made a most vigorous defence.

The fight then became general, and the English managed their ships with so much ease and dexterity, that the unweildy Spaniards, who lay like hulks in a dead calm, could make but little use of their superior strength, orders having been given by the English commander in chief, to avoid by all means a close engagement; by which, as the enemy's ships were full of men, a great slaughter was made of them without suffering in return any considerable loss.

In this manner, a sort of running fight was maintained for two days, with no decisive advantage on either side, except what arose from the disproportion of the numbers slain.

It will not be improper to observe, that according to the original plan of this invasion, the Spanish admiral was to have been joined in the British channel by the duke of Parma, with a body of thirty thousand land forces from the Spanish Netherlands; but seeing no appearance of their arrival, he had dispatch'd express after express to hasten their embarkation; and at length set sail himself to the streights of Calais to facilitate their junction.

This motion had been foreseen, and a strong squadron of forty sail under lord Henry Seymour, and Sir William Winter, were properly stationed, as well to block up the ports from whence those succours were to embark, as to watch the future motions of the Spanish admiral.

This

This was a noble stroke of policy, and was soon followed by another that ruin'd their whole project, and put an end to the great conformation, that had overspread the whole nation on the first appearance of so prodigious a naval force.

As soon as the lord high admiral discovered what course the Spaniards had steered, a council of war was immediately called, wherein it was resolved not to lose a moment in pursuing them; on this occasion admiral Drake, whose presence of mind never failed him on the most pressing emergencies, bethought himself of an expedient to distress the enemy, without risking the queen's ships in so unequal a conflict.

Having communicated his scheme to the commander in chief, it was resolved to put it in execution, and the rather as the contrivance was new, and consequently unsuspected.

Hereupon, eight old and shattered ships were hastily fitted up, and filled with all sorts of combustibles; and when the fleet came up with the enemy, who lay at anchor off Calais waiting for the duke of Parma, those ships were secretly dispatched in the night, with proper instructions to their respective captains, to grapple at proper distances, where the enemy were closest in the line, observing always to keep the wind; and when their ships were thus properly stationed, to set them on fire, and then bring off their men.

This was executed under the direction of the captains Prowse and Young, with all imaginable success; for while the Spaniards, thinking themselves surprised, were preparing for an unexpected attack, the captains of the fire-ships did their business, and in little more than an hour, the whole ocean seemed on fire, as if to devour what she could not swallow up, of that presumptuous Armada, which had braved the majesty of heaven, been blessed by the pope, and pronounced invincible.

Now nothing but horror, confusion, and hurry ensued; some were on fire, some fell foul of others, some cut their cables, and drove on shore; and had it not been for the calmness of the duke of Medina, their whole fleet had that night perished with their hopes: but this nobleman seeing the danger, and penetrating the cause, ordered his fleet to separate, every one shifting for himself, and to rendezvous next morning at Graveling: though these were the safest orders that could have been issued in the present dilemma, yet the English reaped from the consequences all the advantage they could have wished: it furnished them with an opportunity of attacking their huge ships singly, with what force they thought proper; and of coming to a general engagement, before the Spaniards were recovered from the dreadful panic with which they were struck.

Drake and Forbisher, experienced sea-officers as ever the world produced, well knew how to improve this critical turn of fortune in their favour, and resolutely attacked the duke of Medina's own squadron before it could be half formed, and made terrible havock, while the other commanders were as vigilant in seeking out the scattered remains of Leyva's and Ricaldo's: in a word, the sea seem'd to be covered with wrecks; and the flower of the English nobility, who had waited on the shore for the event of this engagement, seeing all fears over from the Spaniards landing, flocked on board the ships, which were now increased to the number of 150 sail, to be sharers in the glory of delivering their country from slavery and papal tyranny.

In vain did the duke of Medina, in this lamentable distress, endeavour to regain the British channel; winds, as well as waves, fought against him, and drove him on the coast of Zealand, where he must have perished without any other enemies than tides, shelves, rocks, and sands, had not providence reserved him to experience still farther misfortunes.

The English, well knowing that they must inevitably share in one common destruction if they pursued, prudently gave over the chase; and the duke having now no other views than those of self-preservation, (the wind chopping about in the very instant of his greatest danger) called a council of war, in which it was resolved to sail for Spain by the northern passage.

Having taken this resolution, they weighed anchor, but a storm arose that crossed their hopes for a while, and left them once more at the mercy of the English, who judging of their design, pursued them beyond the Firth of Edinburgh, though with no other advantage than that of weakening their crippled ships still more, and thereby exposing them to the fury of the first tempest that happened, which afterwards proved their total destruction.

In the several engagements on the British coast, fifteen of their stoutest ships, besides transports, were either destroyed or taken: on the coast of Ireland some were sunk, some dashed to pieces against the rocks, some run on sands, and some were burnt by the Spaniards themselves.

Between the rivers of Lochfoille and Lochswille, on the north coast, nine were stranded, and the crews forced to seek for succour among the wild Irish. In the bay of Calbeggy, three more run upon rocks, and most of the men perished.

In the bay of Barreys, a large ship of 1000 tons, and fifty four fine brass cannon, was sunk, and all on board perished, except sixteen, who, by their apparel, seemed persons of great distinction. On the coast of Thomond two ships more perished, one whereof they fired; the other was of St. Sebastiana, and had 300 men on board, 240 of whom were drowned. Before Sir Tirlogh O'Brien's house, another great ship was lost, supposed to be a Galleas.

In a word, from the twenty-first of July, when this vaunting Armada was first beaten by the English, until the tenth of September following, when the shattered remains of it passed the Irish coast, it appears that it had never had one good day or night; so that of 132 ships that arrived in the British channel, scarce 70 of them returned home again, and of 30,000 souls on board, upwards of 20,000 were either killed, or drowned, or remained prisoners in England.—Such was the fate of a fleet which had been denominated and thought Invincible!

The following is a catalogue of the reliques that are preserved here of this memorable victory, so glorious for our country, together with some other curiosities of the like kind.

1. The common soldiers pikes 18 feet long, pointed with long sharp spikes, and shod with iron, which were designed to keep off the horse, to facilitate the landing of the infantry.

2. The Spanish officers lances, finely engraven; these were formerly gilt, but the gilding is now almost worn off with cleaning. There is a story current concerning these, that when Don Pedro de Valdez, already mentioned, passed his examination before lord Burleigh, he told his lordship, that those fine polished lances were put on board to bleed the English with; to which that nobleman replied jokingly, that, if he were not mistaken, the English had performed that operation better, on their good friends the Spaniards, with worse instruments.

3. The Spanish ranceurs, made in different forms, which were intended either to kill the men on horseback, or pull them off their horses. At the back is a spike, with which they tell you, they were to pick the roast beef out of the Englishmen's teeth. On one of them is a piece of silver coin, which they intended to make current: on it are three heads, supposed to be the pope's, Philip II's and queen Mary's.

This is a curiosity that most Spaniards come to see.

4. An uncommon piece of arms, being a pistol in a shield, so contrived as to fire the pistol, and cover the body at the same time with the shield. It is to be fired by a match-lock, and the sight of the enemy is to be taken through a little grate in the shield, which is pistol proof.

5. A small train of ten pieces of pretty little cannon, neatly mounted on proper carriages, being a present from the foundery of London to king Charles I. when a child, to practise the art of gunnery with. These, though no part of the Spanish spoils, are nevertheless a great curiosity.

6. The banner, with a crucifix upon it, which was to have been carried before the Spanish general. On it is engraved the pope's benediction before the Spanish fleet sailed: for the pope came to the water side, and on seeing the fleet, blessed it, and, as has been said, filed it INVINCIBLE.

7. Danish and Saxon clubs, which weapons those people jointly are said to have used in the conquest of England; and are, perhaps, curiosities of the greatest antiquity of any in the Tower, having lain there 850 years. The warders call them the Women's Weapons, because, say they, the British women made prize of them, when in one night they all conspired together, and cut the throats of 35,000 Danes, the greatest piece of secrecy the English women ever kept, for which they have ever since been honoured with the right hand of the man, and the upper end of the table. Indeed in 1002, a prodigious slaughter was made of the Danes, on the feast of St. Brice, not by the secret conspiracy of the women alone, but by the private orders of Ethelred II. who commanded his officers on that day to extirpate the whole race of the Danes out of his dominions, at once, sparing neither man, woman nor child; which orders were so punctually obeyed, that only about sixteen who got on board a ship escaped; but these alarming their countrymen, they afterwards returned, and severely revenged the death of their countrymen.

8. The Spanish cravats, as they are called; these are engines of torture, made of iron, and put on board to lock together the feet, arms and heads of English hereticks.

9. Spanish bilboes, made of iron likewise, to yoke the English prisoners two and two.

10. Spanish shot, which are of four sorts; spike-shot, star-shot, chain-shot, and link-shot, all admirably contrived, as well for the destruction of the masts and rigging of ships, as for sweeping the decks of their men. But some attribute the invention of these to admiral Drake, to be employed against the Spaniards.

11. Spanish spadas poisoned at the points, so that if a man received but ever so slight a wound with one of those, certain death was the consequence.

12. Spanish halberts, or spears, some whereof are curiously engraven, and inlaid with gold.

13. The axe, with which queen Anne Boleyn (mother of queen Elizabeth) was beheaded. This was performed May 19, 1536, a little before noon, by an executioner sent for on purpose from Calais. At the time of her death she was not 30 years of age, and fell a sacrifice to the jealousy, or rather the caprice of Henry VIII. to whom she was lawfully married. The earl of Essex (queen Elizabeth's favourite) was likewise beheaded with the same axe.

14. A Spanish poll-axe, used in boarding of ships.

15. Thumb screws, of which there were several chests full on board the Spanish fleet. The use they were intended for is said to have been to extort confession from the English where their money was hid, had that cruel people prevailed. Certain it is, that after the defeat, the whole conversation of the court turned upon the discoveries made by the Spanish prisoners of the racks, the wheels, and the whips of wire, with which they were to scourge the English of every rank and age, and of both sexes. The most noted hereticks were to be put to death; those that survived were to be branded on the forehead with a hot iron; and the whole form of government both in church and state was to be overturned.

16. The Spanish morning-star; a destructive engine resembling the figure of a star, of which there were many thousands on board, and all of them with poisoned points: and were designed to strike at the enemy as they came on board in case of a close attack.

17. The Spanish general's halbert, covered with velvet. All the nails of this weapon are double gilt with gold: and on its top is the pope's head, curiously engraven.

18. A Spanish battle-axe, so contrived as to strike four holes in a man's skull at once; and has besides a pistol in its handle with a match lock.

19. King Henry the VIII's walking-staff, which has three match-lock pistols in it, with coverings to keep the charges dry. With this staff the warders tell you, the king walked round the city sometimes; to see that the constables did their duty; and one night as he was walking near the bridge-foot, the constable stopt him to know what he did with such an unlucky weapon at that time of the night; upon which the king struck him; but the constable calling the watchmen to his assistance, his majesty was apprehended and carried to the Poultry-Compter, where he lay confined till morning, without either fire or candle: when the keeper was informed of the rank of his prisoner, he dispatched a messenger to the constable, who came trembling with fear, expecting nothing less than to be hanged, drawn and quartered; but instead of that, the king applauded his resolution in honestly doing his duty, and made him a handsome present. At the same time, he settled upon St. Magnus parish an annual grant of 23*l*. and a mark; and made a provision for furnishing 30 chaldron of coals, and a large allowance of bread annually for ever, toward the comfortable relief of his fellow prisoners and their successors, which is paid them to this day, if the account given by the wardens may be relied on.

20. A large wooden cannon called Policy, because, (say your guides,) when Henry VIII. besieged Bologne, the roads being impassable for heavy cannon, he caused a number of these wooden ones to be made and mounted on proper batteries before the town, as if real cannon, which so terrified the French commandant, that when he beheld a formidable train, as he thought just ready to play, he gave up the town without firing a shot.—The truth is, the duke of Suffolk, who commanded at this siege under the king, soon made himself master of the lower town; but it was not till seven weeks afterwards that the upper town capitulated, in which time the English sustained great loss in possessing themselves of the Braye; after which springing some mines with good success, and the garrison losing Philip Corse, their best officer, at length surrendered on honourable terms. The lower town was taken July 25, 1544, and the upper town surrendered September 14, in the same year.

21. The last thing they shew of these memorable spoils, is the Spanish general's shield, not worn by, but carried before him as an ensign of honour. On it are depicted, in most curious workmanship, the labours of Hercules, and other expressive allegories, which seem to throw a shade upon the boasted skill of modern artists. The date is 1370, near 100 years before the art of printing was known in England.

The inscription upon it is as follows in Roman characters, tolerably engraven: ADULTERIO DEIANIRA CONSPURCAN SOCCIDITVR CACVS AB HERCVL. OPPRIMITVR 1376. Alluding to the killing of Cacus by Hercules, for adultery with his wife Deianira.

22. Some weapons made with the part of a scythe fixed on a pole, which were taken from the duke of Monmouth's party from the battle of Sedgemore in the reign of James II.

23. The partisans that were carried at the funeral of king William III.

24. But what is most curious of all, is a perfect model of that most admirable machine, the idea of which was brought from Italy, by Sir Thomas Lombe, and first erected at Derby at his own expence, for making organzine or thrown silk. This ingenious gentleman made two attempts, at the hazard of his life, for the completing of this machine, which by means of a friar he at length effected; and having obtained the sanction of an act of parliament, in the year 1742, by which 14,000 pounds were granted to his majesty, to be paid to him as a reward for his eminent service in discovering and introducing the said machine, he finally completed it, and brought it into use. The following is a brief account of it, but no words can describe the beautiful structure of it.

It contains 26,586 wheels, and 97,746 movements, which work 93,726 yards of silk thread every time the water wheel goes round, which is thrice in one minute, and 318,504,960 yards in twenty-four hours. One water wheel gives motion to the rest of the wheels and movements, of which any one may be stopt seperately. One fire engine conveys warm air to every individual part of the machine, and one regulator governs the whole work. The above model will make example amends to the curious for the trouble of inspecting it.

Of the SMALL ARMORY:

A Small folding door adjoining to the east-end of the Tower-chapel, the ascent to which is by a grand stair-case of fifty easy steps, conducts the spectator to this curiosity.

On the left side of the uppermost landing-place is the work-shop, wherein are constantly employed about fourteen furbishers, in cleaning, repairing, and new-placing the arms. When you enter the armory itself, you will see, what they call a wilderness of arms, so artificially disposed, and so admirably ranged, that at one view, you behold arms for near 80,000 men, all bright and shining, and fit for service at a moment's warning; a sight that none ever beheld without astonishment, and is not to be matched perhaps in the world.

Besides those exposed to public view, there are sixteen chests shut up, each chest holding about 1200 musquets. Of the disposition of the arms, description can convey no adequate idea; but to assist the spectator to view it to advantage, and to help him to retain the remembrance of what he sees, we have given the following particulars.

The north and south walls are adorned with sixteen pilasters (on each side eight) of pikes sixteen feet long, with capitals of pistols in the Corinthian order.

At the west end, on the left hand as you enter, are two curious pyramids, composed of pistols, standing upon crowns, globes, scepters, finely carved and placed upon a pedestal five feet high. At the east or farther end, in the opposite corner, are two suits of armour, one made for Henry V. the other for Henry VI. over each of which is a semicircle of pistols; between these is represented the figure of an organ, the large pipes composed of brass blunder-busses, the small of pistols; on one side of this figure is the representation of a fiery serpent, the head and tail of carved ed work, and the body of pistols, winding round in the form of a snake; and on the other a hydra, or seven headed monster, whose heads are very artificially combined by links of pistols.

The inter-columns which compose the wilderness, round which you are carried by your guides, are,

1. Some arms taken at Bath in the year 1715. These are distinguished from all others in the Tower, by having what they call dog-locks, which kind of locks have a ketch to secure them from going off at a half cock.

2. Bayonets and pistols put up in the form of half moons and fans with the imitation of a target in the center, made up of bayonet-blades: these bayonets, of which you will observe several other fans composed, are of the first invention, having plug-handles, which go into the muzzle of a gun, instead of over it, and thereby prevent the firing of the piece without shooting away the bayonet. These were invented at Bayonne in Spain, from whence they take their name.

3. Brass blunderbusses for sea-service, with capitals of pistols over them; the waves of the sea are here represented in old fashion bayonets.

4. Bayonets and sword-bayonets, in the form of half-moons and fans, and set in scollop-shells finely carved: the sword bayonet is made like the old bayonet with a plug handle, only different from it by being of a greater length.

5. The rising sun irradiated with rays of pistols set in a chequered frame of marine hangers of a peculiar make, having brass handles, and the form of a dog's head on their pummels.

6. Four beautiful twisted pillars, made with pistols up to the top, which is about twenty-two feet high, and placed at right angles, with the form of a falling star on the ceiling exactly in the middle of them, being the centre of this magnificent room.

Into this place opens the grand stair-case door, for the admission of the royal family, or any of the nobility, whose curiosity may lead them to view the armory; opposite to which opens another door into the balcony, that affords a fine prospect of the parade, the governor's house, the surveyor-general's, store-keepers, and the other general officers houses in the Tower.

This grand entrance has been newly ornamented; the capitals, irradiations, and heads of Julius and Augustus Cæsar, are all finely gilt; and the whole armory neatly cleaned and painted, and newly fitted up in a most elegant manner.

7. The form of a pair of large folding-gates, made of serjeants halberts of antique form.

8. Horsemen's carbines, blunderbusses, and pistols, hanging very artificially in furbelows and flounces.

9. Medusa's head, commonly called the witch of Endor, within three regular ellipses of pistols, with snakes represented stinging her. The features are finely carved, and the whole figure contrived with curious art.—This figure is the last on the north side.

10. The figure of a hydra, or seven-headed monster, very curiously wreathed.

11. Facing the east wall, as you turn round, is a grand figure of a lofty organ, ten ranges high, in which are contained upwards of 2000 pair of pistols.

12. On the south-side, as you return, the first figure that attracts attention, is that of Jupiter riding in a fiery chariot drawn by eagles, as if in the clouds, holding a thunder-bolt in his left hand, and over his head is a rainbow: this figure is finely carved, and decorated with bayonets.

13. King Henry V. the greatest conqueror in his time.

14. King Henry VI. his son.

✧ The figures on this side answer pretty nearly to those on the others; and therefore need no farther description till you come again to the centre; where, on each side the door leading to the balcony, you will see,

15. A fine representation, in carved work, of the star and garter, thistle, rose and crown, ornamented with pistols, &c. and very elegantly enriched with birds and other creatures.

16. The arms taken from Sir William Perkins, Sir John Friend, Charnock, and others concerned in the assassination plot, in 1696, among which they shew the very blunderbuss with which they intended to shoot king William near Turnham Green, in his way to Hampton-Court; also the carbine with which Charnock undertook to shoot that monarch as he rode a hunting.

17. Lastly, you are shewn the Highlander's arms, taken in 1715, particularly the earl of Mar's fine piece, exquisitely wrought, and inlaid with mother of pearl; also a Highland broadsword, with which a Highlander struck general Evans over the head, and at one blow cut him thro' his hat, wig, and iron scull cap; on which that general is said to have shot him dead; but others say he was taken prisoner, and generously forgiven for his bravery. Here is also the sword of justice (having a sharp point) the sword of mercy (having a blunt point) carried before the pretender when proclaimed in Scotland 1715; some of the Highlander's pistols, the barrels and stocks being all iron; also a Highlander's loughabor ax, with which it is said colonel Gardener was killed at the battle of Preston-Pans.

A curious spectator will discover a thousand peculiarities in the disposition of so vast a variety of arms, which no description can reach; and therefore it is fit that every one who has a taste for the admirable combinations of art, should gratify that darling passion with the sight of a curiosity which is not equalled by any of its kind in the universe.

Account of the Royal TRAIN of ARTILLERY.

UNDER the small armory, on a ground floor of equal dimensions, is the royal train of artillery, which one cannot view without a kind of awful dread. To see so many and such various engines of destruction, before whose dreadful thunder, churches, palaces, pompous edifices, the noblest works of human genius, fall together in one common and undistinguished ruin; one cannot reflect upon this, without wishing that the horrible invention had still lain like a false conception conception in the womb of nature, never to have been ripened into birth.

At your entrance you are shewn two copper cannon, three pounders, on wheels, which were taken from the gate of the governor's house at Quebec.

You are then shewn two mortars, and upwards of twenty fine pieces of cannon, lately taken from the French at Cherbourg. Their description, date, and weight, are as follows:

Two MORTARS, both inscriptions alike.

Date when made.	Weight.
1684	2840

Kelleri Helvetii fecit Duaci.

"Kellerius Helvetius made it at Douay."

Non Solis radios, sed Jovis fulmina.

"Not the rays of the sun, but Jupiter's thunder"

The CANNON.

1709	Hecube.	Hecuba	4090
------	----------------	---------------	------

Inf. Ultima Ratio Regum Louis Charles de Bourbon, Comte D'Eu, Due Dumale.

The ultimate reason of kings, Louis Charles of Bourbon, earl D'Eu, duke of Dumale.

Pluribus nec impar. Beren. Donicourt fec.

A match for many. Berenger Donicourt maker.

1739	Nitrocris.	The Splendor; spiked up.	4080
------	-------------------	---------------------------------	------

Inscription as the former.

1730	L'Emerillon.	The Merlin.	5320
------	---------------------	--------------------	------

1748	Le Temeraire.	The Rash	5980
------	----------------------	-----------------	------

1748	Auguste.	The Augustus; spiked up.	5770
------	-----------------	---------------------------------	------

1748	Antonin.	The Anthony; spiked up.	5740
------	-----------------	--------------------------------	------

1748	L'Insensible.	The Insensible; spiked.	5660
------	----------------------	--------------------------------	------

1741	Le Malefaisant.	The Mischievous,
------	------------------------	-------------------------	--

	Spiked up.	5500
--	-------------------	------

1750	Le Vanqueur.	The conqueror; sp.	5670
------	---------------------	---------------------------	------

1732	Le Juste.	The Just; spiked up.	5490
------	------------------	-----------------------------	------

1730	La Divinereffe.	The conjuror.	4000
------	------------------------	----------------------	------

1745	L'Imperieuse.	The Imperious; spik.	4160
------	----------------------	-----------------------------	------

1744	La Furieuse.	The Furious.	4160
------	---------------------	---------------------	------

1744	La Violente.	The violent; spiked.	4150
------	---------------------	-----------------------------	------

1719	La Sage.	The Wife.	4346
------	-----------------	------------------	------

1720	La Moresque.	The Blackmore.	3080
------	---------------------	-----------------------	------

1751	La Diligence.	The Diligence spiked.	3960
------	----------------------	------------------------------	------

1751	La Laborieux.	The Laborious; spik.	3320
------	----------------------	-----------------------------	------

1751	Le Renomme.	The renown; spiked.	3367
------	--------------------	----------------------------	------

1742	Le Foudroyant.	The dreadful; spi.	3310
------	-----------------------	---------------------------	------

1742	L'Ulysse	The Ulysses.	2353
------	-----------------	---------------------	------

2. Two large pieces of cannon employed by admiral Vernon before Carthage; they have each a large scale driven out of their muzzles by balls from the castle of Bocca Chica.

3. Two carved pieces, of excellent workmanship, presented by the city of London to the young duke of Gloucester, queen Anne's son, to teach him the military art.

4. Four small mortars in miniature, for throwing hand-granadoes; the invention of colonel Brown. They are fired with a lock like a common gun; but have not been introduced into practice.

5. Two fine brass cannon taken from the walls of Vigo by the late lord Cobham, in 1704. Their breeches represent lions couchant, with the effigy of St. Barbara, to whom they were dedicated.

6. A petard for the bursting open the gates of cities or castles.

7. A large train of fine brass battering cannon, 24 pounders never yet used.

9

8. A parcel of cannon of a new invention, from 6 to 24 pounders. Their superior excellence consists first, in their lightness; the 24 pounders weighing not quite 1700 weight, whereas formerly they weighed 5000, the rest are in proportion; and 2dly, in the contrivance for levelling them, which is by a screw, instead of beds and coins. This new method is more expeditious, and saves two men to a gun, and is said to be the invention of his late royal highness the duke of Cumberland.

9. Brass mortars 13 inches diameter, which throw a shell of 300 weight; with a number of lesser mortars and shells in proportion.

10. A carcase, which they fill at sieges with pitch, tar, and other combustibles, to set towns on fire; it is thrown out of an 18 inch mortar, and will burn two hours where it happens to fall.

11. A Spanish mortar of 12 inches diameter, taken on board a ship in the West-Indies.

12. Six French pieces of cannon, 6 pounders, taken from the rebels at the battle of Culloden, April 16, 1746. This battle lasted but 35 minutes, but the slaughter was so great, that 3000 rebels fell on the spot; it is said that lord Kingston's horse killed 10 or 12 of them a piece in the pursuit.

13. A beautiful piece of ordnance, made for king Charles I. when prince of Wales. It is finely ornamented with several emblematical devices, among which is an eagle throwing a thunderbolt in the clouds.

14. A train of field-pieces, called the galloping train, carrying a ball of one pound and half each.

15. A destroying engine that throws 30 hand granadoes at once, and is fired by a train.

16. A most curious brass cannon made for prince Henry, eldest son of king James I. the ornamenting whereof is said to have cost 200l. It is inscribed with the makers names, Thomas and Richard Pitt, 1608, who no doubt were proud of the performance, which is indeed a very exquisite one.

17. A piece with seven bores, for throwing so many bullets at once; and another with three, made as early as the reign of king Henry VIII.

18. The drum-major's chariot of state with the kettle drums placed; it is drawn by four white horses at the head of the train, when upon a march.

19. Two French field-pieces, taken at the battle of Hochstadt, in 1704, in which the French had 12,000 men killed, 5000 wounded, and more than 20,000 taken prisoners.

20. An iron cannon of the first invention, being bars of iron hammered together, and hooped from top to bottom with iron hoops, to prevent its bursting. It has no carriage, but was to be moved from place to place by means of six rings fixed to it at proper distances.

21. A huge mortar, weighing upwards of 6000 weight, and throwing a shell of 500 weight two miles: this mortar was fired so often against Namur in king William's time, that the very touch-hole is melted for want of giving it time to cool. This siege is one of the most remarkable that is recorded in history. The place was thought to be impregnable, and yet taken from a complete

C c

army

army within, headed by a marshal of France, in the sight of 100,000 men without, that came to relieve it. Lord Cutts commanded the English at the general assault of the castle, where he acquired the name of the English salamander; scarce an officer or soldier in his corps came off unhurt; the greatest part fell in the action, which was one of the most desperate that ever was fought.

22. A fine twisted brass cannon, 12 feet long, made in the reign of Edward VI. called queen Elizabeth's pocket pistol; which your guides, by way of joke, will tell you she used to wear on her right side when she rode a hunting.

23. Two brass cannon, three bores each, carrying six pounders, taken by the duke of Marlborough, at the battle of Ramillies. Here the famous French household troops, which had been boasted of as impenetrable, were totally defeated and ruined. The French had 8000 men killed, and 6000 taken prisoners.

24. A mortar that throws nine shells at a time; out of which the balloons were fired at the late fire-works.

25. A very curious brass cannon, finely carved, weight 52 c. 3 qrs. 18lb. carrying 24 pounders, with lord Ligonier's coat of arms upon it, and the names of his majesty's principal officers of ordnance.

Exclusive of those above enumerated, there are in this store room a vast number of brass cannon, all new; together with sponges, ladles, rammers, hand-spikes, wad-hooks, &c. wherewith the walls are lined all round; and under the ceiling there hangs on poles upwards of 4000 harnesses for horses, besides men's harness, drag ropes, &c. This room, which is at least 380 feet in length, 50 wide, and 24 high, has a passage in the middle 16 feet wide, on each side of which the artillery are placed. In it are 20 pillars for supporting the small armory above, all hung round with implements of war; and besides the trophies of standards, colours, &c. taken from the enemy, it is now adorned with the transparent and well-coloured pictures brought hither from the fire-works played off in the Green Park, on occasion of the late peace.

Account of the HORSE ARMORY.

IN this place the spectator is entertained with a perfect representation of those illustrious kings and heroes of our own nation, of whose gallant actions he has heard and read so much; all of them equipped and sitting on horseback, in the same bright and shining armour they were used to wear at the very time when those glorious deeds were performed, which will be for ever remembered to their honour.

In ascending the stair-case, just as you come to the landing-place, by casting your eye inward, you'll see the figure of a grenadier in his accoutrements, as if upon duty, with his piece resting upon his arm, which at first glance you will be apt to mistake for real life, so admirably has the painter discovered the excellence of his art in the representation of this sentinel.

Having entered the room, you first behold a great number of iron caps and breast-plates, most of which were in use in the last war; but the only one that used to be shewn as a curiosity, hangs upon a beam on the left-hand as you pass through the entry; it has had the lower edge of the left side carried away by a slant shot of a cannon ball; and, as an old warder used to tell the story, the rim of the man's belly that wore it, and part of his bowels, were carried away at the same time; notwithstanding which, being put under the care of a skilful surgeon, the man recovered, and lived ten years afterwards.

This story the old warder constantly told to all strangers, till his late royal highness the prince of Wales coming to see the curiosities in the Tower, and it falling to the old man's lot to attend his highness; when he came to his breast-plate, he repeated to him his accustomed tale: his royal highness listened to him with seeming pleasure, and when he had done, looking upon him with a smile; and what, friend, says he, is there so extraordinary in all this? I remember myself to have read in a book, of a soldier who had his head cleft in two so dexterously by the enemy, that one half of it fell on one shoulder, and the other half on the opposite shoulder; and yet, on his comrade's clapping the two sides nicely together again, and binding them close with his handkerchief, the man did well, drank his pot of ale at night, and scarcely recollected that ever he had been hurt.

This similar story, so seasonably applied, put all the company that attended his royal highness into a violent laugh; which so dashed the old warder that he never had courage to tell his story again, so that the poor battered breast-plate has lain unnoticed ever since.

We have already observed, that the breast-plates here laid up, were almost all in use in the late war; but were not thought necessary at first, till the want of them was felt at the battle of Dettingen, when the black musketeers of the enemy being covered with their cuirasses, (the same piece of armour with the addition of a back piece) pierced the very lines of our army, and rode up undaunted to the muzzles of our guns, till being flanked by our foot, and ill supported by their own troops, they were forced to retreat, though with an inconsiderable loss, considering their desperate attempt.

This plainly discovered the great use of breast-plates, and orders were sent to England for the immediate embarkation of all that were in the Tower fit for service. In the wars of queen Anne, there was the same omission, till the duke of Marlborough being convinced of the disadvantage his horse fought under against an enemy entrenched, as it were, in iron; sent lord Cadogan over, who went himself to the Tower, and chose out as many breast and back-plates, as he could find for his purpose; but the duke would not suffer the latter to be worn, being, as he said, an useless incumbrance; for he was sure his men would never shew their backs to the enemy.

Most of those breast-plates are musquet-proof; they are quilted on the inside, and so contrived as to cover the whole trunk of the body, and yet, by the manner of fixing them on, are very little trouble to the wearers. There are likewise to be seen here a great many curiasses taken from the French, out of a ship called the Holy Ghost, and marked Torras, which might possibly be the name of the admiral.

What has been said above is rather by way of remark than description.——When you enter the room, your conductor directs you to observe,

1. The figures of the horse and foot, on your left hand, supposed to be drawn up in military order to attend the kings on the other side of the house; these figures are as big as the life, have lately been painted, and have a very noble appearance.

2. The large tilting lance of Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk, king Henry the VIIIth's general in France.—This nobleman excelled at the then fashionable diversion of tilting, and engaging king Henry VIII. who was likewise passionately fond of that royal exercise, gave the king such a shock with his spear, that had like to have cost him his life.—The duke's valour had indeed been sufficiently tried in France, when he attended princess Mary of England on her marriage with Lewis XIIth.—On this occasion, Francis de Valois, presumptive heir to the crown of France, being willing to give some proof of his valour, caused jousts to be proclaimed; these jousts continued three days, in which 305 men at arms were answered by their defendants; of whom some were so hurt, that they died soon after. Francis had chosen the duke and marquis of Dorset two of his aids, and being hurt himself at first, desired the duke and marquis to fight at barriers, who therefore took the first place against all comers. In the mean time Francis, as was thought, intending an affront to the duke, caused a German, the strongest about the court, to be armed secretly, and to present himself: they both did well; yet the duke at last, with the but-end of his spear, struck the German till he staggered; and then the rail was let fall: having breathed a while, they renewed the fight, when the duke so mauled the German about the head, that the blood gushed out of his nose and ears, and then he was secretly conveyed away. Before this encounter, the duke had likewise unhorsed a gentleman at tilts, and hurt him prodigiously.

3. A complete suit of tilting armour, such as the kings, nobility, and gentlemen at arms, used to exercise in on horseback; at which diversion one of the kings of France is said to have been killed by a shiver of a spear striking him in the eye.—Likewise the tilting lance, the rest for the tilting lance, with the grand guard and the flits before the eye, through which they take the sight.

4. A compleat suit of armour made for king Henry VIII. when he was but eighteen years of age, rough from the hammer: 'tis at least six feet high, and the joints in the hands, arms, thighs, knees, and feet, play like the joints of a rattlesnake, and are moved with all the facility imaginable.—The method of learning the exercise of tilting was upon wooden horses set on castors, which, by the sway of the body, could be moved every way; so that by frequent practice the rider could shift, parry, strike, unhorse, and recover with surprising dexterity. Some of the horses in this armory had undoubtedly been made use of for this purpose; and it is but lately that the castors have been taken from their feet.

5. A little suit of armour made for king Charles II. when he was prince of Wales, and about seven or eight years of age, with a piece of armour for his horse's head; the whole most curiously wrought and inlaid with silver.

6. Lord Courcy's armour, who, as the warders tell you, was grand champion in Ireland, and, as a proof, shew you the very sword he took from the champion of France, for which valiant action he and all his successors have the honour to wear their hats in the king's presence; which privilege, add they, is enjoyed by Lord Kinsale, as head of that ancient and noble family, at this day.—It is recorded indeed of this Courcy, that when a conspiracy was formed against him in Ireland, by his own servants, at the instigation of Hugh de Lacy, who was jealous of his power, though he was betrayed at his devotions, he laid thirteen of the conspirators dead at his feet before he was overpowered. He was afterwards committed prisoner to the Tower of London, and it is not unlikely that what is shewn is the very armour he brought with him to that prison.

7. Real coats of mail called brigandine jackets: They consist of small bits of steel, so artfully quilted one over another as to resist the point of a sword, or even, we imagine, a musket bullet; and yet they are so flexible, that you may bend your body in them any way, as well as in ordinary cloathing.

8. An Indian suit of armour, sent as a present to king Charles II. from the great mogul: this is indeed a great curiosity: It is made of iron quills about two inches long; finely japanned and ranged in rows, one row slipping over another very artificially; they are bound together with silk twist very strong: They are used in that country as a defence against darts and arrows poisoned or unpoisoned.

9. A neat little suit of armour, in which is a carved figure representing Richard duke of York, king Edward the IVth's youngest son, who, with his brother Edward V. were smothered in the Tower by order of Richard III. their uncle and guardian. The manner of their deaths was this: one Sir James Tyrrel, a strong resolute fellow, having a commission from the king for that purpose, and employing one Miles Forrest, a common ruffian, and John Deighton his own groom, these two wretches, by night, entered the room where the young princes, attended only by one servant, were confined, and while they slept, smothered them in their bed-cloaths. After this, Tyrrel ordered them to be buried at the stair foot, deep under ground; where their bones were found in the reign of king Charles II.

10. The armour of the great John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, who was the son, father and uncle of a king, but was never king himself. Dugdale says, that more kings and sovereign princes sprang from his loins than from any king in Christendom. He was interred with Blanch, his first wife, on the north side of the choir of the old cathedral church of St. Paul; and on his monument hung his helmet and spear; as also his his target covered with horn; which precious reliques were unfortunately consumed with that stately edifice itself, by the dreadful fire of London. The armour here shewn is seven feet high, and the sword and lance are of an enormous size.

11. The droll figure of Will Somers, who was, as the warders tell you, king Henry the VIIIth's jester.

12. A collar of torment, which, (say your conductors) used formerly to be put about the women's necks, that cuckolded their husbands, or scolded at them when they came home late.

You are next shewn the line of kings, which, to follow the order of your conductor, we must reverse the order of their chronology, and describe the last first, as

1. His late majesty king George I. in a complete suit of armour, sitting with a truncheon in his hand on a white horse, richly caparisoned, having a fine Turkey bridle gilt with gold, with a globe, crescent, and star; velvet furniture laced with gold, and gold trappings. This prince was born in 1660, came to the crown on the death of queen Anne, August 1, 1714, and died June 11, 1727, on his journey to Hanover.

2. The late king William III. dressed in the very suit of armour worn by Edward the Black prince, son of Edward III. in the famous battle of Cressy, wherein the French lost 11 princes, 18 baronets, 1200 knights, 1500 gentlemen at arms, 4000 squires, who were mounted on horseback; and 30,000 common men. He is mounted on a sorrel horse, whose furniture is green velvet embroidered with silver, and holds in his right hand a flaming sword. The battle of the Boyne, in Ireland, and the taking of Namur, are the only memorable victories of this warlike king; who was born in 1650, ascended the British throne on the abdication of king James II. his father-in-law, February 13, 1688, and died March 8, 1702, by a fall from his horse.

3. King Charles II. dressed in the armour that was worn by the champion of England at the coronation of his late majesty. There is nothing very memorable in this king's story, but his sufferings, and his restoration to the crown after twelve years banishment. He sits with a truncheon in his hand on a fine horse richly caparisoned with crimson velvet laced with gold. He was born in 1630, succeeded to the throne on the death of his father Charles I. January 30th, 1649, and died February 6, 1684.

4. King Charles I. in a rich suit of his own proper armour, gilt with gold and curiously wrought, presented to him by the city of London when he was prince of Wales; and in the same armour that was laid on the coffin at the funeral procession of the late great duke of Marlborough; on which occasion a collar of SS's was added to it, and is now round it.

The civil wars in this prince's reign, and his untimely death, afford a very melancholy story, which will never be forgotten. He was born in 1600, succeeded his father king James I. March 27, 1625, and was beheaded in sight of his own palace gates, January 30, 1649.

5. James I. of England and VIth of Scotland. By his succeeding to the throne of England, on the death of queen Elizabeth, the kingdoms of England and Scotland, which till then had been at continual wars, were united under one head. He sits on horseback with a truncheon in his right hand, dressed in a complete suit of figured armour. He was born in 1566, mounted the English throne March 24, 1603, and died March 27, 1625, after one of the most inglorious reigns of any recorded in the annals of this kingdom.

6. King Edward VI. the first protestant prince that ever reigned in England (if Henry VIII. the father of the reformation be excepted.) He is said by some to have been cut out of the belly of his mother lady Jane Seymour, but that queen lived twelve days after her delivery. The memorable acts of his reign are those of charity and beneficence. He gave to the citizens of London three hospitals: to wit, that of Christ-Church, for the maintenance and education of poor citizens children; that of Bridewell, for breeding them up to trades: and that of St. Thomas, for healing the sick and diseased. He is dressed in a most curious suit of steel armour, whereon are depicted in different compartments, a vast variety of scripture histories, alluding to battles and other memorable passages. He sits on horseback like the rest, with a truncheon in his right hand. He was born October 12, 1537, proclaimed king January 31, 1548, and died July 6, 1553.

7. King Henry VIII. in his own proper armour, being of polished steel, the foliages whereof are gilt or inlaid with gold. In his right hand he bears a sword, but whether of cruelty or mercy, will hardly, I think, admit a doubt. His reign is marked with the divorce and murder of wives, the destruction of religious houses and monasteries, and by a defiance of all laws divine and human. He was indeed an infamous villain; and yet to his vices we are in a great measure indebted for the enjoyment of the reformed religion. He was born June 28, 1491, succeeded his father Henry VII, April 22, 1509, and died January 28, 1547.

8. Henry VII. who killed Richard III. in the memorable battle of Bosworth-Field, and by marrying Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Edward IV. united the two famous houses of York and Lancaster, about whose claims to the throne a deluge of English blood had been poured forth. This prince holds likewise a sword in his hand, and sits on horseback in a complete suit of armour, finely wrought and washed with silver. He was born in 1457, crowned October 30, 1485, and died April 12, 1509.

9. Edward V. who, with his brother Richard, as has been said, was smothered in the Tower: he was proclaimed king, but never crowned; for which reason a crown is hung over his head: he is in a rich suit of armour finely decorated, and holds a lance in his right hand.

10. King Edward IV. father to the unhappy princes abovementioned: his reign is stained with blood and lust; and though he was fortunate in most of his battles, yet his victories were all at the expence of his own subjects. At the battle of Townton 36,000 English are said to have been killed; and during his reign, Guthrie says no less than 200,000 English lost their lives in the contest contest between Henry of Lancaster and this Edward of York. He was equally formed for love and war, and his gallantries with the citizens wives, amongst which was the famous Jane Shore, are still remembered with detestation. He is here distinguished by a suit of bright armour studded, and by holding in his right hand a drawn sword. He was born in 1441, began his reign March 4, 1460, and died in 1483.

11. King Henry VI. who though crowned king of France at Paris, lost all that kingdom. In his reign no less than sixteen battles were fought at home and abroad. The bloody civil wars commenced between the houses of York and Lancaster, already mentioned. The rebellion of Jack Cade, who entered London, and beheaded lord Say, happened in his reign. The famous Joan of Arc, or maid of Orleans started up also, and spread her fame through all Europe by raising the siege of Orleans. In his time also the art of printing was introduced into England. He was born in 1422, began his reign August 31, the same year (being an infant) and was murdered in the Tower by the duke of Gloucester in 1471.

12. The warlike and victorious Henry V. who by his conquests in France gained immortal glory. He caused himself to be acknowledged regent, and presumptive heir of that kingdom. With only 9000 English, he defeated 15000 French at the battle of Agincourt, where he took more prisoners than he had men in his army. Near Harfleur 15000 French were defeated by 1500 English. This prince was Sir John Falstaff's companion. He was born in 1389, began to reign March 20, 1413, and died August 31, 1422. A short reign, but full of glory.

13. Henry IV. son of the great John of Gaunt. his reign is made infamous by a bloody statute to burn heretics. He was notwithstanding valiant; but his courage was employed to secure himself on a throne to which he had but slight pretensions. Four insurrections against him were defeated, the greatest of which he quelled himself by the battle of Shrewsbury, wherein Harry Hotspur, and 10,000 rebels fell, besides as many of his own troops. He twice beat the Welsh under Owen Glendower. He was born in 1367, ascended the throne September 20, 1396, and died March 20, 1413.

14. Edward III. John of Gaunt's father, and father to Edward the Black prince, of whom we have already spoken. Besides the battle of Cressy, the ever memorable battle of Poitiers was fought by this king, at which John, king of France, was taken prisoner and brought to England, where he met David, king of Scots, a prisoner also; and these two, accompanied by the king of England and the king of Cyprus, who happened to be on his travels at the English court, were all entertained at a banquet, by a citizen of London, as hath been already mentioned in this work. David, king of Scots, was afterwards ransomed for 10,000 marks, and John, king of France, for 500,000 crowns. Edward, the Black Prince, died in 1376, to the inexpressible grief of the king and the whole nation; but his son Richard II. succeeded to the throne, whereby the famous John of Gaunt was excluded. Edward III. is represented here with a venerable old grey beard, and in a suit of plain bright armour, with two crowns on his sword, alluding to the two kingdoms France and England, of both which he was crowned king, and was the first who quartered the arms of France with his own; adding the motto, Dieu et mon Droit. He was born in 1312, called to the throne on the deposition of his father, January 25, 1326, and died June 21, 1377, after a glorious reign of fifty years.

15. Edward I. in a very curious suit of gilt armour, with this peculiarity, that the shoes thereof are of mail. He is represented with a battle-ax in his hand, perhaps to distinguish him from the rest, he being the only king in the line that had employed his arms against the Turks and Infidels, by an expedition to the Holy-Land. The warders tell you, that being there shot with a poisoned arrow, his queen who accompanied him, sucking the wound, she died, and he lived; and add, that he afterwards brought her corpse over, and buried it in Westminster-Abbey; but Camden, who reports this fact, tells it thus: "when her husband was treacherously wounded by a Moor with a poisonous dagger, and the wounds, by reason of the malignity of the poison, could not be closed, she licked them daily with her own tongue, and sucked out the venomous humour; by the power whereof he was entirely cured of his wound, and she escaped unhurt." This fact happened in 1272, the queen (Eleanor of Castile) died at Herby in Lincolnshire, November 29, 1290, being 18 years after; from whence she was carried to Westminster-Abbey, and there pompously interred by order of her husband. This warlike prince conquered Wales; asserted a right of sovereignty over Scotland; raised Baliol to the throne of that kingdom; and afterwards cited him before the parliament at Westminster to answer to a complaint made against him by the earl of Fife. He was every where victorious, and his reign is famed for acts of justice, and is one of the fairest in the English history. He was born in 1239, made the Crusade in his father's life-time, and received the news of his death, and the advancement to the crown, in his journey home. He began his reign November 16, 1272, and died of the bloody flux, July 7, 1307.

16. The first in the line though last shewn, sits William the conqueror, duke of Normandy, in a suit of plain armour. This valiant prince having with his Normans, on some pretence of right to the crown, invaded England, by one decisive battle accomplished his great design. This memorable battle was fought October 13, 1066, near Hastings in Sussex, in which king Harold, with the flower of the English nobility and best warriors, were slain. Some authors affirm, that this victory was obtained by means of the broad arrow and long bow which the Normans were in possession of, and with which the English were then utterly unacquainted, though afterwards they became such expert archers, that with the same weapons they conquered France. The glory of William's reign and of his victories, is stained by the cruel and arbitrary forest laws he enacted, and the waste and devastation he made by converting a tract of land, of more than threescore miles in circumference, into a den of wild beasts, driving

D d

the

the inhabitants out, and and filling their habitations with wolves and boars; forbidding at the same time those unhappy men, whose lands and properties he had invaded, on pain of death, to kill either deer or wild boar. He was born in 1027, was crowned October 14, 1066, and died September 9, 1087.

Over the door, as you go out of this armory, is a target, on which are engraved, by a masterly hand, the figures, of fortune, fortitude and justice; and round the room, the walls are every where lined with various old uncommon pieces of armour, such as targets, caps, horses heads, breast plates, and many other sorts, for which the very names have not descended to modern times.

Account of the JEWEL-OFFICE.

A Description of this place has already been given; nothing therefore now remains, but to give an account of the curiosities contained in it.

1. The imperial crown that all the kings of England have been crowned with since Edward the Confessor 1042. It is of gold, enriched with diamonds, rubies, emeralds, sapphires and pearls. The cap within is of purple velvet, lined with white taffaty, turned up with three rows of ermine. — They are mistaken in shewing this as the ancient imperial diadem of St. Edward; for that with the other ancient regalia of this kingdom was kept in the arched room in the cloysters of Westminster-Abbey till the grand rebellion, when in 1642 Harry Martin, by order of the then parliament, broke open the iron chest in which it was secured, took it thence, and sold it, together with the robes, sword and scepter of St. Edward. After the restoration, king Charles II. had one made like it, which is what is shewn at present.

2. The golden orb or globe, put into the king's right hand before he is crowned; and borne in his left, with the scepter in his right, upon his return into Westminster-Hall after he is crowned. It is about six inches in diameter, edged with pearl, and enriched with precious stones. On the top is an amethyst, of a violet colour, near an inch and a half in height, set upon a rich cross of gold, adorned with diamonds, pearls and precious stones. The whole height of the ball and cup is eleven inches.

3. The golden scepter, with its cross, set upon a large amethyst, of great value, garnished round with table diamonds. The handle of the scepter is plain, but the pummel is set round with rubies, emeralds, and small diamonds. The top rises into a Fleur de lis of six leaves, all enriched with precious stones, from whence issueth a mound or ball made of the amethyst already mentioned.

The scepter is a very ancient ensign of kingly power. Among the Jews, it was used as an emblem of power and royalty, and spiritually as a weapon to oppose the wicked, and protect the good. The cross is quite covered with precious stones.

4. The scepter with the dove, the emblem of peace, perched on the top of a small Jerusalem cross, finely ornamented with table diamonds and jewels of great value. This emblem was first used by Edward the Confessor, as appears by his seal. It is also marked on the seals of Henry I. Stephen, and Henry II. but omitted by Richard I. Richard II. assumed it again on his seal, and it was also used by Edward IV. and Richard III. The ancient one was sold with the rest. This now in the Tower, was made after the restoration.

A bold attempt was made in the reign of king Charles II. to carry off these ensigns of royalty, the particulars whereof are worth reciting, as it is, perhaps, the most singular enterprize that ever was undertaken. The projector of this theft was one Col. Blood, by birth a gentleman of Ireland, who, having spent his substance in following the fortune of king Charles II. while in adversity, thought himself hardly used, by being neglected when that prince was restored to his throne; and therefore, after being engaged in several very desperate, though unsuccessful plots, such as surprizing the castle of Dublin, seizing the person of the duke of Ormond, and others, he at length thought of a scheme to make himself amends, once for all, by seizing the crown, globe, scepter, and dove, and carrying them all off together; for this purpose, he put himself into a habit of a doctor of divinity, with a little band, a long false beard, a cap with ears, and all those formalities of garb belonging to that degree, except the gown, choosing rather to make use of a cloak, as most proper for his design.

Thus habited, Blood, with a woman whom he called his wife, went to see the curiosities in the Tower; and while they were viewing the regalia, the supposed Mrs. Blood, pretended to be taken suddenly ill, and desired Mr. Edwards (the keeper of the regalia) to assist her with a dram.

This being drank, she was invited to repose herself on a bed, which she did; and after a pretended recovery, took her leave, together with Blood, with many expressions of gratitude.

In a few days afterwards Blood returned, and presented Mrs. Edwards (the keeper's wife) with four pair of white gloves, in return for her civility.

This brought on an acquaintance, which being soon improved into a strict intimacy, a marriage was proposed between a son of Edwards, and a supposed daughter of colonel Blood; but Edwards's son being at sea, the pretended daughter was under no necessity of appearing.

The night before the fact was to be done, the doctor told the old man, that he had some friends at his house that wanted to see the regalia, but that they were to go out of town pretty early in the morning; and therefore hoped he would gratify them with the sight, though they might come a little before the usual hour. (Blood had engaged three accomplices, named Desborough, Kelsy and Perrot, in this enterprize) Accordingly two of them came, accompanied by the doctor, about eight in the morning, and the third held their horses that waited for them at the outer gate of the Tower ready saddled; they had no other apparatus but a wallet and a wooden mallet, which there was no great difficulty to conceal.

Upon their approach, the old man received them with great civility; and presently admitted them into his office; but as it is customary for the

Engraved for Chamberlains History of London.

Blood and his Accomplices,
Escaping after stealing the CROWN from the TOWER.

the inhabitants out, and and filling their habitations with wolves and boars; forbidding at the same time those unhappy men, whose lands and properties he had invaded, on pain of death, to kill either deer or wild boar. He was born in 1027, was crowned October 14, 1066, and died September 9, 1087.

Over the door, as you go out of this armory, is a target, on which are engraved, by a masterly hand, the figures, of fortune, fortitude and justice; and round the room, the walls are every where lined with various old uncommon pieces of armour, such as targets, caps, horses heads, breast plates, and many other sorts, for which the very names have not descended to modern times.

Account of the JEWEL-OFFICE.

A Description of this place has already been given; nothing therefore now remains, but to give an account of the curiosities contained in it.

1. The imperial crown that all the kings of England have been crowned with since Edward the Confessor 1042. It is of gold, enriched with diamonds, rubies, emeralds, sapphires and pearls. The cap within is of purple velvet, lined with white taffaty, turned up with three rows of ermine. — They are mistaken in shewing this as the ancient imperial diadem of St. Edward; for that with the other ancient regalia of this kingdom was kept in the arched room in the cloysters of Westminster-Abbey till the grand rebellion, when in 1642 Harry Martin, by order of the then parliament, broke open the iron chest in which it was secured, took it thence, and sold it, together with the robes, sword and scepter of St. Edward. After the restoration, king Charles II. had one made like it, which is what is shewn at present.

2. The golden orb or globe, put into the king's right hand before he is crowned; and borne in his left, with the scepter in his right, upon his return into Westminster-Hall after he is crowned. It is about six inches in diameter, edged with pearl, and enriched with precious stones. On the top is an amethyst, of a violet colour, near an inch and a half in height, set upon a rich cross of gold, adorned with diamonds, pearls and precious stones. The whole height of the ball and cup is eleven inches.

3. The golden scepter, with its cross, set upon a large amethyst, of great value, garnished round with table diamonds. The handle of the scepter is plain, but the pommel is set round with rubies, emeralds, and small diamonds. The top rises into a Fleur de lis of six leaves, all enriched with precious stones, from whence issueth a mound or ball made of the amethyst already mentioned.

The scepter is a very ancient ensign of kingly power. Among the Jews, it was used as an emblem of power and royalty, and spiritually as a weapon to oppose the wicked, and protect the good. The cross is quite covered with precious stones.

4. The scepter with the dove, the emblem of peace, perched on the top of a small Jerusalem cross, finely ornamented with table diamonds and jewels of great value. This emblem was first used by Edward the Confessor, as appears by his seal. It is also marked on the seals of Henry I. Stephen, and Henry II. but omitted by Richard I. Richard II. assumed it again on his seal, and it was also used by Edward IV. and Richard III. The ancient one was sold with the rest. This now in the Tower, was made after the restoration.

A bold attempt was made in the reign of king Charles II. to carry off these ensigns of royalty, the particulars whereof are worth reciting, as it is; perhaps, the most singular enterprize that ever was undertaken. The projector of this theft was one Col. Blood, by birth a gentleman of Ireland, who, having spent his substance in following the fortune of king Charles II. while in adversity, thought himself hardly used, by being neglected when that prince was restored to his throne; and therefore, after being engaged in several very desperate, though unsuccessful plots, such as surprizing the castle of Dublin, seizing the person of the duke of Ormond, and others, he at length thought of a scheme to make himself amends, once for all, by seizing the crown, globe, scepter, and dove, and carrying them all off together; for this purpose, he put himself into a habit of a doctor of divinity, with a little band, a long false beard, a cap with ears, and all those formalities of garb belonging to that degree, except the gown, choosing rather to make use of a cloak, as most proper for his design.

Thus habited, Blood, with a woman whom he called his wife, went to see the curiosities in the Tower; and while they were viewing the regalia, the supposed Mrs. Blood, pretended to be taken suddenly ill, and desired Mr. Edwards (the keeper of the regalia) to assist her with a dram.

This being drank, she was invited to repose herself on a bed, which she did, and after a pretended recovery, took her leave, together with Blood, with many expressions of gratitude.

In a few days afterwards Blood returned, and presented Mrs. Edwards (the keeper's wife) with four pair of white gloves, in return for her civility.

This brought on an acquaintance, which being soon improved into a strict intimacy, a marriage was proposed between a son of Edwards, and a supposed daughter of colonel Blood; but Edwards's son being at sea, the pretended daughter was under no necessity of appearing.

The night before the fact was to be done, the doctor told the old man, that he had some friends at his house that wanted to see the regalia, but that they were to go out of town pretty early in the morning; and therefore hoped he would gratify them with the sight, though they might come a little before the usual hour. (Blood had engaged three accomplices, named Desborough, Kelsy and Perrot, in this enterprize) Accordingly two of them came, accompanied by the doctor, about eight in the morning, and the third held their horses that waited for them at the outer gate of the Tower ready saddled; they had no other apparatus but a wallet and a wooden mallet, which there was no great difficulty to conceal.

Upon their approach, the old man received them with great civility; and presently admitted them into his office; but as it is customary for the

Engraved for Chamberlains History of London.

*Blood and his Accomplices,
Escaping after stealing the CROWN from the TOWER.*

the keeper of the regalia, when he shews them, to lock himself up in a kind of grate with open bars, that those things of high value may be seen but not soiled, the old man had no sooner opened the door of this place, but the doctor and his companions were in at his heels, and without giving him time to ask questions, silenced him, by knocking him down with the wooden mallet; they then instantly made flat the bows of the crown to make it more portable, seized the sceptre and dove, put them into the wallet together, and were preparing to make their escape, when, unfortunately for them, the old man's son, who had not been at home for ten years before, came from sea in the very instant; and being told that his father was with some friends, that would be very glad to see him, at the jewel office, he posted thither immediately, and met Blood and his companions as they were just coming out; who, instead of returning and securing him, as in good policy they should have done; they hurried away with the crown and globe, but not having time to file the sceptre, they left it behind them.

By this time old Edwards, who had not been so much hurt as the villains had apprehended, recovered his legs, and cried out murder, treason, murder.

The daughter hearing her father's cries, ran out and gave an alarm; and Blood and Perrot, making more than ordinary haste, were observed to jog each others elbows as they went, which gave reason for suspecting them.

The villains were now advanced beyond the main-guard; but the alarm being given to the warder at the draw-bridge, he put himself in a posture to stop their progress.

Blood discharged a pistol at the warder, who, though unhurt, fell to the ground through fear; by which they got safe to the little ward-house gate, where one Sill, who had been a soldier under Oliver Cromwell, stood sentinel; but though this man saw the warder, to all appearance, shot, he made no resistance to Blood and his associates, who now got over the draw-bridge, and through the outward gate upon the wharf.

Captain Beckman, who had pursued them from Edwards's house, now overtook them; on which Blood discharged his second pistol at Beckman's head; but he stooping down at the instant, the shot missed him, and he seized Blood, who had the crown under his cloak.

Notwithstanding Blood was in this situation, he struggled a long while to preserve his prize; and when it was at length wrested from him, he said, "It was a gallant attempt, how unsuccessful so ever; for it was for a crown!"

Another person seized Perrot before Blood was taken; and young Edwards observing a person that was bloody in the scuffle, was going to run him through the body; but was prevented by captain Beckman, who cried out "Hold, he is none of them."

The next thing to be done, was to confine the prisoners, and acquaint his majesty with the nature of their offence, and take directions from court how to proceed.

The result was, that the king had a fancy to examine Blood himself; and while all men thought that some new punishment would be devised to torture so daring an offender, his majesty thought proper not only to pardon him and his accomplices, but to grant Blood a pension, some say of 500*l.* a year during his life.

What the motives were, that induced his majesty to shew so much lenity to a man, who had been engaged in so many plots and conspiracies, is yet a secret, and ever must remain so; many conjectures were formed, and surmises made, but no man knew the truth.

Blood soon after died with grief, being convicted of a plot against the duke of Buckingham, who laid a heavy accusation of Scandalum Magnatum against him, by which he was like to remain a prisoner for life; though most people were of opinion, that this plot was forged against him by his enemies; and having escaped punishment for what he did do, suffered at last for what he did not do.

We have but just hinted that Blood was engaged in the plot to surprize Dublin castle, and another to seize the person of the duke of Ormond; of both which, though a little foreign to our subject, we shall give a brief account.

Upon the restoration, many English, Scots, and Irish were dissatisfied, and wanted only a head to lead them into action. Colonel Blood having declared himself of their party, was thought a proper person for that purpose; and, as nothing could be attempted in England with any probability of success, Ireland was pitched upon for the scene of rebellion.

The colonel knowing what advantage it would be to their cause, to be master of some place of strength, proposed to begin with the surprize of Dublin castle; which was accordingly to have been attempted on the twenty-ninth of May, the anniversary of the king's return, in the following manner.

Blood, with a company of resolute fellows, were, under a pretence of presenting a petition to the duke of Ormond, then lord lieutenant, to have procured admittance, and seized his person, while about fourscore chosen foot, in the habit of tradesmen, were to have waited without, and upon a certain signal to have surprized the guards.

But this plot, by the treachery of one of the conspirators, having been defeated before it was ripe, a proclamation was issued out, with a reward of five hundred pounds for the apprehension of any of the ringleaders: in consequence whereof, one Mr. Lockey, brother-in-law to Blood, was taken, tried, and executed, and Blood himself obliged to make his escape; but with a full resolution to be revenged on the duke of Ormond, by whose vigilance his views had been disappointed, and his brother-in-law hanged.

But it was not till nine years afterwards, that he durst attempt any thing upon the duke's person; when having engaged five of his old and trusty friends, on the sixth of December, 1670, being all well armed and mounted, they beset the duke's coach, as he was passing from St. James's palace, through the long street to Clarendon-house, where the duke then resided; and having knocked out the flambeaux, and secured the attendants, they forced the duke out of his coach, and had actually actually tied him behind one of their associates, (who was to have rode with him without stopping till he came to an appointed place, where they were to meet him, and consult what advantage they should make of their prisoner) when his grace's porter, being apprized of his master's danger, by a boy who concealed himself under the coach, and escaped, seasonably came to his rescue; but what is very surprising, not one of the ruffians were ever apprehended, though a thousand pounds reward was offered, till the attempt already related discovered them, and then they were all pardoned. But to return to our account of the curiosities; the other jewels shewn here are,

5. St. Edward's staff, in length four feet seven inches and an half, and three inches and three quarters in circumference, all of beaten gold, which is carried before the king at his coronation.

6. A rich salt-seller of state, in form like the square White Tower, and so exquisitely wrought, that the workmanship of modern times is in no degree equal to it. It is of gold, and used only on the king's table at the coronation.

7. The curtana, or sword of mercy, the blade 32 inches long, and near two broad, is without a point, and is borne naked before the king at his coronation, between the two swords of justice, spiritual and temporal.

8. A noble silver font, double gilt with gold, and elegantly wrought, in which the royal family are christened.

9. A large silver fountain, presented to king Charles the second, by the town of Plymouth, very curiously wrought, but far short of that already described.

10. The rich crown of state, that his majesty wears in parliament, in which is a large emerald seven inches round, the finest pearl in the world, and a ruby of prodigious value.

11. His royal highness the prince of Wales's crown. These two last named crowns, when his majesty goes to the parliament house, are carried by the keeper of the jewel-office, attended by the warders, privately in a hackney-coach to Whitehall: there they are delivered to the officers appointed to receive them, who, with some yeomen of the guard, carry them to the robing rooms, where his majesty and the prince robe themselves. The king wears his crown on his head as he sits upon the throne; but that of the prince of Wales is placed before him, to shew that he is not yet come to it. As soon as the king is disrobed, the two crowns are re-conducted to the Tower by the same persons that brought them.

12. The late queen Mary's crown, globe, and sceptre, with the diadem she wore in proceeding to her coronation with her consort the late king William.

13. An ivory sceptre with a dove on the top, made for the late king James the second's queen, whose garniture is gold, and the dove on the top gold, enamelled with white.

14. The golden spurs, and the armillas, which are bracelets for the wrists, very antique, and worn at the coronation.

15. Lastly, the ampulla, or eagle of gold, finely engraved, which holds the holy oil the kings and queens of England are anointed with; and the golden spoon that the bishop pours the oil into. These are two pieces of great antiquity. The golden eagle, including the pedestal, is about nine inches high, and the wings expand about seven inches; the whole weighs about ten ounces. The head of the eagle screws off about the middle of the neck, which is made hollow, for holding the holy oil, and when the king is anointed by the bishop, the oil is poured into the spoon out of the bird's beak.

There are in the jewel-office, besides these commonly shewn, all the crown jewels, worn by the prince and princesses at the coronations, and a vast variety of curious old plate; but what is already described is sufficient to gratify any reasonable spectator; though it must be confessed, that the eye can never be satisfied with seeing, where the objects are so admirably adapted to excite and to gratify curiosity.

Account of the MINT and its OFFICERS, and the manner of stamping money.

THE Mint is the office for coining gold, silver, and copper, and is conducted by a number of officers, whose titles and employments are as follows:

1. The Warden. The business of the warden is to receive the silver &c. from the goldsmiths, to pay for it, and to super-intend all the other persons belonging to the office.
2. The Master-Worker. He receives the silver &c. from the warden, orders it to be melted, delivers it to the moniers, and receives it back from them.
3. The Comptroller. It is this person's business to see that the money is made to a just assize, to overlook the officers; and to controul them, if the money does not prove as it ought.
4. The Master of the Assay. His business is to weigh the bullion, and take care that it be according to the standard.
5. The Auditor. This gentleman inspects and settles the accompts.
6. The Surveyor of the melting. His employment is to see the bullion cast out, and that the metal is not altered after the assay-master has made trial of it, and it is delivered to the melter.
7. The Clerk of the irons. His business is to take care that the working irons are kept clean, and fit for use.
8. The Engraver. This person is employed in engraving the stamps for the money.
9. The Melters. Their business is to melt the bullion before it comes to be coined.
10. The Blanchers. These persons anneal, boil, and cleanse the money.
11. The Provost. This person provides for all the moniers, and superintends them.
12. The Moniers. Their business is to shear the money, and forge it: some beat it broad, others round it, and some stamp, or coin it.

The only part of the process respecting the coining of money which we are permitted to see see, is the stamping it; which is performed in a very expeditious manner, by means of an engine worked sometimes by three and sometimes by four men.

The manner of stamping gold and halfpence is exactly the same, only a little more care is necessary in one than in the other, in order to prevent waste. The engine works by a spindle, like that of a printing press; to the point of which the head of the die is fixed with a screw, and in a little sort of a cup which receives it, is placed the reverse: between these the piece of metal, already cut round to the size, and, if gold, exactly weighed, is placed; and by once pulling down the spindle, with a jerk, is completely stamped. It is amazing to see how dexterously the coiner performs this; for as fast as the men that work the engine turn the spindle, so fast does he supply it with metal, putting in the unstamped piece with his fore-finger and thumb, and twitching out the stamp, with his middle finger. The silver and gold thus stamped are afterwards milled round the edges, the manner of performing which is kept a profound secret, and therefore our readers cannot expect a description of it.

The following is a correct list of the present officers of the mint, with their names, and respective salaries.

	l.	s.
Warden , William Whitmore, Esq ; for himself and Clerk	450	0
Master and Worker , lord vis. Chetwynd, for himself and three Clerks	650	0
Comptroller , John Buller, Esq ; for himself and Clerk	350	0
King's Assay-Master , Joseph Lucas, Esq ; for himself and Clerk	225	0
Chief Engraver , Richard Yoe, Esq ;	200	0
Assistant Engraver , J. Ralph Oaks	80	0
Surveyor of the Meltings and Clerk of the Irons , George Selwyn, for himself and Clerk	132	10
Deputy , John Jones
Weigher and Teller , Maurice Morgan, Esq ; for himself and Clerk	142	10
King's Clerk, and Clerk of the Papers , Mr. William Dick	100	0
Solicitor , William Chamberlain Esq ;	60	0
The Master's Assay-Master , Stanesby Alchorne	60	0
Provost to the Comp. of Moneyers, acting as Engineer , Daniel Kemp	100	0
The Company of Moneyers, each	40	0
Warden's Deputy and Clerk , Edward Lucas, Esq ;
Master's Deputy and Clerk , William Gregory, Esq ;
Comptroller's Deputy and Clerk , William Pany Esq ;
Surveyor , John Verdie
Deputy Weigher, Teller, and Clerk ,
Deputy to the King's Clerks William Dick, Junn .
Another Clerk to the Warden , John Twells	100	0
Clerk to the Master , Thomas Day

	l.	s.
Smith, Assistant to the Engraver , Reuben Fletcher	40	0
Surveyor of the Money-Presses , John Chambers	40	0
Two Auditors, each	20	0
Porter , Nicholas Kemp.	45	0

In this place it will be proper to introduce, as well for the entertainment as instruction of the reader, the following table, &c.

Table of the SILVER and GOLD COINS of the kingdom of England, which have been current in the kingdom of England, from the conquest to the reign of king George II.

From the conquest it does not appear that the Silver Coins had any other name or value, than a Penny or Sterling, till 25 Edward III. who coined

Edward III. Pennies—Groats or Groats—Half Groats.

Richard II. Groats—Half Groats—Sterlings—Half Sterlings.

Henry IV. The same. In this reign it was enacted, That a third part of the bullion should be coined in Half-Pence and Farthings.

Henry V. The same. After the battle of Agincourt he coined Blanks, or white Pieces, rated eight pence or two groats.

Henry VI. The same. He was the first that coined brass money in Ireland.

Edward IV. Groats—Three Pences, in the 18th year of his reign—Two Pences—Pennies.

Edward V. Groats—Pennies.

Richard III. Groats. N. B. This king's is the most rare of all other coins.

Henry VII. To the former coins added the shilling, which weighed one third more than ours at this time. [Anno 20.]

Henry VIII. Crown pieces, one of which was lately preserved by the earl of Pembroke—Testoons or Shillings—Groats—Half Groats—Sterlings—Half Pence—Farthings.

Edward VI. Crowns—Half Crowns—Testoons or Shillings—Six Pences—Groats—Three Pences.

Q. Mary I. Shillings—Six Pences—Groats.

Q. Elizabeth. Crowns—Half Crowns—Shillings—Six Pences—Groats—Three Pences—Two Pennies—Pennies.

James I. Crowns—Half Crowns—Shillings—Six pences—Two Pences—Pence—Half Pence.

Charles I. The same. And after his troubles began, he coined Groats, Three Pences, and other various kinds of money, which the distraction of the times and his urgent necessities invented. N. B. This king's coin appears with the most variety.

E c

After

After the 30th of January, 1648, the parliament agreed upon a new sort of coin, by the name of Crowns, Half Crowns, Shillings, and Six Pences, with this inscription, The Common-Wealth of England; on the reverse, God with us. Two Pences, Pennies, Half Pennies, with no inscription, only the initial figures. Their Sixpence in 1651 was the first milled money in England. Oliver, usurping the government, coined the first English crown piece milled, with an inscription on the rim, inscribed Oliver D. G. Ang. Scot. Hib. &c. PRO. on the reverse, Pax Quæritur Bello: A Half Crown and a Shilling also milled.

Charles II. Crowns—Half Crowns—Shillings—Six Pences—Groats—Three Pences—Two Pences—Pennies.

N. B. In this reign private persons were indulged with a liberty they had obtained in 1653 of coining their own Pennies, Half Pence, and Farthings, till Ann. 1672, when the king's copper halfpence and farthings took place.

James II. The same. N. B. He coined Tin Farthings and Half Pence.

William III. } The same. He found the coin so
Mary II. } diminished, that half a crown would scarce weigh a shilling, and so effectually cured and removed that abuse, that we have enjoyed good coin ever since.

Q. Anne
K. George I. } The same.
K. George II. }

Edward III. Noble—Half Noble—Quarter Noble. N. B. His son prince Edward coined gold in Aquitain.

Richard II. The same.

Henry IV. The same.

Henry V. Noble—Half Noble—Quarter Noble—Salute [coined in France.]

Henry VI. Noble—Half Noble—Quarter Noble—Salute—Half Salute. These two last were coined in France.

Edward VI. Spurr Royal—Half Spurr Royal—Angel [first coined Anno 1465]—Half Angel.

Henry VIII. Double Rose Noble—Spurr Royal—Sovereign, (viz.) on his Throne—Half Sovereign—George Noble—Angel—Half Angel—Quarter Angel—Crown with the Rose, H. R. Half Crown with the Rose, H. R.—Crowns with H. I. H. K. and H. A. on the reverse.

Edward VI. Double Rose Noble—Spurr Royal—Sovereign—Half Sovereign—Angel—Half Angel—Broad Piece with his demy effigies in armour—Half Broad Piece, ditto—Ten Shilling Piece with the crown on his head—Half 10s. or Crown Piece, ditto—Quarter or Half

Crown, ditto—Ten Shilling Piece, exhibiting him bare-headed—Half 10s. or Crown, ditto—Quarter or Half Crown, ditto—Ten Shilling Piece, bare-headed, with the rose, instead of the king's arms, on the reverse.

Q. Mary I. Double Rose Noble, 1553—Spurr Royal, 1553—Angel—Half Angel.
Phillip and Mary I. } Angel—Half Angel—Crown, with Mundi salus unica.

Q. Elizabeth. Double Rose Noble—Spurr Royal—Broad Piece—Half Broad Piece—Quarter Broad Piece—Half Quarter Broad Piece—Half Broad Piece and Quarter neatly wrought and milled. [Those grained or indented on the edges are rare.]—Angel—Half Angel—Quarter Angel.

James I. Double Rose Noble—Spurr Royal—Sovereign, or 30s. Piece—Half Sovereign, or 15s. Piece—Scepter and Globe Piece, or 28s. with Rex Angla & Scotia—Half of the same—Scepter and Globe, or 25s. Piece—Half Scepter or 12s. 6d. Piece—Quarter of the same—Half Quarter of the same—Broad, or 20s. Piece, head laureated—Half, or 10s. Piece, head laureated—Quarter of the same, or 5s. Piece—Angel—Half Angel—Crown, called the Thistle Crown.

Charles I. Spurr Royal—Broad, or 20s. Piece—Half, or 10s. Piece—Quarter, or 5s. Piece. Of these there are three particular sorts, viz. with the ruff plain, and smart ruff with the garter robes, and broad band, of 20s. 10s. 5s.—Angel. In his troubles he coined 3l. or 3 broads, with the sword and laurel branch; and also 20s. or single Broad; and half Broad or 10s. Pieces of the same. In Scotland he coined a Broad Piece with the scepter and globe of 25s. Commonwealth. Broad, or 20s. Pieces—Half—Quarter.

Oliver. Twenty Shilling Piece milled, excellently done by Symonds, 1656.

Charles II. Broad, or 20s. Piece with the small Crown. The Mint Mark—Ten Shilling—Five Shilling Piece, ditto—Broad Piece milled of 20s. by Symonds, Ann. 1662—Half—and Quarter of the same. He was the first that coined 5 Pound or 5 Guinea Pieces, Double or 2 Guineas, Guineas, and Half Guineas, milled.

James II.
William III. and Mary II. } The same;
Q. Anne.
K. Geo. I.
K. Geo. II.
K. Geo. III. }

The same, with the addition of pieces of gold coin of 5s. 3d. each, commonly called Quarter Guineas.
Account

Account of the Office of ORDNANCE, with a list of its Officers.

THE office of ordnance is kept in Cold Harbour; to which office all the other offices for supplying artillery, arms, &c. to any part of his majesty's dominions, are accountable; and from thence are issued all orders for the disposition of warlike materials, for every kind of service.

In ancient times, before the use of gunpowder was known, the business of this office was conducted by officers who were distinguished by the names of bowyer, the cross-bowyer, the galeator, the armourer, and the keeper of the tents.

The business of the bowyer was to make and take care of the bows: the cross-bowyer provided accoutrements for the bows: the galeator was purveyor of the helmets or head-pieces: the armourer was the keeper of the king's armour within the Tower: and the business of the keeper of the tents is fully explained by the title itself.

Besides the abovementioned, there was a master smith, whose pay, in the reign of Edward the first, was four-pence halfpenny per day from the crown, and three-pence per day from the Warders or Tower-guards: likewise a master-mason, and a master carpenter, each of whom had twelve pence per day, payable at the exchequer, and a robe once a year.

The office of ordnance continued under the direction of the abovementioned officers till the reign of Henry the eighth, who gave the management of it to a master, lieutenant, surveyor, &c. and in this manner it has continued, some improvements excepted, to the present time.

For the satisfaction of our readers we have subjoined the following,

Authentic list of the present officers of the Office of Ordnance, with their clerks, salaries, &c.

	per Annum.
Master-General, Marquis of Granby	1500 0 0
Lt.-General, Hen. Seymour Conway	1100 0 0
Surveyor-General, Sir Charles Frederic, K. B. F. R. S.	700 0 0
Clerk of the Ordnance, William Rawlinson Earle, Esq; 500l. and 100l. as check to the Store-keeper	600 0 0
Store-keeper, Andrew Wilkinson, Esq; and 60l. for a house	460 0 0
Clerk of the Deliveries, Char. Cocks, Esq; 400l. and 100l. for a house	500 0 0
Treasurer and Paymaster, Ross Mackye Esq;	500 0 0
Secretary to the Master-General, Tho. Thoroton, Esq;	220 0 0
Under Secretary to ditto, J. Drinkwater	150 0 0
Minute Clerk, Henry Simmons	55 0 0
Clerks in ordinary under Lieut. Gen. Simon Parry	150 0 0
Nicholas Witwar	40 0 0
Extra. Clerk, John Spencer	40 0 0
Clerk of the Fortifications	60 0 0
Clerk in ordinary under the Surveyor-General and Proof-master of England, Benjamin Allin	150 0 0
Assistant to ditto, Henry Brown, 4s. 6d. per day

Clerks in Ordinary,
Edward Miles	60 0 0
George Ayres	40 0 0
Extra. Clerks under ditto
Richard North, Rich. Forman, John Vidgen, Tho. Wooldridge, 50l. Ben. Meecher, Miles E. Wilkes, 40l. a year	280 0 0
Clerks in ord. under Clerk of Ordnance
Daniel Kemp	180 0 0
John Boddington	150 0 0
John Humfrey	60 0 0
William Arnold	60 0 0
Grenville Sharp	50 0 0
John Humfrey, 4s. a day
Extra. Clerks under ditto
William Adams, Joseph Sparrow, Thomas Bradshaw, John Bullock, Anthony Forman, Oliff Adams, E. Short, T. Adams, W. Nettle-ship, T. Mumford, J. King, Perkins Saunder, 40l. a year each	480 0 0
Ledger-keeper to the Out ports, John Wilkinson	60 0 0
Home Ledger-keeper, Wm. Gregory	60 0 0
Clerks in ord. under the Store-keeper
Johnson Robinson	150 0 0
Thomas Day	60 0 0
Extra. Clerks under ditto.
Richard Dickinson, Richard Steel, Cades Middleton, 40l. each	120 0 0
Clerks in ordinary under the Clerk of Deliveries
Stillington Durnford	150 0 0
John Woodward	70 0 0
Clerks extra. under ditto
Fr. Milns, Rich. Blight, John Lock, 40l. each	120 0 0
Deputy Paymaster, John Walcot, Esq;	150 0 0
Clerks under the Treasurer,
Francis Hanrot	60 0 0
James Cooper	50 0 0
Clerks extra. under ditto.
El. Durnford, Cut. Fisher, Clarke Durnford, Tho. Haberfield, W. Davis, 40l. each	200 0 0
Clerk to chief Engineer, Arthur Caldwell
Proof-masters,
Rob. Bennet, T. Hartwell, 20l. each	40 0 0
Clerk of the Works, Tho. Hartwell, Assistant to ditto, Charles White, 3s. per day	120 0 0
Purveyor for Land, Evelyn Sutton	100 0 0
Ditto for Sea, Robert Bennet	40 0 0
Assistant Recorders,
J. Boddington, J. Humfrey, 20l. each	40 0 0
Architect and Draughtsman, Charles Frederic, jun. Esq;	220 0 0
Armorer, James Cooper	45 12 6
Furbisher of the Tower, Tho. Hatcher	80 0 0
Furbishers at Windsor, John Miller, Rob. Pilkington, 25l. each	50 0 0
Furbisher at Hampton Court and at St. James's, Joseph Deely	60 0 0
Messenger, William Severn	60 0 0
Barrack-Master, John Jones	40 0 0
Store-keeper of Salt-Petre, Edw. Short	60 0 0
Astronomical Observator, Rev. Nev. Maskelyne, M. A.	100 0 0

C H A P.

CHAPTER XX.

The city walls repaired in consequence of the king's writ. A plot against the duke of Gloucester's life defeated. The address of the city to the king, with the effects it produced. Sir Nicholas Brembre hanged at Tyburn. A grand tournament in Smithfield. The city refuses to lend the king money. Account of a dangerous riot. Mayor of London and others, imprisoned and fined. Citizens fined three thousand marks. The king and queen make a public entry into London. Ten thousand pounds paid by the Londoners for the privilege of chusing their own mayor, which had been illegally taken from them. Order of parliament respecting laystalls. The several wards of London taxed. Procession of queen Isabella. The king compelled to resign his crown, and Henry, duke of Hereford recognized king of England.

HAVING in the last chapter given an account of the Tower of London, agreeable to our invariable plan of introducing a description of the most remarkable places in this city and its suburbs, where such description can be introduced with the greatest propriety, we will now resume the thread of our narrative, reciting every interesting event in chronological order.

This kingdom being threatened with a French invasion in the year 1316, when the best of the English troops were in Spain, whither they had been sent to support the pretences of the king's uncle, the duke of Lancaster, to the crown of Castile; it was thought necessary to put the city in a proper state of defence, in case it should be attacked by the French, as was then apprehended.

In order, therefore, to advance this work as much as possible, the king issued a writ to the citizens of London, of which the following is a faithful translation.

"The king to his beloved the mayor and aldermen, and the rest of the citizens of London, sendeth health. Know ye, that as well the walls and other defences or forts of the said city be old and weak, and, for want of repair, are fallen down in some places; as also the ditches of the said city are exceedingly filled with dirt, dunghills, and other filth, and with grass growing in the same, not only to the evident danger of the said city and inhabitants thereof, (and chiefly at this present time of war) but also to the manifest disgrace and scandal of us and the whole city, &c."

His majesty then gives the mayor and citizens a licence to take a toll on all kinds of victuals and merchandize brought into the city for the space of ten years, in order to defray the expence of the intended repairs.

Thus encouraged, the citizens lost no time in repairing the wall and bulwarks, and cleansing the ditches; and, in order to prevent the French from having any place of shelter, in case of their attacking the city, they demolished several houses contiguous to, and on the outside of the wall.

This great precaution, however, was needless; for the French did not make the expected invasion; and the citizens discontinued the repairs, and devoted the first moments of repose to mirth, joy, and festivity.

About this period the king's favourites, Robert de Vere, and Michael de la Pole, had gained such an ascendancy over his majesty as occasioned great uneasiness between him and his subjects. De Vere had been created duke of Ireland, and de la Pole, earl of Suffolk and lord high-chancellor.

These worthless minions, unsatisfied with the exorbitant degree of power they possessed, and apprehensive that they could not totally engross the royal confidence during the life of the king's uncle Thomas, duke of Gloucester, entered into a conspiracy to destroy him, and some other persons of eminence, whom they considered as their enemies.

In order to carry this scheme into effectual execution, they treated with Nicholas Exton, mayor of London, whom they endeavoured to prevail on to invite the duke and his friends to sup in the city, at the house of Nicholas Brembre, the late mayor, who was in the secret; and when the glass had freely circulated, to assassinate them all.

The mayor heard their proposal; but detesting so foul a deed, he acquainted the duke of Gloucester of the intended villainy, by which he was put upon his guard, and the horrid project defeated.

The duke, from a principle of revenge, and to spirit up the people to lay their complaints against the favourites before the king, industriously propagated a report throughout the nation, that the ministers intended to levy a general poll-tax of a noble a head.

This report produced the intended effect; for the citizens of London immediately deputed proper persons to wait on the duke of Gloucester, to request him to assume the government of the kingdom, and to bring to justice all its internal enemies, who had burthened the people with intolerable taxes, and had endeavoured to aggrandize themselves at the public expence.

This solicitation the duke thought proper to decline; urging, as a reason for so doing, that it would be impossible for him to redress their grievances, while the ear of the king was so totally engrossed by his favourites; but he advised the citizens to engage the other cities and towns to address his majesty respectively, beseeching him to remedy their grievances; and he promised that that if these petitions were delivered on the St. George's day following, himself and his brother would not fail to be present with the king, in order to enforce them.

In consequence of this promise, the mayor and citizens, on the day appointed sent a deputation of sixty of the principal inhabitants of London, in company with the persons deputed by the other cities and towns, to attend the king at Windsor, at which place he then resided.

When his majesty was informed of their arrival, he would have declined seeing them; but he was at length prevailed on to grant them an audience, through the mediation of the dukes of York and Gloucester, and the earl of Salisbury.

When the citizens and other deputies were introduced to the king, Sir Simon Sudbury, in the name of the rest, laid their grievances before his majesty, intreating "that a parliament might be speedily summoned, to call to account all such as had misbehaved in the administration of public affairs, and to substitute men of worth and probity in their stead, according to the advice of parliament."

In answer hereto the king said, that "their supplications being long, he had no time to answer;" he therefore desired they would "bring their requests at the ensuing Michaelmas, when he would communicate them to the parliament that would then be held at Westminster, and what was judged reasonable should then be granted to them; but that his subjects should never be his masters by prescribing to him; for he could not perceive that either himself or those about him had ever intended any thing else but right and justice."

In answer hereto, one of the persons deputed by the city of London, with a spirit that does him great honour, said that "with humble submission to his majesty, justice was never less practised in England than at present; and that by the subtle management of certain persons, 'twas impossible for him to come at the truth of things, seeing the ministers found it their interest to conceal from him the management of his affairs, as much as possible: in consideration of which, they did not think it consistent with their interest, nor that of the kingdom, to wait the meeting of the parliament, seeing a speedier remedy might be applied, by calling to an account those plunderers, who had embezzled the public treasure; and to enquire how those immense sums, raised for nine years past, had been applied: and that all those who could not discharge themselves honourably, should stand to the judgment of parliament."

His majesty, equally surprized at the substance of this speech, and at the freedom with which it was delivered, turned to his uncles and the nobility present, demanding their opinion: and they being unanimous that there was nothing unreasonable in the request of his majesty's subjects, a parliament was appointed to enquire into the state of the nation, which was to assemble at Westminster on the third day of May following.

But in order to avoid the consequences of a parliamentary enquiry, the favourites induced the king to attend them to Bristol, from whence his majesty dispatched the duke of Ireland to Wales, with a commission to raise an army with a view to reduce to obedience the city of London, and his uncles who were supported by it.

In a short time the duke of Ireland assembled fifteen thousand men, with whom he marched towards the metropolis: but the duke of Gloucester, at the head of an army of twenty thousand men, chiefly Londoners, engaged him at Oxford, and obtained a compleat victory.

As soon as the king heard of the defeat of his favourite, he came to the resolution of taking up his residence in the Tower of London, to wait the event of the civil war, as he imagined he should be more safe in that fortress than in the country.

But the citizens of London no sooner heard of his majesty's approach toward the metropolis, than a great number of them went to meet him, on horseback, richly dressed, and escorted him to the cathedral church of St. Paul, and thence to his palace at Westminster.

The citizens appear to have taken this step, with a view to convince his majesty that he might rely on their loyalty and affection to himself and his family, and that their opposition was not to their sovereign, but to the minions who had usurped his confidence.

His majesty had not been long at Westminster before he received advice that the army of the barons were marching from Haringhaye * park towards London; upon which his favourites prevailed on him to take refuge in the Tower, as a place of the greatest security.

As soon as the king was safe lodged in the Tower, he issued a proclamation, forbidding any person whatever from supplying the forces of the barons with any kind of arms, ammunition, or provisions, on pain of death, and confiscation of all their effects.

In consequence of this proclamation the barons sent a manifesto, directed to the mayor, aldermen, and citizens of London, written in the French language; of which we have subjoined a faithful translation.

This manifesto sets forth, that "they, the lords above-mentioned, were, and always would be, obedient and loyal subjects to the king; yet that the mayor, aldermen, &c. should not wonder at the cause of their assembling in such a manner, that they thought good to let them know, that it had been ordained by the king in the last parliament, that certain lords, thereunto appointed and sworn, were to have the governance of the king's council and realm, for the honour and profit of both, for the term of one year; which government had been, and was then disturbed and interrupted by Alexander, archbishop of York, Robert Vere, duke of Ireland, Michael de la Pole, earl of Suffolk, Robert Tresilian, that false justice, and Nicholas Brembre a false knight of Lon-

* Now called Hornsey.

“ don, every one of them being traitors to the “ king and kingdom: who falsly and traitor-“ ously, by their wicked advices and conduct of “ the king's person, had carried him into divers “ remote parts far from his council, to the ruin
 “ of him and his realm; and falsly counselled
 “ him, contrary to their oaths, to do divers “ things in disinherittance and dismembring of “ his crown, he being nigh to loose his heritage “ beyond sea, by their means, to the great in“ famy and destruction of the whole nation: and “ had also wickedly made several differences be“ tween the king and the lords of his council, so
 “ as some of them were in great fear and danger
 “ of their lives, as they had lately informed the “ king, by the archbishop of Canterbury, the “ duke of York, the bishops of Winchester and “ Ely, and several other lords. Wherefore to “ redress these grievances, and to punish those “ traitors according to law, they were now as“ sembled, requiring and charging the mayor and “ citizens, by virtue of their allegiance, that “ they should make proclamation through the “ whole city, that this was their true intent, and “ no other; and for the honour, profit and safety, “ of the king and all his loyal subjects, they “ would be aiding and assisting with all their “ power, to the said lords, not favouring or aid“ ing the said traitors, or any of them as they “ tendered the honour of God, the king and the “ kingdom, and the safety of the city; and that “ they neglect not this advice, as they desire to “ avoid the dangers that may happen in time to “ come.” And concluded with “ demanding
 “ their resolution in this matter on the Friday fol“ lowing, the 15 of November, 1386.”

The citizens in general approved highly of the contents of this manifesto, and, without deliberation, directed Nicholas Exton, the mayor, to deliver the keys of the city to the duke of Gloucester; and likewise supplied the army of the barons with plenty of provisions of every kind.

On the meeting of the parliament, Sir Nicholas Brembre, who was to have been made duke of London if the king's favourites had carried their point, was found guilty of high treason, in consequence of which he received sentence to be hanged, and was accordingly executed at Tyburn, by which, and other well-timed acts of justice, the king was induced to make such concessions to his injured subjects, as put a period to the calamities of a civil war.

In the year 1389 the streets of London were become so filthy, that by order of the parliament, a proclamation was issued, ordaining that “ no “ person whatsoever should presume to lay any “ dung, guts, garbage, offals, or other ordure,
 “ in any street, ditch, &c. upon the penalty of “ twenty pounds to be recovered by an informa“ tion in chancery.”

In the year 1390 the king gave orders for a grand tournament to be held in Smithfield; on which occasion many German princes, and great numbers of the nobility from various parts of the continent, came to England to partake of this royal entertainment.

On the afternoon of the first Sunday after Michaelmas, the procession began from the Tower, with a cavalcade of sixty ladies, dressed in the most elegant manner, each mounted on a stately horse, richly accoutred, and leading an armed knight by a silver chain; and every knight being attended by his esquires of honour.

In this order they proceeded through Cheapside, to Smithfield, where the jousts continued four days, in the presence of the king, queen, and the whole court; and the king himself jousted on the second day.

There were great variety of splendid entertainments; and open house was kept the whole time, at the expence of his majesty, at the palace of the bishop of London, * where there was a ball every night, for the amusement of the nobility and gentry.

In the year 1391, the price of wheat being so greatly advanced that the poor were in danger of starving, the mayor and aldermen of this city voluntarily subscribed twenty pounds each, which, with two thousand marks taken out of the orphans fund in the chamber of London, was expended in the importation of corn from abroad; by which the poor were so far supplied, that the peace of the city was preserved, and the benevolence of the magistrates universally extolled.

The king being in great want of money in the year 1322, he applied to the citizens of London for a loan of ten thousand pounds, † which they not only positively refused; but insulted and even beat a Lombard merchant for offering to advance the money.

These circumstances, as might naturally be expected, incensed the king in a high degree; but he chose to suppress his resentment for the present and wait till some casual accident should afford him an opportunity of gratifying his revenge.

This indeed soon happened. A baker's servant carrying a basket of bread by the bishop of Salisbury's house in Fleet Street, one Roman, a servant of the bishop, took a loaf out of the basket, and wounded the baker, in his attempt to recover the loaf.

Hereupon a mob soon gathered together, to revenge this atrocious robbery and insult; but Roman's fellow servant rescued him, took him into the house and refused to deliver him up, though a constable was sent to demand him.

This circumstance so exasperated the populace, that they threatened to set the house on fire, if he was not immediately produced. In the mean time the mayor, aldermen and sheriffs, having been informed of the disturbance, hastened to Fleetstreet, where, by meer dint of persuasion, they at length prevailed upon the people to disperse, without proceeding to any extraordinary acts of violence.

It was not then apprehended that any farther

* This palace was situated in Aldersgate Street, and of late years called London House; but was almost consumed by fire in the year 1768, and is now taking down in order to erect dwelling houses and shops on the spot.

† Some writers say only one thousand pounds.

consequences

Engraved for Chamberlain's History of London.

A Representation of an Ancient TOURNAMENT.

consequences would have resulted from this affair; but the bishop of Salisbury, instead of punishing his rascally servant, went immediately to the king and made heavy complaints against the citizens, whom he represented as having insulted, in his person, the whole body of the clergy; and said, that if the citizens of London were permitted to go on unpunished, the state, as well as the church would be endangered.

The king, who was glad of any opportunity of punishing the citizens for refusing him the loan he had requested, immediately threatened to plunder the metropolis, and raze it to the ground: but by the advice of many of the principal nobility, he was prevailed on to moderate his anger; in consequence of which he commanded, the mayor, aldermen, sheriffs, and twenty-four other principal citizens, to attend him at Nottingham, to answer such complaints as should be made against them.

The citizens, during their journey to Nottingham, mutually resolved to adhere faithfully to each other, as the most probable method of vindicating themselves from the malice of their enemies: but some of them failing in this resolution, began to impeach their brethren; which occasioning recriminations on the part of the accused, was likely to have produced very disagreeable consequences to them all.

This aspect of their affairs determined them to submit entirely to the mercy of the king, who committed the mayor to the castle of Windsor, and the rest to other prisons, to remain during his pleasure.

In a short time, however, a commission was issued "to enquire into all and singular the errors, defects, and misprisions committed in the city, through the bad conduct of the said magistrates."

In consequence hereof William Venour, the late mayor, John Loveneye and John Walcote, late sheriffs, with William Barret, Nicholas Exton, and others of the aldermen, were indicted for mal-administration in the government of the city; and being found guilty, they were sentenced to pay a fine of three thousand marks, for the use of the king; and the liberties of the city were seized, in direct violation of the first charter of king Edward the third.

As a farther token of the king's displeasure, he removed the courts of justice to York, to which city himself and the nobility withdrew. But at length the city privileges, except that of choosing their mayor, were restored, and all disputes between the king and the citizens were adjusted, on their paying the fine of three thousand marks.

The king having at length declared his intention of returning to London, he was met at Shene * near Richmond, by four hundred of the citizens on horseback, who were elegantly dressed in an uniform manner, and preceded by the recorder of London, who, in the name of the company, entreated his majesty to honour the city with his presence.

His majesty having consented to gratify the citizens in this particular, they conducted him as far as St. George's church, in Southwark, where he was received by the bishop of London, the clergy of his diocese; and five hundred boys in surplices.

Thus attended, his majesty proceeded to London-bridge, where he was presented with a beautiful horse, adorned with trappings of gold brocade, and a white pad, decked with rich furniture for the use of the queen.

From hence the king and queen, mounted on the beasts which had been presented to them, advanced into the city, the streets of which were lined with the several companies in their formalities, and the houses were adorned with rich hangings of silk and tapestry, while the conduits ran with a great variety of wines.

A stately pageant was erected at the standard in Cheapside, on which was placed a boy, representing an angel, who presented the king with wine in a cup of gold, and placed on his head a golden crown elegantly adorned with jewels, and pearls of great value; and likewise paid the same honour to the queen.

Their majesties proceeding to St. Paul's cathedral, the king there made an offering, after which they were conducted, with great pomp, to the royal palace at Westminster.

On the following day the mayor, aldermen, and sheriffs waited on the king, and presented him with two silver basons gilt, each of them containing a thousand nobles of gold; and likewise with a curious picture of the trinity, esteemed worth eight hundred pounds.

They likewise presented the queen with a silver tablet, gilt with gold, valued at a thousand marks; besides other things of considerable value.

By these liberal presents the citizens hoped to have recovered their ancient liberty of choosing their mayor: but in this they were mistaken, and were obliged to pay ten thousand pounds for the restoration of this valuable privilege, which sum was raised by a general assessment on the inhabitants of London.

On the meeting of the parliament, the state of the lay-stalls in the city was again taken into consideration, and it was enacted that "all the filth of a certain lay-stall upon the bank of the river Thames, be forthwith removed; and that the butchers of London should, before the ensuing Easter, erect a house or houses, in a proper place, to receive all their ordure, thence to be carried in boats into the middle of the said river, and to be thrown in at the turn of the tide at high water. And that no person should presume to throw any muck, rubbish, laystage, or other ordure, in at the sides of the said river, or lay any filth or nastiness on the banks of the same, between the palace of Westminster and the Tower of London, upon the penalty of 10l."

It was enacted, by this parliament, for the security of the city liberties against future attempts

* From this it seems probable that the great north road from York to London lay then in a very different line from the present; or perhaps his majesty went to his palace at Shene, in order to repose himself for a time, before his public entry into London.

of a court, "That it was not the king's meaning or intent, nor the meaning of the statute made in the twenty-eighth of Edward III. that the mayor, aldermen, and sheriffs of London, that have been, now are, or hereafter shall be, should incur the penalty contained in the said statute, for any erroneous judgment given, or to be given, in the same city." The parliament, however, left them answerable for all defects respecting the government of the city.

It was further enacted by the authority aforesaid, "That from thenceforward, the aldermen of the city should not be chosen annually, but remain in their offices during their good behaviour. And that the great ward of Farringdon should be divided into two wards, and have two aldermen."

This parliament likewise ordained what proportion the said wards should pay towards raising a tax called a fifteenth; whereby it appears that the sums to be paid into the exchequer by the respective wards, were as follow.

	l.	s.	d.
The ward of Cheap	72	0	0
The ward Vintry	35	5	0
The ward of Queenhithe	20	0	0
The ward of Baynard castle	12	0	0
The ward of Cordwainer's-street	72	0	0
The ward of Bread-street	36	10	0
The ward of Farringdon without	34	10	0
The ward of Farringdon within	53	6	8
The ward of Aldrychgate	7	0	0
The ward of Cripplegate	39	10	0
The ward of Cripplegate without *	10	0	0
The ward of Bassyngshawe	7	0	0
The ward of Coleman-street	19	0	0
The ward of Walbrook	39	0	0
The ward of Dowgate	34	10	0
The ward of Brydge	49	10	0
The ward of Byllingsgate	31	10	0
The ward of the Tower	45	10	0
The ward of Portfoken	9	0	0
The ward of Aldgate	5	0	0
The ward of Lime-street	2	0	0
The ward of Bishopsgate	21	10	0
The ward of Broad-street	25	0	0
The ward of Cornhill	16	0	0
The ward of Langborne	20	10	0
The ward of Candlewick-street	16	0	0

In the year 1394, the mayor of London was empowered by the parliament to search all the malt to be brought into the city, and to see that each quarter measured eight bushels of clean malt.

In the same year the mayor and sheriffs were ordered to attend the king's council, to answer a charge brought against them by the country graziers frequenting Smithfield market, who alledged that the officers of the city extorted from them every third beast which they brought to that market: but history does not inform us whether any, or what punishment was inflicted for so scandalous an instance of injustice and oppression.

In the year 1396 the mayor of this city being informed that the king was arrived at Dover, with his young consort, Isabella, † a daughter of France, he went to Blackheath to meet them, attended by the aldermen, and a number of the principal citizens, mounted on horseback, and dressed in an uniform cloathing, having each of them on their sleeves a symbol of their respective mysteries, richly embroidered.

The recorder of London having addressed their majesties, on the part of the citizens, with compliments of congratulation, the royal pair were conducted to the palace at Kennington.

From hence the little queen (as she was called) was carried to the Tower of London, with great pomp and magnificence; on which occasion the crowds of people were so great, that no less than nine of them were pressed to death on London-bridge; and on the following day her majesty was conducted to Westminster, amidst the repeated applauding shouts of the citizens.

In the year 1398, if the account of a foreign author ‡ may be credited, the citizens of London, by the advice of the duke of Gloucester, petitioned the king to annul the heavy taxes which had been imposed for the support of the French war; and requested that his majesty would not enter into any treaty with the French king respecting the delivering up the town of Calais.

This petition of the Londoners so irritated the king, that he compelled many of the most eminent citizens to sign and seal a number of blank papers, which were afterwards filled up with such sums as the ministry thought proper to extort.

By a continued course of exactions and oppressions, king Richard became at length so odious to his subjects, that Henry duke of Hereford, son of the famous John of Gaunt, and grandson of Edward III. was, by the principal nobility, gentry, and others, invited from France, where he was then an exile, to come over and deliver the nation from slavery.

In consequence of this invitation, Henry set sail, and landing at Ravenspurre in Yorkshire, soon found himself at the head of sixty thousand men, with whom he marched to London, where he was received as the deliverer of his country, and supplied with all kinds of provisions for his army. King Richard was now expected from Ireland, where he had been to reduce that kingdom; and Henry, encouraged by the Londoners espousing his interest, marched against Richard, who finding himself deserted by most of the great men in his train, surrendered to Henry, by whom he was confined in the Tower of London, and obliged to resign the crown in favour of his competitor.

* This was not a separate ward, but only a liberty or part of the former, under one aldermen, as at present.

† This lady was at that time only about eight years old.
‡ Froissart.

CHAPTER XXI.

Henry IV. ascends the throne. Popular acts of parliament. Plot to assassinate the king defeated. Clause in king Henry the fourth's first charter. The prison called the Tun in Cornhill, converted into a conduit. Contest between the goldsmiths and cutlers. Dreadful pestilence. A play acted by the company of parish clerks. Tournament in Smithfield. A riot in the city. John Bradby burnt in Smithfield. Guildhall founded. The death of Henry IV. and accession of Henry V. A great mortality in Newgate. Great rejoicings on account of the victory at Agincourt. The city of London first lighted with lanthorns. The king's crown and jewels pawned. Leadenhall built. Death of Henry V.

ON the thirtieth day of September 1399, Henry duke of Lancaster ascended the throne by the title of Henry the fourth; and on the thirteenth day of October the mayor and aldermen of London rode to the Tower, from whence they attended his majesty to Westminster, where the ceremony of his coronation was performed, with the accustomed solemnity.

One of the first acts of sovereignty exercised by this monarch was, the giving orders that all the blank papers which had been extorted from the citizens (as mentioned in the preceding chapter) should be burnt at the standard in Cheap-side: a circumstance which greatly endeared the new king to his subjects in general, and to the inhabitants of London in particular.

About this time the parliament repealed an act passed in the twenty-seventh year of king Edward the third, by which it had been ordained, that “the mayor, aldermen, and sheriffs of London, in default of the good government of the city, were to be tried as delinquents, by a foreign inquest, to be taken out of the counties of Kent, Essex, Suffex, Hertfordshire, Buckinghamshire, and Berkshire; and who upon being found guilty, were to pay a thousand marks for the first default, two thousand for the second, and for the third to forfeit the franchises of the city to the king.”

And the same parliament enacted, that “all repyers, and other fishers, from Rye and Winchelsea, and all other parts on the sea coasts, should sell their fish themselves in Cornhill and Cheap, and other Streets of London, unto all men that would buy them, except fishmongers, and others that would buy the said fish to sell again. And that all foreign fishermen in amity with the king, as well as domestic, should have the privilege of retailing their fish in the city, either whole or in pieces, to all persons whatsoever, except fishmongers.”

As these acts were supposed to have passed at the particular desire of the king, this circumstance still further endeared his majesty to the citizens of London, who had soon an opportunity of testifying their gratitude for the favours received, as will appear from the following particulars.

Several of the principal people in the nation having formed a conspiracy to assassinate the king, his majesty was no sooner informed of it, than he hastened to London, and acquainting the mayor with the affair, commanded him to raise the citizens; which was obeyed with so much expedition, that in a few hours six thousand of the Londoners were assembled, completely armed, and ready to march wherever the exigency of his majesty's affairs might require.

The king having learnt that the conspirators had been at Windsor, with an intent to surprize him there, marched from London at the head of the citizens, and as many auxiliary forces as made his army twenty thousand; with which he waited the approach of the rebels on Hounslow heath.

The rebels, however, retired at the approach of the royal army; and the duke of Surry and earl of Salisbury, two of the principal insurgents, being taken at Cirencester, the army was dispersed; and the rest of the ringleaders being soon made prisoners, were tried, condemned and executed; by which the rebellion was totally suppressed.

The king, truly sensible of the obligations he had to his faithful citizens of London, was determined to give them some testimony of his gratitude; and therefore granted them a charter, of which the following clause is a part.

“And moreover, of our ample grace, we have granted for us and our heirs, as much as in us is, to the same citizens, their heirs and successors, as aforesaid, that they shall have the custody, as well of the gates of Newgate and Ludgate as all other the gates and posterns of the same city; and also the office of gathering of the tolls and customs in Cheap and Billingsgate and Smithfield, there rightfully to be taken and accustomed; and also the tronage, that is to say, the weighing of lead, wax, pepper, allom, madder, and other like wares, within the said city for ever; as by the said charters, amongst others things, more plainly may appear.” Dated the 25th of May, 1399.”

In the year 1401 the citizens of London converted the prison called the tun, in Cornhill, into a conduit

G g

a conduit for the reception of water which was brought in leaden pipes from Tyburn: and on the side of this conduit they erected a cage, with a pair of stocks over it for the punishment of night-walkers; together with a pillory, in which dishonest millers and bakers were exposed to the scorn of the public.

In the year 1405 a contest happened between the companies of goldsmiths and cutlers, with regard to certain privileges claimed by the former, of inspecting all the gold and silver work made by the latter.

At length the goldsmiths appealed to the parliament, and by the authority of the king the affair was referred to the mayor of London, who having carefully examined into the affair, reported, that according to the ancient immunities of the city, the cutlers had a right to work in gold and silver; but that all things made by them were to be assayed by the goldsmiths: whereupon the goldsmiths charter was confirmed by parliament, and additional privileges were granted.

A most dreadful plague broke out among the inhabitants of the city in the year 1407, which raged to so great a degree as to destroy thirty thousand of the inhabitants in a very short time; which considerably lessening the consumption of bread, reduced the price of wheat to three shillings and six-pence the quarter.

In the year 1409 history informs us that the company of parish clerks of London acted a play concerning the Creation of the World, which they repeated eight days successively, at Skinner's-Well, near Clerkenwell, with great applause.

From the play the company retired daily to Smithfield, where a tournament was held between the marshal and gentlemen of Hainault, and the earl of Somerset and several other English gentlemen; in which victory declared so much in favour of the English, that they all came off conquerors except one.

In the year 1410 a riot happened in this city, of which our historians relate the following particulars. The princes Thomas and John, sons of the king, being at an entertainment in Eastcheap, a dispute arose between their highness's servants and some others belonging to the court, during which it was said that some insult was offered to the princes.

The mayor being informed of the riot, immediately repaired to the place, attended by the aldermen and sheriffs, who exerted themselves effectually to restore the peace. But notwithstanding this spirited and well judged conduct, the king issued a writ, appointing commissioners to enquire into the cause of the tumult, who summoned the mayor, aldermen and sheriffs before them; when the chief justice Gascoyne advised them to make submission to the king, in behalf of all the citizens.

This they refused to do; and, conscious of their own innocence, vindicated themselves with so much spirit, and so strict a regard to truth, that the king appeared fully satisfied with their conduct, and they were discharged with honour.

In the year abovementioned one John Bradby, Alias Badby, a taylor, one of the professors in the doctrine inculcated by the celebrated Wickliff, having been convicted before Thomas archbishop of Canterbury, of what was then called Heresy, was sentenced to be burnt to death in Smithfield.

This unhappy man was conveyed to the place of execution in a cask, and Henry prince of Wales being present on the occasion, offered him a free pardon, on condition of his recanting before the fire was kindled. This offer Bradby rejected; on which he was tied to a stake, in the cask, and the fire being lighted, the flames soon reached his body, which occasioned his crying out in a most piteous manner.

The young prince was so affected by this circumstance, that he gave orders to take him instantly out of the fire, renewed the offer of a pardon on the conditions abovementioned, and even promised to allow him a pension of three-pence per day, in consideration of the injury he had already sustained by the fire.

This offer likewise the resolute martyr rejected, upon which he was re-conducted to the flames, which soon put a period to his life.

The Guildhall of the city of London having been heretofore nothing better than a mean cottage situated in Aldermanbury, and the business of the city greatly increasing, the foundation of the New Guildhall was laid this year, on the spot, where the present building stands, at the upper end of King-street in Cheap-side, of which it may not be improper to introduce a concise description in this place.

The New Guildhall, which was finished in the year 1411, having been very considerably damaged by the dreadful fire in 1666, it was thought fit to demolish it entirely; and the present edifice was built and extremely well beautified in 1669.

This hall is 153 feet long, 48 broad, and 55 feet high to the roof.

The portico is adorned with a stately gothic frontispiece, enriched with the king's arms, &c.

After entering the portico, the first thing worthy attention is the balcony, over a flight of nine or ten steps leading to the mayor's court, in the front of which is a fine clock and dial, in a curious frame of oak: the carvings are, at the four corners the four cardinal virtues, and on the top, time, with a cock on each side of him. Above this are the figures of Moses and Aaron; on the sides beneath, the four cardinal virtues; and below are depicted the arms of the 24 companies. On each side of the balcony is a giant of an enormous size; the one holding a pole-axe, the other an halbert, supposed to be an ancient Briton and a Saxon.

Round the hall are colours and standards taken from the French, &c. at different periods.

The roof is flat, divided into panels; the walls on the north and south sides are adorned with four gothic demi-pillars, painted white, and veined with blue, and the capitals gilt with gold; upon which are the royal arms, and those of Edward the confessor. In many places are the royal arms: on the south-eastward pillar is the arms of London, and westward are the arms of the twelve companies.

At

Engraved for Chamberlain's History of London.

Manner of BURNING the MARTYRS in Smithfield.

At the east end are the portraiture of their late majesties king George II. and queen Caroline, and those of their present majesties: close by the first is the picture of queen Anne, at the foot of an anabathrum, under a rich canopy; by the latter, his majesty king George I. And at the same end, but on the north and south sides, the pictures of king William III. and queen Mary, fronting each other.

The inter columns are painted in imitation of porphyry, and embellished with the pictures, in full proportion, of 19 judges, who determined differences between landlord and tenant in rebuilding the city after the dreadful fire in 1666, without the expence of law-suits; in gratitude for those signal services, their pictures were put up in the Guildhall.

On the south side are eight, on the north side eight, and on the west end three; to which the city have lately added the picture, in full proportion, of lord chief justice Pratt, in grateful remembrance of that gentleman's uprightness, firmness, and conduct in the cause of liberty, which has deservedly given him a place with those worthy men, who stepped forth in the utmost danger to defend the weak from oppression, and to save mankind from ruin.

In the Lord-mayor's court, which is adorned with flag-stones and gildings, and also the figures of the four cardinal virtues, are the portraits of four other judges, in full proportion. This court is called the council chamber, and is well worthy of observation.

In this hall are held the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen; the court of common-council; the court of hustings; the court of orphans; two courts of the sheriffs; the court of wardmote; the court of hallmote; the court of requests, and the chamberlain's court.

The lotteries are drawn in this hall, which is likewise used for choosing the city officers, and members of parliament, and is large enough to contain near seven thousand persons.

King Henry the fourth dying suddenly, while he was paying his devotions at the shrine of Edward the confessor in Westminster-Abbey, his son Henry was proclaimed by the stile and title of Henry the fifth.

The dissolute life of this prince till the period of his father's death is well known; but that event no sooner happened, than he immediately dismissed his rakish companions, reformed his whole conduct, and acted as became the monarch and the man.

His former course of life, however, furnished his enemies with a pretence of disturbing their sovereign's tranquillity; and a conspiracy was even formed against his life; which coming to his majesty's knowledge, he sent an order to Sir Nicholas Falconer, mayor of London, to shut the gates of the city, and to apprehend all suspected persons.

In obedience to this command, the mayor issued his orders to the aldermen, each of whom kept a strong guard in his respective ward: and information having been received that some of the conspirators were to meet at the Axe-inn without Bishopsgate, the mayor, attended by a proper guard, went thither about midnight, and apprehended John Borgate, a carpenter, and seven other persons, who being examined, made a ready confession of their guilt.

On this occasion many others were apprehended, and committed to Newgate, where the number of delinquents was so great as to cause a dreadful pestilential disorder, by which the keeper, the turnkey, and sixty-four of the prisoners lost their lives.

In the year 1415, as Nicholas Wotton was riding to Westminster, (on the Lord-mayor's day) to qualify himself for the office of mayor, one of the king's messengers met him with a letter, by which he was informed of the victory which the king had obtained over the French at Agincourt.

In consequence of this good news, the mayor, on his return from Westminster, being accompanied by the bishop of Winchester, the lord high-chancellor, and other persons of rank, went to St. Paul's cathedral, and attended the Te Deum, which was sung in a most solemn manner.

On the day following, the queen, attended by the nobility, clergy, mayor, aldermen, and the several city companies, walked in solemn procession from St. Paul's to Westminster-abbey, where having made a rich oblation at the shrine of St. Edward, they returned in triumph to the city.

Soon after this, the king returned from France, with a great number of the French nobility, prisoners; on which occasion he was met on Blackheath, by the mayor, aldermen, and sheriffs of London, in scarlet robes, attended by three hundred of the principal citizens mounted on horses adorned with rich trappings.

In the road near Deptford this cavalcade was joined by a solemn and pompous procession of the clergy of London, in magnificent copes, and preceded by rich crosses, and censers smoking with frankincense.

The city of London was embellished, on this joyful occasion, with rich hangings of tapestry; the city conduit ran with divers sorts of wine for the entertainment of the populace, and a variety of stately pageants were erected, on which were placed children dressed in imitation of angels, who chaunted praises to God for the success of his majesty's arms.

On the morning succeeding these public rejoicings, the mayor, aldermen, and citizens went to Westminster, where they presented the king with a thousand pounds in gold, in two golden basons of the like value.

In the year 1416, Sir Henry Barton, mayor of London, ordered lanthorns to be hung out, for the purpose of lighting the streets by night; and this is the origin of a custom which is now become general in this city, and on which its safety in a great measure depends.

In the following year, the king being distressed for money to carry on the war with France, pawned his crown for twenty thousand marks to the bishop of Winchester, and his jewels for ten thousand to the citizens of London.

In the year 1419, Sir Thomas Eyre, who had been mayor of this city, compassionating the distresses to which the poor were frequently driven by the scarcity of corn, built Leadenhall at his sole expence, and gave it to the city, as a public granary, granary, for the purpose of laying up a quantity of corn as a reserve, to be used in times of necessity.

In the east side of this building was originally a chapel, in which was founded a fraternity of the trinity, consisting of sixty priests, besides other brethren and sisters; and some one or more of the priests were enjoined to perform divine service every market day, to such persons as frequented the market.

After this period, the common beam for weighing wool was erected, and a public market for foreign commodities was held in Leadenhall; and since that it was occupied as an armory, in which the military utensils of the city were deposited; but at present it is converted into warehouses, for leather, wool, and other commodities, and the area is a market for hides, leather, and butchers meat.

On the thirty first day of August, 1422, king Henry the fifth died in France, from whence his corpse was brought to England, and carried through London in a pompous manner, on an open chariot, drawn by four horses, to St. Paul's cathedral, where the funeral obsequies being performed, the body was carried to Westminster, and deposited among the remains of his royal progenitors.

At this funeral, James, king of Scotland, assisted as chief mourner, and was attended by the princes of the blood, almost all the nobility, and the principal gentry of the kingdom.

CHAPTER XXII.

The accession of Henry VI. Newgate rebuilt. The bishop of Winchester attempts to surprize the city of London, but is frustrated. The king's letter concerning the ancient liberties of the city, with the answer thereto. A pernicious statute respecting apprentices repealed. The reception of the king on his return from Paris. Tyburn water brought to the standard in Cheap-side. A remarkable severe frost. Act of parliament respecting the sale of fish. Water brought to Aldermanbury, Cripplegate, and Fleet-street. A dreadful scarcity of corn. A violent storm of wind. Sir Richard Wick burnt on account of religion. The cross in Cheap-side rebuilt. The Merchant-Tailors endeavour to set aside the choice of a mayor. The king's letter on that subject. The steeple of St. Paul's burnt by lightning.

ON the death of Henry the fifth, his son, at that time only eight months and a few days old was advanced to the throne, by the name of Henry the sixth; and in the month of November following, the young monarch was carried through the city, in his mother's lap, in an open chair, to the parliament then sitting at Westminster.

Soon after the young king's accession to the throne, in the year 1423, a petition was presented to the king in council, for permission to remove the prisoners out of Newgate, in order to rebuild that prison, in conformity to the will of Sir Richard Wittington, late Lord-mayor of London; and the petition being granted, the work was performed under the inspection of Sir Richard's executors.

About the year 1426, the bishop of Winchester, who was great uncle to the king, formed a design of seizing the protectorship into his own hands; and as the most likely method to accomplish his ends, determined to surprize the city of London.

The duke of Gloucester, who was protector, having received intelligence that this bold plan was intended to be carried into execution, in the night succeeding the Lord-mayor's day, when the citizens were engaged in festivity, he sent an order to the Lord-mayor to raise such a number of citizens as might be sufficient to defeat the attempt.

Sir John Coventry, the mayor, obeyed this order so effectually, that when the bishop's archers and men at arms attempted to force a passage at London-bridge, they were easily repulsed, and the insurrection was wholly suppressed, with very little damage on either side.

In the year 1426, the following interesting letter was sent by king Henry the sixth to the mayor and aldermen of London.

" Henry, by the grace of God, king of England and France, and lord of Ireland, to the mayor and aldermen of the city of London, greeting. Willing for certain causes to be certified upon the tenors of divers liberties and customs of the aforesaid city, and concerning the records, and memoranda of servants and natives coming to the aforesaid city, and tarrying there for a year and a day, without complaint of their lords or masters before you had, and inrolled in our court of our chamber of Guildhall, of the aforesaid city, as is said: We command you the mayor, distinctly and openly, to send the tenor of the liberties, customs, records, and memoranda, aforesaid, to us in our chancery, under our seal, and this our brief. Witness myself at Westminster, the twentieth day of January, in the seventh year of our reign."

To this letter the mayor and aldermen returned the following answer, viz. that

" In the time of holy king Edward, heretofore king of England, and before, and from all time in memory of man, then was extant such dignity, liberty, and loyal custom, among others

" others was had, used, and approved, in the city
 " of London, which is, and from all time hath
 " been called, the free chamber of the king of " England, as from ancient time it was used, and " had as in the great city of Troy; to wit, that " every servant, whosoever he were, that came " to the city of London, and tarried in it for a " year and a day, without being reclaimed by " his lord there, afterwards he may, ought, and
 " hath accustomed through his whole life, so " freely and securely to tarry there, as it were in
 " the house or chamber of the king: and hence
 " it is, that the same holy king Edward, amongst " other things, by his laws remaining upon re" cord, in the treasury of Guildhall of the said
 " city, and reciting the city itself to be the head
 " of the kingdom, and that it was founded like
 " and after the manner of old Troy; and that it
 " containeth in it the laws, liberties, dignities,
 " and royal customs of Great Troy: he appointed
 " and ordained, that the said city of London may
 " have and keep every where, by one inviolabi-
 " lity always, all her old usages and customs,
 " wheresoever the king himself shall be, whether
 " on an expedition or otherwise. And that after" wards, William the conqueror, king of Eng" land, by his charter, which remaineth of the " record, in the same treasury, granted to the " men of London, that they be worthy of all
 " that, both law and right, as they were in the
 " the days of the foresaid Edward: and moreover
 " that the said William the king, among other " laws at the said city made, with the consent of
 " noble and wise men of the whole kingdom,
 " and remaining in the said treasury, likewise
 " remaining of record, appointed and ordained
 " that if servants remain without complaint by
 " a year and a day, in a burgh compassed with a
 " wall, or in castles, or in the cities of the said
 " king; whence the said city of London, to that " time, and from all time before was one, and the " more principal of the whole kingdom, as is
 " said before; from that day let them become
 " freemen, and let them be for ever free and
 " quit from the yoke of their servitude." And
 " the record of this transaction further saith, " It " is to be noted, that the laws, recitements, and
 " statutes of holy king Edward, of which men" tion is made above, are contained in folio 34
 " of this book, under the title De Heretockis et
 " libertatibus London: and in folio 113 of the " book of Customs of the said city; and in folio
 " 36 of the book called Recordatorium London,
 " &c. and in folio 162 of the Red Book in the " exchequer, called The True Charter: by which
 " the said lord the conqueror, hath confirmed
 " to the citizens of London, all rights and laws
 " which they had in the time of holy king Ed" ward, together with certain other charters, by " which the said lord, immediately after the con" quest, gave the whole hyde and land of the " city of London, whereof he had been possessed
 " in his demesne, to the men of the said city,
 " patent and remanent under the seal of the said
 " king, in the custody of the chamberlain, in
 " the treasury of the said city: which charters
 " are contained and incorporated into the great
 " charter of the liberties and customs of the " city of London; and are confirmed by the lord

 " the king, (Henry the sixth) and his progeni" tors. But the tenor of the said charters are " patent in the Latin tongue, in folio 238 of the
 " ordinations of the said city."

By an act of parliament passed in the seventh year of king Henry the fourth, it had been ordained, that no person should be admitted to put out their children as apprentices to any trade, unless they were worth twenty shillings per annum;
 and all persons presuming to take as apprentices
 the children of any parents so disqualified were liable to a heavy penalty mentioned in the statute.

The citizens, considering this as a grievous oppression, applied to parliament for redress, in the year 1426; and, in consideration of the great services which the city had rendered to the king,
 this act was repealed.

The favours abovementioned gave occasion for the grand and splendid reception which the king met with on his return from Paris, where he had been crowned.

On the twenty-first day of February 1427, his majesty was met on Blackheath, by the mayor of this city, dressed in crimson velvet, a large furred velvet hat, an ornament of gold about his neck, falling down behind, and a golden girdle about his waist.

The chief magistrate was followed by three horsemen, cloathed in scarlet studded with silver, and attended by the aldermen in scarlet gowns,
 and a great number of the principal citizens in white gowns and scarlet hoods, each riding on a stately horse, and having the symbol of his trade or mystery embroidered on his sleeve.

On this occasion the city was adorned with rich silks and carpets, and a great number of pageants were erected, in which were placed persons representing the graces and sciences, who congratulated his majesty in songs and speeches.

Two days afterwards the mayor and aldermen waited on the king at Westminster, and presented him with a thousand pounds, in nobles, in a golden hamper, in the name of the citizens of London.

In the year 1429, Sir John Wells, late mayor of this city, laid a number of pipes, at his own expence, to convey water from Tyburn, to the standard in Cheapside.

A most severe frost began on the twenty-fourth of November, 1434, which continuing till the tenth of February following, the river Thames was entirely frozen up, so that the navigation being entirely impeded, the ships from foreign parts were obliged to be unladed at the mouth of the river, and their cargoes brought to London
 by land carriage.

As the fishmongers of London, in defiance of former laws, endeavoured to monopolize the sale of fish, an act of parliament was passed in the year 1435, by which it was ordained, that "No " person whatever should presume to hinder or
 " obstruct any fisherman, either foreign or do" mestic, from disposing of his fish as he should
 " see convenient, on the penalty of ten pounds."

In the year 1438, conduits were erected in Aldermanbury, at Cripplegate, and in Fleet-street, which were supplied with water from Highbury-H h barn

barn and Tyburn, at the sole expence of Sir William Eastfield, knight of the bath, and mayor of this city.

During the harvest season of this year, there were such excessive storms of wind and rain that a great part of the crops of corn were destroyed, so that the poor in some parts of the country were reduced to the necessity of making a kind of bread of ivy-berries and fern-roots; and though this calamity was severely felt in London, yet, by the care and humanity of the mayor, who sent ships to Prussia to fetch rye, when the scarcity first began, the city was so far supplied, as to prevent the dreadful consequences of a total famine.

On the twenty-fifth of November in this same year, there happened a most violent storm of wind, by which many churches and houses were uncovered, and almost half of the houses in the Old Change, near Cheapside, quite blown down.

In the year 1440, Sir Richard Wick, vicar of Hermetsworth, in Essex, was burnt on Tower-hill, on account of his religious tenets; and as he had the reputation of being a man of remarkable sanctity, the vicar of Barking embraced this opportunity of imposing upon the people, by mixing a quantity of odoriferous spices with some ashes, which he privately strewed on the place where Wick had been burnt, in order to induce the people to worship him as a martyr to the faith.

This trick drew numbers of people to the spot, who began to invoke the deceased as a deity, and offer statues of wax, and money at his shrine, which the impostor repaid, by presenting them with the ashes as sacred relicks, and supplying the place with fresh ashes during the night.

After this farce had been carried on for about a week, the vicar was seized and imprisoned, and in a short time afterwards, the whole cheat was discovered by his own confession.

In the year 1441, John Hatherley, the mayor of London, applied to king Henry the sixth, for permission to rebuild, in a beautiful manner, the cross in Cheapside, which had been erected by Edward the first, in the year 1290, in memory of Eleanor his queen.

This magistrate likewise, at the same time, solicited the royal aid towards repairing the common granary of the city, and the conduits, as well as for completing other improvements then carrying on for the supplying the city with water: and the king granted his several requests, as will appear by the following letter.

“ The king to whom these shall come, greeting. Know ye, That whereas our beloved John Hatherley, mayor, and the citizens of London, do intend, for the common utility and decency of all the said city, and for the universal advantage; likewise for the well-pleasing of all liege subjects flowing thither from other parts, at convenient places therein, as it well becomes them so to do, to build and erect divers aqueducts of fresh water, with standards and other machines, and leaden pipes, which have and do run under and above the earth, above three miles; and to rebuild a certain common granary, and a certain beautiful cross in the “ West-cheap of the said city, which may serve for a reservoir, or, as it were, a mother to the said conduits or aqueducts; which works cannot be performed without a very large quantity of lead, and workmen proper to carry on the said works; we, well considering the utility, decency, and advantage of the said works, do, of our special grace, grant and give our licence for completing the same; and for the said citizens to take up two hundred fodder of lead for the building thereof, and to impress plumbers and labourers, &c. for carrying on the said work, paying them their wages.”

In the year 1442, Robert Clopton, a member of the Draper's company, and Ralph Holland, a Merchant-Taylor, were returned to the court of aldermen, for their choice of one of them to be mayor for the year ensuing; when they made choice of the former, agreeable to the ancient custom of the city: on which a number of persons belonging to the Merchant-Taylor's company, being supported by many of the inferior citizens, demanded that Ralph Holland should be mayor, and proceeded to such unwarrantable lengths in support of their demand, that Sir John Paddesley, the mayor, was obliged to commit several of the rioters to Newgate, who being severely punished, there was an end of the disturbance for the present.

This affair, however, did not end here; for the Merchant-Taylor's party made no scruple of declaring that they would oppose the next election; whereupon the king was applied to, who issued a letter to the following effect.

“ That whereas the mayors of London used to be chosen by the aldermen, and certain more discreet persons of the said city, especially summoned and warned for that purpose; yet some that had not, nor ought to have, any interest in such elections, came, and with their noise and clamour disturbed them, with an intention to choose such who might afterwards favour their evil-doing and errors: He therefore, willing to provide for the quiet and peace of his subjects, and to apply a suitable remedy on this behalf, did command and firmly enjoin the mayor and sheriffs, to make proclamation through all the city and liberty, before the time of the election of a mayor, strictly forbidding, that none be present at such election, or any way, or under any colour, thrust himself into it, but such as by right, and according to the custom of the city, ought to be there; and that such election be made by the aldermen and other of the more discreet and able citizens, especially warned and summoned according to the custom aforesaid: letting them know for certain, that if any, some other way elected, were presented to him, or his treasurer, and barons of the exchequer, they would by no means admit him: and that they should arrest and commit to prison all those who should act contrary to the said proclamation and prohibition.”

On the eve of Candlemas day in the year 1444, there there was a dreadful storm of thunder and lightning, by which the steeple of St. Paul's church was set on fire; but by immediate assistance it was thought to be extinguished: yet between eight and nine o'clock at night, the flames again broke out, and consumed almost all the wooden frame of the steeple.

CHAPTER XXIII.

The murder of the duke of Gloucester. Singular petition to parliament for a licence to open grammar schools. The rebellion of Jack Cade, and the consequences thereof. First use of barges on Lord-Mayor's day. The king taken prisoner and the duke of York made protector of England. Riots in St. Martin's-le-Grand and Cheapside. The court greatly alarmed. Five thousand citizens mount guard. The royal army refused admission, and the earl of March's army received into the city. King Henry VI. deposed, and the earl of March chosen king, by the name of Edward IV.

IN the year 1447, the duke of Gloucester, uncle to the king, being obnoxious to the queen and her party, on account of his great virtues and abilities, was falsely charged with a design to murder the king; upon which they seized and committed him to prison; but conscious that they should not be able to support the charge against the worthy duke, they procured him to be privately murdered during the first night of his imprisonment, and causing his body to be exposed on the following day, they reported that he had died of the apoplexy.

Five of his Grace's domesticks being likewise seized, were brought to their trial, and sentence of death being passed upon them, they were drawn to Tyburn, where they were hanged, but cut down alive, stripped naked, and marked with a knife, in order to their being quartered; but at this instant the duke of Suffolk produced a pardon, and being brought back to the city, they all recovered.

About this period the public schools for the education of youth had so far gone to decay, that the grossest ignorance prevailed among the people in general.

To remedy this defect, by improving the rising generation in grammatical knowledge, four clergymen petitioned the parliament for leave to set up schools in the respective parishes of Allhallows the Great, St. Andrew, Holborn, St. Peter, Cornhill, and St. Mary, Colechurch, with liberty for their several successors to continue the said schools.

As this petition may be supposed to have been drawn up by men of learning, with their greatest care, and the utmost exertion of their abilities, we have carefully transcribed it from the records in the Tower of London, as a curious specimen of the language and manner of spelling then in use.

"To the ful worthie and discrete communes
"in this present parlement assemblyd to conside
"the grete Nombre of gramer scholes that
"sometyme were in divers parties of this realme,
"besides those that were in London, and how

"few ben in these dayes, and the grete hurt is "caused of this, not oonly in the spiritual partie
"of the chirche, where oftentye it apperith to "openly in som persones with grete shame, but "also in the temporal partie; to whom also it is "full expedyent to have competent congruite for
"many causes, as to your wisdomes apperith.

"And for asmuche as to the citee of London is
"the common concourse of this land, som lake
"of schole Maistres in their own contree, for to "be enfourmed of gramer ther, and som for
"the grete Almes of lordes, merchants, and
"others, that which is in London, more plen-
"teously, sobner than manie other places of this
"reaume, to such pouere creatures as never
"should have be brought to so greet vertu and
"counyng as thei have, ne had hit been by the "meane of the Almes above said:

"Wherefore it were expedyent that in Lon"don were a sufficient nombre of scholes, and
"good enfourmers in gramer; and not, for the "singular avail of two or three persones griev-
"ously to hurt the moltitude of yong people
"of al this land. For wher ther is grete
"nombre of lerners and few techers; and al the
"lerners be compelled to go to the few techers,
"and to noon others, the maistres waxen rich
"of monie, and the lerners pourer in counyng,
"as experyence openlie shewith ayenst all vertu
"and ordre of well publik.

"And these premisses movent and sturen of "greet devocion and pitee maistre William
"Lycchefeld person of the parish chirche of
"Al Hallowen the Moor in London, Maistre
"Gilbert, person of Seint Andrew Holbourne,
"in the suburbs of the said citee, Maistre John
"Cote, person of Seint Petre in Cornhul of "London, and John Neel, Maistre of the hous
"or Hospital of Seint Thomas of Acres, and
"person of Colchirche in London; to compleyne
"unto you, and for remedie besechn you, to pray
"the kyng our soveraign lord, that he by the
"the advys and assent of the lords spirituel and
"temporel in this present parliament assembled,
"and by authoritie of the same parliament, will "provide, ordeyne, and graunt to the said Maistre

"Williams

“ William and his successors, that they in the “ said parich of Al Hallowen, to the said “ Maistre Gilbert, and his successors, that they
 “ in the said parich of Seint Andrew, to the said “ Maistre John and his successors, that they in
 “ the said parich of Seint Petre, and to the said “ John Maistre, [of the said hospital] and his “ successors; that they within the foresaid parich
 “ of our ladie of Colchirche, in the which said
 “ house of St. Thomas is sette; may ordeyne, “ create, establish, and sett a person sufficientlie
 “ lerned in gramer, to hold and exercise a schole
 “ in the same science of gramer, and is there
 “ to tech to al that will lern.

“ And that everiche of the said Maistres,
 “ Maistre William, Maistre Gilbert, Maistre
 “ John, and John Neel, Maistre; such schole-“ Maistre, so bi him sett, and everiche of their “ successors, such schole-Maistre bi him, or bi “ any of his predecessors so established and sett,
 “ specially as is above rehersed, may in his own “ parich or place remove, and another in his “ place substitute, and sett, as any of the said “ persones, or their successors semeth, [and] the “ cause reasonable so requireth.

“ And so to do ich of the said persones and
 “ and their successors, as often as it happenyth
 “ any of the said scholes to be void of a schole“ maistre in any manner wyse, to the honour of “ God, and encreasyng of vertu.”

The following is the answer given to the above recited: “ the king wille that it be done as it is “ desired, so that it be done bi th’ advyse of the “ ordinary, the relles of archbishops of Canter“ bury for the tyme being.”

In the year 1450, one Jack Cade, a native of Ireland, who greatly resembled John Mortimer, a prince of the blood of the family of March,
 who had been beheaded in the beginning of this reign, began a scene of imposture of a very extraordinary kind.

Cade, who had served as a soldier in France, “ under the duke of York, was nothing more than the tool of that prince, who thought it ad-viseable to prepare the nation for his design of ascending the throne, by exciting their affection to the house of Mortimer.

The courage, capacity, and spirit of Cade, had well qualified him for the part he was to act; and he had no sooner received his instructions from the duke of York’s agents, than he assumed the name of John Mortimer, pretending to be the son of John Mortimer, the person who had been beheaded; and repairing to the county of Kent, in which the duke of York had a great number of adherents, he collected a strong body of male-contents, on pretence of delivering the people from the burden of taxes, and redressing the grievances of the nation.

Such prodigious numbers of people soon flocked to his standard, that finding himself in a condition to advance towards London, he marched, and encamped on Blackheath with all his forces.

From hence Cade sent letters of safe conduct to Thomas Cock, a draper in the city, who repaired to him for the transacting some affairs between Cade and some of the citizens; and in one of the letters he enjoined the said Cock to demand horses, arms, and a thousand marks in money of the Genoa, Venetian, and Florence merchants residing in London.

As soon as the king received intelligence of this rebellion, he sent a messenger to demand the cause of their appearance in arms; to whom Cade, in the name of the rest, replied, that they had no design against the person of his majesty; but their intention was to address the parliament, that all evil ministers might receive their deserts; and in particular he demanded that the duke of Somerfet should be punished for the loss of Normandy, and that the king’s council might be composed of the princes of the blood, and other wise and worthy persons; and not of wretches equally contemptible for the weakness of their intellects, and the depravity of their hearts.

The king in council being informed of Cade’s proposals, the council immediately condemned them as arrogant and seditious, and determined to suppress the rebellion by force of arms; and an army of fifteen thousand men being assembled, the king advanced at their head towards Blackheath.

As his majesty advanced, Cade retired, as if afraid of coming to an engagement, and retreated into a wood near Sevenoaks in Kent, expecting that the king’s army emboldened at his retreat, would pursue him in disorder; but Henry, imagining that the rebels were totally dispersed, returned towards London, having first detached a small party in pursuit of the fugitives, under the command of lord Stafford, who falling into the ambuscade, he and all his followers were cut to pieces.

As soon as Cade had gained this advantage, he again marched towards London; while the king and court retired hastily to Kenilworth castle, having left a strong garrison in the Tower of London, under the command of lord Scales.

The citizens of London, being either averse to the government, or terrified at the success of the rebels, opened the gates at their approach, and Cade entered in triumph, at the head of his troops, which had been greatly augmented since his victory: but he forbade his followers, on the severest penalties, to commit the least outrage on the citizens, or give the slightest cause of complaint.

It is recorded of this celebrated impostor, that in his march through Cannon-street, he struck
 London-stone with his sword, and exclaimed, “ now is Mortimer lord of this city!” In the evening Cade withdrew to Southwark, but returned to London on the following day, and hearing that the lord treasurer Say was in the city, he gave immediate orders for his being apprehended, and caused him to be beheaded without any form of trial.

Thus did Cade continue for some days to enter the city in the morning, and retire at night, that he might not give offence to the citizens, with whom, for some time, he maintained a good understanding.

At length, however, the rebels having pillaged several of the citizens, and committed many violent

violent outrages, Cade one morning found the gate of the bridge shut and secured against him.

Hereupon he attempted to force a passage; upon which a battle ensued between the citizens and the rebels, which lasted till night put an end to the combat.

The archbishop of Canterbury, and the lord chancellor, who had taken refuge in the Tower, being informed by their emissaries that the rebels were greatly dispirited by this repulse, and heartily tired of the rebellion; they immediately drew up an act of amnesty, confirmed by the sanction of the great seal, which they caused to be published in Southwark before the next evening.

This expedient produced an effect as happy as it was sudden; for the rebels, anxious to escape the punishment due to their crimes, deserted in such numbers, that, by break of day, Cade found himself almost alone, and was obliged to take shelter in the woods of Sussex.

His flight was no sooner known, than the government issued a proclamation, with a reward of a thousand marks, to any person who should take him, alive or dead; and it was not long before he was discovered in a garden, at Hothfield in Sussex, by Alexander Eden, a Kentish gentleman, who endeavoured to apprehend him; but Cade fought till he was killed on the spot; and his body being brought in a cart to London, his head was cut off and fixed upon London-bridge, together with the heads of nine of his accomplices.

Thus happily ended this dangerous rebellion, chiefly through the bravery of the citizens of London, whose courageous resistance of the insurgents at London-bridge, paved the way for all the happy consequences that followed.

In the year 1451, Godfrey Fielding, mayor of London, being greatly in favour with the king, his majesty created him one of his privy-counsellors. We mention not this circumstance as a matter of any great importance in itself, but to obviate a mistake which has lately prevailed, that Mr. Harley, late Lord-mayor of London, was the first person in that rank of life that was ever honoured with a seat in the privy-council.

The custom of the Lord-mayor elect being rowed in a barge to Westminster, in order to qualify himself for his office, took its rise in the year 1454, when John Norman, the newly chosen mayor, having built an elegant barge at his own expence, his example was imitated by the several city companies, who attended him in their respective barges, magnificently painted, and adorned with flags and streamers.

The queen and her party continuing to influence all the king's actions, the affections of his subjects were at length so entirely alienated from him, that great numbers of them joined the duke of York, who with an army composed of Welshmen and the dissatisfied English, engaged the king's army at St. Alban's, and after an obstinate battle, Henry was taken prisoner, sent to London, and confined in the palace of the bishop of that diocese.

The battle above-mentioned happened in the week before Whitsuntide, soon after which the parliament assembled, removed all the king's evil counsellors, and made choice of the duke of York to be protector of the kingdom.

At this period there were several extraordinary riots in this city, of which the two following were the most remarkable. A number of the inhabitants of St. Martin's-le-Grand assembled; and having violently assaulted the citizens, several of whom they beat and wounded, they returned to their habitations within the sanctuary of their church.

This affair being represented to the mayor and aldermen, they went to the monastery with proper attendants, forced open the door and seized the rioters, whom they committed to prison.

Hereupon the dean of Westminster complained to the king that the mayor and aldermen had been guilty of a breach of privilege; upon which they were summoned before the king and council, then at Egle in Hertfordshire, who, after a long examination, dismissed them; with an order to detain the rioters in custody till his majesty should come to London, and enquire more particularly into the merits of the affair.

The particulars of the other riot are as follow. A young mercer of the city of London, having resided some time in Italy, where, by the laws of the country, he was forbid to wear a dagger, being returned to England, accidentally met an Italian in Cheapside, with a dagger by his side. This circumstance so highly offended the mercer, that he snatched the dagger and broke the foreigner's head with it, affirming, that as himself had not been allowed to wear a weapon in Italy; neither should the other in London.

The Italian applied to the Lord-mayor for redress, who summoned the mercer to appear before himself and the whole court of aldermen, and, upon full conviction of his guilt, sentenced him to be imprisoned in Newgate: but as the proper officers were conveying him to the jail, a number of servants in the mercery business, stopped them near the end of Laurence-lane, Cheapside; and rescued the prisoner.

The populace, taking the advantage of the confusion which this affair occasioned, immediately assembled in great numbers, and plundered the houses of the most eminent Italian merchants in the city; nor was the tumult appeased without bloodshed; while the mercer who had occasioned all the disturbance, took sanctuary in the abbey church of St. Peter, where he remained till the whole matter was adjusted.

The report of these riots gave great uneasiness to the queen and her party, who apprehended that they might be set on foot by the adherents of the duke of York: whereupon her majesty dispatched the dukes of Exeter and Buckingham, with other noblemen, to assist the mayor and aldermen in the trial and punishment of the offenders.

A court was accordingly held at Guildhall, and they were proceeding to impanel the jury, when the mob assembled in greater numbers than ever, and threatened that if their fellow-citizens, then in prison on account of the late riots, were tried, they would take a severe revenge.

These threats so intimidated the court, that they

they immediately broke up, and the queen's commissioners retired with the utmost precipitation: but the mayor, foreseeing that if a stop was not put to the riotous proceedings of the populace, there would be an end of all civil government in the city, he summoned a court or common-council, to meet at Guildhall on the following day, and strictly enjoined the warden of every fellowship to assemble his whole fellowship at the respective halls that very afternoon, and to charge every member of their community, to keep, in his own person, and endeavour to maintain the peace of the city: and that if they should discover or suspect any person inclined to attempt the forcible release of such persons as were in prison, the said warden should, by fair means, endeavour to persuade the parties so disposed to change their sentiments, and in the mean time give their name or names privately to the mayor.

The consequence of this proceeding was, that all tumults subsided, and the queen's commissioners returning to the city, the prisoners were brought to their trial, three of whom were condemned and hanged at Tyburn, and several others fined in considerable sums of money.

It having been found by experience that the four grammar schools already founded were productive of great public good; five other schools were now opened, (under the auspices of the archbishop of Canterbury, and the bishop of London) which were respectively situated within the church-yard of St. Paul; at the collegiate church of St. Martin-le-Grand; at Bow-church in Cheapside; at St. Dunstan's in the east; and at the hospital of St. Anthony.

Towards the close of the year 1456 two whales, a sword-fish, and a fish called Mors Marina, were taken in the river Thames near Erith; which the inhabitants of London, who were at that time amazingly superstitious, considered as the sure prognosticks of public calamity and misfortune.

A power having been granted to the curates of the churches of London, in the year 1453, to levy certain rates or offerings upon the laity, it had given rise to many disputes between the clergy and their parishioners: but in the year 1457, these disputes were finally adjusted, by the clergy agreeing to accept, and the laity to pay, the following composition.

The composition of all offering within the city of LONDON and suburbs of the same.

" First, that every person, dweller and inhabitant in any house in London, or its suburbs, who hireth and occupieth the same at 10s per annum, shall offer to God, and to the church in whose parish such house standeth, one farthing on each of the feast days, hereafter mentioned; viz. on every Sunday in the year, Christmas-day, circumcision, epiphany, purification of our lady, ascension of our Lord, Corpus Christi, St. Matthew, St. Simon and Jude, All-saints, St. Andrew, conception of the blessed Virgin, St. Thomas the apostle, St. Peter and Paul, St. James and St. Bartholomew, assumption and nativity of our lady, dedication day: to be kept for all the churches

" in London from henceforward on the 3d of October yearly; and also on the patron's day of each church in London and its suburbs. And if such inhabited houses be let for 20s. to pay two farthings or a halfpenny; if for 30s. to pay three farthings: if for 40s. to pay 1d. if for 50s. to pay 1d. one farthing. And so every sum, ascending and descending by 10s. into what sum soever, shall always offer one farthing, after the rate of 10s. at the foresaid feasts.—And he, who rents houses in divers parishes within London and its suburbs, shall pay or offer the same, for each house, to the church in which parish it stands. Provided that should it happen two of the said feasts fall on one day, the offering shall be only for one day. That a house, rented at 6s. 8d. shall offer only four times in the year, on the four principal feasts of the church, of which he is a parishioner. And all above 6s. 8d. and under 10s. to pay 1d. one farthing once a year. Provided always that if the said dweller go before the curate, and there declare, upon his faith and truth, that he may not pay his said money according to the ordinance aforesaid, be within 10s. that the said curate shall holden him, ayght or naught, and the dweller thereupon shall be quit. Also if the rent of the house exceeds 10s. and does not amount to 30s. and so to any sum being between 10s. and 10s. the inhabitant shall pay to the curate five farthings for every shilling of the said sum that shall be between ten and ten. Where a house is taken together, and afterwards let out into apartments for divers people, then the person who took the whole house, and inhabiteth the principal part thereof, shall pay an offering to his parish church for the whole rent, if the said house be inhabited and occupied as dwelling-places. But if the person, who rents the whole house, does not dwell in any part thereof, and lets it out again, then he that dwelleth in the principal part shall offer all, and the rest 4d. by the year. Also every warehouse, shop, cellar, wharf, stable, crane, ground, garden, or place, shall pay, for every pound, they be let for, 6d. offering to the curate of the church, in which they shall stand, without any other offering; and 3d. for 10s. per ann. rent; and more or less as they shall be let for more or less than 10s. per ann. It was also provided, that all apprentices and servants and hired men within the said city, not charged with such rent and houses, which shall be householder at Easter, or about Easter, shall four times in the year, at the four principal feasts offer to God and to the church. Also as for personal tythes, the parishioners are neither charged nor discharged; saving that hereafter no curate shall vex, trouble, sue, or deny sacraments or service for non-payment of the same; but leave them to the piety and conscience of the parishioners. Also all proceedings or suits, hitherto carried on for tythes or offerings before this day, shall stop and never be brought into controversy any more: but all such things, done before this day, shall be remitted and forgiven by both parties."

It

It is proper to observe, that at this time, there were, within the city of London, and the suburbs thereof, one hundred and eighteen parish churches.

In the year 1458, the king and queen, the dukes of York, Exeter, and Somerset, the earls of Warwick, Northumberland and Salisbury, and the lords Egermond, and Clifford, having arrived in the city of London, and all of them being attended by great numbers of guards; (the lowest number being four hundred) Godfrey Buloigne, the Lord-mayor, began to be apprehensive for the safety of the city; upon which he caused five thousand citizens to mount guard, under his own command, and two thousand every night, under the command of three aldermen; by which prudent measure the peace of the city was preserved, till the departure of its illustrious, but unwelcome visitors.

The measures of the court were at length so oppressive as not to be endured; when the earl of March, chiefly on the invitation of the Londoners, landed at Sandwich, in Kent, from Calais.

The king was no sooner informed of the earl's arrival in England, than he commanded lord Scales to march with a large body of troops, to possess himself of the city of London; but the Lord-mayor refused to admit an army within the line of his jurisdiction; and told lord Scales, that he wanted no assistance, either in the government or defence of the city.

Hereupon that nobleman, who foresaw the intention of the citizens to admit the earl of March, possessed himself of the Tower, and threatened to lay the city in ashes, in case the rebels were admitted.

It appears, however, that these menaces had but little weight with the Londoners; for the earl of March no sooner appeared before the gates of the city, than he was received with every possible demonstration of joy.

The metropolis having thus declared for the earl, he immediately marched at the head of twenty-five thousand men, in search of the king, leaving the earl of Salisbury, with the remainder of his army, to defend the city against lord Scales, who really did as he had threatened, firing guns upon the city in such a manner, as to destroy many houses and kill several people.

Hereupon the earl of Salisbury blocked up the Tower on all sides, and erected a battery on the opposite side of the Thames, which soon prevented Scales from firing on the city.

In a short time after this the king's army was routed at Northampton, which being followed by many other advantages on the side of the earl of March, the latter was, at length, received into London with every possible testimony of joy; and in a convention of the nobility, clergy, gentry and citizens, held at Baynard's castle, king Henry was deposed, and the earl of March unanimously chosen king by the name of Edward IV.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Edward the fourth proclaimed. Crowned. Grants a valuable charter to the citizens. Particulars of the second charter of king Edward the fourth. Sentence of excommunication pronounced against the wearers of long-toed shoes. A jury punished for perjury.

KING Henry was no sooner deposed, than Edward the fourth was proclaimed at the usual places of making proclamation in the cities of London and Westminster.

One of the first actions of this monarch evinced an arbitrary turn of mind, which does him no small dishonour. One Walker, a grocer, who lived at the sign of the crown in Cheapside, having, in a joke, said that he would make his son heir to the crown, (meaning his own sign) it came to the knowledge of the king, who ordered the unfortunate man to be beheaded in Smithfield, which was accordingly performed on the eighth day after the king's accession to the throne.

On the twenty-seventh of June, 1460, being the day appointed for his majesty's coronation, he rode from the Tower through the city in great state to Westminster, where the ceremony was performed.

This monarch, in the second year of his reign, in grateful acknowledgment of repeated favours from the citizens of London, granted them a valuable charter, of which we have subjoined a faithful copy, that our fellow-citizens may be well instructed in their ancient, chartered, and invaluable privileges!

“ Edward, by the grace of God, king of “ England and France, and lord of Ireland, to “ all archbishops, &c. greeting. Although as “ we understand such things altogether as ought “ to be holden and determined by conservators of “ the peace, and justices assigned for hearing and “ determining divers felonies, trespasses, and “ misdemeanors, in all the counties of our realm
“ of England, by the king's authority, by virtue “ of the ordinances and statutes of our realm “ aforesaid, made for the good of the peace, and “ rule of our people, have always, time out of “ mind, been used and well affirmed, and yet be
“ in our city of London: nevertheless, to the end “ that from henceforth one good, certain and “ undoubted manner may be continually had in “ our city, for the conservation of the peace, and “ governing our people of the same; and that “ the same may always be, and remain a city of “ peace and quietness: we will of our mere “ motion, and by tenor of these presents do “ grant, for us, and as much as in us is, to the “ mayor and commonalty of the city aforesaid,
“ and to the citizens of the same, and to their suc“ cessors for ever, that they may have and hold
“ all and singular their liberties and free customs,

“ as

“ as whole and sound as ever they had and held
 “ them in all time of our progenitors. And fur“ ther we grant, for us and our heirs aforesaid,
 “ to the mayor and commonalty, and citizens,
 “ and to their successors, the liberties and autho“ rities, acquittals and franchises, under written;
 “ that is to say, that from henceforth the mayor
 “ and recorder of the said city who now be, and “ their successors, and the mayors and recorders “ which for the time shall be, as well those al“ dermen which before this time have been “ mayors of the same city, as other aldermen
 “ who shall hereafter sustain the charge of mayor“ alty, and shall not be thereof dismissed as long
 “ as they shall there remain aldermen for ever;
 “ shall be conservators of the present peace of “ our city, and the peace of our successors of the “ said city and liberties thereof as well by land
 “ as by water. And to keep or cause to be kept,
 “ all ordinances and statutes, made and to be “ made for the good of our peace, and for the “ quietness, rule, and government of our peo“ ple, in all their articles, as well within the “ city aforesaid, as the liberty and suburbs of the “ same, as well by land as by water, according “ to all the force, form and effect of the same.
 “ and to chastise and punish whom they shall “ find offending, contrary to the form and effect
 “ of the said ordinances and statutes, as accord“ ing to the form of the ordinances and statutes “ aforesaid, should be done. We will also and “ grant to the said mayor and commonalty and “ citizens, and their successors that the now
 “ mayor and his successors aforesaid, and the re“ corder of the said city which for the time shall “ be: and such aldermen as aforesaid, or four of “ the same, mayor, recorder, and aldermen, of “ whom we will that such mayor for the time “ being, and his successors, to be one, be ju“ stices, and have so assigned them justices for “ us and our successors for ever; to enquire,
 “ hear, and determine, as often and at such times
 “ as to them shall seem meet, of all manner of “ felonies, trespasses, forestalling and regratings, “ extortions and other misdemeanors within the
 “ said city, or the liberties or suburbs thereof,
 “ as well by land as by water, by whomsoever,
 “ or after what manner soever, done or commit“ ted, and which from henceforth shall happen
 “ to be done: and also to hear and determine,
 “ and execute all and singular other things which “ shall pertain to our justices of peace within our “ realm of England. So always, that the said “ mayor and citizens, and their successors, may “ have and hold all and singular their antient “ liberties and customs, whole, free, and sound,
 “ the premises in any thing notwithstanding.
 “ Given to our sheriffs of the city aforesaid for
 “ the time being, and to their successors, and to all “ whatsoever citizens of the said city, which “ now be, and which hereafter for the time shall “ be, by tenor of these presents; streightly in “ commandment, that they be attendant, coun“ selling, answering and aiding the said keepers
 “ of the peace aforesaid, the now mayor, re“ corder, and to their successors, and to such al“ dermen as aforesaid, in all things they do, or “ may pertain to the office of conservator of the “ peace, and of such justices within the said city,

 “ and the liberties thereof, according to the form “ aforesaid, as often, and at such times, as shall be
 “ by them, or any of them, on our behalf, duly “ required. Saving always to the mayor and com“ monalty, and the citizens of the same city, and
 “ to their successors, the customs, liberties and fran“ chises, which we will and strictly command to “ be inviolably observed in all things, as they
 “ and their predecessors before the making of “ these presents observed the same. And because “ we understand, that by the most ancient custom
 “ of the said city, it is there had, and in the cir“ cuits of the justices of our progenitors, some“ times kings of England, it is allowed to the “ said citizens, that the mayor and aldermen of “ the said city, for the time being, ought to re“ cord all their ancient customs by word of “ mouth, as often and at such time as any thing “ should be moved in act or question before any “ judges or justices touching their customs afore“ said; as in their claims in the last circuit of “ justices holden at our Tower of London it is “ more fully contained: We, considering the “ same thing, being willing rather to enlarge “ than diminish the custom of the said city, of “ our special grace have granted, for us, our “ heirs and successors, unto the said mayor and “ commonalty, and citizens, and their successors,
 “ that whensoever any issue shall be taken on any “ plea of, or upon the custom of the city of “ London, between any parties in pleading, (yea
 “ though themselves be parties) or if any thing
 “ in plea, act, and question, touching the said “ customs be moved, or happen before us or our “ heirs to be holden, the justices of the common “ bench, the treasurer and barons of our exche“ quer, or of our heirs, or before the barons of “ such like exchequer, or any other the justices
 “ of us, or our heirs, which shall exact or “ require inquisition, recognizance, certificate or “ trial, the same mayor and aldermen of the said
 “ city for the time being, and their successors, “ shall record, testify, and declare, whether such
 “ be a custom or not, by the recorder of the “ same city for the time being, by word of “ mouth; and that there may be speedy process
 “ by that record, certificate, and declaration, such “ custom so alledged shall be allowed for a cus“ tom, or accounted not for a custom, without “ any jury therefore to be taken, or further pro“ cess thereupon to be made. And furthermore “ we have granted to them, the mayor and com“ monalty, and citizens, that though they and “ their successors, or the said mayor and alder“ men, and their predecessors in time past, or “ their successors hereafter, have for some cause “ perchance fully not used, or abused any of the “ liberties, acquittals, grants, ordinances, arti“ cles, or free-customs, or other thing contained
 “ in these our writings, or in other our writings,
 “ or of our progenitors, sometimes kings of Eng“ land, to the same mayor and commonalty grant“ ed: notwithstanding we will not, that the same
 “ mayor and commonalty, aldermen and citizens,
 “ or their successors, shall therefore incur the “ forfeitures of any of the premises: but they
 “ and their successors may from henceforth fully enjoy

“ enjoy and use all and singular the liberties,
 “ grants, acquittals, ordinances, articles, free-“ customs, and other things whatsoever, so not “ used or abused, in the charters aforesaid con“ tained, and every of them, without impeach“ ment or let of us, or our heirs, justices, es-“ cheators, sheriffs, or other our bailiffs and “ ministers, or of any other whatsoever ally, sta“ tutes or ordinances made, or judgments given;
 “ or any other charters, or any the charters of our “ predecessors whatsoever, in times past granted “ to the contrary notwithstanding. And we, be“ ing willing further to do the said mayor and “ commonalty a greater pleasure; and also for “ the bettering and common profit of our said
 “ city, will and grant to the said mayor and com“ monalty, and their successors, that from hence“ forth all and singular merchants, as well deni“ zens as aliens, abiding within the said city,
 “ and the liberties and suburbs of the same, and “ exercising merchandizing or occupations there,
 “ by any means, by themselves or others, though
 “ they be not of the liberty of the same city,
 “ shall be partakers, shall be taxed, and contri“ bute according to their faculties in subsidies, “ tallages, grants, and other contributions what“ soever, by any means to be assessed, for the “ need of us, or of our heirs, or of the said city,
 “ for the maintenance of the state and profit of
 “ the same with the citizens of the said city: yet “ notwithstanding, that this our present grant be “ not in prejudice or derogation of any grants by “ us, or any of our progenitors, made or granted
 “ to those merchants of Almaine, which have an “ house in the city of London, which is commonly “ called the Guildhall of the Almaines, or their “ successors. And further, because it is well “ known and manifest, that those of the said city
 “ which are called elected, and taken to the de“ gree of aldermen, proper for the conditions and “ merits requiring the same, have sustained and “ supported great charges, cost, and pains, for the “ time they make their abode and residence in the “ same city, being vigilant for the common good,
 “ rule, and government of the same, and for that “ cause oftentimes do leave their possessions, and “ places in the countries there; that therefore they
 “ and every of them, may, without all fear of un“ quietness or molestation, peaceably abide and “ tarry in such their houses, places and possessions, “ when they shall return thither for comfort and “ recreation’s sake. We have, of our special “ grace, granted to the said mayor and common“ alty, and to their successors aforesaid, that all
 “ and every of those which be aldermen of the “ said city, and their successors which for the time “ shall be aldermen there, for the term of their “ lives shall have this liberty; that is to say,
 “ that as long as they shall continue aldermen
 “ there, and shall bear the charge of aldermen “ proper; and also those which before had been “ aldermen, and have also with their great costs
 “ and expences born the offices of mayoralty,
 “ shall not be put in any assizes, juries, or attaints, “ recognizances, or inquisitions, out of the said

 “ city; and that they nor any of them shall be “ tryer or tryers of the same, although they “ touch us, or our heirs, or successors, or other “ whomsoever.

“ And that without that city neither they nor “ any of them be made collectors or collector, “ assessor, taxer, overseer, or comptroller of the “ tenths, fifteenths, taxes, tallages, subsidies, or “ other charges, or impositions whatsoever, to us
 “ our heirs, or successors, hereafter to be granted
 “ or given: and if they, or any of them, be “ elected to any of the offices or charges afore“ said, and that the said mayor or aldermen do “ deny, refuse, or not do the offices or charges “ aforesaid, then they, or any of them, shall not
 “ by any means incur any contempt, loss, pain,
 “ fine, imprisonment, or forfeiture; by occasion
 “ of their so refusing or not doing; nor shall for “ that cause forfeit any issues by any means: and “ further, as we understand, lord Edward, some“ times king of England; the third, after the con“ quest, our progenitor, with the assent of the pre“ lates, earls, barons, and commonalty of the realm “ of England; assembled in parliament, holden at “ Westminster, in the first year of his reign, at the “ petition of the then citizens of the said city,
 “ by his letters patents granted, for him and his “ heirs, to the same citizens, the town of South“ wark, with the appurtenances, to have and to “ hold to them and their successors, citizens of the “ same city, of the same our progenitors, and “ their heirs for ever; paying unto him by the “ year, at the exchequer of him and his heirs, at
 “ the terms accustomed, the farm therefore due
 “ and accustomed, as in the said letters patents
 “ more fully is contained. And now the mayor “ and commonalty of the said city, and their “ predecessors, have and hold certain liberties and “ franchises in the town aforesaid by virtue of those “ letters patents; and do use the same as their “ predecessors have had and held them, and have “ used and enjoyed them; and they now fear that “ divers doubts, opinions, varieties, ambiguities, “ controversies and dissensions, may light, and
 “ be likely to spring, grow, be imagined, holdert,
 “ and had in time to come, in and about the use
 “ and exercise of such liberties and franchises,
 “ for want of more clear and full declaration and “ expressing of the same; for that divers diversly “ interpret, judge, and understand: we therefore,
 “ to the end to take away from henceforth and “ utterly abolish all and all manner of causes,
 “ occasions, and matters, whereupon such opi“ nions, ambiguities, varieties, controversies, and “ dissensions may spring, be holden, and moved
 “ in this behalf, have, of our special grace, and
 “ from our meer motion, granted to the said “ mayor and commonalty of the said city which “ now be, and their successors, mayor and com“ monalty and citizens of that city, which for the “ time being shall be for ever, the town of South“ wark, with the appurtenances, with all chat“ tels, called waif* and estray†; and also treasure

* Goods dropt by a thief being closely pursued or overloaded.

† Cattle lost, both which being found in any lordship, and not owned by any man, which being cried, according to law, in three markets adjoining, if it be not claimed by the owner in a year and a day, it is then the lord's of the soil where found.

“ found in the town aforesaid, and all manner of “ handy-work, goods and chattels of traitors, “ felons defamed, and denying the law of our “ land, wheresoever or before whomsoever justice
 “ shall be done upon them; and also goods dis-“ claimed, found, or being within the town aforesaid;
 “ and also all manner of escheats and forfeitures
 “ which may there pertain unto us, as “ fully and wholly as we should have them if the “ same town were in our hands. And that it shall “ be lawful to the same mayor and commonalty,
 “ and to their successors, by their deputy and “ ministers of the same town, to put themselves “ in possession of and in all the handy-works and “ chattels of all manner of traitors, felons, fugi“ tives, outlaws, condemned, convicted, and of “ felons defamed, and denying the laws of our “ land; and also of and in all goods disclaimed, “ found, and being within the said town; and “ also of and in all the escheats and forfeitures to “ us and to our heirs there pertaining. And that
 “ the same mayor and commonalty, and citizens,
 “ and their successors, by themselves, or their “ deputy, or ministers, may have, in the town
 “ aforesaid, assay* and affize of bread, wine,
 “ beer, and ale, and all other victuals and things “ whatsoever saleable in the said town: and also “ all and whatsoever doth and may appertain to
 “ the office of clerk of the market, of our house,
 “ or of our heirs, together with the correction
 “ and punishment of all persons there selling wine, “ bread, beer, ale, and other victuals; and of all “ other inhabiting and exercising any arts what“ soever, and with all manner of forfeitures, fines,
 “ and amerciaments, to be forfeited; and all other
 “ which there do, and in any time to come may, “ pertain to us, our heirs, or successors: and that “ they shall have, in the said town, the execution
 “ of all manner of writs, commandments, pre“ cepts, extracts, and warrants, with the return “ of the same, by such their ministers or deputy “ whom they shall thereunto use; so always that
 “ the clerk of the market of our house, or of the “ house of our heirs, or the sheriff or escheator
 “ of the county of Surry, which now is, or here“ after shall be, do not by any means intermeddle, “ enter, or do any execution. We have also “ granted to the said mayor, and commonalty,
 “ and citizens, and their successors for ever, that “ they shall and may have yearly, one fair in the “ town aforesaid for three days, that is to say,
 “ the 7th, 8th and 9th days of September, to be “ holden, together with a court of pye-powder,†
 “ and with all the liberties to such fairs appertain-“ ing: and that they may have and hold there
 “ at their said courts, before their said ministers “ or deputy, the said three days, from day to “ day, hour to hour, and from time to time, all “ occasions, complaints, and pleas of a court of pye“ powder, together with all summons, attach“ ments, arrests, issues, fines, redemptions and “ commodities, and other rights whatsoever, to
 “ the same court of pye-powder any way pertain-

“ ing, without any impediment, let or hindrance
 “ of us, our heirs or successors, or other our “ officers and ministers whatsoever. And also that “ they may there have a view of frankpledge,‡
 “ and whatsoever thereto pertaineth, together
 “ with all summons, attachments, arrests, issues, “ amerciaments, fines, redemptions, profits, com“ modities, and other things whatsoever, which “ there may or ought therefore to pertain to us,
 “ our heirs and successors. And furthermore, the “ aforesaid mayor and commonalty, and citizens,
 “ and their successors, may by themselves, or by “ their minister or deputy in the said town ap“ pointed, take and arrest all manner of felons, “ thieves, and other malefactors, found within
 “ the said town, and may lead them to our gaol
 “ of Newgate, safely to be kept until they shall “ be by process of law delivered. And further,
 “ the said mayor and commonalty, and citizens
 “ and their successors, may for ever have, in the “ town aforesaid, all manner of liberties, privi“ leges, franchises, acquittals, customs, and rights, “ which we should or might there have if the said “ town were and remained in our hands, without “ any thing to be by any means given or paid to “ us, or our heirs, beside only 10l. for the “ ancient form therefore due; and without im“ peachment, let, molestation, or disturbance,
 “ of us, our heirs or successors, justices, escheat-
 “ ors, sheriffs, officers, or ministers, of ours,
 “ or of our heirs or successors whatsoever; the “ rights, liberties, and franchises, of right belong“ ing to the most reverend father and lord in “ Christ Thomas archbishop of Canterbury, and
 “ of other persons there always saved; although “ express mention be not here made of the true “ yearly value of the premises, or of any other “ gifts or grants to the mayor and aldermen, “ sheriffs and citizens, or their successors, or any “ of them, made according to the form of the “ statute thereof had, made and provided, or any “ other statute, ordinance, act, thing, cause, or “ matter whatsoever notwithstanding. These be“ ing witness; the reverend father Thomas arch“ bishop of Canterbury; William archbishop of “ York; George of Exon, chancellor; and Wil“ liam bishop of Ely; and our dear brother
 “ George of Clarence, and Richard of Gloucest-
 “ ter, dukes; and others. Given by our hand
 “ at Westminster, the ninth day of November,
 “ in the second year of our reign.”

By the above recited charter, not only all the ancient rights and privileges of the city are confirmed; but it is likewise granted that the mayor, recorder, and the aldermen past the chair, shall be perpetual justices of the peace, and likewise justices of oyer and terminer, for the trying of all malefactors within their own jurisdiction; that the Lord-mayor and aldermen may, by the mouth of their recorder, declare, whether, when a plea is brought into any of the superior courts, the controverted point be a custom of the city or * Tryal, proof.

† Held in fairs for enrolling contracts, and redressing disorders there committed.

‡ Or surety for freemen of fourteen years and upwards, except clerks and knights; for all such freemen were to find security towards the king and his subjects, or else were to be sent to prison.

not: that the mayor and aldermen be for ever exempt from serving in all foreign assizes, juries, or attaincs, and likewise from the offices of assessor, collector of taxes, overseer or comptroller of all public duties without the jurisdiction of the city.

By this charter likewise, the grant of the borough of Southwark is confirmed; and the citizens are entitled to the goods and chattles of traitors, felons, &c. with the privilege of holding a fair annually in the said borough, at the fee-farm rent of ten pounds.

In the year 1463, king Edward granted the citizens of London a second charter, by which the tronage, weighing, measuring, laying up, placing, and housing of wool, which used to be brought to the staple at Westminster, was ordered to be in Leadenhall, and in no other place within three miles of the city: and all fees, profits, and emoluments, arising from the said laying-up, placing and housing, were granted to the mayor, commonalty and citizens, for ever.

In the year 1465, a most absurd custom prevailed, of wearing shoes with toes of an enormous length; for the preventing of which proclamation was made, that, for the future, the beaks or toes of shoes and boots should not exceed two inches in length, on the penalty of the wearer being excommunicated, and paying a fine of twenty shillings for each offence, to be equally divided between the king, the chamber of London, and the company of Cordwainers.

In the year 1468, we have a remarkable instance on record, of several of the London jury, who, having taken bribes to favour a prisoner who was to be tried before them, were apprehended and brought to their trials, before the Lord-mayor, for wilful and corrupt perjury; and being convicted on full evidence, they were sentenced to ride from Newgate to Cornhill, with paper mitres on their heads, where they were exposed to the derision of the public, and then carried back in the same manner to Newgate.

CHAPTER XXV.

Stocks erected in every ward in the city. The number of sheriffs officers ascertained. Disorderly women punished. The Steel-yard granted to the Anseatic merchants. The choice of mayor and sheriffs vested in the livery. The city walls repaired. Abstract of the third and fourth charters of Edward IV. A great pestilence in London. A person fined for marrying an orphan without licence of the city. Four persons hanged and burnt for sacrilege. The city lends the king 5000 marks, towards the support of his army. The Lord-mayor, aldermen and citizens entertained at a grand hunting match by the king. Proceedings of the duke of Gloucester on the death of king Edward IV. The king's reception into London. Lord Hastings beheaded. Substance of the duke of Gloucester's speech to the mayor and aldermen at the Tower. The Lord-mayor made a privy counsellor. Dr. Shaw preaches at St. Paul's cross. Duke of Buckingham's remarkable speech at Guildhall. Duke of Gloucester requested to accept the crown. His artful answer and final compliance.

IN the year 1472 there was only one pair of stocks in the whole city, at the place called stocks-marker, where the Lord-mayor's mansion-house now stands; but Sir William Hampton, who was mayor in the year above-mentioned, issued his orders for erecting stocks in every ward, for the more effectual punishment of vagabonds.

In the following year it was ordained, that each of the sheriffs of London and Middlesex should have sixteen serjeants, under whom should be the like number of yeomen; together with six clerks, namely, a secondary, a clerk of the papers, and four inferior clerks; besides those of the under sheriffs.

In the year last abovementioned the streets of this city were extremely infested with disorderly women; to remedy which nuisance the Lord-mayor inflicted corporal punishment on the most notorious, and ordered them to be led through the principal streets, and exposed to the contempt of the public.

In the year 1475 the company of anseatic merchants of London obtained a confirmation of a large house, or hall, then called Guyhallda Teutonicorum, (but at present known by the name of the Steel-yard,) to them and their successors for ever, on the condition of paying seventy pounds per annum, to the mayor and citizens of London, and some trifling rents to the owners of certain tenements adjoining to the said hall.

By an act of common-council which passed in this year, the election of the mayor and sheriffs, which had hitherto been in the whole body of the citizens, was vested in the masters, wardens, and liverymen of the several companies of the city; and this mode of election has continued to the present day.

In the year 1476, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council came to a resolution, that the walls of the city should be repaired with bricks made of earth, dug, tempered, and burnt in Moorfields; and that the expence of these repairs should be defrayed by the parishioners of the several parishes, each of whom should pay sixpence every Sunday, at church, toward the same.

It appears, however, that the sums of money thus levied, did not discharge the whole expence of

of the repairs; for the several companies of drapers, skimmers, and goldsmiths, repaired different parts of the wall at their private charges.

In the year 1479, the king granted a third charter to the city, in which he gave the citizens permission to purchase lands in Mortmain, to the value of two hundred marks per annum: and for this charter his majesty received a compliment of nineteen hundred and twenty-three pounds, nine shillings and eight-pence.

On the twentieth of June 1479, the very day on which this charter was granted, the citizens purchased a fourth charter of the king, on the consideration of abating seven thousand pounds, being part of a debt of twelve thousand, nine hundred, and twenty-three pounds, nine shillings and eight pence, then due from the king to the city, as appeared in the receipt of the exchequer.

By this fourth charter "the offices or occupations of packing all manner of woollen cloaths, "sheep-skins, calves-skins, vessels of amber, and "all other merchandize whatsoever, to be packed, tunned, piped, barrellled, or any wise to "be inclosed;" and also "the office of portage "of all wools, sheep-skins, tynn bails, and other "merchandize whatsoever; likewise the office of "guager within the said city; the office of wine "drawers, to provide for the carriage of wines "brought to the port of the said city, and laid on "land, and elsewhere to be carried;" together with "the office of coroner within the said city "and suburbs thereof," were respectively granted to the mayor and commonalty of London, and their successors.

In the same year that these charters were granted, a most dreadful pestilence raged in this city, which beginning about the end of September in the preceding year, continued for near fourteen months; in which time an incredible number of the citizens fell sacrifices to its devouring rage.

One Robert Deyns, having, in the year 1480, married an orphan in the city, without licence of the magistrates, was adjudged, by the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen, to pay a fine of twenty pounds for the said offence.

In the same year a remarkable punishment was inflicted on four persons, who, having been tried for robbing of churches, and convicted, were sentenced to be hanged on Tower-hill, and their bodies burnt to ashes, together with the gibbet on which they were hanged; which sentence was accordingly carried into execution.

The Scots having invaded England in the year 1481, the citizens of London, at the request of the king, advanced five thousand marks, towards the support of an army with which his majesty marched against the invaders.

At this period the citizens of London were in such favour with the king, that his majesty treated the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and others, with a grand hunting match on Waltham forest, in which several deer were killed, and the entertainment was concluded with a sumptuous and splendid feast, which the king caused to be provided in a beautiful arbour erected on the occasion.

On the death of Edward the fourth, his eldest son Edward ought to have succeeded to the throne: but Richard, duke of Gloucester, brother to the deceased king, seized the person of the young prince at Stoney-Stratford, as he was on his journey from Ludlow to London.

The citizens of London no sooner heard of this extraordinary proceeding, than great numbers of them joined the nobility, who had already taken up arms, by way of defending themselves, till they could learn the motives of the duke of Gloucester's conduct in seizing their young sovereign.

The duke of Gloucester, unwilling to incense the Londoners, sent lord Hastings into the city, to assure them that his intentions were perfectly upright; that the king was in no danger, and that the earl Rivers, lord Grey, and others, who were apprehended with his majesty, were arrested for conspiring against the dukes of Gloucester and Buckingham, as would soon appear by a legal course of justice.

Lord Hastings farther represented to the citizens, the danger they would plunge themselves into if they did not lay down their arms, and return to their respective habitations, without presuming to enquire into the conduct of their superiors.

His lordship concluded with assuring them, that the duke of Gloucester and other lords were conducting the young king to London, in order to celebrated his coronation.

This speech produced the desired effect; for the citizens, yielding an implicit belief to it, immediately retired to their respective habitations.

On the fourth of May following, the mayor, aldermen, and five hundred of the principal citizens of London, richly dressed in purple gowns, and mounted on fine horses, met king Edward V. at Hornsey Park, and conducted him to the city, where he was received with every demonstration of joy and affection, and lodged in the palace of the bishop of London.

During this cavalcade the duke of Gloucester acted the most hypocritical part imaginable; frequently calling out to the citizens "behold your "king and sovereign" and even carried his hypocrisy so far, as to do homage to the king, and persuade the nobility to follow his example.

This behaviour so entirely erased from the minds of the citizens all ill impressions they had conceived of Gloucester, that they unanimously joined with the nobility, in appointing him to be protector of the kingdom during the minority of the king.

The perfidious duke was no sooner vested with this authority, than he prevailed on the queen, who had taken sanctuary at Westminster, to deliver her younger son, the duke of York, also to his care.

Having thus possessed himself of the persons of the two royal youths, he lodged them both in the Tower of London, and took up his own residence in Crosby's place, near Bishopsgate, now called Crosby-square.

It appears that the duke was, at all events, determined to ascend the throne: but dreading the influence of lord Hastings, who was one of the king's most zealous adherents, he caused him to be seized, and dragged to the platform near the chapel

Engraved for Chamberlain's History of London.

*Dr. Shaw
Preaching at ST. PAUL'S Cross.*

chapel within the Tower, where he was beheaded without any legal form of trial.

Richard was not without apprehensions that some disagreeable consequences might result from the news of this murder being propagated in the city; whereupon himself, and the duke of Buckingham his accomplice, clad themselves in suits of rusty armour, and instantly sent for the mayor and aldermen: and on their arrival, Gloucester addressed them to the following purpose:

"That the lord Hastings had conspired with several persons, and contrived suddenly to kill him and the duke of Buckingham, that day, in council: that he could not yet guess the cause of the treason, and had not certain knowledge thereof before ten o'clock of the same day; which had forced them to put on such filthy armour, as being next at hand, for their own defence; and induced the lords of the council to order him to be immediately executed, to prevent insurrections and attempts of his lordships accomplices to rescue him from justice; and to preserve the peace of the nation.

"This, (continued Gloucester,) is the naked truth: and we have sent for you to inform you of it, that you may, as you see cause, satisfy the people of the justice of lord Hastings's sufferings: and though we are in no wise obliged to do it, yet, out of a desire to please them, we thus condescend to do it; and we require you thus to report it."

The city magistrates appeared to approve of the duke's conduct, and testified an inclination to obey his commands: but their expressions to their fellow citizens, on their return from the Tower, did not exhibit all that satisfaction with the duke's behaviour, which he hoped and expected.

Gloucester soon perceived that his stratagem had not produced the desired effect; whereupon he sent a herald at arms into the city, who, at all the usual places made a proclamation to the effect following.

"That the lord Hastings, with divers other wicked conspirators, had traiterously contrived the same day to have slain the protector and duke of Buckingham sitting in council, with a purpose and design to take upon him the government of the king and kingdom, and rule all things at his pleasure, hoping that, when they were dead, they should meet no opposition in their designs: and in how miserable a condition this nation had been, if God had left them in his hands, appeared from the former actions of the said lord, who, being so ill a man, could not make a good governor; for he it was, that by his ill advice enticed the king's father to many things much redounding to his dishonour, and the universal damage and detriment of the realm, leading him into debauchery by his exemplary wickedness, and procuring lewd and ungracious persons to gratify his lusts, and particularly Shore's wife, who was one of his secret council in this treason; by which lewd living the said king not only shortened his days, but also was forced to oppress and tax his people, that he might have sufficient to gratify his expences; and since the death of the said king, he hath lived in a continual incontinency with the said Shore's wife, and lay nightly with her, and particularly the very night before his death; so that it was no marvel, if his ungracious life brought him to as unhappy a death, which he was put to by the special command of the king's highness, and of his honourable and faithful council, both for his own demerits, being so openly taken in his intended treason; and also, lest any delay of his execution might have encouraged other mischievous persons, who were engaged in the conspiracy with him to make an insurrection for his deliverance, which being wisely foreseen, and as effectually prevented, was the only means under God's providence to preserve the whole realm in peace and quietness."

As this second attempt to impose on the citizens met with no better success than the former, it became necessary for Gloucester, in pursuit of his ambitious plan, to have recourse to other means to engage the Londoners in his favour; for, without their assistance, he apprehended it would be impossible to ascend the throne.

Hereupon the duke made Sir Edmund Shaw, Lord-mayor of London, a privy-counsellor; by which means he gained the interest of Dr. Shaw, an eloquent and popular preacher, and brother to the Lord-mayor; who undertook to preach a sermon on the following Sunday, at St. Paul's cross, in support of the protector's right to the crown.

The doctor's text, taken from the Wisdom of Solomon, was, "bastard slips shall take no deep root;" and in the course of his sermon he alleged, that the late king having promised marriage to the lady Elizabeth Lucy, and had a child by her, she was his wife in the sight of God; and of consequence, that the children he had by his queen were a spurious and bastard issue; so that no happiness could be expected to this kingdom, under the reign of Edward V.

He then proceeded to accuse the mother of Edward IV. of adultery; so that neither the late king nor the duke of Clarence, brother to Gloucester nor their descendants had any just title to the crown.

This artful preacher then raised his voice, and said, "but my lord protector, that noble prince, the pattern of all virtue and heroic actions, carries in his air, in his mein, and in his soul, the perfect image of his illustrious father the great duke of York!"

This unmeaning heap of abuse and panegyric, both equally undeserved, not producing the effect which had been expected from it, orders were sent to the Lord-mayor, to summons the aldermen and citizens to meet at Guildhall, where the duke of Buckingham with several of the nobility, attended; and the duke, ascending the hustings, addressed himself to the citizens in the following artful speech.

"Gentlemen, out of the zeal and sincere affection

" fection we have for your persons and interests,
 " we are come to acquaint you with a matter of " high importance, equally pleasing to God and
 " profitable to the commonwealth, and to none
 " more than to you the citizens of this famous
 " and honourable city: for the very thing which
 " we believe you have a long time wanted and " wished for; what you would have purchased at
 " a great rate, and gone far to fetch, we are
 " come hither to bring you, without any labour
 " trouble, cost, or peril to you. And what can
 " this be but your own safety, the peace of your
 " wives and daughters, the security of your goods
 " and estates, which were all in danger until now?
 " who of you could call what he had his own?
 " there were so many snares laid to deceive you;
 " so many fines and forfeitures, taxes and im-
 " positions, of which there was no end, and often
 " no necessity: or, if there was, it was occasioned
 " by riots, and unreasonable waste, rather than
 " a just and lawful charge for defence or honour
 " of the state: your best citizens were plundered,
 " and their wealth squandered by profuse favour" ites: fifteenths and the usual subsidies would
 " not do; but, under the plausible name of bene" volence, your goods were taken from you by
 " the commissioners against your will; as if by
 " that name was understood, that every man " should pay, not what he pleased, but what the
 " king would have him, who never was mo" derate in his demands, always exorbitant, turn" ing forfeitures into fines, fines into ransoms,
 " small offences into misprison of treason, and " misprison into treason itself. We need not give " you examples of it: Burdet's case will never be
 " forgot, who, for a word spoken in haste, was
 " cruelly beheaded. Did not judge Markham re" sign his office, rather than join with his bre" thren in passing that illegal sentence on that
 " honest man? were you not all witnesses of the " barbarous treatment one of your own body,
 " the worshipful alderman Cook, met with? and
 " yourselves know too well how many instances
 " of this kind I might name among you.

" King Edward gaining the crown by conquest,
 " all that were any ways related to those that were
 " his enemies lay under the charge of treason.
 " Thus half of the kingdom became at once trai-
 " tors; for half of the kingdom were either
 " friends to king Henry, or relations or friends
 " to some that were so. Though open war with
 " invaders is terrible and destructive to a nation,
 " yet civil dissensions are much more fatal, and
 " to be dreaded; with which his reign was more
 " disturbed than the reigns of all his prececef-
 " sors. But he is dead and gone; and God for" give his soul! It cost the people more blood
 " and treasure to get the crown for this prince
 " than it had done to conquer France twice.
 " Half of the nobility of the kingdom lost their " lives or estates in the quarrel; and, when the " dispute was over, the peace that followed was " not much safer than the war: every rich and " landed man was in danger; for whom could he
 " trust that distrusted his own brother? whom
 " spare, that killed his own brother? or who " could perfectly love him, whom his own brother
 " could not love? we shall, in honour to the " memory of one that was our sovereign, forbear

" to mention, who were the persons, on which " he was so lavish of his favours: only it is well " known that those that deserved them most had
 " the least of them. Was not Shore's wife his " chief minister? was there not more court made
 " to her than all the lords of England, except
 " those that were the strumpet's favourites? who,
 " poor woman! was herself chaste, and of good
 " reputation, till he deluded her to his lust, and " tempted her from her husband, an honest sub" stantial young man, whom you all know. In" deed, I am ashamed to say it, the king's appe" tite in that point was insatiable and intolerable.
 " No woman could escape him: young or old,
 " rich or poor, wife or virgin, all fell victims to
 " his lust: by which means the most honourable
 " houses were defiled, and the most honourable
 " families were corrupted.

" You of this renowned city suffered most:
 " you, who deserved most from him, for your
 " readiness to serve the house of York with your " lives and fortunes; which tho' he ill requited,
 " there is of that house, who, by God's grace,
 " shall reward you better. I shall not enlarge
 " on this subject: you have heard it from one,
 " whom ye will hearken to more, as you ought
 " to do: for I am not so vain as to think what
 " I can say will have so great authority with you
 " as the words of a preacher; a man so wise and
 " so pious, that he could not utter a thing, in
 " the pulpit especially, which he did not firmly " believe it was his duty to declare. You re" member, I doubt not, how he set forth, last " Sunday, the right of the most excellent Richard
 " duke of Gloucester to the crown of this realm:
 " for, as he proved to you, the children of king
 " Edward IV. were never lawfully begotten, the " king leaving his lawful wife, the lady Lucy,
 " to contract an illegal marriage with the queen.
 " My noble lord the protector's reverence to the " dutchess his mother will not permit me to say
 " any thing further concerning what the worthy
 " doctor alledged of her familiarity with others
 " besides her own husband, for fear of offending
 " the duke of Gloucester her own son: though,
 " for these causes, the crown of England is de-
 " volved to the most excellent prince the lord
 " protector, as the only lawful begotten son " of the right noble duke of York. This, and
 " the consideration of his many high qualities,
 " has prevailed with the lords and commons of " England, of the northern counties especially,
 " who have declared they will not have a bastard
 " reign over them, to petition that high and
 " mighty prince to take on him the sovereign
 " power, for the good of the realm, to which he " has so rightful and lawful a title. We have " reason to fear he will not grant our request;
 " being a prince whose wisdom foresees the labour,
 " both of body and mind, that attends the su" preme dignity; which is not a place for a child,
 " as that wise man observed, who said, Va regno
 " cujus rex puer est, i. e. Woe to the realm whose
 " king is a child. Wherefore we have reason to " bless God that the prince, whose right is to
 " reign over us, is of so ripe age, so great wisdom
 " and experience, who, though he is unwilling to " take the government upon himself, yet the peti" tion

"tion of the lords and gentlemen will meet with
 "the more favourable acceptance, if you the wor"shipful citizens of the metropolis of the king"dom will join with us in our request; which, for "your welfare, we doubt not but you will. How"ever, I heartily entreat you to do it for the "common good of the people of England; whom
 "you will oblige by chusing them so good a king,
 "and his majesty by shewing early your ready dis-
 "positions to his election; in which, my most dear
 "friends, I require you, in the name of myself
 "and these lords, to shew us plainly your minds
 "and intentions."

The citizens were struck with such horror and amazement at this speech, that they remained entirely silent, as totally unable to express their abhorrence at the injustice and absurdity of the proposal.

Hereupon Buckingham addressed himself to the mayor, enquiring the cause of their profound silence; to which the mayor answered, that, perhaps the citizens did not understand his grace: on which the duke repeated the substance of what he had said, and enforced it with all the powers of his oratory.

But this second effort making no deeper impression on their minds than the first, the recorder was directed to address the assembly on the same subject: which he at length undertook, though with great reluctance; repeating only the substance of what the duke had said, without adding a single word in favour of the protector.

Upon this Buckingham, having observed to the mayor that the people were amazingly obstinate, once more addressed the citizens, in the following words.

"Dear friends, we came to acquaint you
 "with a thing which we needed not have "done, had it not been for the affection we "bear you. The lords and commons could "have determined the matter without you,
 "but would gladly have you join with us,
 "which is for your honour and profit, though
 "you do not see it, or consider it: We re"quire you therefore to give your answer one "way or another, whether you are willing, as
 "the lords are, to have the most excellent prince
 "the lord protector to be your king, or not?"

This short address produced almost a general murmur through the assembly; but a few servants of the protector and the duke of Buckingham, having assembled a number of apprentices and other rabble, they crowded into the hall, threw up their hats in the air, and cried out, "King Richard! King Richard!"

Buckingham instantly seized this opportunity of making his acknowledgements; and, as if this testimony of approbation had been general, addressed the assembly as follows.

"'Tis a goodly and joyful cry, to hear every "man with one voice agree to it, and nobody
 "say no. Since therefore, dear friends, we see
 "you are all, as one man, inclined to have this
 "noble prince to be your king, we shall report

"the matter so effectually to him, that we doubt
 "not it will be much for your advantage. We "require you to attend us to-morrow, with our "joint petition to his Grace, as has been already
 "agreed on between us."

Buckingham and the rest of the noblemen now retired, leaving the citizens in the utmost dejection of mind; who, not daring to express in public their disapprobation of this day's transactions, retired to their respective habitations, to vent their griefs in private.

However, the Lord-mayor, Sir Edmund Shaw, prevailed on the aldermen, and several of the common-council, to attend him, on the following day, at Baynard's castle, where the duke of Gloucester then resided; and there they found the duke of Buckingham, and several of the nobility.

A new farce was now acted. The duke of Buckingham sent in a messenger to acquaint the protector, that a great number of the nobility and citizens desired an audience, on an affair of the utmost importance.

Gloucester appeared to be averse to their admittance; upon which Buckingham hinted to the mayor and citizens, that the protector was totally ignorant of their design, nor knew any of what had passed at Guildhall.

It was now determined to send in another messenger, who, in the most earnest and humble manner entreated the protector to grant the desired audience, with which, with great apparent diffidence, he at length complied.

The company being introduced, the duke of Buckingham, in the name of himself and the company, apologized for the intrusion, in the most humble manner, and after enumerating the grievances of the people, begged the protector to assume the reins of government, as the only method to secure the public welfare.

Richard, with a degree of hypocrisy that would be astonishing in any other character than his own, answered, "That, though he knew the things
 "he alledged to be true, yet he loved king Ed"ward and his children above any crown what"soever; and therefore could not grant their "request: however he pardoned their petition,
 "and thanked them for their love; but desired
 "them to be obedient to the prince under whom
 "himself and they lived at that time; and whom "he would advise to the best of his capacity, as "he had already done, to the satisfaction of all "parties."

The duke of Buckingham affecting to receive this answer with the utmost dissatisfaction, asked the protector pardon for what he had farther to offer, but declared, "That they were all agreed
 "not to have any of king Edward's line to reign
 "over them; that they were gone too far to go "back; for which reason, if his grace would be "pleased to take the crown upon him, they hum-
 "bly beseeched him to do it; or, if he would "give them a resolute answer to the contrary,
 "which they should be loth to hear, they must
 "and would look out some other person that
 "would accept of their proposal."

Thus

Thus urged, the artful duke, as in obedience to the general wish of the people, complied with their demands in the following terms:

“ Since we perceive that the whole realm is bent upon it, not to have king Edward’s children to govern over them, of which we are sorry; and knowing that the crown can belong to no man so justly as to ourself, the right heir, lawfully begotten of the body of our most dear father Richard, late duke of York; to which title is now joined your election, the nobles and commons of this realm, which we, of all titles

“ possible, take for the most effectual; we are content, and agree favourably to receive your petition and request, and, according to the same, take upon us the royal estate, preheminance, and kingdoms of the two noble realms of England and France; the one, from this day forward, by us and our heirs, to rule, govern and defend; the other, by God’s grace and your good help, to get again, subdue, and establish for ever in due obedience to this realm of England; and we ask of God to live no longer than we intend to procure its advancement.”

CHAPTER XXVI.

The young princes murdered in the Tower. Coronation of Richard III. Copy of the citizens claim of the office of chief butler. The earl of Richmond invades England. King Richard slain at the battle of Bosworth. King Henry VII. enters into London. The sweating sickness. The cross in Cheap-side finished. A mercenary act of common council. Henry and his queen enter into London, after the defeat of Simnel the impostor. Penalty on killing beasts in London. The Flemish merchants banished the city. Their conspiracy and punishment. The king entertains the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and citizens. Laws to punish perjury in jurors. The artillery-ground formed from a part of Bunhill-fields. Remarkable plenty of corn. Twenty thousand persons destroyed by the plague, to avoid which, the king and queen retire to Calais. Kitchens first built at Guildhall. The aldermen, for the first time attend the mayor to the water-side on horseback.

RICHARD duke of Gloucester having thus usurped the throne, prevailed on Sir James Tyrrell to murder the young king, and his brother, the duke of York, by smothering them between two beds, in the Tower of London.

On the sixth day of July, 1483, Richard, accompanied by his queen, rode through the city in great state, to Westminster, where they were crowned in a very solemn manner: but it appears that this monarch had but little confidence in the affections of his new subjects; for he previously sent for five thousand men, from the north of England, to protect him against any accident that might happen at the coronation.

Previous to the coronation of Richard III. the citizens of London claimed the office of chief butler, in the following terms; from whence it seems probable that the citizens of Winchester had renewed their claim to that office, which they had made at the commencement of several preceding reigns.

To the Right High and Mighty Prince the Duke of Norfolk, Seneschal of England.

“ Shewen unto your good and gracious lordship, the mair and citezeins of the citee of London, that where, after the liberty and commendable customes of the said citee, of time that no man’s mind is to the contrary, used, enjoyed, and accustomed, the mair of the same citee for the time being, by reason of the “ office of mairalty of the said citee, in his own person, oweth of right and duty to serve the kyng our souvereigne lord in the day of his ful noble coronation, in such place as it shall please his highness to take his spices, and the same cup, with the kevering belonging thereunto, and a layer [ewer] of gold, the said mair to have, and with him to bear away at the time of his departing, for his fee and reward.

“ And also that divers other citezeins, that by the said mair and citee shal thereto be named and chosen, owen of right by the same custom, at the same day to serve in the office of butlership, in helping of the chief butler of England, to the lords and estates that shall be at the said coronation, as well at the table in the hall at meat, as after meat in the chamber.

“ Beseeching your said lordship, that Edmund Shaa, now mair, and other citezeins of the citee aforesaid, to the said office and service now chosen, whose names, in a schedule hereunto annexed, be specified, may be admitted to do the same service, as their predecessors mairs and citezeins of the said citee, in case semblable, have used in days past.

“ Also the said mair and citezeins praying, that they may sit, in the day of the said coronation, at the table next the cupboard, of the left side of the hall, lykes as of late tyme it hath been used and accustomed;

“ and

"and that the said mair may have and enjoy
"the said fee and reward, according to the "dutie."

In the year 1485, the earl of Richmond, who had been invited from his exile to invade England, in order to dethrone Richard, marched with his army from Wales towards London; upon which Richard gave immediate orders for the repair of the Tower of London, and immediately marched to meet his opponent.

The armies came to an engagement at Bosworth, in Leicestershire, and, after a furious battle of near two hours, Richard was slain, and his crown, which he had worn during the fight, being found among the spoils of the field, was placed on the head of the earl of Richmond, who was saluted as king by the whole army.

Richmond, who was now acknowledged king by the name of Henry VII. immediately set out for London, which he entered on the twenty-seventh of August amidst the shouts and acclamations of the people, who considered him as their deliverer from the most cruel of tyrants, that perhaps ever disgraced the annals of any kingdom.

The new king, attended by the Lord-mayor and aldermen in scarlet robes, and a great number of citizens in violet colour'd gowns, proceeded directly to St. Paul's church, where he offered up the standard he had taken in battle, and when divine service was ended, he repaired to the palace of the bishop of London; where, in a few days he assembled a council of all the nobility and gentry then in London, and solemnly renewed the oath he had formerly taken to marry the princess Elizabeth.

A most dreadful, and hitherto unheard of distemper broke out this year, in the city of London, and some other parts of the kingdom. It was a kind of malignant fever, called the sweating sickness, and carried off those who were attacked with it in twenty-four hours; but those who survived that time generally recovered.

In the year 1486, the cross at the west end of Cheapside, (then called the Westcheap) was completed and most curiously embellished at the expence of a number of the citizens, among whom John Fisher, a mercer, contributed no less than six hundred marks.

In the following year the court of common-council passed an act, whereby the citizens were enjoined, on the penalty of one hundred pounds, "not to carry any goods or merchandize to any fair or market within the kingdom, for the term of seven years."

This act was so unreasonable in itself, and gave such offence to the legislature, that it was repealed by an act of parliament passed in the following year, which empowered the citizens to carry on their commerce as usual, to the several parts of the kingdom: and a penalty of forty pounds was laid on any person who should presume to molest any of the citizens in their said trade.

In the year abovementioned, Lambert Simnel, * the famous impostor, who personated the earl of Warwick, having been defeated at Stoke, near Newark, the king and queen returned towards London; and on their arrival at Hornsey-park, were met by the mayor, aldermen, and principal citizens, mounted on fine horses, and richly dressed in an elegant uniform.

In this manner they entered the city, the streets of which were covered with new gravel on the occasion; and passing through the several livery companies, dressed in their formalities, their majesties went to St. Paul's Cathedral, where Te Deum was solemnly sung, on occasion of the late victory.

About this period the inhabitants of St. Gregory and St. Faith, having made complaint of the horrid stench arising from the blood and ordure running through the said parishes from St. Nicholas's shambles; (now Newgate-market;) together with the noxious vapours arising from the scalding of swine; the parliament, to remedy such grievances for the future; passed an act, in which it was ordained that "no butcher should presume to kill any beast within the walls of London, upon the penalty of one shilling for every ox and cow so killed, and eight-pence for every beast."

The king having, from some political cause, conceived an insuperable aversion to the Flemish nation, banished all the merchants of that country from the city of London, and prohibited all intercourse with that people.

The anseatic merchants, taking advantage of this circumstance, imported large quantities of merchandize from Flanders, and the English merchant adventurers became great sufferers by being deprived of the principal part of their commerce with the Flemish merchants.

These circumstances so highly incensed the Flemings, that they entered into a conspiracy against the anseatic merchants; and being joined by the populace, broke open and plundered their hall, situated where the Steel-yard now stands, near Thames-street.

However, a great number of armed citizens coming across the Thames to the assistance of the merchants, several of the conspirators were taken, and committed to the Tower; and after a long imprisonment some were hanged, and others discharged.

On twelfth day, in the year 1494, the king entertained the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and others of the principal citizens, at Westminster; where, after dinner, Ralph Austrey, the mayor, was dubbed knight; and in the evening several kinds of divertisement were exhibited in the great hall, which was hung with tapestry and staged on each side.

The morning following the king, queen, and divers of the nobility, being seated at a stone table, the king and queen's messes, consisting of sixty dishes each, were served up by sixty knights and esquires; the mayor was also served with twenty-four dishes, and plenty of the choicest

* For the particulars concerning this extraordinary period, see CLARENDON'S History of England, vol. 1. page 461.
M m wines,

wines, and the citizens were so well pleased with their entertainment, that they did not get to London till the break of the next day.

Notwithstanding the care which formerly had been taken to prevent improper persons from being impannelled on juries, it was found necessary in the eleventh year of Henry's reign to enact as follows :

" That, for the future, no person or persons
" be impannelled, or sworn into any jury or in" quest in any of the city courts, unless he be " worth forty marks; and if the cause to be tried
" amount to that sum, then no person to be ad" mitted a juror worth less than 100 marks: and
" that every person, so qualified, refusing to serve " as a jurymen, for the first default to forfeit 1s.
" the second 2s. and every one after, to double " the sum. That when upon trial it shall be " found, that a petty jury have brought in an " unjust verdict, then every member of the same
" to forfeit 20l. or more, according to the dis" cretion of the court of Lord-mayor and al" derman, and to suffer six months imprisonment,
" or less, at the discretion of the said mayor,
" and aldermen, without bail or main prize, and
" for ever after to be rendered incapable of serv" ing in any jury. And further, if upon en" quiry, it should be found, that any juror has " taken money as a bribe, or other reward, or " promise of reward, to favour either plaintiff or
" defendant in the cause to be tried by him, that
" then, and in every such case, the person so of" fending to forfeit and pay to the party by him

" thus injured, ten times the value of such sum
" or reward by him taken, and also to suffer im" prisonment, as already mentioned; and besides,
" to be disabled for ever from serving in that " capacity: and that every person or persons
" guilty of bribing any juror, shall likewise for" feit ten times the value given, and suffer im" prisonment as aforesaid."

A parcel of grounds, consisting of gardens, orchards, &c. situate on the north side of Chiswell Street, and called by the name of Bunhill-fields, was in the year 1498, converted into a spacious field, for the use of the London archers, which is now known by the name of the Artillery Ground.

In the year 1502, the city entertainments which till that time had been given at Grocer's-hall, were ordered by the Lord-mayor to be, in future, held at Guildhall, to which end kitchens were built at the latter place, by a subscription of the several companies, where several of the aldermen and principal citizens were entertained with an elegant feast.

It was in this year, too, that the aldermen first accompanied the mayor to the water-side when he took barge for Westminster.

The marriage of the princess Margaret, by proxy to James IV. of Scotland was published on the twenty-fifth of January at St. Paul's-cross, on which account the citizens made bonfires, illuminated their houses, and gave every possible testimony of the high satisfaction with which they received the news.

CHAPTER XXVII.

The chapel of Henry VII. in Westminster Abbey founded. A particular account of the Monuments and other curiosities in that noble pile of Antiquity.

IN the year 1502, a chapel dedicated to the Virgin Mary, and a tavern, both which were situated at the east-end of Westminster-abbey, were taken down, by the order of Henry VII. and on the ground where they stood was erected the chapel, which is known by the name of Henry VIIth's chapel to this day.

In this place, as the most proper for its introduction, we shall give a clear and accurate account of every interesting particular relative to, and every curiosity in the abbey church of St. Peter, Westminster, of which the chapel of Henry VII. now forms a part.

There are so many miraculous stories related of the foundation of this abbey, in the legends of monkish writers, that by this enlightened age the bare recital would hardly be excused: all that can with truth be said, amounts only to this, that Sebert, king of the East-saxons, who died in 616, being by Austin's preaching, and his uncle Ethelbert's example, converted to christianity, threw down the temple of Apollo, west of London, and there most devoutly erected a church, which he dedicated to the honour of St. Peter, prince of the apostles, and appointed Melitus, then bishop of London, to consecrate it accordingly. Ranulphus, indeed, does not particularly mention Sebert, but has these remarkable words, " that some one, at the instigation of Ethelbert, built a church to the honour of St. Peter in the west part of the city of London, in a place called Thorney, which signifies an island of thorns, but is now called Westminster."

Fleet, a monkish writer, speaks of the city of London, as worshipping Diana, and the suburbs of Thorney, as offering incense to Apollo; so that it seems clear almost to demonstration, that this church had the ruins of a Pagan temple, for its foundation.

We are not ignorant that Sir Christopher Wren, whose opinion is by no means to be contemned, rejects as fabulous the notion of a temple to Apollo in Thorney island; and the rather, because it is said to be destroyed by an earthquake in the reign of Antoninus Pius, in order to make way for a christian

Engraved for Chamberlain's History of London.

The Abbey Church of ST PETER Westminster.

The ADMIRALTY OFFICE

Engraved for Chamberlain's History of London.

VIEW of the INSIDE of WESTMINSTER ABBY

VIEW of the INSIDE of ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL

tian church to be erected by king Lucius upon its ruins. Sir Christopher to strengthen his opinion, declares, that when he was employed to survey Westminster-abbey, though he examined both the walls and ornaments about it with the nicest care, yet he could neither discover the least fragment of cornice or capital, to indicate the handy work of a Roman builder, which he thinks he must undoubtedly have done, had the fact been true, as earthquakes break few stones, though they overturn edifices.

For the same and other reasons mentioned in their place, he disbelieves the founding of St. Paul's upon the ruins of a temple of Diana; yet till his time both these facts were credited by the most learned antiquarians our nation ever produced, and reported by them upon the fullest evidence the nature of the subject would admit; evidence, we think, that added to one circumstance, which they have omitted, carries conviction along with it; namely, that the Pagans must certainly have had temples in both these cities, and that the above places, and no other, being marked by tradition for the seats of them, no discoveries have yet been made during a course of 1700 years, in any other places, of the remains of any such edifices.

The dedication of this ancient abbey is a matter as uncertain as the foundation of it; the church historians will have it miraculous, and none but St. Peter himself, though dead 500 years before, must be admitted to that honour.

The king, as has been hinted, had ordered Mellitus to perform the ceremony, but St. Peter, as the legend says, was beforehand with him; for over-night he called upon Edricus, a fisherman, and desired to be ferry'd over to Thorney, which happened to be then flooded round by the heavy rains that had lately fallen: the fisherman obeyed, and the apostle (having consecrated the church amidst a grand chorus of heavenly music, and a glorious appearance of burning lights, of which Edricus was both an ear and an eye-witness) on his return discovered himself, and bid the fisherman tell Mellitus what he had heard and seen; giving, at the same time, to Edricus, a specimen of his divine mission, by a miraculous draught of salmon, of which kind of fish when in season, the apostle assured him, none of his occupation should ever want, provided they honestly made an offering of the tenth fish to the use of the newly consecrated church; which custom we find continued for more than 400 years after.

We should hardly have ventured to insert this story, but that it is in part confirmed, or at least believed, by two royal charters; the first, of king Edgar, who speaking of it says, "this church was dedicated by no less than St. Peter, the prince of apostles, to his own honour;" the other is of Edward the Confessor, which is still more full, affirming it to be "dedicated by St. Peter himself with the attendance of angels, by the impression of the holy cross, and the anointment of the holy chrism."

As we have, in a great measure, settled the era of the foundation and dedication of this church, it remains only for us to trace by what steps it gradually rose to the grandeur in which it appears at present; for at first, only that part of it was built which forms the east-angle.

The next who enlarged and repaired the church of Sebert's foundation, was Offa, the great king of Mercia; for Sebert's sons relapsing into paganism, it had been long neglected, and was in a very ruined state.

When it was almost ruined by the incursions of the Danes, Edgar was the first who revived its dying lustre, by two charters in its favour; which were afterwards confirmed and enlarged by Edward the Confessor, the old church was pulled down, and a most magnificent one for that age erected in the room of it, in the form of a cross, which afterwards became a pattern for that kind of building. When he had so done, he then granted a charter of his own, wherein he recites the account of St. Peter's consecration, as has been said; its destruction by the Danes, the grants and privileges of his predecessors, such as Sac and Soc, and Sol, Thol and Theam, Intoll and Uttoll, and Infrangenthet, Githrich, Hamsoken, Murage, and Fenstall; and adds his own. This last charter was closed with solemn imprecations on such as should infringe it, and was signed by the king, queen, two archbishops, ten bishops, and many of the abbots and nobility, at a convention called by his majesty's order, for that purpose.

The next prince who laid his hands to this great work, was Henry III. who built a chapel to the blessed Virgin, then called the new work at Westminster, the first stone whereof he laid himself on the Saturday before his coronation, in the year 1220, being the fifth of his reign; but about twenty-five years after, finding the walls and steeple of the church decayed, he pulled them down likewise, with a design to enlarge and make the whole more regular, but did not live to accomplish his design, which was not completed till twenty-three years after the death of this monarch.

Sir Christopher Wren, says, that this king's intention certainly was to make up only the cross to the westward, for thus far it is built in a different manner from the rest more westward, as the pillars and spandrels of the arches shew. The work must therefore, in all probability, have been carried on afterwards, during the reigns of the three succeeding kings, by the monks and abbots, which, though it proceeded but slowly, was yet more skilfully executed than the former part. Indeed, during the tumultuous and bloody wars between the houses of York and Lancaster, little could be expected to be done in works of genius, but upon the advancement of the Lancastrian line to the peaceable possession of the throne, Henry the seventh resumed the work very early, as appears by the key-stones of the vaulting of the very first bay of building that is extended beyond the old plan, being marked with the rose of Lancaster.

About the year 1502, this prince began that stately and magnificent structure which is now generally called by his name, by first pulling down the chapel of Henry III. already-mentioned, and a house adjoining, called the White-rose tavern; and then, marking out the foundation, on the 24th of January, 1507, he laid the first stone:

stone: this chapel he dedicated, like the former, to the blessed Virgin, and designing it for a burial-place for him and his posterity, in his will he expressly enjoins, that none but the blood royal should be permitted to lie therein; and, for the health of his soul, he procured a bull from pope Leo, for uniting to this abbey the collegiate church of St. Martin's-le-Grand, and the manor of Tykill in Yorkshire, to maintain a chauntry of three monks, who should be priests, and two lay brothers; which we the rather mention, as it is but little known how the inhabitants of St. Martin's-le-Grand came first to be connected with those of Westminster. The priests were to say daily mass for his soul, and the souls of his wife and children, for which service, besides their usual salary, they were to be allowed 100 shillings a year. Before his death, over and above this, he is said to have delivered into the hands of the Abbot of Westminster 5000l. for masses and alms, whereof 10,000 masses were to be said for him at 6d. each; and between his death and burial, 200l. to be given in alms.

No very material alterations have been made in the outward structure of this church, since Henry's death till of late years; when, as it was the admiration and grief of all who beheld it, it became the object of parliamentary concern, to rescue it from that ruin into which it was falling apace, by a thorough reparation at the national expence; and though the ravage that was made within it by Henry VIII. and the havock without and within it, during the unhappy civil commotions that defaced the ancient beauty of all religious houses in this kingdom, can never be recovered; yet it has lately, by the labour and skill of Sir Christopher Wren, and those that succeeded him, been decorated with some new ornaments, and by the addition of two stately towers, which are thought to exceed in point of workmanship any part of the ancient building, is now rendered more compleat than ever.

When the old abbey was examined in order to its being repaired, Sir Christopher Wren found great defects both in the materials and in the workmanship. The stone, which was of the Ryegate kind, very easy to work, but subject to take in water, was decayed four inches deep; the roof was oak, mixed with Normandy chesnut, badly wrought, and not properly secured from stretching, by which the walls were damaged, and still rendered worse by the water in the gutters being ill carried off. The four inner pillars of the cross he found to be swayed inward considerably, the arches of the second order cracked, the great west window feeble, and the gable end of the roof over it only weather boards painted. But what was worst of all, a bold and ignorant architect having formerly undertaken to build the Monks a cloister, without knowing the principles upon which he ought to have proceeded, had joined the new work to the old in such a manner, that, by the settling of the former, the wall above the windows of the latter was forced out ten inches, and the ribs broken, so that it was amazing it had not quite fallen. This, however, Sir Christopher caused to be amended instantly, and made stronger and more secure than ever the first builders had left it; the ragged Ashlar he likewise cut away, and invested the building, so far as he lived to finish it, with a better sort of stone from Burford in Oxfordshire, which has since been continued by his successors, and now near finished; the timber of the roof of the nave, and of the cross, was likewise substantially repaired under his direction. The four innermost pillars he restored to their perpendicular, and left a plan for erecting a tower and a spire that would serve rather to have strengthened than to have over-loaded them. In short, this great architect prepared and left behind him perfect draughts and models of all the additional ornaments that he thought necessary to complete this stately building; some of which, particularly the two lofty towers to the west, have been since erected in a masterly manner; but the lofty spire, which he seems to have had most at heart, has been either thought not practicable or not necessary.

Having thus given an account of the foundation and gradual increase of this ancient structure, we shall now proceed to a more particular description of it, as well as of what curiosities are still remaining.

A particular DESCRIPTION of the BUILDING.

There is not perhaps a more venerable fragment of antiquity in the whole world than this noble fabric, which has lately been new coated as already hinted, on the outside, except that part of it called Henry VIIIth's chapel, which is indeed a separate building, and will no doubt be repaired by a particular order, when the reparations of the ancient abbey are compleated. It must be owned, that by the two stately towers at the west end, lately added, and the great pains that have been taken in the coating, to preserve the ancient Gothic grandeur, this church, as to its distant prospect, has all the majesty of its former state; yet the beautiful carving and curious sculpture that once adorned it, and upon a nearer view used to charm the beholder, is now irretrievably lost; the buttresses, once beautifully capped with Turrets, made into plain pyramidal forms, and topped with free-stone; and the statues of our ancient kinds that formerly stood in niches near the tops of these buttresses and attracted admiration, are for the most part removed, and their broken fragments lodged in the roof of Henry VIIIth's chapel, where they are buried from the public eye for ever. Next the towers on the north side, some of these statues are still standing; and indeed it is on this side that you are to take your outward view of the abbey, the other side being so encumbered with buildings, that even the exact situation cannot be distinguished. The form of the church is that of a crucifix, in which you are to consider Henry VIIIth's chapel as no part. The south-side answered exactly to the north in the original plan, by attending to which you will be able to form a true judgment of the whole. The cloisters on the south-side were added for the conveniency of the monks, and the contiguous buildings were erected a considerable time after.

In viewing the outside of this building your attention

tion will be principally engaged by the magnificent portico, leading into the north-cross, which by some has been stiled the beautiful or Solomon's gate. It seems to have been founded by Richard II. his arms carved in stone being formerly over the door. This portico is of the gothic order, and is extremely beautiful; and over it is a most magnificent window of modern design, * but admirably well executed. On the south-side may be seen a window set up in 1705, which is likewise very masterly. Besides these there is nothing in the outward appearance to dwell upon except the loftiness of the roof, to exceed in which particular seems to have been the emulation of ancient architects; that of Westminster-hall is indeed very high, but that of the abbey is a great deal more lofty.

In order to take the most advantageous view of the inside, you must go in at the west door, between the towers; and the moment you enter, the whole body of the church opens itself at once to your eye, the pillars dividing the nave from the side isles, being so curiously formed as not to obstruct the side openings; nor is your sight terminated to the east, but by the fine painted window over the portico of Henry VIIIth's chapel, which antiently (when the altar was low, and the gloriously adorned shrine of Edward the confessor was included in the prospect,) must have afforded one of the grandest sights that ever was beheld.

The imagination is forcibly struck by the awful solemnity of the place, caused by the loftiness of the roof, and the happy disposition of the lights, and of that noble range of pillars which supports the whole building.

It may not be improper to observe, that the open space between the rows of pillars is called the nave of the church; the inclosed space, the choir; the space between the pillars and the walls, the isles; and the enlarged spaces to the north and south, the north cross and south cross.

These pillars terminate toward the east by a sweep, thereby enclosing the chapel of Edward the confessor in a kind of semi-circle, and excluding all the other chapels belonging to the abbey, of which there are no less than ten in number, beyond the avenue or walk, by which they are surrounded. And it is worth your observation, that as far as to the gates of the choir the pillars are filleted with brais, but all beyond with free stone; from which circumstance some take occasion to determine the bounds of the different enlargements of this church at different times, but we think, with much uncertainty. Answerable to the middle range of pillars are columns adjoining to the walls, which as they rise spring into semi-arches, and are every where met in acute angles by their opposites, thereby throwing the roof into a variety of intaglio's, as the term is, which are no other than little ornamental carvings at the closings and crossings of the lines. On the arches of the pillars are galleries of double columns, 15 feet wide, covering the side-isles, and enlightened by a middle range of windows, over which there is an upper range of larger windows; by these and the under range, together with the four capital windows, facing the N. S. E. and W. the whole fabric is so admirably enlightened, that in the day-time you are never dazzled with a glare, nor incommoded with darkness, in the walls between the columns were shallow niches, arched about eight or ten feet high, on which the arms of the original benefactors were depicted, and over them in saxon characters, their titles, &c. but these by the monuments of the dead, being placed before them, are almost all hid from the sight.

The next objects truly worth observance, are the fine paintings in the great west window of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; Moses and Aaron, and the twelve patriarchs; the arms of his late majesty, king Sebert, and queen Elizabeth; king Edward the confessor; and the late worthy dean, doctor Wilcox, bishop of Rochester; this window was set up in the year 1733, and is very curious; to the left of which, in a lesser window, is a painting of one of our kings (supposed of Richard II.) but the colours being of a water blue, no particular face can be distinguished. In the window, on the other side the great window, you will see a lively representation of Edward the confessor in his robes, and under his feet his arms painted. These are the most perfect of many remains of this ancient art, to be seen in the different windows of the abbey.

After surveying the open parts of this church, the next thing to be viewed is the choir, which you can only see during the times of divine service; the grand entrance into which is by a pair of iron gates finely wrought. The floor is paved with the finest black and white marble: the ancient stalls are covered with gothic acute arches, supported by small pillars of iron, and painted purple; but what you should particularly remark, is an ancient painting near the pulpit, of that most beautiful prince Richard II. sitting in a chair of gold, and dressed in a vest of green flowered with gold, having on shoes of gold powdered with pearls. This piece is in length six feet eleven inches, and, in breadth three feet seven inches; the lower part much defaced. The next thing to be remarked, is the fine altar enclosed with a curious ballustrade, within which is a pavement of Mosaic work, made at the charge of abbot Ware, and said to be the most beautiful in its kind of any in the world. By some latin verses it appears, that the stones whereof it is composed are of porphyry, and that it was laid in the year 1272, near 500 years ago. The altar, which had formerly stood in a chapel at Whitehall, is a stately and beautiful piece of marble, and was removed from the stores at Hampton-court in the year 1707, by order of her late majesty queen Anne, who presented it to this church. On each side the altar are marble doors opening into St. Edward's chapel, where at their coronation, our kings retire to refresh themselves.

Among the different ascents to the roof of this church, there is one at the west corner of the

* The draught was made and finished by Sir Christopher Wren, and the same gentleman's plans have been also used in making all the other repairs.

north cross, another at the east corner of the south cross; and over the south west tower are small chambers said to have been formerly the habitation of Bradshaw, president of the rebels bloody court, where he ended his days before the restoration in deep melancholy and grief.

Description of HENRY VIIth's Chapel.

HAVING said every thing necessary with respect to the architecture of this ancient abbey, it remains still to say something of that famous building called Henry VIIth's chapel, which, as we have already hinted, is undoubtedly of much later date than the fabric we have been describing. This wonder of the world, as it may well be styled, is adorned without with sixteen gothic towers, all beautifully ornamented with admirable ingenuity, and jutting from the building in different angles. It is situated to the east of the abbey, to which it is so neatly joined, that at a superficial view it appears to be one and the same building. It is enlightened by a double range of windows, that throw the light into such a happy disposition, as at once to please the eye and inspire reverence. In the towers are niches, in which stood a number of statues, that for expression were hardly to be equalled; but these were removed by order of the rump parliament, lest they should tumble upon the heads of some of its members. These towers are joined to the roof, by arches of the gothic order.

From the east end of the abbey you ascend to the inside, by steps of black marble under a stately portico, which leads to the gates opening to the body or nave of the chapel, before you enter which you may observe a door on each hand, opening into the side isles, for it is composed of a nave and side isles, every way answering the plan of a cathedral. The gates by which you enter the nave are well worth your observation: they are of brass most curiously wrought in the manner of frame work, having in every other open panel a rose and portcullis alternately. Being entered, your eye will naturally be directed to the lofty ceiling, which is wrought with such astonishing variety of figures as no description can reach; the stalls are of brown wainscot with gothic canopies, most beautifully carved, as are the seats with strange devices; more particularly the carving under the seats, are monstrous representations of beastly actions, but so strongly expressed by the artificer, that nothing on wood is now remaining equal to it: the pavement is of black and white marble, done at the charge of Dr. Killigrew, once prebendary of this abbey, as appears by two inscriptions, one on a plate of brass infixed in the rise towards the founder's tomb; the other cut in the pavement. The east view from the entrance presents you with the brass chapel and tomb of the founder, and round it, where the east end forms a semi-circle, are the chapels of the duke of Buckingham and Richmond, and the open spaces and windows, where is the tomb of Sheffield, duke of Buckingham, and the effigy of the countess of Richmond. The side-isles open to the nave at the east end on each side of the founder's tomb; and at the east end of the south isle is the royal vault; and of the other, the monuments of the princes murdered; the walls, as well of the nave as of the south isles, are wrought into the most curious imagery imaginable, and contains 120 large statues of patriarchs, saints, martyrs, and confessors, placed in niches, under which are angels supporting imperial crowns, besides innumerable small ones, all of them esteemed so curious, that the best masters have travelled from abroad to copy them. The windows which are thirteen on each side above, and as many below, in the north and south isles, besides the spacious east window, jut out into the gothic towers, and were formerly of painted or diapered glass, having in every pane a white rose, the badge of Lancaster, or an H the initial letter of the founder's name, and portcullisses, the badge of the Beaufort's crowned, of which there are some now remaining. The roof is flattish, and is supported on arches between the nave and the side isles, which turn upon twelve stately gothic pillars curiously adorned with figures, fruitage, and foliage. The length of this chapel within is 99 feet, the breadth 66, and the height 54.

We shall now proceed to such curiosities in Westminster-abbey, as deserve the reader's notice.

Descriptive account of the TOMBS and other MONUMENTS in the several CHAPELS.

IT has been already observed, that there are ten enclosed chapels belonging to Westminster-abbey, including Henry VIIth's, just now described; but as it would be a tedious work to enter minutely into a description of each, we shall rather chuse to go hand in hand with your guides, in giving you an account of their contents.

The following are the names of the several chapels beginning from the south cross, and so passing round to the north cross: 1. St. Benedict; 2. St. Edmund; 3. St. Nicholas; 4. Henry VII. 5. St. Paul; 6. St. John the Baptist; 7. Islop's Chapel; 8. St. John the Evangelist; 9. St. Michael; and 10. St. Andrew: besides which, the chapel of Edward the Confessor, which, as has been said, is inclosed in the body of the church, stands in the center.

Account of the TOMBS in the Chapel of St. BENEDICT.

THERE is in St. Benedict's chapel, an ancient tomb of free-stone, railed with iron on the side next the area, having formerly a canopy of wood, now quite demolished and broken away; on which lies the image of archbishop Langham, who was first a monk, afterwards a prior, then an abbot of Westminster, and lastly archbishop of Canterbury. There is a Latin epitaph round his tomb, setting forth, "That he was monk, prior, and abbot of this abbey; afterwards elected bishop of London; but Ely being then also vacant, he made choice of that see; that he was primate and chancellor of England; priest-cardinal, afterwards bishop-cardinal of Prenefte; and nuncio from the pope; and that he died on the feast of St. Mary Magdalene, in the year 1376, on whose soul God have mercy, and grant him the joys of

Engraved for Chamberlain's History of London.

The Chapel of King Henry VII in Westminster Abbey.

The front view of WESTMINSTER HALL

"of heaven for the merits of Christ." He was made cardinal by pope Urban V. with the title of St. Sextus, but was deprived of his archbishoprick by king Edward the third, for being promoted without his consent: in 1369 he was made bishop cardinal of Prebysty, by pope Gregory XI. and had the profits assigned him of the archdeaconries of Taunton and Wells; founded a house of Carthusians at Avignon in Province, at which place he was first interred, and afterwards removed to the chapel of St. Benedict.

The next object worthy of attention is a most elegant monument of black and white marble, on which are two images in a cumbent posture, representing an ancient nobleman in his robes, with his lady. This monument was erected in memory of Lionel Cranfield, earl of Middlesex, by his relict lady Anne: a translation of the latin inscription on this monument is as follows:

"Sacred to the memory of Lionel lord Cranfield, earl of Middlesex, who by that discerning prince king James I. being called to court, was for his excellent parts bountifully rewarded both with honours and fortune; being made master of the requests, and of the wardrobe, president of the court of wards and privy counsellor. The new and illustrious, as well as difficult province of lord treasurer of England, he fill'd; which services, (how indefatigably he underwent) his titles of knight, baron Cranfield, and lastly earl of Middlesex, with various other honours, abundantly testify. From hence envy swelling, its utmost efforts were exerted to raise storms against him. Whilst he boldly standing on his guard, encouraged by the consciousness of his innocence, was shamefully tossed about; but happily escaping shipwreck, in a composed winter of life, cast anchor and finished his course in a retired leisure. Here lying concealed, being wearied out first, and wasted afterwards, this pilot was roused up to undertake a safer voyage, and made the port of Heaven. He died the 6th of August, 1645, aged about seventy, he was twice married; by his first wife he had three daughters, Elizabeth late countess of Mulgrave; Martha, countess of Monmouth; and Mary, who died unmarried. By the the second, who survived him, he had three sons and two daughters, James, heir to the honour of earl Middlesex; Lionel and Edward; Frances, lady Buckhurst; and Susannah, who died an infant."

There is another tomb near bishop Langham's, about eighteen inches from the ground, on which is engraved on a brass plate the figure of an old man in a doctor's habit, designed for doctor William Bill, dean of Westminster, master of Eaton college, head of Trinity in Cambridge, and chief almoner to queen Elizabeth, as appears by his inscription. He died July 5, 1561. On a brass plate are some latin verses, setting forth, "that he was a good and learned man, and a friend to those that were so; that he was just and charitable; and that the poor, as well as the three colleges over which he presided, sustained an irreparable loss by his death."

There is a very fine monument on the east (on the spot where St. Benedict's altar stood) composed of various kinds of marble, to the memory of lady Frances, countess of Hertford, who is here represented in her robes in a cumbent posture, with her head resting on an embroidered cushion, and her feet on a lion's back. The sculpture of this monument is extremely curious, and well worth attention. It seems to represent a stately temple, where the ensigns and devices of the noble families of Somerset and Effingham, appear to be the chief ornaments. The Latin inscriptions set forth, "that she was wife to the noble earl of Hertford, son to the renowned prince Edward, duke of Somerset, earl of Hertford, viscount Beauchamp, and baron Seymour: that she was daughter to the noble lord William, baron Howard, of Effingham, knight of the garter, high admiral to queen Mary, and lord chamberlain and privy seal to queen Elizabeth, &c. That for her many graces both of mind and body, she was highly favoured by her gracious sovereign, and dearly loved by her noble lord; who, in testimony of his inviolable affection, consecrated to her memory this monument. She died in the forty-fourth year of her age, May 14, 1598."

A monument is affixed to the wall, on the south side of this chapel, to the memory of Dr. Gabriel Goodman, who is represented in his proper habit, and kneeling. The Latin inscription intimates, "that he was the fifth dean of this church, over which he presided for forty years with much applause; that he founded an hospital, and instituted a school, at Ruthin, in Denbighshire, where he was born; that he was a man of a regular and devout life; and that he died in 1601, aged 73." This Dr. Goodman was the first who raised the learned Cambden from obscurity, by defraying the expences of several of his journies in search of antiquities, and making him second master of Westminster school.

There is also, on the same side, and under the adjoining arch, a neat table monument of white marble, to the memory of George Sprat, second son of Dr. Thomas Sprat, bishop of Rochester, and dean of Westminster, by his wife Helena, descended from the ancient and honourable family of the Wolsleys in Staffordshire, who lies interred in the chapel of St. Nicholas. He died in the year 1608, being an infant only one year old.

In this chapel, Catherine, daughter to Dr. Dolben, bishop of Rochester, dean of Westminster, and afterwards archbishop of York, lies interred; as does also a countess of Kildare in Ireland; and Dr. John Spotswood, lord archbishop of St. Andrews, primate and lord chancellor of Scotland, who departed this life in the year 1640.

A monument is affixed in the wall, between this chapel and the next, of mosaic work, the sides in plain pannels, but the top of the table wrought in figures, said to be done with the same kind of stones as the floor before the altar, and erected for the children of Henry I. and Edward I. Over this tomb is something which seems to have been a piece of church perspective, but now almost defaced. This certainly was once a rich and costly monument; for in the records of

of the Tower, there is the king's order for erecting such a one in this place, and for allowing master Simon de Wells five marks and a half, to defray his expences in bringing from the city a handsome brass image to set upon his daughter Catharine's tomb; and for paying to Simon de Gloucester, the king's goldsmith, for a silver image for the like purpose, the sum of seventy marks.

Of the TOMBS, &c. in the CHAPEL of St. EDMUND.

THE next curiosity that follows in order is the chapel of St. Edmund, at the entrance of which, on your left hand, is a monument sacred to the memory of John of Eltham, second son of king Edward II. and so called from Eltham in Kent, the place of his nativity, where our English kings had once a palace. His statue is of white alabaster, the head encircled in a coronet of greater and lesser leaves, remarkable for its being the first of the kind; his habit is that of an armed knight. He died in Scotland at the age of nineteen, unmarried; though three different matches had been proposed to him; the last of which, to Mary daughter of Ferdinand king of Spain, he accepted; but lived not to consummate it. His funeral was so magnificent and costly, that the prior and convent demanded 100l. (a vast sum then) for horse and armour present there on the day of his burial. This monument is by some authors said to belong to H. Holland, duke of Exeter, who in the reign of Edward IV. lost his life at sea.

There is at the feet of this a handsome monument of white marble, with the following inscription.

In this chapel lies interred all that was mortal of the most illustrious and most benevolent John Paul Howard, earl of Stafford, who in 1738 married Elizabeth, daughter of A. Ewens of the county of Somerset, esquire, by Elizabeth his wife, eldest daughter of John St. Albin, of Alfoxton, in the same county, esquire.

His heart was as truly great and noble
As his high descent:
Faithful to his God,
A lover of his country,
A relation to relations,
A detester of detraction,
A friend to mankind:

Naturally generous and compassionate:
His liberality and his charity to the poor were without bounds.

We therefore piously hope that at the last day,
His body will be received in glory
Into the everlasting tabernacles.

Being snatched away suddenly by death,
Which he had long meditated and expected
with constancy,

He went to a better life the first of April, 1762;
Having lived sixty-one years, nine months, and six days.

The countess dowager, in testimony of her great
Affection and respect to her lord's memory,
Has caused this monument to be placed here.

The figures of the ancient badges of honour belonging to the Stafford family, who descend by ten different marriages from the royal blood of England and France, are placed round this inscription.

Invented and stained by Robert Chambers.

The next is a small table monument, on which lie the figures of William of Windfor, sixth son of Edward III. who died in his infancy; and of Blanch of the Tower, sister to William, who likewise died young, having obtained their surnames from the places of their nativity. What is remarkable, they are dressed in the habits of their time, the boy in a short doublet, of the indecency whereof Chaucer's parson complains; the girl in a horned head-dress, which Stow says was frightful.

Against the east wall between the monuments of lady Frances, dutchess of Suffolk, and John of Eltham, earl of Cornwall, is a monument erected to the memory of Nicholas Monck, provost of Eton, bishop of Hereford, and brother to George Monck duke of Albemarle, &c. he died December, the 11th, 1661, aged fifty. In the year 1723, his grandson Christopher Rawlinson, esquire; of Cark in Lancashire, caused this to be erected.

The effigy of lady Frances dutchess of Suffolk, in her proper robes, lies on an adjoining tomb raised from the floor, she was daughter of the famous Charles Brandon, by Mary the French queen, daughter to Henry VII. and became herself dutchess of Suffolk, by marrying Henry Grey, then marquis of Dorset, but upon her father's decease created duke of Suffolk, and afterwards beheaded for being concerned in Wyatt's attempt for dethroning the bloody queen Mary: by the duke she had two daughters, lady Jane and Catharine; lady Jane was married to lord Guildford Dudley, son to the duke of Northumberland, and afterwards proclaimed queen, but not being properly supported, fell a sacrifice to the resentment of her successors, who cut off the heads of her husband and father-in-law, as well as that of her father; lady Catharine was more fortunate, and married first lord Herbert, son to the earl of Pembroke, and afterwards Edward, earl of Hertford.—Being now deprived of a husband and daughter, the dutchess herself fell under the displeasure of the court on account of her religion, and was charged with dressing a cat in a rochet in ridicule of the episcopal dignity; this charge was vigorously prosecuted against her by the secret direction of Gardiner, bishop of Winchester; who being under confinement in the Tower in the preceding reign, and seeing the dutchess pass under his window, made her a very courteous reverence: but her grace, instead of returning the compliment, told him with an air of contempt, "it was well for the lambs, now the wolves were shut up;" which slight he never forgave: so that, not being able to foresee the consequences, she judged it most prudent privately to retire into the country, where she soon after married one Adrian Stock, esq; and with him lived unknown and unnoticed, till the accession of queen Elizabeth to the crown, when when she again appeared at court, and became a great favourite, inasmuch, that the queen, in regard she was lineally descended from Henry VII. distinguished her with an augmentation of the arms of England, viz. a Border Gaubony, Gold and Azure; which at her funeral was placed with her ancestors arms in banners, banner rolls, lozenges, and scutcheons; and quartered on the monument we are now describing. The time of her death is no where to be found, but it is certain she died before her second husband:—In Fox's Martyrology the sufferings of this great lady, for the reformed religion, are fully related; and, if we may credit what is there set down, she was once reduced to such misery, as after wandering up and down till she was faint, to be obliged to lie a long winter's night in a church-yard. On her tomb are two inscriptions; the first in latin verse, describing her virtues and accomplishments, the second in English, which is little more than an account of her several marriages.

The next monument to this is a very grand one of white marble, representing a youth in Grecian armour, sitting on a greek altar; and erected, as the latin inscription sets forth, to the memory of Francis Hollis, by John, earl of Clare, his afflicted father. This brave youth, after returning home from making a campaign in Flanders, died August 12th, 1622, in his nineteenth year. The following is his epitaph.

What so thou hast of nature or of arts,
Youth, beauty, strength, or what excelling parts
Of Mind and Body, letters, arms and worth,
Hiseighteen years, beyond his years, brought forth;
Then stand and read thyself within this glass,
How soon these perish, and thyself may pass;
Man's life is measured by the work not days,
No aged sloth, but active youth hath praise.

You are next presented with a white alabaſtar of lady Elizabeth Russel, in a sleeping posture. This lady was daughter to lord Russel; and is said to have died with a prick of her finger, which circumstance is apt to raise pity in the minds of the spectators; but this story has no other foundation, than the misapprehension of the statuary's design; for having represented her as asleep, and pointing with her finger to a death's head under her right foot, it has been supposed that her finger bled, and that the bleeding had closed her eyes in death; whereas the design of the artist seems rather to allude to the composed situation of her mind at the approach of death, which she considered only as a profound sleep, from which she was again to wake in a joyful resurrection; of which the motto under her feet is a clear illustration; Dormit, non mortua est; "she is not dead, but sleepeth." The latin inscription on the scroll beneath, only tells that her afflicted sister Ann erected this monument to her memory. The device is an eagle, the emblem of eternity, standing on a florilege of roses, &c.

There is another most magnificent monument within the rails which enclose this last; it is composed of marble and alabaſtar of various colours, painted and gilt; and erected to the memory of John lord Russel, (son and heir to Francis earl of Bedford) and his son Francis by Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Anthony Cook, knight and widow of Sir Thomas Hoby, knight. He is represented in a cumbent posture, habited in his coronation robes, with his infant son at his feet: His lady was esteemed the Sappho of her age, being well versed in the learned languages, and an excellent poet; five of the epitaphs on this tomb are of her composition, of which three are in latin, one in greek, and the other in English, which is here transcribed as a specimen, the purport of the others being the same.

Right noble twice, by virtue and by birth,
Of Heaven lov'd, and honour'd on the Earth;
His country's hope, his kindred's chief delight;
My husband dear, more than this world's light,
Death hath me reft. But I from death will take
His memory, to whom this tomb I make.
John was his name (ah was I) wretch must I say;
Lord Russel once, now my tear-thirsty clay.

Near this monument there are two others, affixed to the wall, one to the memory of lady Seymour, daughter to Edward duke of Somerset, who died March the 19th, 1560, aged nineteen; the other to the right honourable the lady Catharine Knollys, chief lady of the queen's bed-chamber, and wife to Sir Francis Knollys, knight, treasurer of her highness's household. She died January the 15th, 1568. This lady Knollys and lord Hunsdon, her brother, were the only children of William Carey, esq; by lady Mary his wife, one of the daughters and heirs of Thomas Boleyn, earl of Wiltshire and Ormond, and sister to Anne Boleyn, queen of England, wife to Henry VIII. father and mother to queen Elizabeth. What is farther remarkable, the only daughter of lady Knollys, was the favourite earl of Essex's mother.

There is a very ancient monument just under the window fronting the entrance, which represents a gothic chapel, and in it the figure of a knight in armour, in a cumbent posture, with his feet resting on a lion's back. This was erected for Sir Bernard Brocas, of Baurépaire in the county of Hants (Gutherie calls him Brokehouse) chamberlain to Anne, queen to Richard II. But this princess dying, and Richard falling under the displeasure of his people, who deposed him, Sir Bernard still adhered to his royal master in his misfortunes, which cost him his life; for being concerned with many others in an unsuccessful attempt to restore him to the crown, he shared the common fate of almost all the leaders in that conspiracy, and was in the month of January, 1399, publicly beheaded on Tower-hill.

On the west side, adjoining to this, is the monument of Sir Richard Peckfall, knight, master of the Buck-hounds to queen Elizabeth; first married to Alianer, the daughter of William Paulet, marquis of Winchester, by whom he had four daughters; and afterwards to Alianer, daughter to John Cotgrave, who erected this monument to his memory, as appears by the inscription: on the basis of the pillars are the following verses translated from the latin.

Death can't disjoin, whom Christ has join'd in love,
Love leads to death, and death to life above.
In heaven's a happier place, frail things despise,
Live well, to gain in future life the prize.

At a small distance from this is an ancient monument of grey marble, on which, in plated brass, is the figure of a Knight in armour; his head reclined upon his helmet, and one of his feet placed upon a leopard, the other on an eagle. By the Latin inscription this knight was Humphry Bouchier, son and heir to John Bouchier, lord Barners; who, espousing the cause of Edward IV. against the earl of Warwick, was slain in the battle of Barnet-field, on Easter-day, in the year 1471.

On the entrance to this chapel, on the right hand is the ancient monument of William de Valence, lying in a cumbent posture on a chest of wainscot placed upon a tomb of grey marble; the figure is wood, covered originally with copper gilt, as was the chest in which it lies, but the greatest part has been filched away; and of 30 small images that were placed in little brass niches round it, scarce one remains entire. This William de Valence was earl of Pembroke, and son to the earl of March, by Isabel, widow to king John; and being half brother to Henry III. was made prime minister to that prince, which brought upon him the odium of the barons. Being unable to maintain his post, he was at length, in 1237, forced to fly, leaving his lands in mortgage to one Aaron, a Jew, at York, for ninety marks in gold; which seems to have been a considerable sum, by the account given of the splendor of his equipage at his departure. About two years after, having squandered his money abroad, the king interested himself in his favour; and having solicited his return, bestowed upon him the government of Hertford-castle, of which he made a wanton use; for, being a foreigner, and for that reason hated by the English, he slipped no opportunity to mortify them; Matthew Paris gives one instance among many of his insolent behaviour to the bishop of Ely, whose Park at Hatfield lying contiguous to his government, Valence forcibly entered it without the bishop's leave, and having hunted till he was tired, broke open the bishop's house, pantries and cellars, and feasting himself and followers till they were gorged and drunk, committed the most tumultuous outrages, pulling out the taps of the casks that were empty, and broaching those that were full, suffering what they left to run about the cellars, and beating the servants unmercifully that opposed their riot. This done, they went off laughing at their mischief. In the year 1258, he was again banished, together with many other foreigners, who had made themselves obnoxious to the English barons; however, in 1264, we find him once more in England, at the battle of Evesham, where the king was taken prisoner by the barons, and he, with four hundred cuirassiers, fled to the castle of Pevensey, till they found means to transport themselves into France, where, in 1296, he was slain treacherously at Bayonne. His body was afterwards brought to England, and honourably buried in this chapel, and many devout persons expressing a desire to offer up their prayers for the welfare of his soul, one hundred days were granted them for that purpose.

Not far from the tomb of Valence, is a most magnificent monument, partly enclosed, to the memory of Edward Talbot, eighth earl of Shrewsbury, who died February the 8th, 1617, aged fifty-seven, and his lady Jane, eldest daughter and coheirs of Cuthbert baron Ogle, whose effigies in their robes lie on a black marble table, supported by a pedestal of alabaster. This monument is finely ornamented, and the carving on the various coloured marble is exquisite. The inscription contains nothing more than his titles and character, which is indeed very high: he was honourable without pride: potent without ostentation: religious without superstition: liberal both in mind and bounty: warded ever against fortune, his whole life was a path of justice; and his innocence escaping envy; continued through the whole course of his life.

There is a tomb two feet high on the floor of this chapel, on which is a lady in a widow's dress with a barb and veil cut in brass, round which is an inscription in old French, importing that Alianer de Bohun, daughter and heiress of Sir Humphry de Bohun, earl of Hertford, Essex, and Northampton, and wife to the mighty and noble prince of Woodstock, duke of Gloucester, earl of Essex and Buckingham, son to Henry III. lies interred here.—This lady, who was the greatest heiress in England, was deprived of her husband by the cruelty of his nephew, Richard II. who, jealous of his popularity, most treacherously betrayed him by a shew of friendship; for coming to visit him at Plasby, a pleasant seat of his in Essex, and staying supper, in duty he thought to attend his majesty to town; but at Stratford was suddenly surrounded by an ambush of armed men, who privately hurried him on board a ship, and carried him to Calais, where, by the king's order; he was stifled between feather-beds. After this melancholy accident his lady spent the rest of her days in the nunnery at Barking, and died October 3, 1399; from whence her remains were brought, and here interred. In the year 1397, the duke her husband was murdered.

Near the above is, a white marble table monument of Mary countess of Stafford: who died in January 1693, and who was wife to the unfortunate viscount Stafford, beheaded in the reign of king Charles II. on Tower-hill. She was lineally descended from the noble personages just mentioned, and from the barons and earls of Stafford, and was daughter and heiress to the noble house of Buckingham.

Above the duke of Suffolk's monument against the wall is one erected to the memory of Mary countess of Stafford, and of Henry earl of Stafford her son, who died abroad in 1719, and was buried here.

There are several persons interred in this chapel of less note than those already mentioned; particularly Henry Ferne, D. D. bishop of Chester, who, dying March 16, 1662, enjoyed his bishopric but five weeks.

An archbishop is also buried here, as appears by

by a very antique figure in a mass habit, engraven on a brass plate, and placed on a flat stone in the pavement, over the remains of Robert de Walby; who, as appears by the inscription, was first an Augustin monk, and attended Edward the black prince into France, where, being young, he prosecuted his studies, and made a surprizing progress in natural and moral philosophy, physic, the languages, and in the canon law; and being likewise an eloquent preacher and sound divine, was made divinity professor in the university of Thoulouse; where he continued till called by Richard II. to the bishopric of Man, from whence he was removed to the archbishopric of Dublin; but not liking that situation, he was advanced to the see of Chichester, and afterwards to the archbishopric of York. From an inscription scarce legible we are informed he died May 29, 1397.

On the west side of this chapel there is another grave stone of black marble, sacred to the memory of Edward lord Herbert, who died December 9, 1678, aged 46. He was baron of Cherbury in England, and of Castle-Ireland in Ireland.

Description of the TOMBS in St. NICHOLAS'S CHAPEL.

ON the left hand as you enter is a monument of black marble, finely polished, and adorned with cherubims. The scroll and figures are in alabaster; the former of which has a long inscription on it in English, describing the descent and marriage of lady Jane Clifford, youngest daughter to the duke of Somerset, and wife to Charles lord Clifford and Dungarvon, who died the 23d of November, 1679.

On the same side, near the door, is a monument of alabaster erected for lady Cecil, lady of the bedchamber to queen Elizabeth, and daughter of lord Cobham; who having married Sir Robert Cecil, son to William lord Burleigh, treasurer of England, died in child-bed, two years after, which was in the year 1591. There is a dialogue in latin, describing the mutual affection that subsisted between the happy pair.

From this the beholders are particularly struck with admiration at viewing a most superb temple of various coloured marble, erected to the memory of Anne, dutchess of Somerset, wife to Edward duke of Somerset, brother to the third wife of king Henry VIII. queen Jane Seymour and uncle to Edward VI. and some time regent during his minority. He was afterwards disgraced, accused of treasonable and felonious practices against the king and council, tried by his peers, and acquitted of treason, but condemned of felony in levying armed men contrary to law. In consequence of which he was sentenced to be hanged, but in respect to his quality, was beheaded on Tower-hill, the 22d of January, in the year 1551. The inscription on the tomb is in latin and English, and describes the noble lineage of this great lady, who was daughter to Sir Edward Stanhope; by Elizabeth daughter of Foulke Bouchier, lord Fitz-Water, her alliances and issue. She died at Hamworth in the nineteenth year of her age, April 16, 1587.

The next is a beautiful monument to the memory of lady Elizabeth Fane, the inscription of which represents her ancient descent, but in a particular manner her virtues. She was daughter to Robert baron Spencer, of Wormleighton, and wife to Sir George Fane, of Buston in Kent. She died in the 28th year of her age 1618.

Under this, adjoining to the wall, is an antique monument of grey marble beautifully wrought, placed over Nicholas baron Carew, and the lady Margaret his wife, daughter of John lord Dinham, and, as 'tis imagined, mother to Sir Nicholas Carew, who was beheaded in the time of Henry VIII. for holding a correspondence with cardinal de la Pole, and spiriting up a rebellion on account of religion. They both died in the year 1470: he on the 6th of December, she on the 13th.

Beneath this tomb, engraven on brass, is the portrait of Sir Humphrey Stanley, who died the 12th of March, 1505. He was knighted by Henry VII. for his gallant behaviour under his cousin lord Stanley, at the battle of Bosworth-field.

Near to this is a most superb monument, erected by the great lord Burleigh, to the memory of Mildred his wife, and their daughter lady Anne, countess of Oxford. It represents a stately temple made of porphyry, and other kinds of marble gilt. It is divided into two compartments, one raised over the other. In the lower lies lady Burleigh with her daughter lady Jane in her arms; and at her head and feet are her children and grand children kneeling. In the upper compartment is the figure of a venerable old man, in the robes and ensigns of the garter, kneeling, as if at prayers. It is supposed to be designed for lord Burleigh. There is a long latin inscription setting forth their respective virtues, and explaining the figures. This amiable lady, after being 40 years married, died the 4th of April 1589.

Adjoining is a monument erected to the memory of William de Dudley, alias Sutton, son of John lord Dudley, who died in the year 1483. He was archdeacon of Middlesex, dean of Windsor, and, in 1476, lord bishop of Durham.

There is another beautiful monument erected to the memory of lady Winifred, who was first married to Sir Richard Sackville, knt. and afterwards to John Paulet, marquis of Winchester. Before this monument, on the base, are the figures of a knight armed and kneeling; opposite him is a lady in deep mourning, in the like attitude; behind whose back, on a baptismal font, lies an infant with its head supported by a pillow. The inscription implies, that she was descended of illustrious parents, and married first a gentleman whose ancestors were renowned before the conqueror's time, and that her second husband was of noble blood.

On the west side of this chapel against the wall, is a gothic monument with the effigy of a lady in robes. By the inscription, this lady appears to be Philippa, second daughter and coheir to John lord Mohun, of Dunstar, who died in the year 1433. She was first married to Edward Plantagenet, duke of York, and afterwards to Sir Walter Fitz-Walter, knt. by neither of whom she appears to have had issue.

There are two beautiful pyramids in this chapel; the largest erected to the memory of Nicholas Bagenall, a child of two months old, that was overlaid by his nurse the 7th of March, 1688: the other to the memory of Anna Sophia Harley, a child of a year old, daughter to the honourable Christopher Harley, ambassador from the French king, who died in the year 1605. The inscription informs us, that the heart of this child is placed in a cup on the top of the pyramid.

There is a fine raised monument of polished marble in the middle of this chapel, to the memory of Sir George Villars and his lady, Mary Beaumont, created countess of Buckingham [in 1618. She died the 19th of April 1632, aged 62. Her son was advanced to the dignity of duke of Buckingham, by the favour of king James I. and in the third year of king Charles I. owing to the hatred he incurred from the public, was stabbed by Felton in the council-chamber at St. James's.

The marquis of Hamilton, who died in 1638, lies interred near this tomb. After a life of strange vicissitude, being engaged in the long and civil bloody wars during the reign of Charles I. he was, at length, after the murder of his royal master, cut off by the usurper; and, together with the lords Capel and Holland, fell a sacrifice to the policy of those unhappy times.

Just by lies Elizabeth countess of Derby, who died in 1626. She was the wife of William Stanley, earl of Derby, eldest daughter of Edward de Vere, earl of Oxford, and grand-daughter to lord Burleigh.

Algernon Seymour, duke of Somerset, lies interred in this chapel. He died the 7th of February 1750. Over the monument of lady Ross hang his banners, &c. Frances, relict of the above duke, eldest daughter and coheiress of the honourable Henry Thynne, esq; died the 7th of July 1754. Her banners hang over Elizabeth dutchess of Somerset's. In the same place is likewise interred George lord viscount Beauchamp, who died of the small pox in France the 11th of September 1744.

Sir Henry Spelman, who died in a very advanced age, was buried at the door of this chapel in the year 1641. He was supposed to be the most learned antiquary of his time.

*Account of the tombs in the chapel of king
HENRY VII.*

THE original intent of this chapel was as a sepulchre, in which none but the royal family was to be interred; nor indeed have any been admitted but those of the highest descent.

In this chapel stands the magnificent tomb of Henry VII. and Elizabeth his queen. It is inclosed in a curious chauntry of cast brass, beautifully designed, and well executed: it is ornamented with statues, of which those only of St. George, St. James, St. Bartholomew and St. Edward are now remaining. Within it are the effigies of the royal pair; in their robes of state, lying close to each other on a tomb of black marble; the head of which is supported by a red dragon, the ensign of Cadwallader, the last king of the britons, from whom king Henry VII. was fond of tracing his descent. There are various devices alluding to his family and alliances; such as portcullisses, signifying his relation to the Beauforts by his mother's side; roses twisted and crowned in memory of the union of the two royal houses of Lancaster and York; and at each end a crown in a bush, referring to the crown of Richard III. found in a hawthorn, near Bosworth-field. He died the 21st of April 1509, in the 53d year of his age. This monument was not erected till some time after his interment.

The remains of Edward VI. grandson to Henry VII. lie deposited at the head of this chauntry. A stately monument was originally erected to his memory by queen Mary, his sister and successor, but having some curious sculpture, representing the passion and resurrection of our Saviour, with two angels on the top kneeling, it was entirely demolished by the puritan party, during the grand rebellion, as a relict of romish superstition. He died in the 16th year of his age, and seventh of his reign.

In a small chapel on one side of the tomb of Henry VII. is a monument of cast brass, in which are the effigies of Lewis Stuart, duke of Richmond and Francis his wife. They are represented as lying on a marble table under a canopy of brass curiously wrought, and supported by the figures of faith, hope, charity, and prudence. There is on the top a beautiful figure of fame taking her flight and resting only on her toe. This illustrious nobleman died the 16th of February 1623. His lady the 8th of October 1639. There is likewise a pyramid of black and white marble supporting a small urn, in which is contained the heart of Esme Stuart, son to the duke of Richmond and Lenox, who died in France the 14th of August 1661, in the eleventh year of his age.

There is a very antique monument on the north side of Henry VIIth's chapel, which is decorated with several emblematical figures in brass gilt with gold, the most material of which is Neptune in a pensive posture with his trident reversed, and Mars with his head crushed. These figures support the tomb on which lies the effigy of George Villars, duke of Buckingham, the great favourite of king James I. and king Charles I. who fell a sacrifice to national resentment, and perished by the hands of an assassin. The dutchess, who caused this monument to be erected to his memory, lies in effigy by his side on the same tomb. There is a latin inscription, which represents his high titles and honours, and alludes to the unhappy cause of his death.

Not inferior to the above is a monument erected about thirty years ago to the memory of John Sheffield, late duke of Buckingham, where, on an altar of the most beautiful marble, lies in a half raised posture, his grace's effigy in a roman habit, with his dutchess Catharine, natural daughter of the duke of York, afterwards king James II. standing at his feet weeping. On each side are enrichments of military trophies, and over all a beautiful figure of Time holding several busts in relievo, being the portraits of their graces children. In the early part of his life he was a most excellent poet, and in the latter part, perhaps one of the first writers of his time. Over his grace's effigy is a latin inscription, importing the affection he bore to his king and country, and his resignation to the will of providence. He died the 24th of February 1720, in the 75th year of his age. He left his literary productions to the care of Mr. Pope. His grace had three wives: the first Ursula, countess of Conway; the second Catharine, countess of Gainsborough, who died in 1704, and lies here interred; and the third Catharine, countess of Anglesey, who died the 14th of March 1743.

are

You now enter the north isle, where is fixed on the east wall a beautiful altar raised by king Charles II. to the memory of Edward V. and his brother, who by their treacherous uncle Richard III. were murdered in the Tower. The inscription is in latin, the translation of which runs thus: "Here lie the reliques of Edward V. king of England, and Richard, duke of York; who being confined in the Tower, and there stifled with pillows, were privately and meanly buried by order of their perfidious uncle Richard the usurper: their bones, long enquired after and wished for, after lying 201 years in the rubbish of the stairs, (those lately leading to the chapel of the White Tower) were on the 7th of July 1674, by undoubted proofs discovered, being buried deep in that place. Charles II. pitying their unhappy fate, ordered those unfortunate princes to be laid amongst the reliques of their predecessors, in the year 1678, and the 20th of his reign." What is very singular, Edward was born the 4th of November 1470, in the sanctuary belonging to this church, whither his mother took refuge during the contest between the houses of York and Lancaster. His father dying, he was proclaimed king when but eleven years of age, and was murdered, as has been related about two years after, on the 23d of June 1483. Richard his brother, was born May 28, 1474, and was married in his infancy.

There is a lofty and beautiful monument in this isle, erected to the memory of queen Elizabeth, by her successor king James I. The inscription describes her character thus: "That she was the mother of her country, and the patroness of religion and learning: she was skilled in many languages, adorned with every excellence of mind and person, and endowed with princely virtues beyond her sex; that in her reign religion was refined to its primitive purity; peace was established; money restored to its just value; domestic insurrections quelled; France delivered from intestine troubles; the Netherlands supported; the Spanish armada defeated; Ireland, almost lost by the secret contrivance of Spain, recovered; the revenues of both universities improved by a law of provisions; and, in short, all England enriched; that she was a most prudent governess, forty-five years a virtuous and triumphant queen;

"truly religious and blessed in all her great affairs; and that after a calm and resigned death in the seventieth year of her age, she left her mortal part to be deposited in this church, which she established on a new footing, till by Christ's word she is called to immortality." She died the 24th of March, in the year 1602. In this same place lies interred the bloody queen Mary, whose reign preceded that of the above valuable queen.

There is in this isle a pyramid of a considerable height, supported by two griffins of brass gilt, on a pedestal of the most curious marble, erected to the memory of Charles Montague, the first of this family who bore the title of lord Halifax. He died the 19th of May 1715.

In the same isle, at the east end, is a vault, in which are deposited the remains of king James I. and his queen, who was daughter to Frederick II. king of Denmark. This prince reigned over Scotland fifty-nine years, and England twenty-two. After a long and peaceful reign, he died the 16th of March 1625, aged sixty.

There is a small tomb over this vault with the figure of a child, erected to the memory of Mary, third daughter to king James I. born at Greenwich in the year 1605; and soon afterwards committed to the care of lady Knevet, in whose house, at two years old, she died the 16th of December 1607.

To the memory of Sophia, fourth daughter of the same king, is another monument representing a child in the cradle. She died in three days after her birth, which was at Greenwich in the year 1606.

There is a table monument in the south-isle of of this chapel, on which is the effigy of Margaret, countess of Richmond, mother to Henry VII. She was a great encourager of the art of printing when first brought into England. The inscription describes her to be of a very charitable disposition. She died during the reign of her grandson Henry VIII. in the month of July 1509.

Inclosed with iron rails at the west-end of this isle is a handsome table monument on which lies finely robed, the effigy of Margaret Douglas, daughter of Margaret queen of Scots. Agreeable to the English inscription this lady had to her great grand-father king Henry VII. to her uncle king Henry VIII. to her cousin-german king Edward VI. to her brother king James V. of Scotland; to her son king Henry I of Scotland; to her grand-son king James VI. having to her great grand-mother and grand-mother two queens, both named Elizabeth; to her mother Margaret queen of Scots; to her aunt, Mary the French queen; to her cousins-german, Mary and Elizabeth, queens of England; to her niece and daughter-in-law, Mary queen of Scots. She was privately married to Thomas Howard, son of the duke of Norfolk, in the year 1537; on which account both of them were committed to the Tower by king Henry VIII. her uncle. Her husband died in prison, but she being released, was soon after married to Matthew earl of Lenox, by whom she had the handsome lord Darnly, father to king James I. whose effigy is the foremost on the tomb in a kneeling posture, with the crown over his head. There are seven children besides round the tomb of Margaret. She died the 10th of March 1577.

P p

are

There is a magnificent monument near this tomb, erected to the memory of the unhappy Mary, queen of Scots, who was beheaded on the 8th of February 1587, at Fotheringhay-castle in Northamptonshire, on a scaffold erected in the hall of that castle. She was afterwards pompously interred by order of queen Elizabeth in the cathedral church of Peterborough, but on the accession of her son to the throne of England, her remains were removed from thence, and placed near this monument amongst her ancestors.

The royal vault, as it is called, is at the east end of this isle, in which are deposited the coffins of king Charles II. king William III. and queen Mary his consort; queen Anne and prince George's. In a wainscot press over them is the effigy of king Charles II. in wax-work, resembling life, and dressed in the robes he wore at the installation of the knights of the garter at Windsor.

There is likewise a monument erected to the memory of George, and Christopher Monk his son, both dukes of Albemarle; also Elizabeth, dutchess dowager of Albemarle and Montague.

Near this is a figure erected to the memory of Catharine lady Walpole, eldest daughter of John Shorter, esq; of Rybrook, in Kent, and first wife of Sir Robert Walpole, afterwards earl of Orford. The figure was brought from Italy by her son Horace. She died the 20th of August in the year 1737.

At the corner of the great east window is another wainscot press, in which is placed the effigy of lady Mary, dutchess of Richmond, relict of Charles Stuart, duke of Richmond, who died in 1672. The figure is dressed in the very robes her grace wore at the coronation of queen Anne. She was daughter of Walter Stuart, who died October the 15th, 1702, and is interred in the Richmond vault. She left her fortune to Walter Stuart, lord Blantyre in Scotland, who died June the 23d. 1713.

In a handsome wainscot press near this monument is the effigy of Catharine, relict of John duke of Buckingham and Normanby, and natural daughter of king James II. by Catharine countess of Dorchester. She is dressed in the robes she wore at his late majesty's coronation. Likewise by her stands the effigy of her son, the marquis of Normanby, who died the first of February, 1714, in the fourth year of his age.

As you pass out of the left isle, in another wainscot press, is the effigy of general Monk, who had so great a share in the restoration of king Charles II. to the throne of his ancestors. This great man was son to Sir Thomas Monk of Potheridge, descended by the mother's side from the royal line of the Plantagenets. As a reward for his eminent services in the restoration, he was created duke of Albemarle, earl of Farrington, Baron Monk, of Potheridge, Beauchamp, and Tey, captain general of all his majesty's forces, knight of the most noble order of the garter, master of the horse, and privy counsellor. He died January the 4th, 1669, and was buried in a vault in this isle, which is still called Albemarle vault. He is represented in armour, and the person who describes him generally presents his ducal cap for the acceptance of the observer's bounty.

The installation of the knights of the most honourable order of the Bath is performed in this chapel. This order was revived in the reign of king George I. in the year 1725. In their stalls are placed brass plates of their arms, &c. and over them hang their banners, swords, and helmets.

Description of the MONUMENTS, &c. in St. PAUL'S CHAPEL.

AS you enter this chapel, on your left hand is a monument erected to the memory of Sir John Puckering, knight, remarkable for his knowledge in the laws, as well as piety, wisdom, and many other virtues. He was lord keeper of the great seal of England four years in the reign of queen Elizabeth, in which office he died the 20th of April 1596.

There is a monument very much decayed adjoining to this, on which are the effigies of Sir James Fullerton, and his lady. On a table of black marble there is an epitaph, which has a certain quaintness in it peculiar to those times, and runs thus :

" Here lie the remains of Sir James Fullerton, " knt. first gentleman of the bedchamber to " king Charles the first (prince and king) a gene- " rous rewarder of all virtue, a severe reprover " of all vice, a professed renouncer of all vanity. " He was a firm pillar to the commonwealth, a " faithful patron to the catholic church, a fair " pattern to the British court. He lived to the " welfare of his country, to the honour of his " prince, to the glory of his God. He died " fuller of faith than of fear, fuller of resolu- " tion than of pains, fuller of honour than of " days."

There is a table monument in the middle of this chapel, which is railed in. On it lie the effigies of Sir Giles Daubeny, and dame Elizabeth his wife. In the reign of Henry VII. he was lord lieutenant of Calais in France, lord chamberlain to his majesty, knight of the most noble order of the garter, and father to Henry lord Daubeny, the first and last earl of Bridgewater.

His lady died in the year 1500, and he the 22d of May, 1507.

On the table of a most beautiful monument of alabaster, with pillars of lydian marble gilt, lies the effigy of an old man in a chancellor's habit, with four sons and four daughters kneeling on the base. It appears by the inscription that this monument was erected to the memory of Sir Thomas Bromley, knight, privy-counsellor to queen Elizabeth, and eight years chancellor, in which office he died the 12th of April, 1587.

The next is a lofty but plain monument, on which is placed, in a half raised posture, the effigy of Sir Dudley Carleton, afterwards made viscount Dorchester, for his great services to king Charles I. and his father, both at home and abroad. The inscription informs us he was well acquainted with the language and customs of most of the European nations, and was, both by king James I. and his successor, entrusted with the most

most important foreign negotiations. He was twice married; first to Ann Gerrard, who died the 18th of April 1627, with whom he lived twenty years; and afterwards to Ann, viscountess Bayning, who died the 15th of February 1631, by both of whom he had issue.

There is another beautiful monument of alabaster to the east of this, erected to the memory of Frances countess of Suffex, whose effigy lies in a cumbent posture with a coronet on her head, resting on an embroidered cushion, and her body beautifully robed. Her ladyship was the wife of Thomas Ratcliffe, earl of Suffex, lord-deputy of Ireland, and knight of the garter; and daughter to Sir William Sidney of Penshurst, knight. Having outlived her husband, at her decease she instituted a divinity lecture in this abbey, gave five thousand pounds towards the building of a new college in Cambridge, now called Sidney Suffex college, and left a sufficient yearly revenue for the maintenance of one master, ten fellows, and twenty scholars, either in the said new college, or in Clare-hall. She died the 15th of April, 1589, in the 58th year of her age. The inscription tells us, that to her relations she was most kind, to the poor and prisoners most liberal, and to the ministers of the word of God most charitable.

Next to this is a monument erected to the memory of Sir Henry Belasyse, knt. lieutenant-general, some time governor of Galway in Ireland, and afterwards of Berwick upon Tweed, in the reign of king William III. He died the 16th of December 1717, in the 69th year of his age.

In this chapel is a monument of black touchstone, which differs, in a very peculiar manner, from any other in the abbey. There is, on the top of it, a circular frame of gilt brass, enclosing the bust of Ann, lady Cottington, wife to Francis lord Cottington. She died the 22d of February 1633, in the 33d year of her age. Her issue were four daughters and a son, all of whom died before their father, who, on a table monument beneath, lies in effigy, resting on his left arm, and over the head of a satyr is the following inscription: "Here lies Francis lord Cottington, of Hanworth, who, in the reign of king Charles I. was chancellor of his majesty's exchequer, master of the court of wards, constable of the Tower, lord high-treasurer of England, and one of the privy-council. He was twice ambassador in Spain, once for the said king, and a second time for king Charles II. now reigning, to both which he most signally shewed his allegiance and fidelity, during the unhappy civil broils of those times; and for his faithful adherence to the crown (the usurper prevailing) was forced to fly his country, and, during his exile, died at Valadolid in Spain, June 19th 1652, in the 74th year of his age, whence his body was brought and here interred by Charles Cottington, esq; his nephew and heir, in 1679." This great man was secretary to Charles, prince of Wales, whom he attended on his journey to visit the Infanta when on the point of marriage with that princess. After the death of the duke of Buckingham, he rose to such honour as even to be consulted in all the principal affairs of the nation; and such was his conduct, that he acquitted himself of that popular odium which fell on many much inferior to himself.

Here is also a very gothic monument erected to the memory of Lewis Robert, or Robbert, a foreigner, but standard-bearer to Henry V. first, knight of the bath, and then of the garter, and afterwards created lord Bouchier.

Description of the TOMBS, &c. in St. ERASMUS'S CHAPEL.

AS you enter this chapel, on the right hand, is an elegant monument erected to the memory of Mrs. Mary Kendall, daughter of Thomas Kendall, esq; who died at Epfom the 4th of March, 1700, in the 33d year of her age. The epitaph describes her character thus: "Her great virtues rendered her every way worthy of that close union and friendship in which she lived with lady Catharine Jones; and in testimony of which, she desired that even their ashes, after death, might not be divided; and therefore ordered herself here to be interred, where she knew that excellent lady designed one day to rest, near the grave of her beloved and religious mother, Elizabeth, countess of Ranelagh."

Near this is a monument erected to the memory of colonel Edward Popham, and his lady, the statues of whom are in white marble, as big as the life, and stand under a lofty canopy, resting their arms in a thoughtful position on a marble altar, on which lie the gloves of an armed knight. He was an active officer in Cromwell's army, and his achievements were inscribed on his tomb. At the time of the restoration this inscription was ordered to be defaced, and the whole monument destroyed, but at the intercession of some of the relations of his lady, who had been of particular service to his majesty, the stone, on which the inscription was engraved, was only turned inwards, and the monument received no other injury. The time of this gentleman's death is entirely uncertain, as the inscription is irrecoverable.

In this chapel is a monument erected to the memory of Thomas Carey, second son to the earl of Monmouth, who died in the year 1648. It is said he died of grief at the age of 33, on account of the unhappy fate of his royal master king Charles the first, to whom he was of the bedchamber. He was son to Robert lord Carey, of Leppington, who was created earl of Monmouth in 1625, and died the 5th of February 1639. His eldest son Henry succeeded him in his titles, but died without issue in the year 1661, in consequence of which the title became extinct.

There is an ancient monument in this chapel, erected to the memory of Sir Thomas Vaughan, knt. chamberlain to Edward, prince of Wales, and treasurer to king Edward the fourth.

In the middle of this chapel is a large table monument, erected to the memory of Thomas Cecil, earl of Exeter, baron Burleigh, knight of the garter, and privy-counsellor to king James; on which is his effigy in his robes with a lady on his right side, and a vacant space for another on his left. Dorothy Nevil, his first wife, who was daughter daughter and coheir to the noble lord Latimer, lays on his right side; and the place that is vacant was left for his second wife Frances Bridges, who was of the noble family of Chandois. This lady gave express orders in her will, that as the right side was taken up, her effigy should not be placed on the left; notwithstanding which, agreeable to the inscription, they are all buried together in one vault.

Affixed to the east wall is the most superb monument in this chapel. It is in the very place where stood the altar of St. John Baptist, and was erected to the memory of Henry Carey, first cousin to queen Elizabeth, created baron of Hunsdon, in Hertfordshire, in the year 1558, some time governor of Berwick, lord chamberlain to queen Elizabeth, privy-counsellor, and knight of the garter, who died the 23d of July 1596, in the seventy-second year of his age. It is said, that not meeting with preferment agreeable to his expectations, he laid the disappointment so much to heart, that he languished for a long time on a sick bed, at which the queen being moved too late, created him an earl, and ordered the patent and robes to be laid before him, but without effect.

There is a stone monument, very antique, against the south wall, where, under a gothic canopy, lies the figure of a bishop properly habited, and is supposed to be Thomas Ruthal, made bishop of Durham by king Henry VIII. He had been secretary of state to Henry VII. and was made a privy-counsellor, and sent abroad on various embassies by Henry VIII. He died in the year 1524. Bishop Goodwin relates the following circumstance relative to the discovery of his possessions: That being commanded to write down a true state of the kingdom in general for his majesty's private information, he took great pains in the performance, and having fairly transcribed it, caused the book to be bound in vellum, gilt, and variously ornamented; and at the same time having taken an account of his own private estate, with an inventory of his jewels, plate and money, he caused that likewise to be bound and ornamented exactly like the other, and laid them both carefully together in his closet. However, it so fell out, that the king, upon some occasion, sent cardinal Wolsey in haste for the national tract, which he had so long expected from Ruthal, but by mistake Wolsey received the book which contained the schedule of the bishop's own wealth. The cardinal soon discovered the mistake, but, being willing to do Ruthal, to whom he had no liking, a shrewd turn, he delivered the book to the king, just as he received it, telling his majesty that now if he wanted money, that book would inform him where he might command a million; for so much did the bishop's inventory amount to. When the bishop discovered his error, it touched him so near, that he died soon after.

An ancient stone monument is erected in this chapel, to the memory of William of Colchester, on which lies his effigy properly habited, the feet supported by a tomb, and the head by an angel.

Another antique monument is that of George Flaccet, abbot of Westminster, in the reign of Henry VII. who died about the year 1414. The stone coffin of Thomas Mything, bishop of Hereford, stands on this monument: he was some time abbot of Westminster, and privy-counsellor to king Edward IV.

Account of the TOMBS in the Chapel of ISLIP, otherwise called St. JOHN BAPTIST.

THERE are but two monuments in this chapel that admit of any particular notice; the one is that of John Islip, abbot of Westminster, the founder. It is a plain marble table, standing in the center, supported with four small pillars of brass; over which on the roof was anciently a fine painting of our Saviour on the cross, destroyed no doubt by the puritans in the time of Cromwell, who were enemies to every thing that tended to popish idolatry. This man was employed by Henry VII. in decorating his new chapel, and in repairing and beautifying the whole abbey; to which he added several embellishments, especially the statues of our kings along the buttresses, which since that are almost all demolished. He likewise projected a most superb dome or lanthorn to be erected in the center of the cross, but the pillars were found too weak to support it. His own chapel he dedicated to St. John, and died the second of January 1510.

The other monument is that of Sir Christopher Hatton, knight of the bath, son and heir of John Hatton, and the nearest kinsman of the male line to Christopher Hatton, chancellor of England in the reign of queen Elizabeth. He died, according to the inscription, the 10th of September 1619. The principle figures on this tomb are a knight in armour, and a lady in deep mourning, both resting on the ascending sides of a triangular pediment, separated in the middle by a trunkless helmet. There is a neat piece of architecture over their heads, in the center whereof is a scroll with their arms, held up by naked boys, one whereof, over the knight, holds a torch put out and reversed, to shew that Sir Christopher died first; the other over the lady holds his torch erect, and burning, to signify that she survived him. After the death of Essex, in the reign of queen Elizabeth, Sir Christopher, the chancellor, became the chief favourite. He was preferred to the chancellorship for the reputation he had of clear judgment and strict integrity. Though he was rooted in the queen's favour, yet 'tis said he died through her unkindness; for having run into her debt, she demanded her money with some severity; which, presuming on her favour, he hoped would have been remitted; but finding his mistake, he sickened, and during his illness Elizabeth, by visits and other expressions of friendship, strove to heal the spirit she had broken, but in vain; for he died the 23d of July 1596, in the seventy-second year of his age.

There is a chauntry over this chapel, in which are two large wainscot presses, containing the effigies of royal personages, and others of the highest distinction. These effigies resembled the deceased as near as possible, and were usually exposed at the funerals of our princes, in open chariots, with their proper ensigns appended of royalty and honours. What are here laid up, are in a sad mangled condition; some stripped, others in in tattered robes, and all of them maimed or broken. Those that are the most ancient are least damaged, by which it appears that the richness of their cloaths had been the occasion of this ravage; for the robes of Edward VI. which were of crimson velvet, but now appears like leather, are left entire; but those of queen Elizabeth and king James I. are entirely stripped.

The eye is particularly struck at the effigies of king William and queen Mary, and queen Anne, which are in good condition placed in two handsome wainscot presses, in this chapel. Here is likewise a new figure of queen Elizabeth.

Description of the TOMBS of St. JOHN the EVANGELIST'S CHAPEL.

There is an elegant monument in the center of this chapel, erected to the memory of Sir Francis Vere, a gentleman well skilled both in learning and arms; but being brought up from his youth in the camp, he dedicated his study to the art of war, in which he was equalled by few, not excelled by any. He commanded in front under prince Maurice, at the battle of Newport, against the Spanish army, who came to the relief of that town, under the command of the archduke Albert, then governor of the low countries. Vere, in posting the English soldiers advantageously had occasion to pass a ford, in order to which the soldiers were preparing to strip; but he prevented that delay, by telling them that what they were going to do was entirely useless, for in a few hours they might either have dry cloaths, or need of none. By this seasonable encouragement the enemy's horse that had left their foot behind, were beat back, and the English, who were not above 1500 in number, gained the eminence of the downs, supported by a body of Friesland foot, ready to sustain the first shock of the enemy's fire. Though this was a desperate enterprise, in which Vere himself was wounded, his horse shot under him, and half the English slain, yet it proved the cause of victory on the part of the Dutch; for prince Maurice advancing suddenly with his fresh troops, while the Spaniards were yet greatly exhausted by their full discharge upon this small body, found it easy to put them to the rout, and thereby obtained a compleat victory. The monument is a table supported by four knights kneeling, on which lie the several parts of a compleat suit of armour, and underneath the effigy of Sir Francis, laying, as if undressed, in a loose gown, on a quilt of alabaster.—There is a short description on the base of the monument in latin, signifying that he was nephew to the earl of Oxford, and that this was consecrated to his memory by his disconsolate widow. He died in the fifty-fourth year of his age, the 28th of August, 1608.

Adjoining to the wall, eastward of this, is a monument, on the pedestal whereof is represented in relief the siege of a town; alluding, in all probability, to the siege of Newport. The principal figure is a general on horseback holding a baton, and having a blemish in one eye. It is reasonable to suppose, that as the monument was erected to the memory of Sir George Hollis, nephew to Sir

Francis Vere, and major-general under him, that this piece of sculpture is intended to perpetuate the story of that memorable battle in which Sir Francis was wounded, and acquired so much honour. The cannon, which is very visible, seems to point that out as the instrument by which his horse was killed, and the blemish in the general's eye, the hurt he might have received on falling. There is a Pallas sitting on one side of the pedestal, and on the other Bellona, lamenting the death of the great warrior represented above in a Roman habit, standing erect upon a lofty altar with a cherub supporting the plinth on which he stands. Sir George died in the fiftieth year of his age, the sixteenth of May, in the year 1626.

Not far from the tomb of Sir Francis lies Aubrey de Vere, the last earl of Oxford of that name; which title had continued in a direct line to his noble family ever since the year 1155. He was the twentieth and last earl, and enjoyed the title seventy years. He died without issue male the 12th of March, 1702.

There were formerly many ancient monuments in this chapel; only one of which is now remaining. It has the image of an abbot, in his mass habit, curiously engraved on brass, representing John de Eastny, who died the 4th of March 1498. He appears, by the records of the church, to have been a great benefactor to it. He adorned the west window with many grand paintings in glass, a small quantity of which still remains: he built the screen to this chapel, and presented two images gilt for the altars of St. Peter and St. Paul; and one for the Chapter-house. 'Tis very singular that in breaking up a grave, the body of this abbot was discovered in a coffin quilted with yellow sattin, having on a gown of crimson silk girded round him with a black girdle; on his legs were white silk stockings, and over his face a clean napkin doubled up and laid corner-wise.

The face was in some degree discoloured, but the legs were firm. This discovery was made the 17th of August 1706.

Before the door of this chapel there is a grey marble which bears the figure of an armed knight, and is said, by the register, to represent Sir John Harpedon, knt. who died in the year 1457. He is resting his head on a greyhound, and his feet on a lion.

On the north side of this chapel, within the door, is another ancient tomb of free-stone, under which lies the body of Sir Thomas Parry, knt. who died the 15th of December, 1560. He was treasurer of the household, and master of the court of wards and liveries to queen Elizabeth.

Description of the TOMBS, &c. in St. MICHAEL'S CHAPEL.

There is a most superb monument lately erected in this chapel, and executed by that great master of sculpture Mr. Rubiliac. Above is represented a lady expiring in the arms of her husband; and beneath, sily creeping from a tomb, the king of terrors presents his grim visage, pointing his unerring dart to the dying figure, at which sight the husband, suddenly struck with astonishment, horror and despair, would willingly willingly ward off the fatal stroke from the distressed object of his care. This monument was erected to the memory of Joseph Gascoigne Nightingale and his lady, and has on it the following inscription: "Here rest the ashes of Joseph Gascoigne Nightingale, of Mamhead, in the county of Devon, esq; who died July the 20th, 1752, aged 56; and of lady Elizabeth his wife, daughter and coheirs of Washington earl Ferrers, who died August the 17th, 1734, aged 27. Their only son Washington Gascoigne Nightingale, esq; deceased, in memory of their virtues, did, by his last will, order this monument to be erected.

Inclining to the north, there is a monument erected to the memory of Sarah, dutchess of Somerset, relict of John Seymour, duke of Somerset, who died the 5th of October 1692. On the base of this monument sit two charity boys, one on each side, bewailing the death of their great benefactress, who is represented in a modern dress, resting upon her arm, under a canopy of state, and looking earnestly up at a group of cherubs, issuing from the clouds above her. Underneath is a latin inscription to this purpose: "Here lies the late illustrious dutchess of Somerset, celebrated for charity and benevolence, who erected a grammar-school for boys at Tottenham, in Middlesex, enlarged the income of the green-coat hospital at Westminster, largely endowed Brazen-Nose college in Oxford, and St. John's in Cambridge, for the education and instruction of youth in piety and good literature. She was likewise an encourager of trades and handicrafts, and had a tender regard to old age, by erecting an alms-house in Froxfield in Wiltshire, for thirty widows: she was very charitable to the poor of St. Margaret's, Westminster, where she instituted a lecture, and gave many stately ornaments to the church."

There was formerly a monument in this chapel erected to the memory of Catharine, lady St. John. It was broken in pieces at the time of repairing the church, but the effigy may be still seen in the chapel of St. Andrew. This lady was relict of John lord St. John, of Bletsoe in Bedfordshire, and daughter of Sir William Dormer, of Eyethorpe in Bucks.

Account of the TOMBS in St. ANDREW'S CHAPEL.

A Most beautiful monument is erected in the center of this chapel, to the memory of Sir Henry Norris, his lady, and six sons. It has a fine representation of an encampment in relief, and is otherwise elegantly ornamented; but as there is no inscription, the date is left uncertain. This great man was ancestor to the present earl of Abington, who is baron Norris of Rycot, and for his valour in the low countries in the reign of queen Elizabeth, was created lord Norris of Rycot. He was the first who discovered the project of the Spanish invasion, which he did by means of the provost-marshal of Paris, whom he entertained as a spy.

There was formerly against the east wall, a table monument erected to the memory of Sir John Burgh, who was twice honoured with knighthood;

once in the Netherlands by the earl of Leicester, captain-general of her majesty's forces, and afterwards by Harry IV. of France, at the victory of St. Adrian. He died the 10th of March, 1594. The inscription informs us, that endeavouring to take and bring into England a large Spanish ship laden with jewels, gold, silver, Indian spices, &c. a prize of infinite value, by an unhappy security of mind, despising the enemy, though far superior in force, he met with an untimely death at the age of 32, to the irreparable loss of his country.

A monument is still remaining erected to the memory of Ann, daughter of Henry Bodenham, and of Catharine his wife, wife of James Kirton, of Castel-Cary, in the county of Somerset, who died the 7th of September 1603.

There is in one corner of this chapel the ancient monument of abbot Kirton, who died the third of October, 1466. It is worthy of observation, having several labels of black letter all round the portrait, which stands upon eagles crowned, alluding, perhaps to his high descent, from the ancient and illustrious family of Codilbic. He was an excellent orator, and appears to have been a man of great reputation.

Description of the TOMBS in the AREA.

ON the north side, as you pass round the area, were formerly three ancient monuments, all of which are now almost obliterated. The first of free-stone, made like a close bed, was walled up, and the tomb of bishop Duppa, tutor to king Charles I. placed against it. This tomb was covered with an ancient gothic arch, the sides whereof were adorned with vine branches in relief, the roof within, springing into many angels, under which lies the image of a lady in a very antique dress, her feet resting upon lions, and her head on pillows supported by angels, sitting on each side the effigy, gilt and painted. On the side of the tomb are six niches, on which seem to have been painted monks, and on the pedestal are still to be seen some remains of paintings. This monument covered the remains of Aveline, countess of Lancaster, who died the 4th of November 1293, the very year of her marriage. She was daughter to William de Fortibus, earl of Albemarle, and Holderneffe, and married Edmund earl of Lancaster, son to king Henry the third.

Adjoining to this is another ancient monument of grey marble, to the memory of Aymer de Valence, second and last earl of Pembroke of this family, who was poisoned in France, by the secret contrivance of the earl of Arundel, the 23d of June 1324. He had been three times married, but had no issue by either of his wives. He was a tall, pale man, on which account Gaveston used to call him Joseph the Jew. In the time of Edward I. he was a great general, and not only attended that prince in his expedition to Flanders, but likewise accompanied him to Scotland, where that king died. He is said to have been one of the judges who gave sentence against the great earl of Lancaster.

Another ancient monument in this area is that of

of Edmund Crouchback, fourth son to Henry III. so called, as is supposed by many, from the deformity of his person; others imagine it arose from his attending his brother in the holy wars, where they wore a crouch or cross on their shoulders, as a badge of christianity. On the base of this tomb, towards the area, is the remains of a curious, and perhaps the most antique painting extant, but much defaced, being ten knights armed with banners, surcoats of armour, and cross-belted, representing, undoubtedly, his expedition to the holy land, the number exactly agreeing with what Prior says, namely, Edward and his brother, four earls, and four knights, of whom some are still to be discovered. It has been a very lofty monument, painted, gilt, and inlaid with stained glass. The inside of the canopy has been a sky with stars, but by age changed into a dull red. From this prince the house of Lancaster claimed their right to the crown. He was made earl of Leicester and steward of England at the age of nineteen, and at twenty-one he took the title of the earl of Lancaster, and marrying Aveline already mentioned, became possessed of the estates of Albemarle, Devon, and the Isle of Wight, together with that of Derby and Campaign. His second wife was Blanch, queen of Navarre, widow of Henry, by whom he had three sons, Thomas earl of Lancaster, who was executed; John of Monmouth; and another John, who lived in France. In the reign of his brother Edward I. he commanded an army in France with great success at first; but being ill supported, and his soldiers ill paid, they deserted him, which he laid so much to heart, that he died of grief at Bayonne.

In the chapel of St. Erasmus, on the west side of the door, is a monument erected to the memory of Juliana, only daughter of Sir Randolph Crew, knight, lord chief justice of England, who died unmarried the 22d of April 1621.

There is a monument in this area erected to the memory of bishop Duppa, tutor to king Charles II. He was born at Greenwich, and educated first at Westminster school, and then at Christ-Church college, Oxford, of which he was afterwards dean, and being appointed preceptor to the then prince of Wales, was first made bishop of Chichester, from thence translated to Salisbury, and, after the restoration, to the see of Winchester. He died in the 74th year of his age, the 26th of March 1662. This great man was of such exemplary piety and lively conversation, that when king Charles I. was a prisoner in Carisbrook-castle, his afflictions were alleviated by the conversation of the bishop. Such an ascendancy had he over the prince his pupil, that when he came to be king, he retained such a reverence for his piety, that hearing he was dangerously ill at Richmond, he went thither to pay his devotions to him, and received his last benediction from him on his bended knees.

At St. Erasmus's chapel, on the east side of the door, is a monument erected to the memory of Jane, daughter and coheir of Sir John Poultney, and wife to Sir Cleppesby Crew, knight, who died the second of December, 1639, in the 29th year of her age.

Near this, on the same side, is a monument erected to the memory of admiral Holmes. He is represented in a Roman warlike habit, with his right-hand resting on a cannon mounted on a carriage. Behind is an anchor, a flag-staff, and other naval decorations. Under which is an inscription running thus: "To the memory of Charles Holmes, esq; rear-admiral of the white. He died the 21st of November 1761, commander in chief of his majesty's fleet stationed at Jamaica, aged fifty. Erected by his grateful nieces Mary Stanwix, and Lucretia Sowle."

Another monument in the area is well worth observation. It is that of Esther de la Four, the lord Eland's lady, who died in the 28th year of her age, in the year 1694. It is of curious white marble, representing a lady on her death-bed, with two mourners weeping over her, done beautifully in relief. There is an inscription in Latin and English, which contains an encomium on her many excellent virtues.

In the area there is a monument erected (between those of Henry III. and queen Eleanor) to the memory of Mrs. Christian Kerr, who died the 16th of May, 1694, aged 40. She was wife to William Kerr, esq; and daughter to Sir William Scott, bart. both of the kingdom of Scotland.

In the corner of Henry the fifth's chapel, there is a neat monument erected to the memory of Sir Robert Aiton, knight, who, in the reign of king James I. was highly esteemed for his writings, particularly as a poet. He died in the year 1638. The monument is of black marble, with a bust of brass, having the figures of Apollo and Minerva holding a laurel wreath over it, very beautifully designed.

Not far from this, in the pavement, is an ancient flat stone; formerly inscribed to the memory of Sir John Galofre, called lord of Langley, natural son of Sir John Galofre, by Johanne Pulham. He was famous in the reign of Richard II. for his wisdom and valour, and was persecuted by the discontented lords; but being then ambassador in France, he thought it most prudent to remain there till the storm, in which Burley and others suffered shipwreck, was appeased. After which he returned home, and died in the year 1336, at Wallingford, in Berkshire.

There is a large monument between the chapel of St. Nicholas and the steps going to Henry VIIIth's chapel, erected to the memory of Sir Thomas Ingram, knight, chancellor of the dutchy of Lancaster, and privy-counsellor to king Charles the second. It was erected by Frances his widow, daughter of Thomas viscount Falconberg. He died the 13th of February, in the year 1671.

In this place is an old grave-stone plated with brass, representing John of Windfor, nephew to Sir William of Windfor, lord-lieutenant of Ireland in the reign of Edward the third, who died the 4th of April, 1414. He had been a great soldier in his youth, and in many battles had been victorious; particularly at that of Shrewsbury under Henry IV. but being stung with remorse for the innocent blood he had been the means of shedding, he retired from the world, and finished his life in penitence.

There

There is a monument between the chapels of St. Nicholas and St. Edmund, erected to the memory of Richard Tufton, third son of Sir John Tufton, bart. who died the 4th of October, 1631. It was erected to his memory by his brother Sir Humphrey Tufton, knt.

The remains of many other persons lie in this area, particularly Anne of Cleve, sister to the duke of Cleve, who was contracted in marriage to king Henry VIII. and received with great pomp on Blackheath, the 3d of January 1539, married to the king on the 9th of the same month, and in July following divorced, with liberty to marry again; but being sensibly touched with indignation at the affront put upon her, she lived retired in England, with the title of lady Anne, of Cleve, and saw her rival that supplanted her in the king's affection suffer a worse fate. She died in the year 1557. surviving the king only four years.

Near the ashes of Anne of Cleve lies a still more unfortunate queen, viz. Anne, queen to Richard III. and daughter to Nevil the great earl of Warwick. She was poisoned by her husband, to make way for a marriage with Elizabeth, daughter to his brother Edward IV. and sister to the unhappy youths he had caused to be murdered in the Tower. This marriage was never consummated, he being slain at the battle of Bosworth-field, where he was stripped naked, and exposed to the multitude as a mark of that contempt his cruelty deserved.

In this place are the remains of an ancient monument erected to the memory of Sebert, king of the East-saxons, who first built this church, and died in July 616. Likewise Athelgoda, his queen, who died the 13th of September 615.

Many other people have been interred in this place, whose mementos are either obliterated by time, or they are too insignificant to need recital.

Description of the TOMBS in St. EDWARD'S CHAPEL.

IN the centre of this chapel stands that ancient and venerable shrine dedicated to St. Edward.

It was once of most exquisite beauty, but through time and neglect is now much defaced. It was erected by Henry III. on the canonizing Edward king of England, by pope Alexander the third, who caused his name to be placed in the catalogue of saints, and issued his bull to the abbot Laurence and convent of Westminster, enjoining, "that his body be honoured here on earth, as his soul is glorified in heaven." A cloistered life was his sole happiness; and though he was married eighteen years to one of the most accomplished women of her time, daughter to earl Godwin, yet 'tis said she confessed on her death-bed he suffered her to live and die a virgin. Before this shrine was a lamp kept continually burning, on one side whereof stood an image of the Blessed Virgin, wrought in silver, which, with two jewels of immense value, queen Eleanor presented here as an offering; and on the other side stood another image of the Virgin, wrought in ivory, presented by Thomas Becker, Archbishop of Canterbury. To this shrine Edward the first offered the Scotch regalia, and chair, which is still preserved. Alphonso, about the year 1280, offered here the golden coronet of Llewellyn prince of Wales, and other jewels. It is said that Henry IV. being upon his knees before it, was seized with an apoplexy, and for speedy relief removed to the abbot's house, where coming to himself, he could not recollect where he was; but upon enquiring was told the room bore the name of Jerusalem. To which he replied, "the Lord have mercy upon me then, for here I must die;" having been formerly told by a magician that he should die at Jerusalem. This shrine was originally composed of various coloured stones, beautifully enriched with all the cost and art that human imagination could project: some of the curious mosaic work that adorned it is still to be seen; but so stripped as to afford little or no satisfaction to common beholders. The stonework is hollow within, and now encloses a large chest, which Mr. Keep, soon after the coronation of James II. found to contain the remains of St. Edward; for being broken by accident, he discovered, upon turning up the bones, a crucifix richly ornamented and enamelled; and a gold chain of twenty inches long, both which he presented to his majesty, who ordered the bones to be replaced in the old coffin, and enclosed in a new one made very strong. Edward the confessor died in 1066, and was canonized in 1269.

The remains of Editha, daughter to Godwin, earl of Kent, and queen to St. Edward, lie interred on the south side of this shrine. This lady survived her husband eight years, and beheld all the miseries consequent upon his death. William the conqueror, however, treated her with great respect, allowing her an apartment in the palace at Winchester, where she died. She was buried, by express orders, with all the pomp of royalty.

Not far from this lie the remains of queen Maud, surnamed the Good, daughter of Malcolm Conmair, king of Scotland, and wife to Henry I. of England, to whom she was espoused to unite the Saxon and Norman lines. She died the first of May, 1118. The greatest happiness she enjoyed was in relieving the distresses of the poor. That she was charitable, the hospitals of St. Giles, and the Leper's hospital in London, are remaining monuments. There is part of a latin epitaph on this excellent princess, the translation of which runs thus:

Succes ne'er sat exulting in her eye,
Nor disappointment heav'd the troubled sigh;
Prosperity ne'er sadden'd o'er her brow,
While glad in trouble she enjoy'd her woe:
Beauty nor made her vain, nor scepters proud,
Nor titles taught to scorn the meaner croud.
Supreme humility was awful grace,
And her chief charms a bashfulness of face.

There is an ancient tomb of very curious workmanship on the north side of this chapel. The pannels are of polished porphyry, and the mosaic work round them of gold and scarlet. The

The effigy of Henry III. upon it is of gilt brass finely executed; and the corners of the table are twisted pillars gilt and enamelled. After a troublesome reign of 56 years, he died in 1272, aged 65. He was interred by the knights templars, of whose order his father was the founder, with all the splendor becoming a royal character.

An ancient table monument of grey marble is at the feet of Henry III. on which lies the effigy of Eleanor, queen to Edward I. It is very singular that the body of this queen lies here interred, and her heart in the choir of the friars predicants in London. On the sides of this monument are engraven the arms of Castile and Leon quarterly, and those of Ponthieu hanging on vines and oak-trees. Round the copper verge is embossed, in Saxon characters, the following inscription: "Here lies Eleanor, formerly queen of England, wife to king Edward the first."

In this chapel is a large plain coffin of grey marble, composed of seven stones, four make the sides, two the ends, and one the cover. It encloses the body of the glorious king Edward I. who was son to Henry III. He was named Edward in honour of St. Edward his father's patron and predecessor, and afterwards Long Shanks, from his tall and slender body. He reigned 34 years, and died the 7th of July, 1307, aged 68.

Not far from Henry III. is a small monument covered with a slab of lydian finely polished, erected to the memory of Elizabeth Tudor, second daughter of king Henry VII. who died at Eltham in Kent, the 14th of September 1495, aged three years.

Another table monument is likewise here in memory of Margaret, daughter to Edward IV. by Elizabeth Woodville, his queen, who died the 19th of April, 1472. There is part of an inscription on it, setting forth her name, quality, and age, which was only nine months.

The chapel of Henry V. is parted from this only by an iron screen, on each side of which are images as big as the life, and guarding, as it were, the stair-case ascending to the chauntry over it. In this place is a magnificent tomb of that glorious and warlike prince Henry of Monmouth, so called from the place of his nativity. On the advancement of this prince to the crown, he made a most excellent king, and by the memorable battle of Agincourt, acquired to himself and the English nation immortal glory. His ambition leading him on to the pursuit of farther conquests, he was taken off by the hand of providence, and died in France in the tenth year of his reign, and thirty-fourth of his age. He was laid at the feet of St. Edward, in a place set apart for keeping reliques, where his queen erected a monument over him of grey marble, whereon was placed his statue; the body whereof was heart of oak, and the head beaten silver; as were the scepter, and other signs of royalty that adorned it. All which were destroyed at the time of Oliver Cromwell. This tomb was enclosed with grates and gates of iron by Henry VII. and and over it in a chauntry chapel the weapons, armour, and caparisons of Henry V. were carefully laid up, where they remain to this day.

In an old wooden chest, near this tomb, lie the remains of Catharine, queen to the above prince. She was youngest daughter to Charles VI. of France. After the death of her husband, she entered into an illegal marriage with Owen ap Tudor, a welshman, and underwent a severe prosecution. In consequence of which she retired to the monastery of Bermondsey, in Southwark, where she died, as it is thought of grief, the second of January 1437, in the thirty-eighth year of her age. She left three sons by this marriage; Edmund, who was afterwards earl of Richmond; Jasper, who was created earl of Pembroke by Henry VI. and duke of Bedford by Henry VII. but died without issue; and Owen, who took upon him the religious habit, died a monk of, and was interred in, this abbey. Queen Catharine received an honourable interment in the chapel of Henry III. but when her grandson pulled down that to build his own, her body was taken up, the bones whereof were firmly united, and thinly covered with flesh, but the coffin being decayed was put into a wooden chest, and removed to the place where it now is.

There is an ancient tomb in this chapel erected to the memory of Philippa, third daughter to William, earl of Heinsault, and queen to king Edward III. It is of black marble, and round it are placed as ornaments, the brazen statues of no less than thirty kings, princes, and noble personages, her relations. This queen was married forty-two years, in which time she had fourteen children, and died the 15th of August 1369.

Near this is a very ancient tomb covered with a gothic canopy, erected to the memory of Edward III. The effigy of this prince lies on a table of grey marble, though his corpse was deposited in the same grave with the queen's. The tomb was surrounded, like the former, with statues, particularly those of his children, and at the head of it is placed the shield and sword carried before him in France. After a reign of fifty years, he died the 21st of June, 1377, aged 64. In the latter part of his life he grew weary of government, and devoted himself entirely to the pleasure of a woman, who, after rendering him ridiculous to all the world, shamefully deserted him in his last moments, and left him to expire without a friend to close his eyes.

Adjoining to this is another tomb erected to the memory of Richard II. over which is a canopy of wood remarkable for a curious painting of the Virgin Mary and our Saviour. This prince was murdered in Pomfret-castle, in Yorkshire, where he was a prisoner, at the instigation of Henry IV. by one Sir Pierce of Exon, on St. Valentine's day, in the year 1399. His body was brought from thence to St. Paul's cathedral, where it was exposed to public view, and afterwards removed to Langley. In which place it remained till Henry V. ordered it to be brought in all the pomp of royalty, and deposited near the remains of his great predecessor and patron St. Edward. The robing of the effigy is curiously wrought with pease-cod shells open, and the pease out, alluding, in all probability, to his being once in full possession of sovereignty, but at last reduced to an empty title. In the same tomb with this prince lies his queen, Anne, daughter to Charles IV. and sister to Wenceslaus, emperor and king of Bohemia. This lady brought him neither dowry nor issue; and yet, so great was his love for her, that he cursed the place of her death, and caused the buildings thereon to be destroyed. After being married twelve years, she died at Shene the 7th of June, 1394.

R r

him

Between the tomb of queen Philippa and the shrine of St. Edward, under a large stone, once beautifully plated with brass, lies the great Thomas of Woodstock, duke of Gloucester, uncle to Richard II. by whom he was murdered the 8th of September, 1397. He was brother to the black prince, and sixth and youngest son to Edward III.

In this chapel was interred the heart of Henry d'Almaine, son to the king of the Romans, and brother to Henry III. who, in passing through Viterbo, in an expedition to the holy land, was sacrilegiously assassinated in the church of St. Silvester, as he was performing his devotions before the high altar. The year after the murder, in 1271, his body was brought to England, and buried in the monastery of St. Helen's; but his heart was put in a cup, and placed near the shrine of St. Edward.

In a handsome wainscot press, in this chapel, is the effigy of Edmund Sheffield, duke of Buckingham, who was the second and last duke of this family. He died at Rome in the twentieth year of his age, October 30, 1735, and was buried in Henry VIIIth's chapel January 31, 1736.

In the north area is a monument erected to the memory of William Pulteney, earl of Bath, who died the 7th of June, 1764, aged 81. It is of beautiful marble, representing wisdom and poetry, over which is a medallion.

Having now described the various monuments in the enclosed part of this building, we shall proceed to the

TOMBS in the open parts of this ABBEY, beginning at the west door.

ON the right hand as you enter is the monument of

Sir THO. HARDY, Knt.

Behind this monument is a lofty pyramid, of a bluish coloured marble, at the bottom of which is the effigy of the deceased reclining upon a tomb of elegant workmanship, with a naked boy on his left side weeping over an urn: the enrichments round the pedestal are just and proper, and the inscription is to the following purport:

" Sir Thomas Hardy, to whose memory this monument is erected, was bred in the royal navy from his youth, and was made a captain in 1693. In the expedition to Cadiz, under Sir George Rooke, he commanded the Pembroke; and when the fleet left the coast of Spain, to return to England, he was ordered to Lagos bay, where he got intelligence of the Spanish galleons being arrived in the harbour of Vigo, under convoy of seventeen French men of war. By his great diligence and judgment he joined the English fleet, and gave the admiral that intelligence which engaged him to make the best of his way to Vigo, where

" all the aforementioned galleons and men of war were either taken or destroyed. After the success of that action, the admiral sent him with an account of it to the queen, who ordered him a considerable present, and knighted him. Some years after he was made a rear-admiral, and received several other marks of favour and esteem from her majesty, and from her royal consort prince George of Denmark, lord high-admiral of England." He died the 16th of August, 1733, aged 66.

From this monument we proceed regularly on to the east door, from thence round the choir to the north door, and return to the place where we first began. To effect which the next is

Capt. JAMES CORNWALL:

This is a most beautiful monument, the height of which is thirty-six feet: it has a bold base and pyramid of rich Sicilian marble. There is a rock against the pyramid, embellished with naval trophies, sea-weeds, &c. in which are two cavities: in the one a latin epitaph; in the other, a view of the sea-fight before Toulon, in basso relievo; on the fore-ground whereof, the Marlborough of 90 guns, is seen fiercely engaged with admiral Navarro's ship the Real, of 114 guns, and her two seconds, all raking the Marlborough fore and aft. On the rock stand two figures, the one represents Britannia under the character of Minerva, accompanied with a lion; the other figure is expressive of Fame, who having presented to Minerva a medallion of the hero, supports it, whilst exhibited to public view. The medallion is accompanied with a globe, and various honorary crowns, as due to valour. Behind the figures is a lofty spreading palm-tree, whereon is fixed the hero's shield or coat of arms, together with a laurel-tree; both which issue from the naturally-barren rock, as alluding to some heroic and uncommon event. The inscription is as follows:

Amongst the monuments of ancient merit,
In this sacred cathedral, let the name of

JAMES CORNWALL

Be preserved, the third son of Henry Cornwall,
Of Bradwardin Castle, in the county of Hereford, Esq;

Who from the very old and illustrious stock of the Plantagenets,

Desiring a truly ancient spirit, became

A naval commander of the first eminence,

Equally and deservedly honoured by the tears and

Applause of Britons, as a man

Who bravely defending the cause of his country
in that sea-fight off Toulon;

And being by a chain-shot deprived

Of both his legs at a blow, fell unconquered

On the 27th of Feb. 1743, in the 45th year of his age.

Bequeathing his animated example to his fellow sailors,

As a legacy of a dying Englishman,

Whose extraordinary valour could not be recommended

To the emulation of posterity in a more ample eulogy

Than by so singular an instance of honour;

Since the parliament of Great Britain, by an unanimous suffrage,

Resolved that a monument at the public expence should be consecrated to the memory of this most heroic person.

The

The Right Hon. JAMES CRAGGS, Esq;

On this monument is finely represented the statue of this gentleman, large as the life, leaning on an urn, which has upon it in golden characters, an inscription, implying, that he was a man universally beloved; which is there particularly marked, because as he was of low extraction, being only a shoe-maker's son, it is the more singular, that in the high station to which his merit had raised him, he should escape envy; and acquire the general esteem. He was made secretary at war in April 1717, and one of his majesty's privy-council and secretary of state in March 1718. On the base of the monument is the following epitaph, written by Mr. Pope:

Statesman, yet friend to truth, of soul sincere,
In action faithful, and in honour clear!
Who broke no promise, serv'd no private end;
Who gain'd no title, and who lost no friend;
Ennobled by himself, by all approv'd,
Prais'd, wept, and honour'd by the muse he lov'd.

WILLIAM CONGREVE, Esq;

On a pedestal of the finest egyptian marble, in an oval frame, is a half length marble portrait of this gentleman: it is enriched with emblematical figures alluding to the drama, and under it is the following inscription:

"Mr. William Congreve died January the 19th 1728, aged 56, and was buried near this place. To whose most valuable memory this monument is set up by Henrietta, dutchess of Marlborough, as a mark how dearly she remembers the happiness she enjoyed in the sincere friendship of so worthy and honest a man, whose virtue, candour, and wit, gained him the love and esteem of the present age; and whose writings will be the admiration of the future."

JOHN FREIND, M. D.

This gentleman was a physician of the first rank in his profession; nor was he less successful in his practice than ingenious in his writings. His bust stands on a pedestal of fine white-veined marble, and under it a long latin inscription, setting forth his great and distinguishing acquirements. He died the 26th of July 1728.

Sir LUMLEY ROBINSON, Bart.

The design of this monument is neat; the columns are supported by deaths heads, and the arms upon the base by a cherub. On the top is a vase, and rising to the pediment, enrichments of laurel branches, &c. He was of Kentwell-hall in Suffolk, and by an untimely death ended his life the 6th of August 1684, aged 36.

THOMAS SPRATT, D. D.

Underneath this monument is the arms of the defunct, and on the top his arms, with that of the see of Rochester, quarterly; between enrichments of books, &c. It seems to have been principally designed for the sake of the inscriptions; the first of which informs us, that Dr. Spratt was the son of a clergyman in Dorsetshire; that he was educated at Wadham college, Oxford; that he first applied himself to poetry, but quitted that study to pursue the beauties of prose, and polish the English language; that he was soon made known to George duke of Buckingham, and by him recommended to king Charles, who made him a prebendary of Westminster, and of Windsor; from which preferments he soon rose to be dean of Westminster, and bishop of Rochester; but at length for his firm integrity to the church and monarchy, was brought in danger of his life, he died in 1713, aged 77. The second inscription signifies, that the remains of Thomas Spratt, A. M. (son to the bishop) archdeacon of Rochester, and prebendary of the churches of Rochester, Winchester, and Westminster, lie near those of his father. He died the 10th of May 1720, aged 41. The last inscription tells us that John Freind, M. D. to shew his respect for those two worthy personages, had caused this monument to be erected jointly to their memories.

Dr. JOSEPH WILCOCKS.

This gentleman was formerly chaplain to the British factory at Lisbon, afterwards made preceptor to the princesses, and prebendary of this church. In 1721 he was consecrated lord bishop of Gloucester; in 1731 translated to Rochester, and also made dean of this church, and of the most hon. order of the Bath. He died the 9th of March 1756, aged 84, and is buried in a vault in the ecclesiastical court, with his wife Jane, daughter of John Milner, Esq; consul at Lisbon. She died the 27th of March 1725, aged 28. In the same vault lies Ann, their daughter, who died in her infancy.

Above this is a small table monument erected to the memory of

HENRY WHARTON.

It is remarkable only for the great name inscribed on it. He was rector of Chatham in Kent, vicar of the church of Minster, in the isle of Thanet, chaplain to archbishop Sancroft, and one of the greatest writers of his time. He was so universally respected by the bishops and clergy, that archbishop Tillotson, and several other prelates, with the choir and king's scholars, attended his funeral in the most solemn procession, singing anthems composed for the occasion. He died the 3d of March 1624, aged 31.

KATHERINE BOVEY.

This monument was erected to the memory of the above lady, by Mrs. Mary Pope, who lived with her in the greatest friendship near forty years. The principle figures are Faith with her book closed, and Wisdom lamenting the death of her patroness.

patronefs, between which is a lady's head in an anulet of black marble curioufly veined. Over it is an infcription, describing the virtues of the deceased, who died the 21ft of January, 1726, aged 72.

Over this monument is that of

Lord Viscount HOWE,

The principal figure represents the genius of the province of Maffachufet's bay, in a mournful pofture, lamenting the fall of this hero; over which are the family arms ornamented with military trophies. In large characters underneath is the following infcription: "The province of "Maffachufet's bay in New England, by an order of the great and general court, bearing "date Feb. 1, 1752, caufed this monument to "be erected to the memory of George lord viscount Howe, brigadier general of his majesty's "forces in North America, who was flain July "the 6th, 1758, on his march to Ticonderago, "in the 34th year of his age: in testimony of "the fenie they had of his fervices and military "virtues, and of the affection their officers and "soldiers bore to his command. He lived refpected and beloved: the public regretted his "lofs; to his family it is irreparable."

ROBERT CANNON, D.D.

This monument, though plain, is yet very neat. It was erected to the memory of the above gentleman, who was dean of Lincoln, and prebendary of this church. He died the 28th of March, 1722, in the 59th year of his age.

Above this is a moft beautiful monument erected to the memory of

Gen. GEORGE WADE,

In the center is a beautiful marble pillar, enriched with military trophies exquisitely wrought: the principal figures represent Fame pushing back Time, who is eagerly approaching to pull down the pillar with the enfigns of honour that adorn it. The general's head is in medallion, under which is the following infcription:

"To the memory of George Wade, field-marshal of his majesty's forces, lieutenant-general of the ordnance, colonel of his majesty's "third regiment of dragoon guards, governor "of Fort William, Fort Auguftus, and Fort "George, and one of his majesty's moft honourable privy council. He died March 14, 1748, "aged 75."

Col. JOHN DAVIS.

We can fay no more of this gentleman than what arifes from the infcription; which is, that he was president of the council of the ifland of St. Christopher's, and died the 13th of December 1725, in the fixty-third year of his age.

CAROLINA HARSNET.

This monument was erected to the memory of the fecond wife of Samuel Morland, knt. and bart. who died in child-bed of her fecond fon the 10th of October, 1674, aged 23. On the tomb are two learned infcriptions; one in hebrew, the other in greek: the tranflation of the hebrew runs thus: "Blessed be the Lord, my wife was "precious: blessed be thy remembrance, O virtuous woman."—The greek thus: "When I "think of thy mildnefs, patience, charity, modesty and piety, I lament thee, O moft excellent creature, and grieve exceedingly: but "not like fuch as have no faith; for I believe and "expect the refurrection of thofe who fleep in "Chrift."

JOHN SMITH, Esq,

This monument is faid to be highly finifhed. The design is a pyramid and altar, in which fits a lady veiled, mournful and difconfolate, and refting her right arm on a curious bufto in relief. On the bafe is a latin infcription, fetting forth his defcent from the Smiths of Lincolnshire; and likewise his iffue, which were two daughters, Ann, the eldeft, firft marrried to Sir Henry Parker of Warwickshire, and afterwards to Michael lord Dunkellin, eldeft fon to the earl of Clanrickard; and Mary, the youngelt, married to Edward Defboverie, of Lanford, in Wilts, bart. The above John Smith died the 6th of July 1718.

ANN FIELDING.

This tomb was erected to the memory of the firft wife of Samuel Morland, knt. and bart. who feems to have been a man of great learning; particularly in the eastern languages. On it are two infcriptions; the one in hebrew, the other in ethiopic, the tranflation of the firft runs thus:

"O thou faireft among' women! O virtuous "woman! The hand of the Lord hath done "this. The Lord gave, and the Lord hath "taken away, and blessed be the name of the "Lord."

The Ethiopic thus:

"Come let us lament o'er this monument of a "beloved husband for thee; but in certain hope "that thou art united with Chrift.

"This lady was truly religious, virtuous, faithful, mild as a dove, and chafte: while fhe continued in life, fhe was honoured; and is happy, "through mercy, in death."

Under the Ethiopic is the following:

"Ann, daughter to George Fielding, Esq; "and of Mary his wife, the truly loving (and "as truly beloved) wife of Samuel Morland, "knt. and bart. died Feb. 20, Anno Dom. "1679-80."

Over this is a monument erected to the memory of

JAMES FLEMING,

Major-general of his majesty's forces, and colonel of a regiment of foot, who, having ferved as a commiffioned officer 44 years, died the 17th of March, 1750, in the fixty-eighth year of his age.

DIANA

DIANA TEMPLE.

This monument by its antiquity, seems to have been originally intended for the whole family of Sir William Temple, as appears by the inscription, which tells us, that Diana Temple died at the age of fourteen. Dorothy Osbourn, (in all probability Sir William's lady) aged 66; William Temple, aged seventy; and Martha Gifford, Sir William's sister, aged 84.

Sir CH. HARBORD, and CLEM, COTTREL, Esq;

These two young gentlemen of the most promising expectations, both perished in the Royal James, with the earl of Sandwich, who commanded in her as vice-admiral against the Dutch in that memorable fight off the coast of Sussex, in the time of king Charles II. The Royal James being set on fire, Sir Charles Harbord, first lieutenant, though he might have saved himself by swimming; yet, out of pure affection to his worthy commander, chose to die with him. Young Cottrel was a volunteer, and having returned to his ship unwounded, from being the first man that had boarded a Dutchman of seventy guns, and pulled down her ensign with his own hands, perished also with his friends. This gentleman, though but twenty-two years of age, understood seven languages. On the base of the monument is represented in relief a dreadful sea fight, and on the top, in a wreath of laurel, is this inscription: "preserve and unite the memory of two faithful friends, who lost their lives at sea together, May the 28th 1672."

SIDNEY, EARL GODOLPHIN.

This is a fine bust, representing the above gentleman, who died the 15th of September, 1712, aged 67. In the year 1661, he was member of parliament, and groom of the bedchamber to king Charles II. In 1679 he was made commissioner of the treasury. In 1684, secretary of state, and the same year created baron of Rialton, in Cornwall, by king James II. by whom also he was made first commissioner of the treasury, and soon after lord high treasurer; which office, according to the inscription, together with that of chief minister, he held during the first nine years of the reign of queen Anne.

Over these, against the wall, is a flat marble monument erected to the memory of

WILLIAM HARGRAVE, Esq;

Lieutenant general of his majesty's forces, colonel of the royal English fuzileers, and governor of Gibraltar; who having been a commissioned officer 57 years, died January 21, 1748, aged seventy-nine.

Col. ROGER TOWNSEND.

On the front of a sarcophagus, supported by two Indians, is represented, in basso relievo, the fall of this brave commander, with his officers attending him in his expiring moments. The monument is adorned with military trophies, and under it is the following inscription:

" This monument was erected by a disconsolate parent, the lady viscountess Townsend, to the memory of her fifth son, the honourable lieutenant colonel Roger Townsend, who was killed by a cannon ball, on the 25th of July, 1759, in the 28th year of his age, as he was reconnoitring the French lines at Ticonderago, in North America. From the parent, the brother and the friend, his social and amiable manners, his enterprising bravery, and the integrity of his heart, may claim the tribute of affliction. Yet, stranger, weep not, for though premature his death, his life was glorious: enrolling him with the names of those immortal statemen and commanders, whose wisdom and intrepidity in the course of this comprehensive and successful war, have extended the commerce, enlarged the dominions, and upheld the majesty of these kingdoms, beyond the idea of any former age."

Over this monument, against the pillar is that of

Mrs. BRIDGET RADLEY.

It is small, but very neat, and was erected to her memory by her husband Charles Radley, esq; gentleman usher daily waiter to king James II. She died the 20th of November 1679.

Major RICHARD CREED.

This is a table monument against the wall, enriched with military trophies; and on it is the following inscription:

" To the memory of the honoured major Richard Creed, who attended his majesty king William III. in all his wars, every where signalizing himself, and never more himself, than when he looked an enemy in the face. At the glorious battle of Blenheim, Ann. Dom. 1704, he commanded those squadrons that began the attack; in two several charges he remained unhurt; but in a third, after many wounds received, still valiantly fighting, he was shot through the head: his dead body was brought off by his brother, at the hazard of his own life, and buried there. To his memory his sorrowful mother erects this monument, placing it near another, which her son, when living, used to look upon with pleasure, for the worthy mention it makes of that great man Edward, earl of Sandwich, to whom he had the honour to be related and whose heroic virtues he was ambitious to imitate. He was the eldest son of John Creed of Oundel, esq; and Elizabeth his wife, only daughter of Sir Gilbert Pickering, bart. of Tichmarsh, in Northamptonshire."

Sir PALMES FAIRBORNE.

This monument, which is very beautiful, is fixed between two stately pyramids of black marble standing on cannon balls, adorned in the middle with emblematical devices in relief, and having two Moorish emperors heads in profile on their tops. The enrichments on the pyramids represent the manner of his glorious death. On one side he is viewing the enemy's lines before the town, and is shot: on the other is a hearse and six horses bringing him off wounded to the castle. On a lofty dome is the deceased's arms, with this motto underneath: tutus si fortis; and over it a Turk's head on a dagger, by way of crest, which he won by his valour in fighting against that people in the German war. On the monument is the following inscription:

" Sacred to the immortal memory of Sir
 " Palmes Fairborne, knt. governor of Tangier,
 " in execution of which command he was mor-
 " tally wounded by a shot from the Moors then " besieging the town, in the 46th year of his " age, October 24, 1680."

His epitaph, which was written, by Mr. Dryden, runs thus.

Ye sacred reliques which your marble keep,
 Here, undisturb'd by wars in quiet sleep:
 Discharge the trust, which, (when it was below)
 Fairborne's undaunted soul did undergo,
 And be the town's palladium from the foe. }
 Alive and dead these walls he will defend:
 Great actions, great examples must attend.
 The Candian siege his early valour knew,
 where turkish blood did his young hands imbrue;
 From thence returning with deserv'd applause,
 Against the Moors his well-flesh'd sword he draws, }
 The same the courage and the same the cause.
 His youth and age, his life and death combine,
 As in some great and regular design, }
 All of a piece throughout, and all divine.
 Still nearer heaven his virtues shone more bright,
 Like rising flames expanding in their height, }
 The martyr's glory crown'd the soldier's fight.
 More bravely British gen'ral never fell,
 Nor gen'ral's death was e'er reveng'd so well,
 Which his pleas'd eyes beheld before their close,
 Follow'd by thousand victims of his foes.
 To his lamented loss, for times to come,
 His pious widow consecrates this tomb.

Over the monuments of major Richard Creed and Sir Palmes Fairborne, is one erected to the memory of

Sir JOHN CHARDIN, Bart.

It is emblematical, and alludes to the travels of this gentleman, by which, as his motto expresses, he acquired his fame. The globe, round which a number of geographical instruments are represented, exhibits a view of the different countries through which he travelled, and the motto beneath refers to the dangers he providentially escaped, for which he ascribes to God the glory.

 He was created baronet May the 28th, 1720.

Captain WILLIAM JULIUS.

There is not any thing remarkable in this monument; nor have we any other information of this gentleman, than that he was captain of the Colchester man of war, and that he died October the 3d. 1608, aged 33.

GEORGE CHURCHILL.

This is a stately and elegant monument. The inscription on it informs us that this great man was second son to Sir Winston Churchill, of Dor-setshire, knt. and brother to John duke of Marlborough. He was early trained to military affairs, and served with great honour at sea and land under king Charles II. king James II. king William, and queen Anne. He was captain of the English fleet at the burning the French at La Hogue, in king William's reign; and for his bravery there was made one of the commissioners of the admiralty. In the succeeding reign he was made admiral in chief, and was for 26 years together of the bedchamber to the prince of Denmark. He died the 8th of May 1710, in the 58th year of his age.

Sir RICHARD BINGHAM.

Against the wall, on a plain marble stone, is an inscription describing the military glories of the above gentleman, who was of the ancient family of the Bingham, of Bingham Melcomb, in Dor-setshire; and served in the reign of queen Mary,
 at St. Quintin; in the reign of queen Elizabeth, at Leith, in Scotland; in the isle of Candy, under the Venetians; at Cabo Chaio, and the famous battle of Lepanto against the Turks; in the civil wars of France in the Netherlands, and at Smerwick, where the Romans and Irish were vanquished. After this he was made governor of Connaught, where he overthrew the Irish and Scots, expelled the traitorous Orouke, suppressed divers rebellions, and was finally made marshal of Ireland, and governor of Leinster. He died at Dublin January 19, 1598, aged 70; from whence he was brought, and here interred by Sir
 John Bingley, some time his servant.

GEORGE STEPNEY, Esq.

This gentleman was descended from the Step-neys of Pendergraft, in Pembrokeshire, but born at Westminster in 1663, and entered of Trinity-college, Cambridge, in 1682. In 1692 he was sent envoy to the elector of Brandenburg; in 1696 and 1697, to the electors of Mentz, Triers, Cologne, Palatine, Landgrave of Hesse, and to the congress of Frankfort: in 1697, on his return, he was made commissioner of trade; in 1698, was sent a second time envoy to the elector of Brandenburg; in 1699, in the same quality to the king of Poland; in 1701, a second time to the emperor of Germany; and lastly, in 1706, to

to the states-general. All these several embassies he conducted with such integrity, application, and ease, that he generally exceeded the expectations of his sovereigns, William and Anne, by whom he was employed. He died greatly lamented at Chelsea, in the year 1706.

THOMAS KNIPE. S. T. P.

In memory of the above gentleman, this monument was erected by Alice his second wife. He was for fifty years employed in Westminster-school, sixteen whereof as head master. He was likewise a prebendary of this cathedral. The latin inscription, which is long, only describes his many great virtues, and that he died the 8th of August 1711, aged 73.

Above these two last, is a monument erected to the memory of

JOHN METHUEN, Esq;

Who died in the service of his country in Portugal, July 13, 1706, and was here interred September 17, 1708. Also the right honourable Sir Paul Methuen, of Bishops-Canning in Wilts, son of the said John Methuen, esq; one of his majesty's most honourable privy-council, and knight of the most honourable order of the Bath, who died the 11th of April 1757, aged 86.

Sir CLOUDESLEY SHOVEL, knt.

On the base of this monument is represented in bas relief the ship Association, in which the admiral sailed, as striking against a rock, with several others perishing at the same time; and at the top are two boys blowing trumpets. This great man received the honour of knighthood the 16th of May 1689. The inscription on the monument runs thus: "Sir Cloudesley Shovel, knt. rear-admiral of Great Britain; and admiral and commander in chief of the fleet, the just reward of his long and faithful services. He was deservedly beloved of his country, and esteemed, though dreaded, by the enemy who had often experienced his conduct and courage.—Being shipwrecked on the rocks of Scilly, in his voyage from Thoulon the 22d of October 1707, at night, in the 57th year of his age, his fate was lamented by all, but especially by the sea-faring part of the nation; to whom he was a generous patron, and a worthy example.—His body was flung on the shore, and buried with others in the sand; but being soon after taken up, was placed under this monument, which his royal mistress had caused to be erected to commemorate his steady loyalty, and extraordinary virtues."

ANN WEMYS.

Adjoining to the wall is a small oval tablet, with the following inscription: "Near these steps lies the body of Mrs. Ann Wemys, daughter of Dr. Locowick Wemys, sometime prebendary of this cathedral, and of Mrs. Jane Bargrave his wife, who departed this life, December the 19th 1698, in the sixty-seventh year of her age."

SOPHIA FAIRHOLM.

This monument represents an ancient sepulchre, over which is raised a stately edifice ornamented at top with the family arms. She was marchioness of Anandale, born in Scotland, and was mother to the marquis of Anandale, who, as a mark of his duty and gratitude, caused this monument to be erected to her memory. She died the 13th of December 1716, aged 49.

Against the pillars on this spot, are two table monuments, the one erected to the memory of

Dr. ANTHONY HORNECK.

According to the inscription this gentleman was remarkable for learning, sedateness and piety; an indefatigable preacher, and a smooth and florid orator. He was born at Wittenberg in Zealand, but educated at Queen's college, Oxford; was king's divinity-professor and chaplain, a prebendary to this church, and preacher at the Savoy. He died of the stone January the 31, 1696, aged fifty-six.

The other monument is erected to the memory of

Dr. SAMUEL BARTON.

By the inscription he appears to have been a prebendary of this church, and a person of admirable genius and learning. He died September 1715, aged 62.

WILLIAM CAMDEN.

On this monument the above gentleman is represented in a half-length in the habit of his time, with his left hand holding a book, and in his right his gloves, resting on an altar, on the body of which is a latin inscription, setting forth his indefatigable industry in illustrating the British antiquities, and his candour, sincerity, and pleasant good humour in private life. He was son to Sampson Camden, Citizen of London, and painter-stainer, was born in the Old Baily, May 2, 1551, and received the first rudiments of his education at Christ-church hospital. In 1566 he entered himself of Magdalen college, Oxford, but afterwards removed to Pembroke, where he became acquainted with Dr. Goodman, dean of Westminster, by whose recommendation, in 1575, he was made second master of the abbey-school, and began the laborious work of his antiquities, encouraged thereto and assisted by his patron. In 1588 he was made prebend of Ilfracombe, in the church of Sarum, which he held till his death. In 1593 he was made head master of Westminster school. In 1596, Richmond Herald, and next day Clarencieux king at arms. In 1619 he founded his history lecture in Oxford. In August 1622, he fell from his chair at his house in Chiselmhurst in Kent, and hurt himself in such a manner, that he lingered till the 9th of November 1623, and then died, aged 74.

The above monument has lately been repaired and beautified at the charge and expence of the university of Oxford.

ISAAC

ISAAC CASAUBON.

Though this gentleman was a native of France, and in his younger years royal library-keeper at Paris, yet he was so dissatisfied with the ceremonial part of the Romish worship, that upon the murder of his great patron Henry IV. he willingly quitted his native country, and at the earnest entreaty of king James I. settled in England; where, for his uncommon knowledge, he became the admiration of men of learning. He died in 1614, aged 55.

This small but neat monument was erected to his memory by the learned Dr. Moreton, bishop of Durham.

JOHN ERNEST GRABE.

Robert Harley, earl of Oxford and Mortimer, erected this monument to the memory of the above gentleman, who died the 3d of November 1711, aged 46, and was buried at Pancrafs, near London. He is represented by a curious figure, large as the life, sitting upon a marble tomb in a thoughtful posture, as contemplating the sorrows of death, and the horrors of the grave. He was remarkably well skilled in the oriental languages.

Sir RICHARD COX.

This gentleman was taster to queen Elizabeth and king James I. to the latter of which he was steward of the household. His epitaph commends him in a high degree for his religion, humanity, chastity, temperance, friendship, beneficence, charity, vigilance and self-denial. He was third son to Thomas Cox, of Beymonds in Hertfordshire, and died a bachelor the 13th of December 1623, in the 60th year of his age.

THOMAS TRIPLET.

Was educated at Christ-church in the university of Oxford, where he was esteemed a wit, a good grecian, and a poet. In 1645 he was made prebend of Preston in the church of Sarum, and had also a living, which being sequestered in the rebellion, he fled to Ireland and kept a school in Dublin, where he was when king Charles I was beheaded. Disliking Ireland, he returned to England, and kept school at Hayes in Middlesex, till the restoration, when he was made prebend of Westminster, and of Fenton, in the church of York. He died at a good old age the 18th of July 1670.

ISAAC BARROW.

On the top of this monument is a remarkable fine bust representing this truly great man, who, as the inscription informs us, was chaplain to king Charles II. head of Trinity college, Cambridge, geometry professor of Gresham college, in London, and of greek and mathematicks at Cambridge. He was a great divine, and in his youth travelled through most parts of Europe.

He died the 4th of May 1677, in the 47th year of his age.

Over this is a handsome monument erected to the memory of

EDW. WETTENHALL, M.D.

This gentleman was, perhaps, one of the most eminent physicians of his time; he was son to bishop Wettenhall, and died the 29th of August 1733. His father was Dr. Edward Wettenhall, who was first advanced to the see of Cork in Ireland, which he filled with great dignity for twenty years; but was afterwards translated to Killmore and Ross, which he held fourteen years. He died in the seventy-eighth year of his age, November 12, 1713.

WILLIAM OUTRAM.

The inscription on this monument is in latin, the translation of which runs thus: "Near this place lies William Outram, D. D. born in Derbyshire, fellow of Trinity and Christ-church colleges in Cambridge, cannon of this abbey, and archdeacon of Leiceſter; an accomplished divine, a nervous and accurate writer, an excellent and diligent preacher, first in Lincolnshire, afterwards at London, and lastly at St. Margaret's Westminster; where he finished his life with great applause, and no less success; but in the course of so much labour and intenseness of mind, being inflamed with the study of scripture and the holy fathers, he grew much distempered with the gravel, with which, being long afflicted, and at length worn out, he ended his life with the utmost composure of mind August 22, 1678 aged 54." On the pedestal is another inscription, which tells us, that, "after a long and religious life, and 42 years widowhood, here rests Jane, wife of Dr. Outram, who died October 4, 1721."

Above this is a monument erected to the memory of that eminent divine and philosopher.

Dr. STEPHEN HALES.

Here are two beautiful figures in relief; the one representing Botany, the other, Religion. The first is presenting a medallion of this great explorer to public view; the latter is deploring the loss of the divine: at the feet of Botany the winds are displayed on a globe, which alludes to his invention of the ventilators. The inscription which is in latin, is as follows:

"To the memory of Stephen Hales, doctor in divinity, Augusta, the mother of that best of kings, George the third, has placed this monument; who chose him when living, to officiate as her chaplain; and after he died, which was on the 4th of January 1761, in the 84th year of his age, honoured him with this marble."

About the tomb of Hales whose fair design
And polish great Augusta caus'd to shine,

Religion;

Religion, hoary faith, and virtue wait,
And shed perpetual tears in mournful state.
But o'er the preacher, render'd to his clay,
The voice of wisdom still as this to say:

"He was a man to hear affliction's cry,
"And trace his maker's works with curious eye:
"O Hales! thy praises not the latest age,
"Shall e'er diminish, or shall blot thy page,
"England, so proud of Newton, shall agree,
"She has a son of equal rank in thee."

GEORGE FREDERICK HANDELL.

The whole of this figure is well executed, and the face is a strong likeness of its original. The left arm is resting on a groupe of musical instruments, and the attitude is very expressive of great attention to the harmony of an angel playing on a harp in the clouds over his head. Before it lies the celebrated Messiah, with that part open, where is the much admired air, I know that my Redeemer liveth. Underneath is the following short inscription: "George Frederick Handell, esq; born February 23, 1684, died April 14, 1729." This is the last monument which that eminent statuary Rubiliac lived to finish. 'Tis said he first became conspicuous, and afterwards finished the exercise of his art with a figure of this extraordinary man; the first of which was erected in the gardens at Vauxhall.

Sir EDWARD ATKINS.

This gentleman was one of the barons of the exchequer in the reigns of king Charles I. and II. He was of such integrity, that he resisted many honours that were offered him by the chiefs of the grand rebellion. He died in the year 1669, aged eighty-two.

Sir Robert Atkins, his eldest son, was created knight of the bath at the coronation of king Charles II. afterwards lord chief baron of the exchequer under king William, and speaker of the house of lords in several parliaments. He died in 1709, aged 88.

Sir Edward Atkins, his youngest son, was likewise baron of the exchequer, but retired, upon the revolution, from public business, to his seat in Norfolk, where he died in the year 1698, aged sixty-eight.

Sir Robert Atkins, eldest son of the above Sir Robert, was a gentleman well versed in polite literature, and in the antiquities of this country. He died in 1711, aged 65.

Edward Atkins, esq; late of Kitteringham in Norfolk, second son of the last named Sir Edward, caused this monument to be erected in memory of his ancestors, who so honourably presided in the courts of justice in Westminster-hall. He died the 20th of January 1750, in the 79th year of his age.

Over this is a flat white marble monument erected to the memory of

MARY HOPE,

Daughter of Eliab Breton, of Forty-hall, Middlesex, and was married to John Hope, of London, merchant. She died at Brockhall, in the county of Northampton, the 25th of June 1767, aged 25. Under which is the following epitaph:

Though low in earth her beauteous form decay'd,
My faithful wife, my lov'd Maria's laid;
In sad remembrance the afflicted raise,
No pompous tomb, inscrib'd with venal praise;
To statesmen, warriors, and to kings belong,
The trophied sculpture, and the poet's song;
And these the proud, expiring, often claim;
Their wealth bequeathing, to record their name;
But humble virtue, stealing to the dust,
Heeds not our lays, or monumental bust.

To name her virtues ill befits my grief,
What was my bliss can now give no relief;
A husband mourns, the rest let friendship tell;
Fame spread her worth, a husband knew it well.

JOHN Duke of ARGYLE and GREENWICH.

This is a most beautiful and stately monument, enclosed with rails. The figure of Minerva is on one side the base, and that of Eloquence on the other; the one looking sorrowfully up at the principal figure above, the other pathetically displaying the public loss at his death. On the top is the figure of History, with one hand holding a book, the other writing on a pyramid of finely coloured marble the titles of the hero, whose actions are supposed to be contained in the book; on the cover of which, in letters of gold, are inscribed the date of his grace's death, and age. On the pyramid is the following epitaph:

Briton, behold! if patriot worth be dear,
A shrine that claims thy tributary tear;
Silent that tongue, admiring senates heard,
Nerveless that arm opposing legions fear'd.
Nor less, O Campbell, thine the power to please,
And give to grandeur all the grace of ease.
Long from thy life, let kindred heroes trace,
Arts which ennoble still, the noblest race;
Others may owe their future fame to me,
I borrow immortality from thee.

Under this is written in large letters,

JOHN DUKE OF ARGYLE AND GR.

at which point the pen of History stops.

The inscription on the base of the monument runs thus: "In memory of an honest man, a constant friend, JOHN the great duke of Argyle and Greenwich, a general and orator excelled by none in the age he lived. Sir Henry Farmer, bart. by his last will left the sum of five hundred pounds towards erecting this monument, and recommended the above inscription."

JOHN GAY.

This beautiful monument was erected to the memory of the above gentleman, by the bounty and favour of the duke and duchess of Queensborough, who were the great encouragers of his genius, and rewarders of his merit. The masks, tragedy-

T t

tragedy-dagger, and instruments of music, which are blended together in a groupe, are emblematical devices, alluding to the various ways of writing in which he excelled; namely, Farce, Satire, Fable, and Pastoral. The following short epitaph was written by himself:

Life is a jest, and all things show it,
I thought so once, but now I know it.

Underneath are the following verses written by Mr. Pope:

Of manners gentle, of affections mild;
In wit, a man; simplicity, a child:
With native humour, temp'ring virtuous rage,
Form'd to delight at once, and last the age:
Above temptation in a low estate,
And uncorrupted, e'en among the great.
A safe companion and an easy friend;
Unblam'd thro' life, lamented in thy end.
These are thy honours, not that here thy bust
Is mix'd with heroes, or with kings thy dust;
But that the worthy and the good shall say,
Striking their pensive bosoms—Here lies Gay.
—He died December 4, 1732, aged 45.

NICHOLAS ROWE, Esq;

This gentleman was poet-laureat, and author of several fine tragedies; and just before his death had finished a translation of Lucan's Pharsalia. The monument, which is a very fine one, was erected to the memory of him and his only daughter. On a pedestal about twenty inches high, which stands on an altar, is a most beautiful bust; near it is the figure of a lady in the deepest sorrow, and between both, on a pyramid behind, is a medallion, with the head of a young lady in relief. On the front of the pedestal is this inscription: "To the memory of Nicholas Rowe, esq; who died in 1718, aged 45. And of Charlotte, his only daughter, wife of Henry Fane, esq; who inheriting her father's spirit, and amiable in her own innocence and beauty, died in the 23d year of her age, 1739." Under which, on the front of the altar, is the following epitaph:

Thy reliques, Rowe! to this sad shrine we trust,
And near thy Shakespear place thy honour'd bust.
Oh! skill'd next him to draw the tender tear,
For never heart felt passion more sincere:
To nobler sentiments to fire the brave,
For never Briton more disdain'd a slave!
Peace to thy gentle shade and endless rest,
Blest in thy genius, in thy love too blest!
And blest, that timely from our scene remov'd,
Thy soul enjoys that liberty it lov'd.

To these so mourn'd in death, so lov'd in life,
The childless mother, and the widow'd wife,
With tears inscribes this monumental stone,
That holds their ashes, and expects her own.

JAMES THOMSON.

This monument was erected in the year 1762: and is executed by Michael Henry Spang, statuary, after a design of Mr. Adam, architect to his majesty. There is a figure of Mr. Thomson sitting, which leans its left arm upon a pedestal, holding a book with the cap of Liberty in its other hand. On the pedestal is carved in basso relievo the Seasons; to which a boy points, offering him a laurel crown, as the reward of his genius. At the feet of the figure is the tragic mask, and the ancient harp. The whole is supported by a projected pedestal, and in a pannel is this inscription:

"JAMES THOMSON, Ætatis 48. Obiit 27 Augusti, 1748. Tutored by thee, sweet poetry
"exults her voice to ages, and informs the page
"with music, image, sentiment, and thought,
"never to die."

WILLIAM SHAKESPEAR.

The design and workmanship of this monument are extremely elegant. In the figure of Shakespear the sculptor has most delicately expressed his attitude, his dress, his shape, his genteel air, and fine composition. The heads on the pedestal, which are likewise proper ornaments to grace the tomb, represent Henry V. Richard III. and queen Elizabeth. In short, the taste that is here shown does honour to those great names, under whose direction, by the public favour, it was so elegantly constructed; namely, the earl of Burlington, Dr. Mead, Mr. Pope, and Mr. Martin. It was designed by Kent, and executed by Scheemakers; and the expence defrayed by the grateful contributions of the public. The lines on the scroll, which were written by himself, are very properly adapted.

The cloud-cap'd towers, the gorgeous palaces,
The solemn temples, the great globe itself;
Yea, all which it inherits, shall dissolve,
And, like the baseless fabric of a vision,
Leave not a wreck behind.

CHARLES De St. DENNIS, Lord of St. EVREMOND.

The inscription on this tomb is in latin, the translation of which informs us, that this gentleman was of a noble family in Normandy, and was employed in the army of France, in which he rose to the rank of a marshal; but retiring to Holland, he was from thence invited by king Charles II. into England, where he lived in the greatest intimacy with the king and principal nobility; but particularly with the dutches of Mazarine. He was of a very sprightly turn of humour, as well in his conversation as writings. Though he left France, as is supposed, on account of religion, yet in his will he left 20l. to poor Roman Catholics, and 20l. to poor French refugees; besides other legacies to be disposed of to those in distress, of what religion soever they might be. He died by a violent fit of the strangury the 9th of September, 1703, aged 90.

MATTHEW PRIOR.

This is a most beautiful monument, and richly ornamented. On one side the pedestal stands the figure figure of Thalia, one of the nine muses, with a flute in her hand; and on the other, History with her book shut; between both is the bust of the deceased upon a raised altar of fine marble. Over this is a handsome pediment, on the ascending sides of which are two boys, one with an hour glass in his hand run out; the other holding a torch reversed: on the apex of the pediment is an urn, and on the base of the monument a long inscription, setting forth the principal employments in which he had been engaged; particularly, by order of king William and queen Mary, in assisting at the congress of the confederate powers at the Hague in 1690. In 1697, he was one of the plenipotentiaries at the peace of Ryswick; and in the following year was of the embassy to France, and also secretary of state in Ireland. In 1700 he was made one of the board of trade; in 1711 first commissioner of the customs; and lastly, in the same year, was sent by her majesty queen Anne to Lewis XIV. of France, with proposals of peace. All which trusts he executed with uncommon address, and the most firm integrity. On the outermost side of the bust is a latin inscription, importing, that while he was busied in writing the history of his own times, death interposed, and broke both the thread of his discourse and of his life the eighteenth of September 1721, in the 57th year of his age.

THOMAS SHADWELL.

This monument was erected to the memory of the above gentleman by his son Dr. John Shadwell. It is of curious marble, ornamented with a fine mantling, urn, and bust, and crowned with a chaplet of bays. The inscription imports, that he was descended from an ancient family in Staffordshire, was poet-laureat and historiographer in the reign of king William, and died the 20th of November 1692, in the 55th year of his age. The cause of his death, which was at Chelsea, was by taking opium, to which he had been long accustomed.

JOHN MILTON.

This monument was erected to his memory by Mr. Auditor Benson in the year 1737. He was a great polemical and political writer, being latin secretary to Oliver Cromwell; but what has immortalized his name are those two inimitable pieces, Paradise lost and regained. These, he wrote in his retirement; and as some affirm after he was blind. This seems to be confirmed by that mournful passage in his third book of Paradise lost, when, in his address to light he says,

—Thee I revisit safe
And feel thy sovereign vital lamb; but thou
Revisit'st not these eyes that roll in vain
To find thy piercing ray, and find no dawn;
So thick a drop serene hath quench'd their orbs.

On the restoration, many had so great an esteem for his parts and learning, that though they detested his principles, they procured his pardon. He was born at London in 1608, and died of the gout at Bunhill, 1674, in the 67th year of his age, leaving three daughters unprovided for. His body was conveyed to St. Giles's-church, Cripplegate, and there interred in the chancel.

EDMUND SPENCER.

This great poet was born in London in the year 1510, and died in 1598. The tomb is of grey marble, but very rough and decayed; on which is the following inscription:

"Here lies (expecting the second coming of "Our Saviour Christ Jesus) the body of Ed-
"mund Spencer; the prince of poets in his time,
"whose divine spirit needs no other witness than
"the works which he left behind him."

Over this is a monument erected to the memory of

SAMUEL BUTLER.

This gentleman was author of Hudibras, and a man of the most extraordinary learning, wit, and integrity; but underwent great difficulties on account of his narrow circumstances. He was born at Sternham in Worcestershire in 1612, died in London in 1680, and was buried at the expence of a private friend, in the church-yard of St. Paul's, Covent-garden. This tomb, as the inscription informs us, was erected by John Barber, esq; citizen of London, and afterwards lord mayor, "that he who was destitute of all
"things when alive, might not want a monument
"when dead."

BEN. JOHNSON.

This gentleman was poet-laureat to king James I. and was cotemporary with Shakespear, to whose writings he was no friend. He was the son of a clergyman, and educated at Westminster school, while Mr. Cambden was master; but after his father's death, his mother marrying a bricklayer, he was taken from school, and made to lay bricks. It is said that at the building of Lincoln's-Inn, he worked with his trowel in one hand, and Horace in the other; but Mr. Cambden regarding his parts, recommended him to Sir Walter Raleigh, whose son he attended in his travels, and upon his return entered himself of Cambridge. Among his various theatrical productions, there are but four plays that will at this time bear representation, viz. The Silent Woman, Alchymist, Volpone, and Every Man in his Humour. The monument is of fine marble, and very neatly ornamented with emblematical figures, alluding perhaps to the malice and envy of his cotemporaries. His epitaph consists only of these words:

O RARE BEN JOHNSON!

He died August 16, 1637, aged 63.

MICHAEL DRAYTON.

This gentleman was an excellent poet, and a great antiquarian; the first of which appears by his his epistles and legends; the latter by his Polyalbion, which the great Seldon honoured with a comment. It does not appear by whom this monument was erected; but the inscription and epitaph (which were formerly in letters of gold, but now almost obliterated) runs thus:

“ Michael Drayton, esq; a memorable poet
“ of his age, exchanged his laurel for a crown
“ of glory, Anno 1631.”

Do, pious marble! let thy readers know
What they, and what their children owe
To Drayton's name, whose sacred dust
We recommend unto thy trust;
Protect his mem'ry, and preserve his story;
Remain a lasting monument of his glory;
And when thy ruins shall disclaim
To be the treasurer of his name:
His name that cannot fade shall be
An everlasting monument to thee.

JOHN PHILLIPS.

This monument was erected to the memory of the above gentleman by Sir Simon Harcourt, knt. The bust is in relief, and represented as in an arbor interwoven with vines, laurel branches, and apples-trees; and over it this motto; Honos erit huic quoque Pomo; alluding to the high qualities ascribed to the apple in that excellent poem of his called Cyder. He was author of but few pieces, but those very masterly. His Blenheim is a fine specimen of what, had he lived, he was capable of in the epic way; in the lyric his ode to lord Bolingbroke on Tobacco is far from contemptible; and as to his Splendid Shilling, whoever reads it must be highly pleased with his fancy and great force of genius. The inscription on his monument is a recital of his transcendent virtues and abilities, and the great merit he was possessed of. He was son to Stephen Phillips, D. D. archdeacon of Salop, was born at Bampton in Oxfordshire, Dec. 30, 1675, and died of a consumption in the prime of his life the 15th of February 1708.

GEOFFERY CHAUCER.

This monument, which is of the gothic stile, was once very beautiful, but now much defaced. The person to whose name it is sacred, is called the father of English poets, and flourished in the fourteenth century. He was son to Sir John Chaucer, a citizen of London, and employed by Edward III. in negotiations abroad relating to trade. He was first brought up at Cambridge; then in Merton in Oxford, from whence he went to study the law in the Middle Temple. After this he became a favourite at court, and was employed as a shield-bearer to the king; he was a gentleman of the bedchamber, and by Edward III. sent ambassador abroad; but in the succeeding reign fell into disgrace, and was committed to the Tower for high treason, where he wrote his Testament of Love. But on the death of Richard II. he became a greater favourite at court than ever, having married the great John of Gaunt's wife's sister. He was born in 1328, and died October 25, 1400, aged 72.

ABRAHAM COWLEY.

Though this monument appears very plain, yet it is expressive. The fire issuing from the mouth of the urn, and the chaplet of laurel that begirts it, are fine emblems of the glory he acquired by the spirit of his writings. The inscription and epitaph on the pedestal are both in latin, the translation of which runs thus:

“ Near this place lies Abraham Cowley, the “ Pindar, Horace, and Virgil of England; and “ the delight, ornament, and admiration of his “ age:

While, sacred bard, far worlds thy works proclaim,
And you survive in an immortal fame,
Here may you blest'd in pleasing quiet lie,
To guard thy urn my hoary faith stand by;
And all thy fav'rite tuneful nine repair
To watch thy dust with a perpetual care.
Sacred for ever may this place be made,
And may no desp'rate hand presume t'invade
With touch unhallow'd, this religious room,
Or dare affront thy venerable tomb;
Unmov'd and undisturb'd till time shall end,
May Cowley's dust this marble shrine defend.

“ So wilhes, and desires that wish may be sacred
“ to posterity, George duke of Buckingham,
“ who erected this monument for that incompa“ rable man. He died in the 49th year of his “ age, and was carried from Buckingham-house,
“ with honourable pomp, his exequies being at“ tended by persons of illustrious characters of “ all degrees, and buried Aug. 3, 1667.”

By a blue stone, on which is engraved his name, it appears that he lies just before this monument.

Mrs. MARTHA BIRCH.

This is a neat fable monument high on a pillar, the inscription whereof informs us that she was daughter to Samuel Viner, esq; and first married to Francis Millington, esq; and after his death to Peter Birch, prebendary of this abbey; and that she was prudent, pious, and chaste. She died in the 50th year of her age, May 15, 1703.

DRYDEN.

This monument was erected to the memory of the above gentleman by the late duke of Buckingham, who valued his writings so much, that he thought no inscription necessary to spread his fame. It may be said of this great man with respect to his writings in general, that what he did in any one species or distinct kind, would have been sufficient to have acquired him a great name. All that can be discovered on the monument is this: “ J. Dryden, born 1632, died May “ 1, 1700. John Sheffield, duke of Buckingham-“ shire, erected this monument, 1720.”

ROBERT

ROBERT SOUTH, D. D.

On the tomb is the figure of this gentleman in his canonical habit, with his arm resting on a cushion, and his right hand on a death's head. In his left he holds a book with his finger between the leaves, as if just closed from reading, and over his head is a groupe of cherubs issuing from a mantling, under which is a long latin inscription, shewing, that he was scholar to Dr. Busby, and student at Christ-church, Oxford, and public orator of that university; that by the patronage of lord Clarendon he was made prebendary both of Westminster and Christ's, and afterwards rector of Islip, where he rebuilt the parsonage house, and founded and endowed a school for the education of poor children. He died July 8, 1716, aged 82.

Dr. RICHARD BUSBY.

The effigy of this learned man in his gown is on the monument looking earnestly on the inscription. In his right hand he holds a pen, and in his left a book open. Underneath, on the pedestal, are a variety of books, and at top his family arms. The inscription is elegantly written, and highly to his praise: it intimates, that whatever fame the school of Westminster boasts, and whatever advantages mankind shall reap from thence in times to come, are all principally owing to the wise institutions of this great man. He was born at Lutton in Lincolnshire, Sept. 22, 1606, made master of Westminster-college Dec. 23, 1640, elected prebend of Westminster July 5, 1660, and treasurer of Wells, August 11, the same year; and died April 5, 1695.

About this spot, on the pavement, are some names to be met with, which are too considerable to pass over unnoticed. The first is

THOMAS PARR.

He was born in the county of Salop, in the year 1483, and lived in the reign of ten princes, viz. king Edward IV. Edward V. Richard III. Henry VII. Henry VIII. Edward VI. queen Mary, queen Elizabeth, king James, and king Charles. He died the 15th of November 1635, aged 152. A very singular circumstance respecting this old man is, that at the age of 130, a prosecution was entered against him in the spiritual court for bastardy, and with such effect, that he did penance publicly in the church for that offence.

Not far from this lie the remains of that once celebrated poet,

Sir WILLIAM DAVENANT.

This great man succeeded Ben Johnson as poet-laureat to king Charles the first, but having lost his nose by an accident, he became the ridicule of the wits in the succeeding reign. His steadiness to the royal cause was singular. In 1641 he was forced to France on an accusation of seducing the parliament army from their duty. In 1643 he was knighted for his bravery at the siege of Gloucester; but the king's cause declining, he was forced once more to take refuge in France, where he wrote his Gondabert. In attempting to return he was taken at sea, confined in the Isle of Wight, and thence removed to the Tower, in order to take his trial at the high court of justiciary; but by the application of Milton, he was spared. He lived to see the restoration, and to enjoy his old post, in which he was succeeded by Mr. Dryden. He was the son of a vintner at Oxford, and received his education at Lincoln-college, where he became acquainted with Endimion Porter, Henry Jermain, and Sir John Suckling. He died in 1668, aged 63. On the stone that covers him are inscribed these words:

O Rare Sir William Davenant.

At a small distance from the above, lie the remains of that great mathematician

Sir ROBERT MURRAY.

He was one of the founders of the Royal Society, of which he was the first president, and while he lived, the principal support of it. He was a great admirer of the Rosacruzians, well versed in chemistry and experimental philosophy; and in great favour with king Charles II. to whom he was secretary for Scotland, and a privy-counsellor. He was buried at the king's expense, after having died suddenly in the garden at Whitehall the 4th of July 1673.

Not far from this is an ancient stone of grey marble, in which by the marks has been the image of a man in armour. It covers the body of

JOHN HAULE.

This man was a private soldier in the reign of Richard III. At the battle of Najara in Spain, he, together with John Shakel his comrade, took the earl of Denne prisoner, who, under pretence of raising money for his ransom, obtained his liberty, leaving his son as surety in their hands. Upon their coming to England, the duke of Lancaster demanded him for the king; but they refused to deliver him up without a ransom, and were therefore both committed to the Tower, from whence escaping they took sanctuary in this abbey. Sir Ralph Ferreris and Alan Buxal, the one governor, the other captain of the Tower, with fifty more men, pursued them, and having by fair promises gained over Shakel, they attempted to seize Haule by force, who made a desperate defence; but being overpowered by numbers, was slain Aug. 11, 1378, in the choir before the prior's stall, commending himself to God the avenger of wrongs; and at the same time a servant of the abbey fell with him. Shakel they threw into prison, but afterwards he was set at liberty, and the king and council of England agreed to pay Shakel for the ransom of his prisoner 500 marks, and 100 marks per annum. Some years afterwards Shakel died, and was likewise buried here in 1396.

Near Dryden's tomb, lie the remains of Francis Beaumont, the dramatic writer, who died in London, in March 1615, and was buried here the 9th of the same month.

U u

Having

Having now done with the pavement, and passed the side of the choir, the first monument which presents itself is that of

WILLIAM THYNNE, Esq;

This ancient monument is of marble and alabaster: on it is a warrior at full length, representing William Thynne, of Botterville, esq; who was a polite gentleman, a great traveller, and a brave soldier. In 1546 he was by king Henry VIII. made receiver of the marches, and fought against the Scots at Musselburgh with undaunted courage. The latter part of his life he spent in retirement and devotion in this church, whither he constantly repaired morning and evening. He was brother to Sir John Thynne, secretary to the duke of Somerset. He died the 14th of March 1584.

Sir THOMAS RICHARDSON.

On this monument, which is of black marble, is an effigy in brass of a judge in his robes, with a collar of S. S. representing Sir Thomas Richardson, knight, who, according to the inscription, was speaker of the House of Commons in the twenty-first and twenty-second years of king James; chief justice of the court of Common-pleas; and lastly, by king Charles I. made lord chief justice of England. This is that judge Richardson, who first issued out an order against the ancient custom of wakes, and ordered every minister to read it in his church; which the bishop of Bath and Wells opposing, complaint was made against it, in the council-chamber, where the judge was so severely reprimanded, that he came out, in a rage, saying, he had been almost choaked with a pair of lawn sleeves. He died in 1634, aged 66.

ELIZ. and JUDITH FREKE.

These two ladies were not only an ornament, but a fine example for their sex; they were the best of daughters, the best of wives, and the best of mothers. The sides of the monument are adorned with their busts in relief, and on the front of it is a long inscription, setting forth their descent and marriages. They were the daughters of Ralph Freke, of Hannington in Wilts, esq; Elizabeth was married to Percy Freke, of West Belney in Norfolk, and died April 7, 1714, aged 69, Judith married Robert Austin, of Tenterden in Kent, and died May 19, 1716, aged 64.

Dame GRACE GETHIN.

This lady, who was married to Sir Richard Gethin, of Gethin Grott, in Ireland, was famed for exemplary piety, and wrote a book of devotion, which Mr. Congreve complimented with a poem. The monument, which is very lofty, bears the effigy of a young lady devoutly kneeling, with a book in her right hand, and her left on her breast; on each side is an angel, one holding a crown, the other a chaplet over her head, and on the ascending sides of the pediment are two female figures in a mournful posture. The whole is supported by three different coats of family arms, and on the base is an English inscription, setting forth her honourable descent from the Norton's of Salop. She died October 11, 1697, in the twenty-first year of her age.

J. A. KENDALL, Esq;

This monument is supported by a death's head, and on the top is a close helmet. The person to whom it is inscribed was chosen a member of the last parliament of king James II. and served in several parliaments afterwards in the reign of king William, by whom he was made governor of Barbadoes, and one of the commissioners for executing the office of lord high admiral. He died the 10th of July, 1708, in the 60th year of his age.

THOMAS OWEN, Esq;

There is a fine figure on this monument of a judge in his robes at full length, leaning on his left arm, and over him an inscription, shewing that he was son to Richard Owen, by Mary, daughter and heiress to Thomas Otrly, of Shropshire, esq; that from his youth he had applied himself to the study of the laws, and was first made serjeant at law to queen Elizabeth, and afterwards a justice of the Common-pleas. He died the 21st of December, in the year 1598.

THOMAS THYNNE, Esq;

This monument, which is esteemed a fine piece of modern statuary, was lately repaired and beautified at the expence of Thomas Thynne, late lord viscount Weymouth. The principal figure is represented in a dying posture, and at his feet a cherub weeping. Underneath on a table of black marble in white letters, is this inscription: "Thomas Thynne of Longleat, in Com. Wilts, esq; who was barbarously murdered on Sunday the 12th of February, 1682." Upon the pedestal in relief, the story of the murder is depicted; which murder was conspired by count Koningmarck, and executed by three assassins hired for that purpose, who shot this unhappy gentleman in Pall-Mall, in his own coach. The motive was, to obtain the rich heiress of Northumberland in marriage, who, in her infancy, had been betrothed to the earl of Ogle, but left a widow before consummation; and afterwards married to Mr. Thynne, but being scarce fifteen, and her mother extremely tender of her, and withal desirous of her having issue, prevailed upon her husband to suffer her to travel another year before he bedded her, in which time she became acquainted with Koningmarck at the court of Hanover. Whether she had ever given him any countenance is uncertain, but having no hopes of obtaining her while her husband was alive, he in this villainous manner accomplished his death; but the lady detested the horrid deed, and soon after married the great duke of Somerset.

JAMES.

JAMES Earl Stanhope.

This monument is stately and magnificent, the principal figure in which leans upon his arm in a cumbent posture, holding in his right hand a general's staff, and in his left a parchment scroll. Before him stands a Cupid resting himself upon a shield. Over a martial tent sits a beautiful Pallas, holding in her right hand a javeline, and in the other a scroll. Behind is a slender pyramid, answering to that of Sir Isaac Newton's, and indeed there is such an affinity in the design as indicates the workmanship to be done by the same master. On the middle of the pedestal are two medals, and on each side the pilasters one: under the principal figure is a latin inscription, setting forth the merits of this great man as a foldier, a statesman, and a senator: In 1707 he concluded an advantageous treaty with Spain; and the same year was sent ambassador to Charles III. In 1708 he took Port Mahon. In 1710 he forced his way to the gates of Madrid, and took possession of that capital. In September 1714 he was made secretary at war. In 1715, being of the secret committee, he impeached the duke of Ormond. In December 1716 he was made secretary of state. In 1717 he was made first commissioner of the treasury, and chancellor of the exchequer; and July following created a peer. In March 1718 he was a second time made secretary of state; and in 1721 he died, in the 47th year of his age.

Sir ISAAC NEWTON.

This is a most superb and elegant monument. Sir Isaac is sculptured on it recumbent, leaning his right arm on four folio's, thus titled, Divinity, Chronology, Opticks, and Phil: Prin: Math: and pointing to the scroll supported by winged cherubs: over him is a large globe, projecting from a pyramid behind, whereon is delineated the course of the comet in 1680, with the signs, constellations and planets. On this globe sits the figure of Astronomy, with her book closed, and in a very thoughtful, composed, and pensive mood. Underneath the principal figure is a most curious bas relief, representing the various labours in which Sir Isaac chiefly employed his time: such as discovering the cause of gravitation, settling the principles of light and colours, and reducing the coinage to a determined standard. The device of weighing the sun by the steelyard has been thought at once bold and striking, and indeed the whole monument does honour to the sculptor. The inscription on the pedestal is in latin, short, but full of meaning, intimating, that by a spirit nearly divine, he solved, on principles of his own, the motion and figure of the planets, the paths of the comets, and the ebbing and flowing of the sea; that he discovered the dissimilarity of the rays of light, and the properties of colours from thence arising, which none but himself had ever dreamt of; that he was a diligent, wise, and faithful interpreter of nature, antiquity, and the holy scriptures; that by his philosophy he maintained the dignity of the supreme Being; and by the purity of his life, the simplicity of the gospel. The inscription concludes with a beautiful exclamation, what reason mortals had to pride themselves in the existence of such and so great an ornament to the human race! He was born December 5, 1642, and died in the year 1726.

Dame ELIZ. CARTERET.

The figure of this lady is on the monument, with a winged seraph descending to receive her, both which are executed in a masterly manner. She was daughter of Sir Edward Carteret, knt. gentleman usher of the black rod to king Charles, and second wife and relict of Sir Philip de Carteret, and by him mother to Sir Charles Carteret, her only son, by whose death was extinguished the eldest branch of the ancient family of the name of Carteret, signeurs of St. Owen, in the Isle of Jersey. She died, aged 52, the 26th of March, 1717.

Sir THOMAS DUPPA.

On the top of this monument is an urn, and the whole is beautifully ornamented with flowers and foliage. The inscription informs us, that in his youth he waited upon king Charles II. when he was prince of Wales and under the tuition of Dr. Duppa. He was afterwards made a gentleman-usher and daily-waiter, and then gentleman usher of the black rod, in which office he died April 25, 1694, in the 75th year of his age.

ALMERICUE DE COURCY,
Baron of Kinsale.

Under a rich canopy finely ornamented and gilt is represented his lordship in full proportion reposing himself after the fatigues of an active life. The inscription informs us, that he was descended from the famous John de Courcy, earl of Ulster, (who in the reign of king John, in consideration of his great valour, obtained that extraordinary privilege to him and his heirs of being covered before the king.) This nobleman was greatly in favour with king Charles II. and king James II. under the latter of which he commanded a troop of horse. He died the 19th of February, 1719, aged 57.

HENRY PURCELL, Esq;

The workmanship of this monument, though small, is very elegant. There is a short but comprehensive epitaph on it, which runs thus: "Here lies Henry Purcell, who left this life, and is gone to that blessed place, where only his harmony can be exceeded." He died November 21, 1695, aged 37.

HUGH CHAMBERLAIN, M. D. &amp; F. R. S.

This monument is principally adorned with a figure laying as it were at ease, on a tomb stone, leaning upon his right arm, with his hand upon his night cap, and his head uncovered. In his left hand he holds a book, indicating thereby his intense application to study. On each side are the emblems emblems of physic and longevity; and over his head is Fame descending with a trumpet in one hand, and in the other a wreath. On the top are weeping cherubs, and on the pedestal a long inscription in latin, setting forth his vast knowledge and industry in his profession, his humanity in relieving the sick, and his connections and affinities in social and private life. This gentleman was famous for the improvements he made in midwifery, the practise of which, since his time, has been studied to great advantage. He died June 17, 1728, aged 64.

Sir THOMAS HESKET.

This is a fine old monument, on which lies the effigy of a gentleman at full length in a tufted gown, and on the base underneath is a lady kneeling. These appear, by the inscription, to represent Sir Thomas Heskett, attorney of the court of wards and liveries in the time of queen Elizabeth; and Julian, his wife, who caused this monument to be erected. He died the 15th of October 1605.

Dame MARY JAMES.

This monument principally consists of an urn wreathed and crowned with a viscount's coronet on a handsome pedestal. It appears by the inscription, that this lady was wife to Sir John James, of the ancient family of the lords of Hostrick in Holland, and daughter to Sir Robert Killegrew, vice-chamberlain to Mary, queen to king Charles the first. She died November 6, 1677,

Sir GILBERT LORT.

This monument is inscribed to the memory of Sir Gilbert Lort, of Stackpole in Pembrokeshire, bart. by his sister Dame Elizabeth Campbell, relict of Sir Alexander Campbell, of Colder in Scotland, bart. Sir Gilbert died September 19, 1698, aged 28. She died September 28, 1714, aged 49. The monument is chiefly ornamented with family arms and cherubs.

Sir PETER WARREN.

This is a most superb monument, consisting of white marble, and executed by that great master of his time, Rubiliac. Adjoining to the wall is a large flag hanging to the flagstaff, and spreading in natural folds, behind the whole monument. Before is a fine figure of Hercules placing Sir Peter's bust on its pedestal; and on the other side is a figure of Navigation with a laurel wreath in her hand, gazing on the bust with a look of melancholy mixed with admiration. Behind her a cornucopia pours out fruit, corn, the fleece, &c. and by it is a cannon, an anchor, and other decorations. The following is the inscription:

Sacred to the memory of
Sir PETER WARREN,
Knight of the Bath, vice-admiral of the red Squadron of the british fleet, and

Member of parliament
For the City and liberty of Westminster.
He derived his descent from an ancient Family of Ireland:
His fame and honours from his virtues and Abilities.
How eminently those were displayed,
With what vigilance and spirit they were exerted,
In the various services wherein he had the honour to command,
And the happiness to conquer,
Will be more properly recorded in the Annals of GREAT BRITAIN.
On this tablet affection with truth must say,
That deservedly esteem'd in private life,
And univerally renowned for his public Conduct,
The judicious and gallant officer
Possessed of all the amiable qualities of the Friend,
The gentleman and the christian:
But the Almighty,
Whom alone he feared, and whose gracious Protection
He had often experienced,
Was pleased to remove him from a place of Honour
To an eternity of happiness,
On the 29th Day of July, 1752,
In the 49th year of his age.

GRACE SCOTT.

Adjoining to the pillar is a neat tablet, on which is the following inscription: "Grace, eldest daughter of Sir Thomas Mauleverer of Allerton Mauleverer, in Yorkshire, bart. born 1622, married to colonel Scott, a member of the Honourable House of Commons, 1644, and died February 24, 1645."

He that will give my GRACE but what is hers,
Must say her death has not
Made only her dear SCOTT,
But virtue, worth, and sweetness, widowers.

WILL. CAVENDISH, duke of Newcastle.

This monument is a most beautiful piece of architecture, and elegantly ornamented. In a cumbent posture, on a double mat covered with a rich canopy of state, lie (according to the English inscription) the loyal duke of Newcastle and his dutchess, his second wife, by whom he had no issue; her name was Margaret Lucas, youngest sister to lord Lucas of Colchester, a noble family; for all the brothers were valiant, and all the sisters virtuous. This dutchess was a wife, witty, and learned lady, which her many books do well testify: she was a most virtuous and a loving careful wife, and was with her lord all the time of his banishment and miseries; and when he came home, never parted from him in his solitary retirements. The latin inscription farther informs us, he was a knight of the bath, and baron Ogle in in right of his mother, viscount Mansfield, and baron Cavendish of Bolesover, earl of Ogle, earl, marquis and duke of Newcastle upon Tyne, lord lieutenant of the counties of Nottingham and Northumberland, first lord of the bedchamber to the king, guardian to prince Charles, privy-counsellor to the king, and knight of the most noble order of the garter; that for his fidelity to the king he was made captain-general of the forces raised for his service in the north, fought many battles, and generally came off victorious; that when the rebels prevailed (being one of the first designed a sacrifice) he left his estate, and endured a long exile; by his first wife Elizabeth, daughter and heir to William Bassett of Staffordshire, esq; he had two sons and three daughters; Charles, who died without issue, and Henry, heir to his honours; Jane, married to Charles Cheyney, of Chesham, Bucks; Elizabeth, to John earl of Bridgewater; and Frances, to Oliver earl of Bolingbroke. He died December 27, 1676, aged 84.

JOHN HOLLIS, Duke of Newcastle.

The chief beauty of this monument consists in the design, though it is, perhaps, as lofty and magnificent as any in the whole abbey. The principal figure on it rests upon a sepulchral monument of darkish coloured marble, and represents the noble person to whose memory it was erected, having in his right hand a general's staff, and in his left hand a ducal coronet. On one side the base stands a statue of Wisdom, on the other, of Sincerity. On the angles of the upper compartment sit angels, and on the ascending sides of the pediment sit cherubs, one with an hour-glass, alluding to the admeasurement of man's life by grains of sand; the other pointing upwards, where life shall be no longer measured by duration. On the base of the monument is the following inscription:

“ John Hollis, duke of Newcastle, marquis
“ and earl of Clare, baron Houghton, of Hough“ ton, and knight companion of the most noble
“ order of the garter, whose body is here depo“ sited under the same roof with many of his “ noble ancestors and relations, of the families
“ of Vere, Cavendish, and Hollis, whose eminent “ virtues he inherited; and was particularly dis“ tinguished for his courage, love to his country,
“ and constancy in friendship; which qualities
“ he exerted with great zeal and readiness, when“ ever the cause of religion, his country, or “ friends required him. In the reign of queen
“ Anne he filled with great capacity and honour
“ the several employments of lord-keeper of “ the privy-seal, and privy-counsellor, lord lieu“ tenant and custos rotulorum of Middlesex and “ Nottingham, and of the county and the town
“ of Nottingham, and of the east and north “ ridings of the county of York; lord chief “ justice in Eyre, north of Trent, and governor
“ of the town and fort of Kingston upon Hull:
“ to all which titles and honours his personal “ merit gave lustre that needed not the addition “ of the great wealth he possessed. He was born “ Jan. 9, 1661-2, and died July 15, 1711. He “ married the lady Margaret, third daughter and “ heiress to Henry Cavendish, duke of Newcastle;

“ by whom he left issue one only child, the lady “ Henrietta Cavendish Hollis Harley, who “ caused this memorial of him to be erected in “ 1723.”

Admiral VERNON.

The bust of that gallant admiral is represented on a pedestal of beautiful marble, with a fine figure of Fame crowning him with laurels. The monument is superbly ornamented with naval trophies, and under it is the following inscription:

As a memorial of his own gratitude,
and of the virtues of his benefactor;
this monument was erected by his nephew
Francis lord Orwell,

In the year

1763.

Sacred to the memory
of

EDWARD VERNON,

Admiral of the white Squadron of the British fleet.

He was the second son of James Vernon,
Who was secretary of state to king William III.
and whose abilities and integrity were equally conspicuous.

In his youth he served under the admirals Shovel and Rooke;

By their example he learned to conquer,

By his own merit he rose to command.

In the war with Spain of M,DCC,XXXIX,
he took the fort of Porto Bello

with six ships,

A force which was thought unequal to the attempt.

For this he received the thanks of both houses of parliament.

He subdued Chagre, and at Carthagenæ conquered as far as naval force could carry victory.

After these services he retired

without place or title,

from the exercise of public to the enjoyment of private virtue.

The testimony of a good conscience

was his reward,

The love and esteem of all good men

his glory.

In battle, tho' calm he was active, and tho' intrepid prudent, successful yet not ostentatious,

Ascribing the glory

to God;

In the senate, he was disinterested, vigilant, and steady.

On the XXX. day of October, M,DCC,LVII,

he died as he had lived,

the friend of man, the lover of his country,

the father of the poor

aged LXXIII.

Sir CHARLES WAGER.

The principal figure on this monument is, Fame holding a portrait of the admiral in relief, supported by an infant Hercules. The embellishments consist of naval trophies, instruments of war and navigation, &c. and on the base in relief

X x

relief is represented the destroying and taking the Spanish galleons in 1708. The inscription runs thus :

To the memory of Sir CHARLES WAGER, Knt.
Admiral of the white, first commissioner of the admiralty,
and privy-counsellor :

A man of great natural talents,
Who bore the highest commands,
And passed through the greatest employments,
With credit to himself, and honour to his country.
He was in private life
Humane, temperate, just, and bountiful :
In public station,
Valiant, prudent, wise, and honest ;
Easy of access to all ;
Plain and unaffected in his manners,
Steady and resolute in his conduct :
So remarkably happy in his presence of mind,
that no danger ever discomposed him ;
Esteemed and favoured by his king ;
Beloved and honoured by his country.
He died 24 May, 1743. Aged 77.

Sir WILLIAM SANDERSON, Knt.

On a small table of alabaster adjoining to the wall, is a bust of this gentleman, who, by the inscription, was of the bedchamber to king Charles I. and wrote the lives of Mary queen of Scots, James and Charles I. that he sustained great hardships from the tyranny of the rebels, but that having bravely surmounted all difficulties, he lived to the age of 90, and died July 15, 1676.

CLEMENT SAUNDERS, Esq;

Adjoining to a pillar near the font is a small monument erected to the memory of the above gentleman, who was son to Sir William Saunders, knt. of the county of Northampton, and carver in ordinary to king Charles II. king James II. and king William III. He died August 10, 1695, in the 84th year of his age.

Admiral WATSON.

This is a most beautiful and splendid monument. In the center of a range of palm-trees is represented an elegant figure of the admiral in Roman Toga, with a branch of palm in his right hand, and is receiving the address of a prostrate figure representing the genius of Calcutta, a place that he relieved and retook from the nabob in Jan. 1757. On the side is the figure in chains of a native of Chandernagore, another place taken by the admiral the March following. On the front of the monument is the following inscription :

To the memory of CHARLES WATSON,
Vice-admiral of the white, commander in chief of his majesty's naval forces in the East Indies, who died at Calcutta the 16th of August 1757.

The EAST-INDIA Company,
As a grateful testimony of the signal advantages which they obtained by his valour and prudent conduct, caused this monument to be erected.

General GUEST.

The bust of this gentleman is of white marble, on a base and pyramid of the most beautiful Egyptian porphyry. It is so highly finished that nothing but a fine imagination can paint its value. The inscription is as follows: " Sacred to those virtues that adorn a christian and a soldier, this marble perpetuates the memory of lieutenant-general Joshua Guest, who closed a service of 60 years, by faithfully defending Edingburgh-castle against the rebels, 1745."

Sir JOHN BALCHEN, Knt.

On the top of this monument, in the most beautiful white marble, is a bust of this great admiral; under which, in relief, is the representation of a ship perishing in a storm. The enrichments, arms, and trophies, are admirably well executed; and the inscription, which is historical, runs thus :

" To the memory of Sir John Balchen, knt. admiral of the white squadron of his majesty's fleet in 1744, being sent out commander in chief of the combined fleets of England and Holland, to cruize on the enemy, was, on his return home in his majesty's ship the Victory, lost in the channel by a violent storm, from which sad circumstance of his death we may learn, that neither the greatest skill, judgment, or experience, joined to the most firm unshaken resolution, can resist the fury of the winds and waves; and we are taught from the passages of his life, which were filled with great and gallant actions, but ever accompanied with adverse gales of fortune, that the brave, the worthy, and the good man meets not always his reward in this world. Fifty-eight years of faithful and painful services he had passed, when being just retired to the government of Greenwich-hospital to wear out the remainder of his days, he was once more, and for the last time; called out by his king and country, whose interest he ever preferred to his own, and his unwearied zeal for their service ending only in his death; which weighty misfortune to his afflicted family became heightened by many aggravating circumstances attending it, yet amidst their grief had they the mournful consolation to find his gracious and royal master mixing his concern with the general lamentations of the public, for the calamitous fate of so zealous, so valiant, and so able a commander; and as a lasting memorial of the sincere love and esteem borne by his widow, to a most affectionate and worthy husband, this honorary monument was erected by her. He was born Feb. 2, 1669, married Susannah, daughter of col. Aprece of Walsingham in the county of Huntingdon. Died Oct. 7, 1744, leaving one son and one daughter, the former of whom, George Balchen, survived him but a short time; for being sent to the West-Indies in 1745, commander of his majesty's ship the Pembroke, he died died in Barbadoes in December the same year, aged 28, having walked in the steps, and imitated the virtue and bravery of his good but unfortunate father."

LORD AUBREY BEAUCLERK.

There is a beautiful bust of this young nobleman in a niche on a pyramid of dove coloured marble, and the whole monument is decorated with arms, trophies, and naval ensigns. On the pedestal is the following historical inscription :

"The lord Aubrey Beauclerk was the youngest son of Charles duke of St. Albans, by Diana, daughter of Aubrey de Vere, earl of Oxford. He went early to sea, and was made a commander in 1731. In 1740 he was sent upon that memorable expedition to Carthage, under the command of admiral Vernon, in his majesty's ship the prince Frederick, which with three others was ordered to cannonade the castle of Bocca Chica. One of these being obliged to quit her station, the prince Frederick was exposed not only to the fire from the castle, but to that of Fort St. Joseph, and to two ships that guarded the mouth of the harbour, which he sustained for many hours that day, and part of the next, with uncommon intrepidity. As he was giving his command upon deck, both his legs were shot off; but such was his magnanimity, that he would not suffer his wounds to be dressed, till he had communicated his orders to the first lieutenant, which were, to fight his ship to the last extremity. Soon after this he gave some directions about his private affairs, and then resigned his soul with the dignity of a hero and christian. Thus was he taken off in the 31st year of his age, an illustrious commander of superior fortitude and clemency, amiable in his person, steady in his affections, and equalled by few in the social and domestic virtues of politeness, modesty, candour and benevolence. He married the widow of col. Francis Alexander, a daughter of Sir Henry Newton, knt. envoy extraordinary to the court of Florence and the republic of Genoa, and judge of the high court of admiralty."

Over the inscription is this epitaph :

Whilst Britain boasts her empire o'er the deep,
This marble shall compel the brave to weep;
As men, as Britons, and as soldiers mourn,
'Tis dauntless, loyal, virtuous Beauclerk's urn.
Sweet were his manners, as his soul was great,
And ripe his worth, tho' immature his fate;
Each tender grace that joy and love inspires,
Living, he mingled with his martial fires;
Dying, he bid Britannia's thunder roar;
And Spain still felt him, when he breath'd no more.

PERCEY KIRK, Esq;

A beautiful bust of this gentleman is represented, on each side of which is a winged seraph; the one having a dagger in his right-hand inverted, and on his left a helmet; the other resting on a ball, and holding in his left-hand a torch reversed. It appears, by the inscription, that he was lieutenant-general of his majesty's armies, that he died January 1, 1741, aged 57; and that he was son to Percey Kirk, esq; lieutenant general in the reign of king James II. by the lady Mary, daughter to George Howard, earl of Suffolk. Diana Dormer, his niece, and sole heiress, died Feb. 22, 1743, in the 33d year of her age.

RICHARD KANE.

The most particular circumstances attending this gentleman's life are inscribed on a handsome pedestal, over which is a beautiful bust of white marble. In 1689 he first appeared in a military capacity at the memorable siege of Derry; and after the reduction of Ireland followed king William into Flanders, where he distinguished himself, particularly by his intrepid behaviour at the siege of Manure, where he was greatly wounded. In 1702 he bore a commission in the service of queen Anne, and assisted in the expedition to Canada; from whence he again returned into Flanders, and fought under the duke of Argyle and Greenwich, and afterwards under lord Carpenter. In 1712 he was made sub-governor of Minorca, through which island he caused a road to be made, which had been thought impracticable. In 1720 he was ordered by king George I. to the defence of Gibraltar, where he sustained an eight months siege against the Spaniards, when all hope of relief was extinguished. King George II. afterwards rewarded him with the government of Minorca, where he died December 19, 1736.

SAM. BRADFORD. S. T. P.

This monument was erected to the memory of bishop Bradford; on it is a long latin inscription almost unintelligible, and surrounded with the arms and proper ensigns of his several dignities. He was some time rector of St. Mary-le-Bow; and from thence advanced to the see of Carlisle, and afterwards translated to that of Rochester, with the deanery of this church, and that of the honourable order of the Bath annexed. He died May 14, 1731, aged 79.

Dr. BOULTER, bishop of Armagh.

This monument is of the finest marble, and after a new invented polish; and the bust is said to be a close copy of the original. The ensigns of his dignity, wherewith it is ornamented, are most exquisitely fine. The inscription is inclosed in a beautiful border of porphyry, and is as follows :
"Dr. Hugh Boulter, late archbishop of Armagh,
"primate of all Ireland; a prelate so eminent for the accomplishments of his mind, the "purity of his heart, and the excellence of his "life, that it may be thought superfluous to specify his titles, recount his virtues, or even
"erect a monument to his fame. His titles he "not only deserved, but adorned; his virtues are
"manifest in his good works, which had never
"dazzled the public eye, if they had not been
"too bright to be concealed; and as to his fame,
"whosoever has any sense of merit, any reverence
"for piety, any passion for his country, or any "charity for mankind, will assist in preserving it
"fair

"fair and spotless, that when brass and marble shall mix with the dust they cover, every succeeding age may have the benefit of his illustrious example. He was born Jan. 4, 1671; was consecrated bishop of Bristol, 1718; translated to the archbishopric of Armagh, 1723; and from thence to Heaven, Sep. 27, 1742."

PHILIP DE SAUMAREZ, Esq;

In gratitude and affection to the above gentleman was this monument erected by his brothers and sisters. He was in the service of the navy twenty-one years, in which time he underwent many great dangers and difficulties. In his majesty's ship the Centurion, he went out a lieutenant under the auspicious conduct of commodore Anson in his expedition to the South-seas, of which ship he was commanding officer when she was driven from her moorings at the isle of Tinian. In the year 1746, being captain of the Nottingham, a 60 gun ship, he, then alone, attacked and took the mars, a French ship of 64 guns. In the first engagement of the following year, when admiral Anson defeated and took a squadron of French men of war and Indiamen, he had an honourable share; and in the second under admiral Hawke, when the enemy after a long and obstinate resistance, was again routed; in pursuing two ships that were making their escape, he gloriously but unfortunately fell. He was the son of Matthew de Saumarez, of the island of Guernsey, esq; by Ann Durell, of the island of Jersey, his wife. He was born November 17, 1710; killed October 14, 1747, and buried in the old church at Plymouth.

JOHN BLOW, doctor in music.

This gentleman was organist, composer, and master of the children, in the chapel royal 25 years; he was scholar to Dr. Christopher Gibbons; and master to the famous Mr. Purcell, and to most of the eminent masters of his time. Under the tomb is a canon in four parts set to music, and adorned with cherubs and flowers. He died October 1, 1708, aged 60.

WILLIAM CROFT.

In bass relief, on the pedestal of this monument, is an organ, and on the top a handsome bust of the deceased, who was a doctor in music, master of the children, and organist and composer of the chapel royal, and organist of this abbey. He died August 14, 1727, in the 50th year of his age.

TEMPLE WEST, Esq;

To preserve to posterity the fame and example of so valuable a man, this monument was erected by his lady in the year 1761. In the most early part of his life he dedicated his time to the naval service of his country, and by his courage and integrity, soon advanced himself to the rank of vice-admiral of the white. He was sagacious, active, industrious: as a skilful seaman, he was cool, intrepid, and resolute. In the signal victory obtained over the French; May 3, 1747, he was captain of the ship which carried Sir Peter Warren; and acquired peculiar honour even on that day of general glory. In the less successful engagement near Minorca, May 20, 1756, wherein, as rear-admiral, he commanded the second division, his distinguished courage and animating example were admired by the whole British squadron; confessed by that of France; and rewarded by the warmest applauses of his country, and the just approbation of his sovereign. On the 17th of November following he was appointed one of the lords commissioners of the admiralty, and adorned his station by a modesty which concealed from him his own merit; and a candor which disposed him to reward that of others. To the frank and generous spirit of an officer, he added the ease and politeness of a gentleman; and with the moral and social virtues of a good man, he exercised the duties of a christian. He died in the year 1737, aged 43.

RICHARD LE NEVE, Esq;

The arms of this gentleman are placed on the top of a very heavy design, adorned with instruments of war. It appears by the inscription, that being made commander of his majesty's ship the Edgar, he was unfortunately killed in a sharp engagement with the Hollanders, August 11, 1673, in the 28th year of his age.

Adjoining to this is a beautiful monument lately erected to the memory of

Sir EDMUND PRIDEAUX.

It has a long inscription which runs thus: "Near this monument, in one grave, in the middle isle, are deposited the remains of Sir Edmund Prideaux, of Netherton, in the county of Devon, bart. and dame Ann his wife. He departed this life, Feb. 26, 1728, in the 55th year of his age; and she the 10th of May 1741, aged 55 years. Sir Edmund married first Mary, daughter of Samuel Reynardson, esq; by whom he had issue Mary, married to James Winstanley, esq; afterwards he married the abovementioned Ann, daughter of Philip Hawkins, of Pennans in the county of Cornwall, gent. They had issue, one son named Peter, who died in his infancy, and one daughter Ann, married to John Pen-darves Bassett, of Tehiddy, in the county of Cornwall, esq; who, surviving her father and mother, caused this monument to be erected to their memory."

CHARLES WILLIAMS Esq;

This monument is supported by a death's head on the wings of Time, and the scroll-work and scolloping is very curious. The inscription says, that he was of a Caerleon in Monmouthshire, a strenuous defender of the church, and a good and generous man. He died Aug. 29, 1720, aged 87.

Dr.

Dr. PETER HEYLIN.

On the top of this monument is a pediment, and the arms of the above gentleman sculpted; on the base the same arms with that of his lady, quarterly. It has a long latin inscription, importing, that he was born at Burford in Oxfordshire, November 29, 1559; educated at Hart-hall, Oxon; was fellow of Magdalen, and recommended to Laud when bishop of Bath and Wells. He was first chaplain to the earl of Danby, then to the king. In 1631 he was made prebendary of Westminster, to the great mortification of Dean Williams, and had the rich parsonage of Houghton-in-the-spring, Durham, conferred upon him. He was afterwards rector of south Warnborough in Hants, and a justice of peace for that county. In 1642 he was clerk to the convocation, and prosecuted by Williams, Prynne, and others, who forced him to retire to Oxford, where he wrote Mercurius Aulicus. In 1643 he was sequestered by parliament, his valuable library sold, and he forced to fly for fear of sharing the same fate with his patron Laud. Being betrayed at Winchester, he escaped in disguise, and turned farmer at Minster Lovel, Oxfordshire, where he wrote his geography. On the restoration he was reinstated in his former preferments, but never rose higher than sub-dean of this church. He was remarkable for his strength of memory, solid judgment, and great elocution; but being of a fiery temper and undaunted courage, he was equally hated by papists and puritans. He died May 8, 1662, in the 63d year of his age.

ROBERT, Lord CONSTABLE.

The composition of this monument is a beautiful piece of architecture, ornamented with a cherub below, and the family arms and crest on the top. In the front is the following inscription: "near this lies the right hon. Robert Lord Constable, viscount Dunbar, who departed this life November 23, 1714, in the 64th year of his age. Also his second wife, the right hon. Dorothy Brudenel, countess of Westmoreland, who departed this life Jan. 26, 1739, aged 91."

THO. LEVINGSTON, viscount Teviot.

This monument is principally decorated with the arms, supporters, and crest of the above nobleman: on the top are military trophies, alluding to his profession as a soldier. In the front is a long latin inscription, informing us that he was born in Holland, but descended from the Levington's in Scotland; that from his childhood he was trained to arms; that he attended the prince of Orange into Britain, as a colonel of foot; that he rose to the rank of a lieutenant-general in the army, and general of the Scotch forces, was made master of the ordnance and privy-counsellor; that he secured Scotland to the king, by one decisive action on the Spey, for which he was advanced to the dignity of viscount; and that he died January 14, 1710, aged 60.

EDWARD DE CARTERET.

The ornaments of this neat monument are cherubs, with festoons of leaves and fruit finely embossed. The child to whose name it is inscribed was son to Sir Edward de Carteret, gentleman usher to king Charles II. and died October 30, 1677, in the 8th year of his age.

PHILIP CARTERET.

Over the monument is the bust of this noble youth, who was son to lord George Carteret, and died a king's scholar at Westminster, March 19, 1710, aged 19. Here is a most beautiful figure of Time, standing on an altar, and holding a scroll in his hand, whereon is written in saphic verse, lines to the following import, which he is supposed to be repeating:

Why flow the mournful muse's tear,
For thee! cut down in life's full prime?
Why sighs, for thee, the parent dear;
Crop'd by the scythe of hoary Time?

Lo! this my boys the common lot!—
To me thy memory entrust;
When all that's dear shall be forgot,
I'll guard thy venerable dust.

From age to age as I proclaim
Thy learning, piety, and truth;
Thy great example shall enflame,
And emulation raise in youth.

HENRY PRIESTMAN.

On this monument is a fine medallion suspended by a knot of ribbons, fastened to a pyramid of various colour'd marble, with the words Henry Priestman, esquire, round the head. Under which are naval trophies and sea instruments most beautifully sculpted; and on the base is an inscription, shewing that the person to whose memory this monument is erected, was commander in chief of a squadron of ships of war in the reign of king Charles II. a commissioner of the navy, and one of the commissioners for executing the office of lord high-admiral of England, in the reign of king William III. He died August 20, 1712, in the 65th year of his age.

JOHN BAKER, Esq;

This is a rostral column of curiously veined marble, enriched with the prows of galleys, a Medusa's head and other naval and military trophies: under which is the following short epitaph: "To the memory of John Baker, esq; vice-admiral of the white squadron of the British fleet, who, when he commanded in the Mediterranean, died at Port-Mahon, November 10, 1716, aged 56. He was a brave, judicious, and experienced officer; a sincere friend, and a true lover of his country. Manet post Funera Virtus."

GILBERT THORNBOROUGH, Esq;

To the memory of an honest courtier, who was faithful to his God, his prince, and his friends, was this monument erected. He died the 6th of October, 1677, aged 56.

RICHARD MEAD, M. D.

This gentleman was of an ancient family, in the county of Bucks, physician in ordinary to his majesty, fellow of the royal college of physicians; and of the royal society, London; a great promoter of the Foundling Hospital, and well known to the world by his learned writings. He died the 14th of March, 1754, in the 71st year of his age.

ROB. and RICH. CHOLMONDELEY.

On this monument is a latin inscription, signifying, that the second and fourth sons of Robert viscount Cholmondeley lie here interred; Robert was a king's scholar, and died the 14th of February 1678, aged 14; Richard, June 9, 1680.

EDWARD MANSELL.

This monument is inscribed to the above gentleman, who was eldest son of Sir Edward Mansell, of Margan in Glamorganhire, bart. He died June 20, 1681, aged 15.

EDWARD HERBERT, Esq;

On a tablet of white marble, adjoining to a pillar, is a long inscription in English, describing the descent of this gentleman, who is buried in a coffin of lead at the feet of the pillar to which it is fixed. He was lineally descended from Sir George Herbert, of Swansey, in Glamorganhire, first sheriff of that county after the union of the principality of Wales, in 1542. He died September 18, 1715, aged 23.

THO. MANSEL, and W. MORGAN.

This monument is double, being two oval tables between three wreathed pillars, neatly ornamented and inscribed; the first to the memory of Thomas Mansel, eldest son of Buffy Mansel, of Britten Ferry, in Glamorganhire, who died December 13, 1684, aged 38. The other, to William Morgan, of Tredegar, in Monmouthshire, who died Feb. 1, 1683, in the nineteenth year of his age.

Mrs. JANE STOVEVILLE.

This lady is here represented on a pedestal in the ancient dress of her time: she appears, by the inscription, to have been daughter to Thomas Stoveville, of Brinkley, in Cambridgeshire, and wife first to Edward Ellis, of Chetterton, and then to Othowell Hill, doctor of civil laws, and chancellor of the diocese of Lincoln, whose widow she died April 27, 1631, in the 78th year of her age.

Mrs. MARY BEAUFOY,

The principle figure on this monument is represented in a devout posture, with cherubs crowning her: on each side are Cupid's lamenting the only decay of Virgin Beauty. And underneath the arms of her family quarterly upheld by cherubs. On the base is the following inscription: "Reader! whoever thou art, let the sight of this tomb imprint in thy mind, that young and old, without distinction, leave this world; and therefore fail not to secure the next." She was only daughter and heiress to Sir Henry Beaufoy of Guyscliffe near Warwick, by the hon. Charlotte Lane, eldest daughter of George lord viscount Lansborough, and died the 12th of July, 1705.

ROBERT KILLEGREW.

The singularity of this piece of sculpture arises from its being cut out of one stone. The embellishments are distinct and very picturesque; and the inscription modest and soldier like: "Robert Killegrew of Arwenack in Cornwall, Esq; son of Thomas and Charlotte; page of honour to king Charles II. brigadier-general of her majesty's forces, killed in Spain in the battle of Almanza, April 14. 1707, ætatis suæ 47. Militavi annis 24;" that is, he fought for his country 24 years.

Col. JAMES BRINGFIELD.

This gentleman was born at Abingdon in Berks, was equerry to prince George of Denmark, and aid de camp to the great duke of Marlborough: he was killed by a cannon ball as he was remounting his general on a French horse at the battle of Ramilies, May 12, 1706, and was interred at Bareham, in the province of Brabant, in the 57th year of his age. The monument is ornamented with military trophies, cherubs, &c. and surrounded by a mantling enclosing a tablet, on which is written the deceased's military preferences, the manner of his death and burial, and praises of his piety and virtue.

HENEAGE TWISDEN.

The architecture of this monument is plain, but very neat. It was erected to the memory of a young hero, who fell in the battle of Blairgnies in Hainaut, while he was aid de camp to John duke of Argyle, who commanded the right wing of the confederate army. He was seventh son to Sir William Twisden, bart. and a youth of the greatest expectations, had not the fortune of war put an early stop to his rising merit, in the 29th year of his age, 1709. Near this are small monuments to the memory of two of his brothers, Josiah and John; Josiah was a captain at the siege of Agremont, near Lille in Flanders, and killed by a cannon shot in 1708, aged 23. John was a lieutenant in the admiral's ship under Sir Cloudesly Shovel, and perished with him 1707, aged 24.

Over

Over this is a small monument erected to the memory of

WILLIAM LEVINZ, Esq;

It resembles a sarcophagus, and on the front of it is the following inscription: "To the memory of William Levinz, esq; grandson of Sir Creswell Levinz, knt. who was attorney-general in the reign of king Charles II. and afterwards one of the justices of the Common pleas, from which station he was displaced in the reign of king James II. for opposing the dispensing power; and was one of the council for the seven bishops. William Levinz, esq; the son of Sir Creswell, represented the county of Nottingham in parliament, as did his son William Levinz, esq; till the year 1747, when he was appointed a commissioner of his majesty's customs, and in the year 1763, receiver general of the said revenue, in which office he died upon the 17th of August 1765, aged 52 years."

JOHN WOODWARD, M. D.

The figures on this monument are well executed. The head of the deceased (who was professor of physic in Gresham College) in profile is very masterly, and the lady that holds it inimitable. The inscription, which is small, seems to be a panegyric on those great parts and learning that entitled him to the distinction he received. He died in May 1728, aged 63.

MARTHA PRICE.

The enrichments of this monument are fruit, flowers, and foliage; and the inscription says, that she was wife to Gervase Price, esq; who served king Charles II. in the double capacity of serjeant-trumpeter, and gentleman of the bows. She died April 7, 1678, aged 37.

ANNE, countess dowager of Clanrikard.

The carving on this monument is beautiful, and the effigy of the lady resting on a tomb admirably well executed. The inscription is as follows:

"Here lies the right honourable Anne, countess dowager of Clanrickard, eldest daughter of John Smith, esq; who is interred near this place. She married first Hugh Parker, esq; eldest son of Sir Henry Parker of Honnington, in the county of Warwick, baronet; by whom she had the present Sir Henry John Parker, baronet, three other sons and three daughters. By her second husband Michael Clanrikard, of the kingdom of Ireland, the head of the ancient and noble family of the Burkes, she had Smith now earl of Clanrikard, and two daughters, lady Anne, and lady Mary. The above said countess died on the 14th of Jan. 1732, in the 49th year of her age."

JAMES EGERTON.

This monument was erected to the memory of the above gentleman's son by his second wife, Elizabeth, daughter to Henry Murray, esq; one of the gentlemen of the bedchamber to king Charles I. He died April 13, 1687, in the 9th year of his age.

PENELOPE EGERTON.

There is nothing remarkable in this monument more than the inscription, which informs us, that this lady for whom it was erected was daughter to Robert lord Needham, viscount Kilmurry, and wife to Randolph Egerton, of Betley, in Cheshire; an eminent loyalist, major-general of horse to king Charles I. and lieutenant-colonel to king Charles the second's own troop of guards. She died in child-bed April 19, 1670.

Sir GODFREY KNELLER, knt. and bart.

On this monument is a bust of the above gentleman under a canopy of state, the curtains of which are finely gilt and tied up with golden strings; and on each side the bust is a weeping cherub, one resting on a framed picture, the other holding a painter's pallet and pencils. On the pedestal is a latin inscription, shewing, that Sir Godfrey Kneller, knt. who lies interred here, was painter to king Charles II. king James II. and king William III. queen Anne, and king George I. born in 1646, died 1723, aged 77. He was knighted March 3, 1691, and created a baronet, May 24, 1715. Among his most excellent works are the beauties of the court of king Charles II. now to be seen at Hampton-court. This monument was designed by Sir Godfrey himself. Underneath is the following epitaph written by Mr. Pope:

Kneller! by heav'n and not a master taught!
Whose art was nature and whose picture thought;
Now for two ages having snatch'd from fate
Whate'er was beauteous or whate'er was great,
Rests crown'd with princes honours, poets lays,
Due to his merit, and brave thirst of praise.
Living, great nature feared he might outvie
Her works; and dying, fears herself may die.

WILLIAM HORNECK, Esq;

The embellishments of this monument consist in books, plans, and instruments of fortification, alluding to the employment of the deceased. He was chief engineer to the royal train, and, according to the inscription, learned the art of war under the great duke of Marlborough. He died the 23d of April 1746, in the 62d year of his age.

JOHN CONDUIT, Esq;

This monument is little inferior to that of Sir Thomas Hardy, knt. and by the manner of the workmanship, they appear both to have been executed by the same hand. In the middle of the pyramid is a large medallion of brass, resting on a cherub below; and suspended by another at top.

top. Round the medal is a latin inscription, the English of which is thus :

JOHN CONDUIT, MASTER OF THE MINT.

This gentleman succeeded his relation, Sir Isaac Newton, in that office, and desired to be buried near him, as appears by a long latin inscription on the base. He died May 23, 1727, aged 49. Catharine his wife died January 20, 1739, aged 59, and lies interred in the same tomb.

Having now given a description of all the monuments within this antique building, and brought the reader back to the place from whence we first led him, we shall cross the isle, and proceed to give a description of such as are material

In the Cloisters.

At the bottom of the south-walk, on the right hand, lie the remains of four abbots, distinguished in the pavement by four stones.

The first is of black marble, called Long Meg, from its extraordinary length of eleven feet, eight inches, and covers the ashes of Gervasius de Blois, natural son to king Stephen, who died in 1666.

The second is a raised stone of Suffex marble, under which lies interred the abbot Laurentius, who died in 1176, and is said to have been the first who obtained from pope Alexander III. the privilege of using the mitre, ring, and globe.

The third is a stone of grey marble, to the memory of Geslebertus Crispinus, who died in the year 1114. His effigy may be still traced on his grave stone by the fragments of his mitre and pastoral staff.

The fourth is the most ancient of all, and was formerly covered with plates of brass inscribed to the abbot Vitales, who died in 1082. All these seem to have had their names and dates cut afresh, and are indeed fragments worthy preservation.

Directly opposite these against the wall, at the bottom of the east walk, is the following inscription, which for the purity of the diction, and the propriety and elegance of the composition, exceeds every other in the whole arch.

Reader,
If thou art a Briton,
Behold this tomb with reverence and regret ;
Here lieth the remains of
DANIEL PULTENEY,
The kindest relation, the truest friend,
The warmest patriot, the worthiest man ;
He exercised virtue in this age,
Sufficient to have distinguish'd him even in the best.
Sagacious by nature,
Industrious by habit,
Inquisitive with Art ;
He gain'd a compleat knowledge of the state of Britain ;
Foreign and domestic.
In most the backward fruit of tedious experience,
In him the early acquisition of undissipated youth.
He served the court several years :
Abroad, in the auspicious reign of queen Anne,

At home, in the reign of that excellent prince king George I.

He served his country always,

At court independent,

In the senate unbiass'd,

At every age and in every station:

This was the bent of his generous soul,

This the business of his laborious life.

Public men, and public things,

He judged by one constant standard,

The true interest of Britain ;

He made no other distinction of party,

He abhorred all other ;

Gentle, humane, disinterested, beneficent,

He created no enemies on his own account :

Firm, determin'd, inflexible,

He feared none he could create in the cause of Britain.

Reader,

In this misfortune of thy country lament thy own.

For know,

The loss of so much private virtue

Is a public calamity.

Adjoining to the abbey wall, near the east-end of the north walk, is an epitaph inscribed to the memory of the reverend William Laurence. As it is somewhat singular we shall here recite it :

With diligence and trust most exemplary,
Did William Laurence serve a prebendary ;
And for his pains, now past, before not lost,
Gain'd this remembrance at his master's cost.

O ! read these lines again, you seldom find

A servant faithful and his master kind.

Short-hand he wrote, his flower in prime did fade,

And hasty death short-hand of him hath made.

Well couth he numbers, and well measure land,

Thus doth he now that ground whereon we stand,

Wherein he lies so geometrical ;

Art maketh some, but thus will nature all.

Ob. Dec. 28, 1621, Ætat. 29.

In the centre of the east walk, adjoining to the wall, is a monument lately erected to the memory of George Walsh, esq; on which is the following inscription : " near this place are deposited the remains of George Walsh, esq; late lieutenant-general of his majesty's forces, and colonel of the 49th regiment of foot, who died October 23, 1761, aged 73.

" The toils of life and pangs of death are o'er,
" And care and pain and sickness are no more."

There are many other monuments in these walks ; but as they have not any thing particular to distinguish them, and would be tedious to the reader, we shall pass them over ; and, after reciting a singular circumstance, which was omitted in its proper place, shall proceed to the next chapter.

In Henry the VIIth's chapel, on the right hand is a small place enclosed, called the duke of Richmond's chapel, in which are two coffins : the one contains the remains of the envoy of Savoy ; the other those of the ambassador from the court of Spain, both of whom was never interred, owing to their corpse being arrested by their creditors in the time of king James the first.

C H A P.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Farther incorporation of the Taylors. Great fire on London-bridge. Expence of the city charters being confirmed. Henry VIIth's charter against foreigners buying goods to sell. He discharges a number of prisoners for debt. His death. Accession of Henry VIII. to the throne. Execution of Empson and Dudley. Parade of the city watch. King and queen attend to see the procession. Sir William Fitzwilliam disfranchised. Moorfields levelled, and bridges erected. Empannelling city juries. Inclosures destroyed by rioters. Remarkable great frost. Celebration of May-day. Occasion of its being afterwards called Evil-May-day. Great disturbances. Many of the rioters condemned, but only one executed. Citizens address the king. Upwards of four hundred prisoners brought before the king in Westminster-hall. At the instigation of the nobility they are pardoned.

IN the year 1503, the company of Taylors having very considerably increased, purchased a charter of the king, by which they obtained the title of Merchant-Taylors of the city of London.

On the twenty-first of November, the same year, a dreadful fire broke out at the north-end of London-bridge, which made great devastation; and on the seventh of January following, many houses were burnt down in Thames-street.

In the year 1505 the citizens complimented the king with five thousand marks as an acknowledgment for his granting them the confirmation of their liberties. Great care was taken in this act to prevent encroachments being made by foreigners on the franchises and customs of the city. This charter of Henry VII. which is dated the twenty-third of July 1505, contains, among many other particulars, the following:

“ That of all time of which the memory of man is not to the contrary, for the commonwealth of the realm and city aforesaid, it hath been used, and by authority of parliament approved and confirmed, that no stranger, from the liberty of the city, may buy or sell from any stranger from the liberties of the said city, any merchandize or wares within the liberties of the same city, upon forfeiture of the same. The said mayor and commonalty, and citizens, and their predecessors, by all the time aforesaid, have had and received, and have been accustomed to receive, perceive, and have, to the use of the same mayor, commonalty, and citizens, all and all manner of merchandizes and wares bought and sold within the liberties of the same city as aforesaid, and forfeitures of the same merchandizes and wares, until of late past time they were troubled or molested: the same lord Henry the VIIth, by his letters patent as aforesaid, for pacifying and taking away from henceforth controversies and ambiguities in that behalf, and to fortify, and by express words to explain and declare the liberty and custom aforesaid to them the said mayor and commonalty, and citizens, and their heirs and successors, and willing the said liberties to be peaceably and quietly had, possessed

“ and enjoyed to the said mayor and commonalty, and citizens, and their successors, with the forfeitures aforesaid, against the said late king Henry, his heirs and successors, granted, and by his said charter confirmed to the said mayor, and commonalty, and citizens, and their successors, that no stranger from the liberties of the same city may buy or sell from any other stranger to the liberty of the same city any merchandizes or wares within the liberty of the said city: and if any stranger to the liberty of the same city, shall sell or buy any merchandizes or wares within the liberty of the same city of any other stranger to the liberty of the same city, that the same mayor, commonalty, and citizens, and their successors, may have, hold, and receive, all and all manner of such like merchandizes and wares so bought, and to be bought, sold, or to be sold, within the liberty of the said city, between whatsoever strangers to the liberty of the same city, as forfeited; and all the forfeitures of the same, and also the penalties, fines, and redemptions whatsoever any ways forfeited, lost, or to be lost, or to be forfeited, or due thereon, to the use and profit of the same mayor and commonalty, and citizens, their heirs and successors, without any hindrance of the same late king, his heirs and successors, any statute, act, or ordinance, of us or our progenitors, made to the contrary notwithstanding; although the same mayor and commonalty, and citizens of the said city, or their predecessors, have before that time used, abused, or not used those customs and liberties: saving always, that great men, lords and nobles, and other English and strangers, of what condition soever they be, may freely whatsoever merchandize engross for their families and proper uses within the liberties of the said city, without any forfeitures, loss, or hindrance whatsoever, so that they do not sell again the said merchandizes to any other. And further, the said late king, of his more ample grace, by his said letters patent, among other things, did give and grant to the mayor, commonalty, and citizens of the same city of London, and their successors, the office of gauger within the said

“ said city, and the disposing, ordering, surveying, and correction of the same; to have, hold, exercise, and occupy the said office and other premises, with all fees, profits, and emoluments to the same office in any manner belonging or appertaining to the same mayor and commonalty, and citizens by themselves, or by their sufficient deputy or deputies, from the twenty-second day of August, in the first year of his reign, for ever, without any account to be made thereof, or any thing rendering and paying to the said lord Henry the VIIth, his heirs or successors, as by the said letters patents more plainly may appear.”

In the year 1507, the king, having a remorse of conscience for the many exactions he had laid on the citizens, endeavoured to mitigate it by acts of benevolence. He discharged all the prisoners in London whose debts did not amount to more than forty shillings; endowed many religious foundations, and gave very considerable alms. Notwithstanding which, he still countenanced the extortions of Empson and Dudley, two evil counsellors, who, under pretence of abuses committed two years before, ordered Thomas Knesworth the mayor, and Roger Grove and Richard Shoare, his sheriffs, to be taken to the marshalsea prison, and there detained till they should advance the sum of fourteen hundred pounds. Had not the death of the king intervened, the like fate would have befallen Sir Lawrence Aylemer and Sir William Capel, both of whom were fined two thousand pounds. The king dying soon after, they were discharged from their confinement, and all arbitrary measures subsided.

King Henry VIII. succeeded his father, and was proclaimed king with the usual solemnities, on the twenty-first of April, 1509. Two days after which he caused all foreign beggars to be banished the city, and dispersed to their respective parishes.

The king and queen, on the twentieth of June following, rode in great pomp from the Tower to Westminster, and were most joyfully received by the Londoners. The city was adorned with rich silks and tapestry, and part of Cornhill, and Goldsmith's-row, in Cheapside, with gold brocades. The Lord-mayor, aldermen, and sheriffs, with the city companies, attended the procession, and the whole was conducted with such elegance as gave the highest satisfaction to the spectators.

The king, anxious to preserve the affection of the citizens, committed Empson and Dudley (his father's commissioners employed by him to raise money on penal laws) to the Tower; after which they were attainted by parliament, and beheaded on Tower-hill the eighteenth of August 1510. Many of their agents were exposed on the pillory, and compelled to ride through the streets with labels in their hats, and their faces to the horse's tail, as a mark of that contempt their infamy deserved.

Henry, disguised in the habit of a yeoman of the guard, went into the city on the eve of St. John to see the grand cavalcade of the city watch. He was so highly pleased with the sight, that he returned on St. Peter's eve, with his royal consort, attended by the principal nobility, and stood in Cheapside, where they saw the stately march. This ceremony was performed twice every year, viz. on the eve of St. John Baptist, and the feast of St. Peter and Paul. The manner of conducting this nocturnal parade was as follows: the city music followed by the Lord-mayor's officers in party-coloured liveries: the sword bearer on horseback, in beautiful armour, before the Lord-mayor, mounted on a stately horse richly decorated, attended by a giant and two pages, on horseback, three pageants, morrice-dancers and footmen: after these came the sheriffs, followed by their officers in proper liveries, and attended by their giants, pages, &c. then a considerable body of demi-lancers in bright armour, on stately horses; these were followed by a great number of carabineers in fustian coats, with the city arms on their backs and breasts; then marched a division of archers, with their bows bent, and by their side shafts of arrows; after these a great number of halberdeers, preceded by a party of pikemen, crosslets and helmets; and the rear was brought up by a party of billmen with aprons and helmets of mail: the whole body consisted of about two thousand men, in different divisions, in each of which were properly fixed musicians, drums, standards, and ensigns. The march began at the conduit the west-end of Cheapside, and passed through Cheapside, the Poultry, Cornhill, and Leadenhall-street, to Aldgate; from whence it returned through Fenchurch-street, Gracechurch-street, Cornhill, and so back to the conduit again. The procession was illuminated by nine hundred and forty large lanterns fixed at the ends of poles, and carried on mens shoulders; two hundred of which were provided at the expence of the city; five hundred at that of the companies, and two hundred and forty by the city constables; exclusive of these a great number of lamps were hung against the houses on each side the way, decorated with flowers and greens made into garlands. The whole formed a very pleasing sight, and gave the highest satisfaction to the royal pair.

This year Sir William Fitzwilliam, alderman of Breadstreet-ward, was disfranchised for refusing to serve the office of sheriff, and retired to Milton in Northamptonshire. After which, being greatly esteemed by the king, he made him knight of the garter, lord-keeper of the privy-seal, and chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, which places he enjoyed till his death.

In the year 1511 a scarcity of corn being apprehended, the Lord-mayor, Roger Achiley, caused Leadenhall (the city granary) to be plentifully stored with grain of all sorts. In the same year he likewise levelled Moorfields, which extended from London-wall to Hoxton, and caused bridges and causeways to be erected for the greater convenience of passengers.

In the year 1512 a great fire broke out in the Tower, which consumed the chapel in that part of it called the White-Tower.

This year an act of parliament passed by which the sheriffs of London and Middlesex were empowered powered to empanel juries for the city courts, and each juror so empanelled, to be a citizen worth one hundred marks; and for non-appearance on his first summons to forfeit one shilling and eightpence, for the second, three shillings and fourpence, and for every default afterwards double the sum. A great mortality raged at this time, which took off a considerable number of the citizens, but whether pestilential or not is uncertain.

In the year 1514, the inhabitants about Islington, Hoxton, and Shoreditch debarred the citizens from their accustomed exercises in those fields, by enclosing their grounds. They were so enraged at this treatment, that, at the instigation of a fellow who ran about the streets, crying spades and shovels, they assembled together in a large body, and with those tools destroyed all the fences that had been so lately made. Commissioners were sent into the city by his majesty to know the cause of the tumult; and being met in Grey-friars, now called Christ's-Hospital, the lord-mayor and aldermen were ordered to attend to give an account of such sedition: they were severely reprimanded, and strictly enjoined to prevent all farther mischief for the future, and preserve the peace of the city.

In the year 1515 there was so great a frost, that carriages of all sorts passed on the ice between Lambeth and Westminster.

The citizens preserved an ancient custom of celebrating May-day, by diverting themselves in the neighbouring woods and fields. This amusement became so universal, that the king and queen, on May-day in the morning, attended by many lords and ladies rode a maying from Greenwich to the top of Shooter's hill. Their majesties were met by a number of tall yeomen clad in green, with green hoods and bows and arrows. Robin Hood, who was their captain; addressed the king to stop and see his men shoot, which they performed at a whistle with the greatest dexterity: the arrows were so contrived, that when shot off, they also whistled, making a strange and loud noise. After this the king and queen with their retinue, were conducted by Robin into the green wood, where, in harbours made with boughs, and decorated with flowers, they were plentifully entertained with wine and venison.

On May-day in the year 1517, an accident happened, which occasioned it to be afterwards called Evil-may-day. It arose from the artificers thinking themselves aggrieved by permitting strangers to exercise their trades in London. In consequence of which they prevailed on one Dr. Bell, or Bele, to support their cause in the pulpit, at the Spital, on Tuesday in Easter week. He complied with their request; and, after reading a bill of complaint given him by one John Lincoln, representing the grievances of the merchants and artificers, he took for his text the following words: "The heavens to the lord of heaven; but the earth is given to the children of men." On this text he endeavoured to shew, that to Englishmen was this land given, and that, as birds defend their nest, so ought Englishmen to cherish and maintain themselves, and for the good of the commonwealth to hunt and drive out aliens. He affirmed, from another text,

"Fight for your country," that by the laws of God they were justified, and therefore it was their duty to clear the city of strangers. This sermon had such an effect on many weak minds, that they assaulted foreigners as they passed along the streets: for which offence, on the twenty-eighth of April, Stephen Studley, Stephen Betts, and some others, who were principals, were committed by the Lord-mayor to prison. Soon after which a report was spread, that the citizens intended, on May-day following, to destroy all strangers that should be found in the city, or its liberties.

The king's council hearing of this rumour, cardinal Wolsey sent for the mayor, and advised him to be on his guard, and prevent the like disturbances for the future. To effect which he summoned the aldermen, about four o'clock in the afternoon preceding May-day, to meet him at Guildhall immediately. The assembly being met, they, with the approbation of the cardinal, came to the following resolution: that every man should be commanded to shut up his doors, and keep his servants within. In consequence of which, an order was made and published by the alderman of each respective ward, that no man after nine o'clock should stir out of his house, but keep his doors shut, and his servants within till nine o'clock in the morning.

Before this order was properly dispersed, it unluckily happened, that Sir John Mundy, in his way home, was rudely treated by two young men playing at bucklers in Cheap, one of whom he ordered to be sent to the Compter. Many prentices who were by, rescued the young man from the alderman, crying out, "Prentices! Prentices! Clubs! Clubs!" on which so great a body assembled with clubs and other weapons, that the alderman was put to flight. These were increased by a number of servingmen, watermen, and others; and by eleven o'clock at night there assembled in the Cheap about seven hundred, and in St. Paul's church-yard three hundred. They proceeded in a body to the Compter, which they broke open, and released the rioters who had been committed there by the mayor for assaulting foreigners; after which they went to Newgate, and took out Studley and Betts committed for the like offence. A proclamation was issued by the mayor and sheriffs, in the king's name, but without effect. The mob increasing, they threw sticks and stones at many strangers as they passed, particularly one Nicholas Dennis, a serjeant at arms, who, being much wounded, cried out, "Down with them." This heightening their resentment, they broke the windows and doors of the houses in St. Martin's-le-grand, and plundered the house of one Mewtas, a Frenchman, in Leadenhall-street, whom they intended, had they met with him, to have destroyed. Early in the morning they dispersed, from an apprehension of being overpowered by the forces preparing to march into the city, under the command of the earls of Shrewsbury and Surry. In this time, by the diligence of the mayor, three hundred of them were taken, and committed to the Tower, Newgate, and the Compters; and about five o'clock in the morning the riot subsided. Among those those committed to the Tower was Dr. Bell, for preaching his seditious sermon. A commission of oyer and terminer was immediately made out for the trials of the offenders, on the second of May at Guildhall. On their arraignment they pleaded not guilty, and their trials were postponed till the fourth of May. The commissioners appointed for this purpose were the Lord-mayor, earl of Surry, and the duke of Norfolk, who came into the city escorted by thirteen hundred men; and the prisoners to the amount of two hundred and seventy-eight, some men, some lads not exceeding fourteen years of age, were brought through the city tied with ropes. On the first day John Lincolne, and several others were indicted and found guilty; and the next day thirteen were condemned to be drawn, hanged and quartered. For this purpose, and to strike a greater terror, ten pair of gallows were set up at the following places: Aldgate, Blanchapelon, Grass-street, Leadenhall, opposite each Compter, Newgate, St. Martin's, Aldersgate, and Bishopsgate. They were made to run on wheels for the better convenience of removing them to such places as might be properly adapted for the execution of so many rioters. Some little time after sentence was passed, Lincolne, Sherwin, and the two brothers named Betts, were drawn upon hurdles to the standard in Cheapside. The first was executed; but as the others were near being turned off, a reprieve came from the king, to the universal joy of the populace, who unanimously cried out, God save the king.

On the eleventh of May, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and recorder, dressed in mourning gowns, waited on the king, who then resided at Greenwich; and being admitted to the door of the privy-chamber, from whence his majesty came, attended by several of his nobles, the recorder, in the name of the rest, falling on his knees, addressed the king in the following words:

"Most natural, benign, and our sovereign lord, we well know that your grace is highly displeased with us of your city of London, for the great riot done and committed there; wherefore we assure your grace, that none of us, nor no honest person were condescending

"to that enmity: yet we, our wives and children, every hour lament that your favour should be taken from us: and forasmuch as light and idle persons were the doers of the same, we most humbly beseech your grace to have mercy on us for our negligence, and compassion on the offenders for their offences and trespasses."

The king, in his answer, accused them of negligence in opposing the rioters, and conniving at their proceedings; therefore, said he, "We will neither grant you our favour nor good will, nor to the offenders mercy: but resort to our lord chancellor, and he shall declare to you our pleasure."

The king being expected at Westminster on the twenty-second of May, they, by the direction of the chancellor, resolved to wait upon him. Accordingly on that day the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and principal commoners attended in their liveries, when his majesty, being seated under a canopy of state at the upper end of the hall, ordered the prisoners to be brought before him. They were accordingly brought in their shirts, bound together with ropes and halters about their necks, to the number of four hundred men and eleven women; which sight had such an effect on the principal part of the nobility, that they warmly solicited the king for their pardon. Silence being proclaimed, and the city magistrates and commonalty ordered into the king's presence, the cardinal chancellor reprimanded them for their negligence; and then, addressing himself to the prisoners, said, that for their offences against the laws of the realm, and against his majesty's crown and dignity, they had incurred the punishment of death. On the close of these words, the people, with piteous lamentation, cried out, "mercy, gracious Lord, mercy." This wrought so effectually on the king, that he yielded to the intreaties of his courtiers, and pronounced them pardon. Their halters were immediately taken off, and the people with one voice cried out, "God save the king." These rioters were called the Black-waggon, and the day on which the riot first began was from that time called Evil-May-Day.

CHAPTER XXIX.

Institution of the court of conscience. Sessions of peace removed to Guildhall. College of Physicians incorporated. Great plague. Reception of the emperor Charles V. and the king and queen of Denmark. Arbitrary tax imposed by Cardinal Wolsey. Great famine. Return of the sweating sickness. One Richard Rose boiled in Smithfield for murder. Grand entertainments at Ely-house. New testament translated. Afterwards burnt. Henry VIII. divorced. His marriage with Anne Boleyn. Procession of the queen to Westminster. Her coronation.

IN the year 1517-18 an act was passed by the common-council of London for erecting a court of conscience, in which it was enacted, that the Lord mayor and aldermen, for the time being, should monthly assign and appoint two aldermen and four discreet commoners to "sit at Guildhall in a judicial manner, twice a week, viz. on Wednesdays and Saturdays, there to hear and determine all matters brought before them between party and party, being citizens and freemen of London, in all cases, where the due debt or damage did not exceed

"forty

"forty shillings." It was intended to continue only two years; but the utility of it being very evident, it remained in force till the reign of James I. when it was finally established by act of parliament.

At this time the sweating sickness raged again violently in London, which took off a great number of the citizens.

The citizens of London finding great inconveniencies from their sessions of peace being held in the monastery of St. Martin's-le-Grand, a foreign liberty, petitioned Henry VIII to repeal that part of Edward the third's charter; to which his majesty graciously condescending, granted them the following charter:

"Henry, by the grace of God, king of England and France, and lord of Ireland, to all to whom these presents shall come, greeting.

"Whereas Edward the third, sometime king of England our progenitor, by his letters patents, amongst other things, has granted to the citizens of the city of London, that all inquisitions from hence, to be taken by the justices, and other the ministers of the men of the said city, should be taken at Great St. Martin's in London, and not elsewhere, except inquisitions to be taken in circuits in the Tower of London, and for the goal delivery of Newgate.

"Know ye, that we, for some urgent causes reasonable us moving, at the petition of the mayor and commonalty aforesaid, and of the citizens of the same city, have, of our special grace, and from our certain knowledge and mere motion, granted, and by these presents do, for us and our heirs (as much as in us is) grant to the said mayor and commonalty, and unto their successors, and unto the same citizens of the same city, that all inquisitions by the justices or other our ministers, or of our heirs, to be from henceforth taken of the men of our city aforesaid, shall be taken at the Guildhall, within the city aforesaid, or at any other place within the same city, where it shall from time to time be thought to our justices for the time being, before whom those inquisitions ought hereafter to be taken, most expedient and most convenient, and not elsewhere, except inquisitions to be taken at the circuits of the Tower of London, and for the goal delivery of Newgate. In witness whereof we have caused these our letters to be made patents. Witness myself at Westminster, the sixteenth day of June, in the tenth year of our reign."

On the twenty-third of September 1519, king Henry VIII. granted the physicians a charter of incorporation to enable them to frame proper regulations for practitioners. By this charter they were allowed a common seal, and to chuse a president annually; to purchase lands and tenements, and to make laws for the government and correction of their college, and of all those who practised physic within seven miles of London; to choose four persons annually to inspect and govern the whole body, and those who offended by neglect in their medicines or receipts to be punished by fines and imprisonment: and that the president and all the members of the college should be exempted from serving on juries.

In the year 1521 an infectious distemper raged in London, which took off a considerable number of its inhabitants; and corn was so scarce, that wheat sold for twenty shillings the quarter, which at that time was a great price.

In the year 1522 the emperor Charles V. came into England on a visit to king Henry, who with his queen, and principal nobles, received him at Greenwich, and conducted him from the palace there to London, which on this occasion was decorated with the most pompous ornaments, and a variety of magnificent pageants. On their entrance into the city the Lord-mayor, aldermen and sheriffs received them in their formalities, attended by the principal citizens on horseback richly accoutred: they were conducted through the city to Black Friars, which was the place adopted for the residence of the emperor, and the princes and nobility of his retinue to theirs in the new palace at Bridewell.

In the following year Henry received a visit from Christian king of Denmark and his queen. On their arrival they were received by the mayor and citizens, who conducted them with great splendor to the bishop of Bath's palace, which was appointed for their residence. St. Peter's Eve happening at the time of their stay in London, their majesties, attended by the principal nobility went to see the pompous march of the city watch; for which purpose they were conducted to the king's head in Cheapside, and afterwards elegantly entertained by Sir Thomas Baldry, the mayor.

The king at this time being in great want of money, cardinal Wolsey, his prime minister, issued out commissions in his majesty's name for levying the sixth part of all the goods and chattels of the laity, and a fourth of those of the clergy. The people were so incensed at this arbitrary proceeding, as to be almost ripe for an open rebellion; which coming to the king's ears he was so much affected that he openly disavowed the cardinal's irregularities, and sent a letter to the mayor and citizens of London, in which he declared that he would not exact or demand any thing of them by compulsion, but by way of benevolence. In consequence of this the cardinal sent for the mayor, and aldermen, and expostulated with them on his majesty's gracious condescension in remitting the payments of a sixth of all their effects; and instead thereof had only appointed them to pay a certain benevolence; he therefore desired them to return and make proper assessments in their respective wards for raising the same. The recorder replied, that such benevolences had been abolished by the first of Richard III. To which the cardinal answered, "that Richard was an usurper and tyrant, a murderer, and one of the greatest criminals: that he had no power to make a law; and that no act made by such a wretch could be binding; therefore the city's argument was trifling and of none effect." Wolsey then tried what he could do with the magistrates separately: to effect which he began with the Lord-mayor, who honestly told him he could give no answer to such a question without the consultation of the common-council. He then desired the mayor and aldermen, in their private capacities, to contribute what they thought proper. The magistrates, however, remained inflexible, but submitted so far as to communicate his request to the common-council, who so strongly resented it, that the court moved for expelling three of their members for speaking in favour of so great an imposition, and broke up without coming to any resolution. Thus, by the vigilance of the city of London against the iniquitous schemes of ministerial power, was the oppressive method proposed by cardinal Wolley to raise money without consent of parliament, entirely brought to nought.

At this time the plague raged so violently in London, that his majesty removed to Eltham; the term was postponed, and the city so much deserted by its inhabitants, that the festival of Christ's nativity was that year called the still Christmas.

In the year 1526 the citizens finding themselves greatly hurt by foreigners who had purchased licences for the importation of woad, applied to the mayor and common council, who enacted, that for the future no citizen should presume to buy, sell, or have any intercourse with foreign importers of woad.

The following year a most dreadful famine happened in the city, owing to the scarcity of corn, by which many citizens perished. But by an immediate supply from his majesty of one thousand quarters of corn, and the great importation of wheat and rye from Dantzick, they were sooner relieved from their distress than any other part of the kingdom.

This year a public entry was made by two French ambassadors extraordinary, into this city. Apartments were provided for them and their attendants in the bishop of London's palace; at which place they were presented by the mayor, in the name of the citizens, with five fat oxen, twenty sheep, twelve swans, twelve cranes, twelve pheasants, four dozen of partridges, twenty sugar loaves, all sorts of spices, and eight hogsheds of wine.

On the first of June an act of common-council was passed, whereby it was agreed, ordained and enacted, "that if hereafter any freeman or free-woman of this city take an apprentice, and within the term of seven years suffer the same apprentice to go at his large liberty and pleasure; and within and after the said term agree with his said apprentice for a certain sum of money, or otherwise, for his said service, and within, or after the end of the said term, the said freeman present the said apprentice to the chamberlain of the city, and by good deliberation, and upon his oath made to the same city, the same freeman or freewoman assureth and affirmeth to the said chamberlain, that the said apprentice hath fully served his said term as apprentice: or if any freeman or freewoman of this city take any apprentice, which, at the time of the said taking, hath any wife: or if any freeman or freewoman of this city give any wages to his or her apprentice, or suffer the said apprentices to take any part of their own getting or gains: or if any freeman or free-woman of this city hereafter colour any foreign goods, or from henceforth buy or sell for any person or persons, or with or to any person or persons, being foreign or foreigners, cloths, silks, wine, oils, or any other goods or merchandize, whatsoever they be, whether he take any thing or things for his or their wages or labour, or not: if any person or persons, being free of this city, by any colour or deceitful means, from henceforth do buy, sell, or receive of any apprentice within this city any money, goods, merchandize, or wares, without the assent or licence of his master or mistress: and, upon examination, duly proved before the chamberlain of the said city for the time being, and the same reported, by the mouth of the said chamberlain, at a court to be holden by the mayor and aldermen of the said city in their council chamber: that as well the said master, as the said apprentice, shall for ever more be disfranchised."

To which act the following instructions were added.

"Ye shall constantly and devoutly on your knees, every day, serve God, morning and evening, and make conscience in the due hearing of the word preached, and endeavour the right practice thereof in your life and conversation. You shall do diligent and faithful service to your master for the time of your apprenticeship, and deal truly in what you shall be trusted. You shall often read over the covenants of your indenture, and see and endeavour yourself to perform the same to the utmost of your power. You shall avoid all evil company, and all occasions which may tend to draw you to the same; and make speedy return, when you shall be sent of your master's or mistress's business. You shall be of fair, gentle, and lowly speech and behaviour towards all men; especially to all your governors. And according to your carriage expect your reward, for good or ill, from God and your friends."

In the year 1528 the sweating sickness broke out again in this city so violent, that a great number of people died within six hours after its first appearance. This occasioned the adjournment of the term, and the suspension of the annual solemnity of the city watch, which was afterwards, by order of the king, discontinued till the second of Edward VI.

The following year a court of justice was erected in Black Friars for trying the legality of the king's marriage with his royal consort queen Catharine. In which sat, as judges, the legates Campejus and cardinal Wolsey; the latter of whom was deprived of the chancellorship in October the same year.

From the proceedings of this court was the first advance made in England toward the work of reformation. The king took such disgust at the

the pope, that he issued out an edict prohibiting all commercial intercourse with the see of Rome.

This year Whitehall was fixed as the chief residence of the English monarchs, and continued so till they were burnt out in 1697. Before this it was called York-place. It was originally built by Hubert de Burgh, earl of Kent, who dying in 1243, left it to the Black Friars in Chancery-lane, Holborn; after which it was purchased by Walter de Gray, archbishop of York; he bequeathed it to his successors in that see as their city mansion for ever. In consequence of which Cardinal Wolsey became possessed of it, and with the approbation of the chapter of York, made a feoffment thereof to the king, from which it was called the king's manor of Westminster.

In the year 1531 Richard Rose, cook to the bishop of Rochester, was boiled to death in Smithfield for poisoning sixteen people with porridge: it was intended for his master, who luckily escaped it, owing to a want of appetite.

A grand entertainment was this year made at Ely-house by eleven gentlemen of the law, on their promotion to the dignity of the coif: it continued five days, and the guests were, the king, queen, foreign ministers, lord mayor, judges, master of the rolls, masters in chancery, aldermen, serjeants at law, principal merchants, and the livery. To shew the disparity between that time and this, respecting the price of provisions, we shall insert the following, which is part of the bill of fare.

	l.	s.	d.
Twenty-four large oxen, each at	1	6	8
The carcase of a large ox	1	4	0
One hundred sheep, each at	0	2	10
Fifty-one calves, each at	0	4	8
Thirty-four hogs, each at	0	3	8
Ninety-one pigs, each at	0	0	6
Ten dozen capons of Greece, each dozen at	0	1	8
Nine dozen and a half of Kentish capons, each at	0	1	0
Nineteen dozen of common capons, each at	0	0	6
Seven dozen and nine of grose or heath cocks, each at	0	0	8
Fourteen dozen and eight common cocks, each at	0	0	3
The best pullets, each at	0	0	2½
Common ditto, each at	0	0	2
Thirty-seven doz. of pigeons, each dozen at	0	0	10
Three hundred and forty dozen of larks, each dozen at	0	0	5

At this time the people became very zealous for the work of reformation; and indeed it was highly encouraged at court, though not without considerable opposition from the clergy. A translation of the New Testament was now published by Tindall and others; but the bishop of London obtained as many copies of them as he could and caused them to be burnt at St. Paul's Cross. The bishop soon after this attempting to ask contribution from his parochial clergy towards paying 100,000l which had been granted to the king, the city clergy resented it so much, that they forced themselves into the chapter-house of St. Paul's, where they beat and abused the bishop's servants. This intimidated the bishop so much, that he forgave them, and desired them to part peaceably. After this he applied to the lord chancellor for redress; and by his order fifteen priests, with their accomplices, were seized by the Lord-mayor, and committed to prison, where they continued for a considerable time.

The king was so highly pleased with the citizens of London in concurring with his measures to throw off the Romish yoke, that, as a testimony of his regard and affection, he confirmed to them many former grants by the following charter:

" Henry the eighth, by the grace of God, king of England and France, defender of the faith, and lord of Ireland, to all to whom these presents shall come, greeting.

" Whereas we, by our letters patents, the date whereof is the eighteenth day of June, in the thirteenth year of our reign, have of our special grace, and from our certain knowledge and mere motion, given and granted, for us and our heirs, for as much as in us then was, to Sir William Sidney, knt. the office of the keeper of the great beam and common balance or weight within our city of London, for weighing of all merchandizes of avoirdupoise, and also all weights whatsoever within the same city, which office one William Stafford, deceased, lately exercised and occupied, by what name soever the said office was named or known. And have ordained, made, and constituted the said Sir William Sidney keeper of the great beam, balance, and weight, and of all other weights whatsoever; and also the weights of all spices, wares, commodities, merchandizes, and things in the city aforesaid, there to be weighed and accustomed, and used to be bought and sold by weight. And have granted also, by our said letters patents, to the said Sir William Sidney, authority and power to make, name and assign, from time to time, all manner of clerks, porters, servants, and ministers of the great beam and balance, and of the iron beam, and of the beam of the stilliard, and of the weights aforesaid; and also all other clerks, porters, servants, and ministers to the same office belonging; and also to remove the same or any of them, and other or others to make, put, or constitute in his or their place, as often as to him shall seem expedient, to have, occupy, and exercise the office and offices aforesaid, together with the authority aforesaid to the said Sir William Sidney by himself, or by his deputy or deputies, during our pleasure, to his proper use and behoof, with all and singular commodities, houses, advantages, profits, fees and emoluments to the said office, in our time, or in the times of any of our progenitors, kings of England, due and accustomed, pertaining or belonging, in as ample manner and form as any person having or occupying such office before this time had, received, and enjoyed the same; and hath given and granted

" the

“ the same commodities, houses, advantages,
 “ profits, fees and emoluments, and all and sin“ gular the premises for the exercise and occupa“ tion of the office aforesaid, to the said Sir Wil“ liam during our pleasure, to the use and be“ hoof of the said Sir William, without account,
 “ or any other thing, to us or our heirs in this “ behalf, for the premises to be made, given,
 “ or paid: although expresse mention be not “ made of the true yearly value, or of any cer“ tainty of the premises, or any grant or grants
 “ by us, or any of our progenitors, to the said “ William before this time made, contained in “ the said letters patents above specified, or any “ statute, act, ordinance, restraint, or provision,
 “ before this time made or provided to the con“ trary; or any other thing, cause, or matter “ whatsoever in any thing notwithstanding, as
 “ by the same our letters patents fully appeareth;
 “ which our pleasure in that behalf we will by “ these shall be determined: and which letters
 “ patents the same Sir William Sidney hath sur“ rendered into our chancery to be cancelled, to
 “ the intent we would vouchsafe to grant our “ letters patents to the mayor, commonalty, and “ citizens of our city of London.

“ And because now of late we understand of
 “ the grievous complaint of our well beloved the “ mayor, commonalty, and citizens of our said
 “ city of London, that the said lord Edward,
 “ sometime king of England, the second, our pro“ genitor, by his charter dated the eighteenth of “ June, in the twelfth year of his reign, amongst “ other things, granted to the then citizens
 “ of our said city, predecessors to the now mayor, “ commonalty, and citizens aforesaid, that the “ weights and beams for the weighing of mer-“ chandizes between merchants and merchants,
 “ of which the profits growing, and knowledge “ of the same, pertain to the commonalty of the “ said city, should remain to be kept, at the will “ of the commonalty, in the custody of two suf“ ficient men of the same city, expert in that of“ fice, to be thereunto chosen by the commonal“ ty of the said city. And they should in no wise “ be committed to any others than to such as “ should be so chosen; as by the same his letters
 “ patents, which we have seen, more fully ap-“ peareth. And because also the lord Henry, “ sometime king of England, the fourth, our “ progenitor, by his letters patents, dated the “ twenty-fifth of May, in the first year of his “ reign, of his favourable grace, amongst other “ things, granted to the said citizens of the said “ city, tronage, that is to say, the weighing of “ lead, wax, pepper, allom, madder, and all
 “ other such wares within the said city for ever;
 “ which letters patents, we, of our especial grace,
 “ by our charter dated the twelfth day of July,
 “ in the first year of our reign, ratified and con“ firmed to the same then citizens, and to their “ successors, as by the same letters patents more “ fully appeareth; by which letters patents, and
 “ by the continual keeping of the office of beam,
 “ balance, weights, and of other the premises,
 “ time out of mind, by the said citizens and
 “ their predecessors, and by the exercise and oc“ cupation of the same within the said city, with-

“ out any challenging, it is manifest, and with“ out any difficulty evident and apparent unto us,
 “ that the said office of the great beam and com“ mon balance, ordained for weighing between “ merchants and merchants, and the office of “ keeping the great balance or weight within “ our city of London, for the weighing of all “ merchandizes of avoirdupoise, and also of all “ weights whatsoever within the said city, and “ also of all spices, wares, merchandizes, and “ things in the city aforesaid to be weighed; and “ also the authority and power to name and assign
 “ all and all manner of clerks, porters, servants,
 “ and ministers of the said great beam and ba“ lance, and of the iron beam; and of the beam
 “ of the stillyard, and also all other clerks, por“ ters, servants, and ministers of the said office “ pertaining, and the issues and revenues there-
 “ of coming, and all and singular the premises “ pertaining, and of ancient right belonging to “ the mayor, commonalty and citizens, we will
 “ in no wise be wronged.

“ And to the end that all ambiguity in such “ cases might be taken away, and that the said “ mayor and commonalty, and citizens, and “ their successors, may not in time to come be “ impeached, impleaded, or grieved by us, or
 “ our heirs and successors, or any of our justices
 “ or ministers, of or for the premises, or any “ of them, we will and grant to the now mayor,
 “ commonalty, and citizens, and to their suc“ cessors, that the weights and beams for weigh“ ing of merchandizes between merchant and “ merchant, whereof the profits growing, and “ the knowledge of them to the commonalty of
 “ the city aforesaid, shall remain at the will of “ the commonalty of the same city, to be kept
 “ in custody of good sufficient men of the same “ city, expert in that office, and to be thereunto “ chosen by the commonalty aforesaid; and that
 “ to others then so to be chosen, to be in no wise
 “ they be committed; and that they shall have “ tronage; that is to say, the weighing of wax, “ lead, pepper, allom, madder, and all other
 “ such like wares, within the said city for ever.
 “ Willing also to do the said mayor and common“ alty a more ample pleasure in this behalf, we “ have of our favourable grace, and from our “ certain knowledge and mere motion, given
 “ and granted, and by these presents do give and “ grant, to the same mayor and commonalty,
 “ and citizens of the city of London, the afore“ said office of keeper of the great beam and “ common-balance, ordained for weighing be“ tween merchant and merchant; and also the “ office of the great beam and weights within the “ said city, for the weighing of merchandizes of “ avoirdupoise, and also all weights whatsoever
 “ within our said city, and of all spices, wares, “ merchandizes, and all things in our said city
 “ there to be weighed, by whatsoever name the “ said office is named or known; and do by these “ presents make, ordain, and constitute the same “ mayor, commonalty, and citizens, and their “ successors, keepers of the great-beam, balance,
 “ and weights aforesaid, and other weights what“ soever; and also the weighing of all spices, “ wares, merchandizes, and things in the city “ aforesaid

"aforesaid there to be weighed, and accustomed to be bought and sold by weight within our said city : and also we do give and grant, to the mayor, commonalty, and citizens of our city aforesaid, authority and power to make, name and assign, from time to time, all, and all manner of clerks, porters, servants, and ministers of the great beam and balance, and of the iron beam, and of the beam of the stillyard, and weights aforesaid ; and also all other clerks, servants, and ministers to the said office pertaining : and also to remove them, or any of them, and to make, constitute, or place other in his or their place, as often as to them shall seem expedient ; to have, occupy, and exercise the office aforesaid, together with the authority and power aforesaid, to the said mayor, and commonalty, and citizens, and their successors, by themselves, their deputy or deputies, for ever, to their own proper use and behoof, together with all and singular commodities, houses, advantages, profits, wages, fees, and emoluments, in our time, or in the times of any of our progenitors, kings of England, due and accustomed, pertaining or belonging to the said office, in as ample manner and form, as the same citizens and their predecessors, or any other person or persons, having or occupying the said office before this time, had and received, or enjoyed the same : and also we give and grant, by these presents, to the said mayor, commonalty, and citizens, and to their successors, the commodities, houses, advantages, profits, fees, and emoluments, and all and singular the premises for the exercise and occupation of the said office, to the proper use and behoof of the said mayor, commonalty, and citizens, and their successors, without account, or any other thing, to us or our heirs to be delivered, made, given, or paid, in this behalf, for the premises, or any of them, in these letters patents specified or contained ; although express mention be not in these presents made of the true value or certainty of the premises, or of their gifts or grants by us to the said mayor, commonalty, and citizens of the said city, before this time made ; or any statute, act, ordinance, provision or restraint thereof made, ordained, or provided to the contrary, or any other thing, cause, or matter whatsoever, in any wise notwithstanding. In witness whereof we have caused these our letters to be made patents. Witness myself at Westminster, the thirteenth day of April, in the twenty-second year of our reign."

In the year 1532, king Henry, fearful of the consequences that might arise from his intended blow on the pope's supremacy, and desirous of knowing his own strength, ordered a general muster to be made of the most defensible men within the city of London, from the age of sixteen to sixty, to be held at Mile-end ; with an account of the weapons, armour, and other military accoutrements belonging to the city. In compliance with this request of his majesty, the citizens were clothed in white, with caps and feathers of the like colour ; and the Lord-mayor, aldermen, recorder and sheriffs were dressed in white armour with black velvet coats, on which were embroidered the city arms ; they were mounted on beautiful horses richly caparisoned, had gold chains about their necks, velvet caps on their heads, and in their right hands were gilt battle axes. They were attended by proper servants richly dressed, and mounted on horseback, and the whole formed a very pleasing sight.

On the day appointed, early in the morning, the muster was made, and before nine o'clock, they began to march, entering at Aldgate, and proceeding through London to Westminster, where they were reviewed by the king and his nobles, who expressed great satisfaction at so splendid an appearance ; from thence they returned round St. James's Park, down Holborn, to Leadenhall, where the procession closed about five in the afternoon.

On the divorcement of queen Catharine, his majesty espoused Anne Boleyn, or Boloine ; and intending her coronation, ordered the Lord-mayor to make all necessary preparations for conducting her majesty from Greenwich to the Tower by water ; and likewise that the city might be magnificently adorned against her proceeding from thence to Westminster.

In compliance with the royal precept, the Lord-mayor ordered all the city companies to attend him at Billingsgate on the twenty-ninth of May, at a fixed hour, with their barges properly decorated, and good bands of music. In consequence of which fifty barges were prepared, and about one o'clock set off to attend the Lord-mayor's barge, which was richly ornamented, with strict orders to keep at least twice their lengths asunder.

The city barge was preceded by one mounted with ordnance, carrying figures of savages, dragons, and other hideous creatures vomiting out fire and smoke, and making an incessant noise. The city barge was covered with gold brocades, and silken sails, with two rich standards of the king's and queen's arms at the head and stern, with a great variety of streamers and flags, containing the company's arms and those of the merchant-adventurers ; and the shrouds and rattlings were hung with a great number of small bells, which produced a very pleasing noise. On the left of this was a barge exhibiting a mount, on which stood a white falcon crowned, perched on a golden stump encircled with red and white roses, the queen's emblem ; and round the mount sat beautiful virgins singing and playing melodiously. After these followed all the companies barges in their proper order. The queen was so highly pleased at this grand procession, that on her arrival at the Tower, she returned the mayor and citizens her hearty thanks for their magnificent attendance.

Two days after, in her majesty's procession from the Tower of London, through the city to Westminster, she was received at the Tower-gate by the Lord-mayor in a gown of crimson velvet, and a rich collar of SS. attended by the sheriffs and two domestics in red and white damask. From the Tower to Temple-bar the streets were new gravelled, and railed in on each side ; within which,

B b b

which, near Gracechurch, stood the Anseatic merchants, and next to them the several corporations of the city in their respective formalities, reaching to the aldermens station at the farther end of Cheapside. On the other side were placed the city constables, dressed in silk and velvet, with staves in their hands to keep off the croud, and prevent disturbances. Gracechurch-street and Cornhill were hung with crimson and scarlet cloth, and Goldsmiths Row in Cheapside with velvet and gold brocades.

Twelve of the French ambassador's servants preceded the procession; they were dressed in blue velvet, mounted on horses trapped with blue pansenets interspersed with white crosses; after whom marched those of the equestrian order, two and two, followed by the judges in their robes; after them the knights of the Bath, in violet gowns trimmed with meniver; then the abbots, barons, bishops, earls and marquises in their robes, two and two; after these the lord chancellor, venetian ambassador, and archbishop of York; next the ambassador of France and the archbishop of Canterbury, followed by two gentlemen who represented the dukes of Normandy and Aquitaine; then proceeded the Lord-mayor of London with his mace, and Garter in his coat of arms; then the duke of Suffolk, lord high steward, and the lord Howard as deputy-marshal of England; next followed all the other great officers of state in their robes, carrying the symbols of their several offices; these were followed by the nobility in crimson velvet, and all the queen's officers in scarlet, followed by her chancellor uncovered, who immediately preceded his mistress sitting in a litter or chair covered with tissue of silver, and drawn by two beautiful pads cloathed in white damask, and led by her footmen. Her majesty was dressed in a silver brocade, with a mantle of the same furred with ermine. Her hair hung loose, and on her head was a chaplet adorned with jewels of inestimable value. Over the litter was a canopy of cloth of gold, supported by sixteen knights alternately, four at a time, with a silver bell hanging at each corner. Her majesty's chamberlain followed next, and after him her master of horse leading a stately pad with a side saddle, and trappings of silver tissue; next to these came seven ladies in crimson velvet, faced with gold brocade, and mounted on beautiful horses richly trapped with gold; these were followed by two chariots covered with cloth of gold, in which were the duchesses of Norfolk, and marchioness of Dorset in the first, and in the second four ladies in crimson velvet; next came several ladies in the same apparel on horseback, adorned with beautiful trappings, then a third chariot all in white, carrying six ladies in crimson velvet; then a fourth all in red, in which were eight ladies in the same dress; then thirty gentlewomen, attendants on the ladies of honour, on horseback, dressed in silks and velvets; and the whole was closed by the guards well mounted and elegantly accoutred.

On her majesty's arrival in Fenchurch-street she stopped at a beautiful pageant, crowded with children in mercatorial habits; who, addressing themselves to her majesty, congratulated her on her happy arrival. She then proceeded to Gracechurch corner, where was erected a magnificent pageant, representing Parnassus, with the fountain of Helicon, in white marble, from which were four springs issuing out Rhenish wine, which centered in a small globe at the summit, and continued running plentifully all day: on the mount sat Apollo, and at his feet Caliope; under whom were the rest of the muses playing on musical instruments; and at their feet were inscribed, in letters of gold, epigrams adapted for the occasion.

At Leadenhall was another stately pageant, representing a hillock encompassed with red and white roses; above which was a golden stump, and a little higher a tippe with a celestial rose, from which descended a white falcon, which perched on the stump; this was soon followed by an angel in a celestial choir who put a crown of gold upon his head. On the hillock, a little lower, sat St. Anne, surrounded by her progeny, one of whom addressed the queen in a speech, wishing her majesty blessed with a happy issue.

At the conduit in Cornhill the graces sat enthroned, with a fountain before them incessantly playing with wine, and underneath a poet describing their peculiar qualities, and presenting the queen with their several presents. The great conduit opposite Mercer's-hall in Cheapside, was beautifully painted with a variety of curious emblems, and which, for the entertainment of the populace, ran all day with a diversity of rich wines. The standard in Woodstreet was beautifully ornamented with royal portraitures, encompassed by a number of flags, on which were painted coats of arms and trophies; and above was a fine concert of music, both vocal and instrumental. When her majesty arrived at the aldermens station near the little conduit at the upper end of Cheapside, John Baker, the recorder, after addressing her with an elegant speech, presented her, in the name of the citizens, with a purse of golden tissue, containing one thousand marks, which her majesty gratefully received. On the little conduit, in a rich pageant, were seated Pallas, Juno and Venus; before whom stood Mercury, who, in their names presented the queen with a golden ball trebly divided, representing the three gifts of Wisdom, Riches, and Felicity. At the gate of St. Paul's a stately pageant presented itself; in which three ladies sumptuously dressed, with chaplets on their heads, exhibited various inscriptions adapted for the occasion. As her majesty passed St. Paul's school, she was highly entertained with verses made by the scholars in praise of herself and the king.

Ludgate was on this occasion beautifully ornamented; and on the top were men and boys singing in concert during the procession. At the end of Shoe-lane, Fleet-street was erected a handsome tower with four turrets, in each of which stood a cardinal virtue, and their symbols; who, addressing themselves to the queen, promised never to leave her, but be always her constant attendants; the conduit ran all the time with variety of wines, and in the tower was a fine concert of music. At Temple-bar her majesty was again entertained with songs sung in concert by men men and boys; and proceeding from thence to Westminster, she there dismissed the Lord-mayor, returning him her sincere and hearty thanks for his good offices, and those of the citizens that day.

The day after being appointed for her majesty's coronation, the Lord-mayor and aldermen attended the ceremony in their proper stations, and in the same dresses, as the preceding day. The king, as a mark of gratitude and affection to the citizens, on the Wednesday following, invited the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and forty of the principals to the christening of his daughter the princess Elizabeth.

The magistrates of the city of London had till now permitted foreign butchers to bring their meat on Wednesdays and Saturdays to Leadenhall-street, and to sell it on stalls before the citizens houses, who made considerable advantage of the ground on which they stood: but it being now thought that the city revenue might be greatly augmented by erecting stalls in Leadenhall, and obliging all butchers to repair to them, it was ordered, by the court of aldermen, that they should sell their meat in Leadenhall-market, and no where else.

CHAPTER XXX.

The lord-chancellor and the bishop of Rochester beheaded on Tower-hill. A conduit erected at Aldgate. Queen Anne Boleyn beheaded. Suppression of religious houses. Grand muster of the city militia. Invention of leaden pipes. Imprisonment of the sheriffs by the House of Commons for breach of privilege. A law made to prevent luxurious eating. Return of the plague. The king borrows a large sum of money of the citizens. Alderman Read pressed, and sent to Scotland as a common soldier. Tythes of the clergy ascertained. Incorporation of St. Bartholomew's hospital. Coronation of Edward VI. Parade of the city watch revived. The protector sent to the Tower. Edward VIth's charter, granting parcels of land in Southwark, &c.

IN the year 1534 John Fisher, bishop of Rochester, and Sir Thomas More, lord chancellor, was committed to the Tower for objecting to swear to the act of succession, particularly that part of it wherein the marriage with queen Catharine was declared to be unlawful; and likewise to another act that passed afterwards for the king's supremacy, and for abolishing the pope's power in this kingdom; for which they were attainted by parliament, and both executed on Tower-hill; the bishop in June 1535, and Sir Thomas the month following.

The following year a conduit was erected, by the contribution of the public, on the south side of the street, just without Aldgate, to receive water from Hackney, for the convenience of the inhabitants in that part of the city. In the same year an act was passed for paving the high streets from Holborn-bridge to the bars, to be kept in repair at the expence of the ground-landlords.

By an act of parliament passed this year for the better conservation of the river Thames, it was enacted, "that if any person or persons do, or procure any thing to be done, in the annoying of the stream of the said river of Thames, making of shelves by any manner of means, by mining digging, casting of dung, or rubbish or any other thing into the said river, or take, pluck, or convey any boards, stakes, piles, timber work, or other thing, from the said banks or walls, (except it be to amend, and the same to repair again) or dig, or undermine any banks or walls, on the water-side of the Thames aforesaid, to the hurt, impairing, or damage, of the said walls or banks, then the said person or persons, and every of them, shall forfeit and pay for every thing so offending, 100s. one moiety thereof to be to the king, and the other moiety thereof to the mayor and commonalty of the city of London, by bill or complaint, writ of debt, or information, severally against every offender, in any of the king's courts in which actions and suits, or any of them, the party defendant shall not be assigned, or wage his law, or any protection to be allowed the same." And it was further enacted, "that if any person that shall have the office and ordering of ballasting of ships near the said river of Thames, and do not take for parcel of the said ballasting, the gravel and sand of the shelves between Greenwich and Richmond, within the said river of Thames, or in any place or places, that is or shall be unto the damage or annoyance of the said river of Thames, or in any part thereof, that then, upon every such complaint, the lord chancellor, lord treasurer, lord president of the king's most honourable council, lord privy seal, and every of them, calling both the justices of either bench, or one of them, shall have power and authority from time to time to hear and finally determine every such complaint by their discretion, and to put such order therein, for the taking of ballast for ships upon every such complaint, as by their discretion shall seem most convenient for the preservation of the said river of Thames; and the parties offending such order shall suffer imprisonment, and be fined five pounds to the king's use, for every time offending or breaking the same. With this proviso, that any person may dig, carry, and take away sand, gravel or rubbish, earth, or thing “ thing, lying or being in or upon any thelve or “ shelves within the said river of the Thames.”

In the month of May, in the year 1536 queen Anne Boleyn, second wife to king Henry VIII. was beheaded on the green within the Tower of London.

On the twenty-first of October 1537, king Henry, by the ministry of his vicar-general Cromwell, ordered the church of St. Thomas of Acres, otherwise Thomas of Becket, in London, to be suppressed. On the 16th of November, the Black-friars; and on the 17th the White-friars, the Grey-friars, and the Carthusian-monks of the Charter-house, underwent the same fate.

The common council of the city of London passed an act in pursuance of the statute of the twenty-seventh of Henry VIII. for the conservation of the river Thames, whereby it was enacted, “ that proclamation should be made within “ this city, and the same to be put in writing,
“ and tables thereof made, and set up in divers “ places of this city, that it shall be lawful to “ every person to dig, carry away, and take away “ sand, gravel, or any rubbish, earth, or any “ thing, lying and being in any thelve or shelves “ within the said river of Thames, without let “ or interruption of any person, and without any “ thing paying for the same : and after that to “ sell the same away, or otherwise to occupy or “ dispose of the said gravel, sand, or other thing,
“ at their free liberty and pleasure. And that all “ paviours, bricklayers, tylers, masons, and all “ others, that occupy sand or gravel, shall en“ deavour themselves, with all diligence, to oc“ cupy the said sand or gravel, and none other, “ paying for the same reasonably, as they should
“ and ought to pay for other sand or gravel, dig-
“ ged out of other men’s grounds about the said “ city. That further application be made to “ his majesty, that all persons having lands or “ tenements along the said river side, shall well
“ and sufficiently repair and maintain all the walls
“ and banks adjoining unto their said lands, so “ that the water may not, nor shall break in upon
“ the same. And that strong grates of iron “ along the said water-side, and also by the street“ side, where any water course is had into the “ said Thames, be made by the inhabitants of “ each ward, so along the said water, as of old “ times has been accustomed : and that every “ grate be in height twenty-four inches at the “ least, as the place shall need ; and in breadth
“ one from another one inch.” And further,
“ that if the occupiers of the said lands and te“ nements made default contrary to the ordinance “ aforesaid, or else if any person or persons, in “ great rains or at other times, sweep their soil“ age, or filth of their houses, into the channel,
“ and the same afterwards is conveyed into the “ Thames, every person so offending shall for“ feit for every such default 1s. 8d. and that “ upon complaint to be made to any constable “ next adjoining to the said place, where any “ such default shall be found, or his sufficient “ deputy for the time being, from time to time,
“ to distrain for the said offence, and to retain
“ the same irreplacible. And a like law to be “ kept and observed, and like penalty to be paid

“ by every person that burns ashes and straw in “ their houses, or walk in the common-streets or “ lanes, and to be recovered as aforesaid ; and “ one moiety thereof to be to the Lord-mayor and “ commonalty, and the other moiety between the “ constable and the informer : and that the con“ stable that shall refuse to do his duty in this “ case, shall pay 3s. 4d. for every offence, re“ coverable in the same manner, and for the same “ uses. And that no person or persons, having “ a wharf or house by the water-side, shall make “ their lay-stalls where the common rakers of “ this city use to lay all their soilage, to be car“ ried away by them in their dung-boats : and “ that the said rakers shall lay their dung to be “ carried away in boats, at such places as shall be “ appointed by the Lord mayor and the court of “ aldermen, under the penalty of five pounds for “ every offence.” Which act or ordinance is still in force.

King Henry having suspected the consequences of throwing off the spiritual yoke of Rome, and finding that the pope had stirred up the emperor and the French king against him, began to prepare for the worst ; for which purpose he fortified the coasts of his kingdom, put his navy in thorough repair, and ordered another general muster to be made, at Mile-end, of all the citizens from the age of sixteen to sixty. Exclusive of pioneers and other attendants, this army, consisting of three divisions of 5000 men each, marched through the city to Westminster, where they were reviewed by the king, queen, and nobles, who expressed great satisfaction at so splendid and numerous a body. This was the greatest muster that ever was made by the citizens of London.

In consideration of the great wisdom and discretion of Paul Wythyn Pool, an order of common-council was made on the 22d of October 1539, by which he was empowered to be present at all common-councils, and elections of mayors and sheriffs. An honour never before conferred on any unqualified citizen.

The king, having restrained the annual custom of the city watch, owing to its great expence, endeavoured to preserve the manly exercise of shooting, by granting a charter to the company of archers, who were called the fraternity of St. George ; by which they had a power to use and exercise shooting at all manner of marks as well in the city as suburbs, with long bows, cross bows, and hand-guns : with this clause, that in case any persons were shot and slain in these sports by some arrow shot by these archers, he was not to be sued or molested, if he had, immediately before he shot, used that common word Faßt. The chieftain of these archers was called prince Arthur, and the rest of them his knights. The principal place of exercising their sport was Mile-end, where they were frequently honoured with the presence of the king himself.

The river Thames was at this time so empty, owing to an excessive drought, that the salt water flowed above London-bridge. At the same time the useful art of making leaden pipes without using solder, for the conveyance of water under-ground ground was invented by Robert Brock, chaplain to the king.

In the year 1542 the House of Commons having sent their serjeant at arms to demand the releasement of George Ferrars, member of Plymouth, who had been arrested at the suit of one White, for two hundred marks, the sheriffs and their officers belonging to the Compter, then situated in Bread-street, assaulted the said serjeant at arms, and broke his mace: for which they were ordered to attend the house; when, after a severe reprimand for their contempt, the sheriffs and White were committed prisoners to the Tower; one of their clerks to a room in the said place called little ease; and the arresting officer, with four others, to Newgate; where they continued for a considerable time, till, by the interposition of the Lord-mayor, and the perseverance of many friends, they were, by an order of the house, discharged.

The king at this time first granted a privilege for printing the bible in English to a bookseller in London. In the same year an act of parliament passed, by which it was enacted, that Algate-high-street, (from the gate to Whitechapel church) Chancery-lane, High-holbourn, (from the bars eastward to St. Giles's) Gray's-in-lane, Shoe-lane and Fetter-lane, should be paved with stone, as other streets were in the city.

In the year 1543 so great a mortality raged among the horned cattle that meat became excessive dear. To remedy which the Lord-mayor and common council made a sumptuary law for preventing luxurious eating, whereby it was ordained, that the Lord-mayor should not have more than seven dishes at either dinner or supper; the aldermen and sheriffs no more than six; the sword-bearer, four; and the mayor and sheriffs officers three; on the penalty of forty shillings for every supernumerary dish. And by the same authority it was enacted, that neither the mayor, aldermen, nor sheriffs should, after the ensuing Easter, buy cranes, swans, or bustards, on the penalty of twenty shillings for every fowl so bought.

Another act of parliament passed this year, by which it was enacted, that the streets called Whitecross-street, Chiswell-street, Grub-street, Shoreditch, Goswell-street, St. John's-street, Cowcross-street, Wych-street, Holywell-street, near St. Clements Danes, the Strand, from Temple-bar to Strand-bridge, Petty-france in Westminster, Water-lane in Fleet-street, Long-lane in Smithfield, and the Butcher-row without Temple-bar, should be paved with stone, and a channel made in the middle, at the expence of the ground landlords in each street. And it was further enacted, "that the Lord-mayor, aldermen, &c. of London shall have power to enquire into, hear, and determine the defaults of paving, and reparation of streets; and that any three justices in London, whereof the mayor to be one, may set fine upon such as do not pave and repair any street in London, or the liberties thereof, to be levied by distress or action, &c. by the chamberlain, to the use of the mayor and commonalty of the said city." And it was further enacted, "that the conduits of London should be made and repaired, for the better

"watering of the city and its liberties; and that the mayor and citizens should have power to bring water to the said conduits from Flampstead-heath, St. Mary-le-bone, Hackney, and Mufwell-hill, upon their indemnifying the owners of lands for damages that might be done by the said water-courses, &c."

This year the plague raged so violently in London, that a great number of citizens died, and the term was adjourned to St. Alban's.

In the year 1544 died Sir John Allen, Lord-mayor of London, and privy-counsellor to the king. He gave a rich collar of gold to be worn by his successors, and five hundred marks to be stock for sea-coal; and the rents of his lands he distributed to the poor in each ward for ever. He was buried at St. Thomas of Acres, in a chapel built by himself. The manner of this gentleman's funeral was very different from that of Margaret Atkinson, who by her will, dated October 18, in the same year, appointed, that, on the Sunday after her interment, a collation should be provided by her executors for the entertainment of her fellow parishioners, to consist of two dozen of bread, a kilderkin of ale, two gammons of bacon, three shoulders of mutton, and four rabbits, to be eaten in the church, on a table for that purpose provided.

The king being in great distress for money to carry on the war with Scotland, the twelve companies lent him 21,263l. 6s. 8d. on mortgage of crown lands, for that purpose. This not being sufficient his majesty afterwards sent commissioners into the city to assess the Londoners in an arbitrary manner by way of benevolence. To this arbitrary proceeding Richard Read, an alderman, not only objected; but absolutely refused paying the sum demanded; for which he was pressed, and sent to Scotland to serve as a common soldier; where he was taken prisoner, and, after undergoing great hardships, was compelled to pay a considerable ransom for his liberty.

This year an act of parliament passed, in which it was enacted, that every person possessed of four hundred marks in real and personal estate, was properly qualified to serve on the grand jury. And the same parliament enacted that every citizen and inhabitant within the city and liberty thereof should, for every ten shillings annual rent, pay to the vicars of their respective parishes one shilling and four-pence, and two shillings and nine pence for every rent of twenty shillings; and so in proportion as the rents might be higher.

The citizens, who had before rejected the king's request, and thereby incurred his displeasure, now recovered his affection, by voluntarily fitting out one thousand foot, at their own expence, to reinforce the army in France. In consequence of this assistance peace was proclaimed between England and France, on Whit Sunday, in the year 1546. On this occasion a solemn procession was made from St. Paul's church to Leadenhall, and back again. It consisted of a number of men carrying the parochial silver crosses, followed by the parish clerks, choristers and priests in London, together with the choir of St. Paul's in their richest copes, followed by the different companies of the city in their liveries; and the procession was closed by the Lord-mayor and aldermen dressed in their scarlet robes.

C c c

city

Claude Annebaut, high-admiral of France, and the French ambassador extraordinary, after having made his public entry into London, was, by the citizens, presented with four large silver flagons, richly gilt, with many other valuables.

The better to enforce the powers granted by a late act of parliament for supplying the city with water, the common-council this year granted two fifteenths for erecting a conduit in Lothbury, which was built near St. Margaret's church; and to bring water from Dame-Annis-the-clear, at the south-east entrance of the village of Hoxton.

The earl of Surry, eldest son to the duke of Norfolk, was tried by a common jury at Guildhall, before the Lord-mayor, for high treason, and notwithstanding the excellent defence he made, was convicted, condemned, and executed on Tower-hill. His father was so near sharing the same fate, that the warrant for his execution had been sent to the lieutenant of the Tower, but the king dying between the date of the warrant and the execution, his life was preserved.

King Henry VIII. having dissolved the priory and old hospital of St. Bartholomew in Smithfield, he, in the last year of his reign, founded it anew, and endowed it with the annual revenue of five hundred marks, on condition that the city should pay an equal sum. The proposal being accepted, the new foundation was incorporated by the name of "The hospital of the mayor, commonalty, and citizens of London, governors for the poor, called Little St. Bartholomew's, near West-Smithfield."

The coronation of Edward VI. being appointed on the twenty-fourth of February, his majesty, attended by the nobility, rode on horseback, in the greatest pomp, from the Tower of London to Westminster. The streets on this occasion were sumptuously adorned, and in divers places were erected the most stately pageants. At St. Paul's his majesty was particularly diverted by a Spaniard, who slid down a rope, head foremost, on his breast, from the battlements of St. Paul's steeple, to the Dean's gate, in the churchyard.

The combinations and conspiracies which were daily concerted by the journeymen and labourers, being found very detrimental to trade, the parliament, among other things, enacted, "That if any artificers, workmen, or labourers, do conspire, covenant, or promise together, that they shall not make or do their work but at a certain price or rate, or shall not enterprize or take upon them to finish that work which another hath begun, or shall do but a certain work in a day, or shall not work but at certain hours or times; that then every person so conspiring, covenanting, or offending, being thereof convicted by witnesses, confession, or otherwise, shall forfeit for the first offence ten pounds, or have twenty days imprisonment; for the second offence, twenty pounds, or pillory; and for a third offence, forty pounds, or to sit on the pillory, and to have one ear cut off, besides being rendered infamous, and incapable of "giving evidence upon oath." In this act are included butchers, bakers, brewers, poulterers, cooks, &c. And all justices of the peace, mayors, bailiffs, &c. in their sessions, leets and courts, have full power and authority to enquire, hear, and determine, all and singular the offence against this statute, and to cause offenders to be punished.

In the year 1548 the march of the city watch, which had been discontinued by command of king Henry VIII. was revived by Sir John Gresham the mayor. The procession received an additional splendor from three hundred light horsemen, which had been raised by the citizens for the service of the king.

This year London was again visited by a plague which took off a great number of its inhabitants.

The privy-counsellors being highly dissatisfied with the conduct of the protector, (the duke of Somerset) found means, by stratagem, to secure the Tower of London, of which they substituted a new governor, and armed themselves and domestics. The earl of Warwick, with his accomplices, retired to London, where he drew up a charge against the duke, which he caused, by consent of the mayor, to be proclaimed in different parts of the city. They likewise demanded a supply of five hundred men, and importuned the mayor and aldermen to put the city in a posture of defence. The magistrates so far agreed, as to order the several companies to mount guard alternately, but would not proceed any farther without consulting the common-council: on which meeting the mayor and aldermen produced the king's letter to the city, demanding five hundred men completely armed, to be sent to him immediately at Windsor. Robert Brook, the recorder, earnestly requested them to supply the lords with that number, as it would enable them to bring the protector to an account, and thereby redress the grievances of an injured nation. He was heard by the court with profound silence, till George Stadlow rose, who, after reciting the bad consequences of the city's joining the barons against king Henry III. said, "Wherefore, as this aid is required of the king's majesty, whose voice we ought to hearken unto, for he is our high shepherd, rather than unto the lords; and yet I would not wish the lords to be clearly shaken off; but they with us, and we with them, may join in suit, and make our most humble petition to the king's majesty, that it would please his majesty to hear such complaint against the government of the lord-protector, as may be justly alledged and proved: and I doubt not but this matter will be pacified; that neither shall the king, nor yet the lords have cause to seek for further aid, neither we to offend either of them." This speech had so good an effect, that the court broke up without coming to any resolution. After which the lords held a conference with the mayor and aldermen, wherein it was resolved to dispatch Sir Philip Hobby with credentials to his majesty, imploring him to permit the said Sir Philip to deliver their message, and to credit what he should declare in their names. Sir Philip delivered himself with such firmness and pertinence to the king, king, in the presence of the protector, that his majesty commanded the protector immediately to withdraw, and soon after committed him prisoner to Beauchamp's tower, in Windsor castle; from whence he was conducted to the Tower of London.

A combination being at this time held between the graziers, salesmen, and others, to enhance the price of butchers meat in London, the following prices were stipulated by order of the king and council.

From Midsummer to Michaelmas.

	l.	s.	d.
The best fat ox to be sold at	—	2	5 0
The best steers and runts	—	1	5 0
The best heifers and kine	—	1	2 0

From Hollowmas to Christmas.

The best fat ox to be sold at	—	2	6 8
The best steers and runts	—	1	6 8
The best heifers and kine	—	1	3 0

From Christmas to Shrovetide.

The best fat ox to be sold at	—	2	8 4
The best steers and runts	—	1	8 4

From shearing-time to Michaelmas.

The best fat weather to be sold at	0	4	4
If shorn	—	0	3 0
The best fat ewe	—	0	2 6
If shorn	—	0	2 0

From Michaelmas to Shrovetide.

The best fat weather, at	—	0	4 4
If shorn	—	0	3 0

In the year 1550 the river Thames ebbed and flowed thrice within the space of nine hours, occasioned by a violent easterly wind repelling the ebb before it could perform its natural course.

This same year a great dearth of provisions happening, the king and council settled the following prices:

	s.	d.
White wheat, the quarter at	13	0
Red ditto at	11	0
All other sorts of ditto at	8	0
Malt the best, the quarter at	10	0
Second sort of ditto at	8	0
Rye the best, the quarter at	7	0
Second sort of ditto at	6	0
Barley the best at	9	0
Second sort of ditto at	7	0
Beans and peas the best, the quarter at	5	0
Second sort of ditto at	3	0
Oats, the quarter at	4	0
The best sweet butter, the pound at	0	1
Essex barrelled butter, the pound at	0	0 ½
All sorts of other barrelled butter at	0	0 ½
Essex cheese, the pound at	0	0 ½
All other sorts of ditto at	0	0 ½

The king was so highly pleased with the conduct of the citizens in the late application made to them by the discontented lords, and so well satisfied of their attachment and affection to his royal house and person, that he granted them the following charter:

" Edward the sixth, by the grace of God, king
 " of England, France, and Ireland, defender
 " of the faith, and on earth supreme head of the " church of England and Ireland; to all to whom
 " these present letters shall come, greeting.
 " Know ye, that for the sum of six hundred " and forty-seven pounds two shillings and a
 " penny, of lawful money of England, paid to
 " the hands of the treasurer of our court of " augmentation and revenues of our crown, to
 " our use, by our well beloved the mayor and
 " commonalty and citizens of the city of Lon" don, whereof we acknowledge us to be fully
 " satisfied and paid, and the mayor and com-
 " monalty and citizens and their successors to
 " be thereof acquitted and discharged by these " presents; and for other causes and conside" rations, us thereunto especially moving, have
 " of our special grace, and from our certain
 " knowledge and mere motion, and also with
 " the advice of our council, given and granted,
 " and by these presents do give and grant, to
 " the said mayor, commonalty, and citizens of " the city of London, all that our messuage or
 " tenement, with the appurtenances, now or " late in the tenure of Simon Sebatson, situate
 " and being next our mansion, late Charles,
 " late duke of Suffolk's, in Southwark, in the " county of Surry; and all that our messuage or
 " tenement with the appurtenances, next the " broad gate of the same our mansion in South-
 " wark aforesaid, and all that our close of ground
 " called Moulter's close, containing by estimation
 " 15 acres, lying in Newington, in our said coun" ty of Surry; and all that our close of ground
 " containing by estimation two acres, now or late " in the tenure of John Parrow, lying or being
 " in St. George's Dunghill, in the parish of St.
 " George in Southwark aforesaid; and also all " that one close of ground, late in the tenure of " John Billington, lying in Lambeth-marsh, in the " parish of Lambeth, in the said county of Surry;
 " and also all those our 39 acres and three rods
 " of meadow, with the appurtenances, now or " late in the possession of William Bafely, lying
 " and being in divers parcels, in the field called
 " St. George's field, in the parish of St. George,
 " in Southwark, in our said county of Surry; and
 " one messuage or tenement of ours situate near
 " Broad-gates in Southwark aforesaid; and all
 " those our two messuages or tenements, and one
 " chamber, and three stables, and one garden of " ours, with all their appurtenances, situate and
 " being in Southwark aforesaid; all and singular
 " which premises sometimes parcels of the pos" sessions and hereditaments of Charles duke of " Suffolk; and all other the messuages, lands,
 " tenements, rents, reversions, and hereditaments
 " whatsoever, with all their appurtenances in " Southwark, in the said county of Surry, which " were the aforesaid Charles duke of Suffolk's,
 " and

“ and which were lately purchased by our dear father, Henry the VIIIth, late king of England, of the same Charles late duke of Suffolk; except nevertheless always to us, and to our heirs and successors, all that our capital messuage and mansion-house called Southwark-place, in Southwark aforesaid, late the duke of Suffolk's, and all gardens and ground to the same adjoining or appertaining, and all our park in Southwark aforesaid, and all the messuages, and all the buildings and grounds, called the Antelope there.

“ Furthermore we give, and for the consideration aforesaid, and with the advice aforesaid, do by these presents grant, to the aforesaid mayor and commonalty, and to the citizens of the said city of London, all that our lordship and manor of Southwark, with their rights, members, and appurtenances, in the said county of Surry, late pertaining to the late monastery of Bermondsey, in the said county; and all messuages, houses, buildings, barns, stables, dove-houses, ponds, pools, springs, orchards, gardens, lands, tenements, meadows, feedings, pastures, commons, waste-street, void-ground-rents, reversions, services, court-leet, view of frank-pledge, chattels, waives, strays, free-warren, and all other rights, profits, commodities, emoluments, and hereditaments, whatsoever, in Southwark aforesaid, to the said lordship and manor of Southwark, by any means belonging, or being before this time accounted, known, or taken as member or parcel of the said lordship and manor, (except before excepted). Furthermore we give, and for the consideration aforesaid, and with the assent aforesaid, by these presents do grant, unto the said mayor and commonalty, and citizens, all our manor and borough of Southwark, with all their rights, members, and appurtenances, in the said county of Surry, late parcel of the possessions of the archbishop and archbishopric of Canterbury, and all our annual rent of 3s. 2d. ob. and the services going out of the lands and tenements sometimes of John Burceter, knight, and now or late in the tenure of William Glasscock, esq; in Southwark aforesaid: and all that our yearly rent of 3s. and service going out of the house or tenement called the Swan, in Southwark aforesaid: and all that our yearly rent of 4s. 10d. and the service going out of the messuage or tenement called the Mermaid, in Southwark aforesaid: and all that the yearly rent of 1s. 8d. a quarter, and the service going out of the messuage or tenement called the Helmet, in the borough of Southwark aforesaid: and all that our annual rent of 16s. and the services going out of the messuage or tenement called the Horse-head, in the borough of Southwark aforesaid: and also all that our annual rent of 6s. 4d. and the services going out of the messuage or tenement called the Gleyne, in Southwark aforesaid: and all that our annual rent of 2s. a quarter, and the services going out of the messuage or tenement called the Rose; and one acre of ground lying in the Lock, in Southwark aforesaid: and all that our annual rent of 20d. a quarter, and the services

“ going out of the messuage or tenement called the Lamb, in Southwark aforesaid, pertaining to the company of Fishmongers of London: and also all that our annual rent of 20d. a quarter, and the service going out of one messuage or tenement, pertaining to the said society of Fishmongers in London, called the Bale, in Southwark aforesaid: and all that annual rent of 20d. a quarter, going out of one messuage or tenement pertaining to the said society of Fishmongers, commonly called the Flower-de-luce, in Southwark aforesaid: and also that our annual rent of 4s. and the service going out of the 12 acres of land, lying at the Lock, in Southwark aforesaid, sometimes the lord Wildford's, and now or late pertaining to the said society of Fishmongers: and all that our annual rent of 8d. and the service going out of two acres of land of Giles Athorn, called Tipping in the Hole, in Southwark aforesaid: and all that our annual rent of 3s. and the service going out of the messuage or tenement late Thomas lord Poynings, in Southwark aforesaid: and all that our annual rent of 12d. halfpenny, and the service going out of the messuage or tenement now or late of William Malton's, in Southwark aforesaid: and all that our annual rent of 20d. halfpenny, and the service going out of the messuage or tenement called the White-Hart, in Southwark aforesaid: and also all that our annual rent of 7s. 4d. and the service going out of a messuage or tenement called the Crown, in Southwark aforesaid, now or late of the masters of the Bridge-house, London: and also all that our annual rent of 2s. and the service going out of a messuage or tenement of the same masters of the Bridge-house, called the Christopher, in Southwark aforesaid: and all that our annual rent of 12d. and the service going out of the lands and meadows of the masters of the Bridge-house in London, lying and being at the Lock, called Carpenter's-hall, in Southwark aforesaid: and all that our annual rent of 10d. halfpenny, and the service going out of the messuage or tenement called the Blue Mead, in Southwark aforesaid: and all that our annual rent of 2s. and the service going out of one messuage or tenement now or late of William Salisbury, in Southwark aforesaid: and also all that our annual rent of 16d. and the services going out of a certain field or ground of four acres of land, now or late the heirs of Robert Linled, lying and being in the Lock, and abutting upon the lands of the late duke of Suffolk, in Southwark aforesaid; and in Newington, or in either of them, in the said county of Surry: and all our annual rent of 2s. and the service going out of a certain field of ground, sometimes John Sola's field, and now or late the heirs of Robert Linled, in Southwark and Newington aforesaid, or either of them: and all our annual rent of 20d. and the services going out of five acres of ground, now or late Stephen Middleton's, lying and being at the Lock of Southwark and Newington aforesaid, or either of them: and all that our annual rent of 4d. and the service going out of four acres of land, now

or

" or late William Champion's, lying and being
 " in South-mead, in Walworth field; in the parish
 " of Newington, in our said county of Surry:
 " and all that our annual rent of 20d. farthing,
 " and the service going out of the messuage or
 " tenement called Circot, in Southwark and New-
 " ington aforesaid, and either of them: and all
 " other our messuages, lands, tenements; rents,
 " reversions, services and hereditaments whatso-
 " ever, which were parcel of the possessions, rents
 " and revenues of the archbishop and bishoprick
 " of Canterbury, in Southwark, in the county of " Surry. We furthermore give, and for the con" siderations aforesaid, and with the advice afore-
 " said, do grant by these presents to the said mayor
 " and commonalty, and citizens of the city of " London, all and all manner of woods, under-
 " woods and trees whatsoever, growing and be" ing of, in, and upon all and singular the pre" mises, and the soil and ground of the same;
 " and also whatsoever reversions of all and singu" lar the premises, and every part thereof, and
 " all the rents and yearly profits whatsoever, re-
 " served upon whatsoever demises and grants
 " made of the premises, or any part thereof, by " any means. We also give, and by these pre" sents grant, to the said mayor and commonalty,
 " and citizens of the city of London, all and sin" gular the premises with the appurtenances, as " fully, and in as ample manner and form, as
 " the said Charles late duke of Suffolk, or any " other abbot of the late monastery of Bermond-
 " sey, or any archbishop of Canterbury, or any of " them, or others before this time, having and " possessing the said manors, and other premises,
 " or any parcel thereof, or being thereof seised,
 " ever had, held, or enjoyed, or ought to have
 " or enjoy the same, or any part thereof; and
 " as fully, freely, and wholly, and in as large
 " manner and form as all and singular the same
 " came or ought to have come to our hands, or
 " to the hands of our most dear father Henry the " VIIIth, late king of England, by reason or
 " pretence of any charters, gift, grant, or con" firmation, or by reason or pretence of the dis-
 " solution of the said monastery, or by any other " means or right they came or ought to have " come, or as the same now be or ought to be in " our hands. Know ye moreover, that we, as " well of our grace, knowledge and motion
 " aforesaid, and with the advice aforesaid, as for
 " the sum of 500 marks of lawful money of " England, paid into the hands of our treasurer
 " of our court aforesaid, to our use, by the said
 " mayor and commonalty, and citizens of the
 " said city of London, whereof we confess us to be " fully satisfied, and the said mayor and common-
 " alty, and citizens and their successors thereof,
 " to be acquitted and discharged by these pre" sents; have given and granted, and by these " presents do give and grant, for us and our " heirs, to the said mayor and commonalty, and
 " citizens of the city aforesaid, and to their suc" cessors, in and through all the town and bo" rough aforesaid; and in and through all the " parishes of St. Saviour's, St. Olave's, and St.
 " George's in Southwark, and in the parish and " through all the parishes lately called St. Tho-

" mas's hospital, and now called the king's hospi" tal, in Southwark aforesaid, and elsewhere so-
 " ever in the said town and borough of South-
 " wark aforesaid; and in Kentish-street, and in " Blackman-street aforesaid, and the parish of
 " Newington, and elsewhere in the said town
 " and borough of Southwark; all goods and
 " chattels, waived estrays, and all treasure found
 " in the town and precinct aforesaid, and all " manner of handy work, goods and chattels,
 " of all manner of traitors, felons, fugitives out-
 " lawed, condemned, convicted, and of felons
 " defamed, and put in exigent, felons of them" selves, and deodands, and denying the law of
 " our land, wherefore, or before whomsoever
 " justice ought to be done of them; and all goods
 " disclaimed, found, and being within the bo-
 " rough, town, parishes and precincts aforesaid;
 " and also all manner of escheats, and forfeitures
 " to us and our heirs, may there pertain as fully
 " and wholly as we should have them, if the said
 " town and borough were in the hands of us or
 " our heirs; and that it shall be lawful to the " same mayor, and commonalty, and citizens,
 " and their successors, by themselves, or by their
 " deputy or ministers of the said town or bo" rough, to put themselves in seisin of and in all
 " the handy-works and chattels of all manner of " traitors, felons, fugitives, outlawed, condemn" ed, convicted, and of felons defamed, and de-
 " denying the law of our land, and of other pre-
 " mises; and also of and in goods disclaimed,
 " found, or being, within the same borough,
 " town, parishes, or precincts thereof; and also
 " of and in all estreats and forfeitures to us and " our heirs there pertaining. And the same
 " mayor, commonalty, and citizens, and their
 " successors, by themselves, or by their deputy,
 " minister or ministers, shall have, in the bo-
 " rough, town, parishes, and precincts aforesaid,
 " the assize and assay of bread, wine, beer and
 " ale, and of all other victuals and things what" soever, set to sale in the town aforesaid: and
 " also, and whatsoever doth pertain to the clerk
 " of the market of our house, or of the house
 " of our heirs, together with the correction and
 " punishment of all persons selling wines, bread,
 " beer, ale, and other victuals there to be sold,
 " and of others there dwelling, or exercising arts
 " howsoever; and with all manner of forfeitures,
 " fines and amerciaments to be forfeited, with all
 " other things which therefore do or may there
 " pertain to us, or our heirs and successors, in " time to come: and that they shall have there
 " the execution of all manner of writs of ours,
 " or of our heirs and successors, and of all other
 " writs, commands, extracts, and warrants, with
 " the return of the same, by such their ministers
 " and deputies, whom they shall thereunto chuse;
 " and that the same mayor and commonalty, and
 " citizens, and their successors, shall every year
 " have there, and through all the town, borough,
 " parishes and precincts aforesaid, one fair, or
 " mart, to endure three days; that is to say, the " seventh, eighth, and ninth days of the month
 " of September, to be holden, together with the " court of pye-powder, and with all liberties
 " and free customs to such fair pertaining: and " that they may have and hold therein, and at

 " the said court, before their minister or deputy,
 " through the said three days, from day to day,
 " and hour to hour, and from time to time, all
 " the actions, plaints, and pleas, of the said court
 " of pyc-powder, together with all summons,
 " attachments, rests, issues, fines, redemptions
 " and commodities, and all other rights whatso" ever, to the same court of pyc-powder, by any " means belonging; without any impediment,
 " let, or disturbance of us, our heirs or successors,
 " or of other our officers or ministers whatsoever.
 " And also, that they may have, in and through
 " the precinct aforesaid, view of frankpledge,
 " together with all summons, attachments, ar-
 " rests, issues and amerciements, fines, redemp-
 " tions, profits, commodities, and other things
 " whatsoever, which therefore may or ought
 " there to pertain to us, our heirs and successors,
 " by any means. And further, that the said
 " mayor and commonalty, and citizens, and their " successors, may, by themselves, or by their mi" nister or deputy, in the borough, town, parish,
 " or precinct aforesaid, constituted and to be
 " constituted, take and arrest all manner of fel-
 " lons, thieves, and other malefactors, found " within the borough, town, parishes and pre" cincts aforesaid, and may bring them to our " goal of Newgate, there to be safely kept, un" til by due process of law they may be deliver" ed. And furthermore, that the said mayor and
 " commonalty, and citizens, and their succef-
 " sors, may have in the borough, town, parishes,
 " and precincts aforesaid, for ever, all and all
 " manner of liberties, privileges, franchises, ac-
 " quittals, customs and rights, which we or our " heirs should or might there have, if the same
 " borough or town were or remained in the hands
 " of us or our heirs. And further, we have of " our grace, knowledge, and motion aforesaid,
 " and by the advice aforesaid, granted, and by
 " these presents do grant, for us, our heirs and
 " successors, to the said mayor, commonalty, and
 " citizens, and their successors, that the said
 " mayor and commonalty, and citizens, from
 " henceforth for ever, shall and may hold all and
 " all manner of contracts and demands whatso" ever, within the borough, town, parishes, and " precincts aforesaid, changing, happening, and " growing, before the mayor and aldermen, and " sheriffs of the said city, for the time being, or " any of them, in the Guildhall of the chamber
 " of the Guildhall and hustings of the said city, or " any of them to be holden by like actions, bills,
 " plaints, process, arrests, judgments, execu" tions, and other things whatsoever, and at the " same days and times, and in such like manner
 " and form, as such, happening in the said city,
 " have time out of mind been taken, held, levied,
 " prosecuted and executed in the court, before
 " the mayor and aldermen, and sheriffs of the " said city, or in any of them. And that the " serjeants at mace of the city of London for the " time being, which have used to execute and
 " serve any process, or any other things, in the " said city, may hereafter make, do, and exe" cute any manner of process, and do whatsoever
 " things in the said borough, town, parishes,

" and precincts, concerning all and singular
 " things arising and happening about such pleas,
 " and executions of the same, within the pre-
 " cincts aforesaid, as by all the time aforesaid it
 " hath been used in the said city of London; and
 " the inhabitants of the town and borough, pa" rishes, and precincts aforesaid, as concerning
 " the causes and matters there arising, may be
 " impleaded, and plead in the same city in form
 " aforesaid, and in the courts aforesaid. And if
 " the men impannelled and summoned in juries,
 " for trials of such issues, have not appeared be" fore the said mayor, aldermen, and sheriffs,
 " in the said courts of the said city, that then
 " such men impannelled and summoned as afore-
 " said, making default, shall be amerced by the " said mayor and sheriffs, and shall forfeit such " issues upon them returned, and to be returned,
 " after the same or in like manner and form as
 " the men impannelled and summoned in the said
 " city for the like issues in the courts of the said
 " city to be tried, have before this time forfeited,
 " and have accustomed to forfeit. And also,
 " that such amerciements and issues forfeited
 " should be levied by the ministers of the said
 " city, to the use of the mayor and commonalty,
 " and citizens, and their successors for ever. And
 " also, that the same mayor and commonalty,
 " and citizens, and their successors, shall and
 " may from henceforth ever have cognizance of
 " all manner of pleas, actions, plaints, and suits
 " personal, happening or growing out of any " court of ours, or our heirs, before us, or our " heirs, or before any of the justices, for or con" cerning any thing, cause, or matter, within the " town, borough, parishes, and precincts afore-
 " said, before the mayor, aldermen, and sheriffs,
 " or any of them, in the said courts of the said
 " city, or any of them. And that the issues
 " happening upon the said pleas and suits shall
 " be tried in the same courts, before the mayor,
 " and aldermen, and sheriffs, or any of them, by
 " the men of the same borough or town, in such " sort as issues in the same city are tried. And " that the said mayor and commonalty, and citi" zens, and their successors, may for ever chuse,
 " according to the form of the law, and may " constitute every year, or as often as, and in
 " what time soever shall seem to them expedient,
 " two coroners in the borough or town aforesaid.
 " And that the said coroners, and either of them,
 " being elected and constituted, may and shall have
 " full power and authority to do and execute in
 " the said borough, town, parishes, and precincts
 " aforesaid, all and singular things, which to the " office of coroner, in any county of our realm
 " of England, do, or ought to pertain to be done
 " and executed. And that none other coroners
 " of us, our heirs, or successors, shall enter into
 " any thing, which to the office of such coroner
 " pertaineth, to be done within the said borough,
 " town, parishes and precincts; neither shall at
 " all intermeddle about any thing belonging to " the office of coroner, happening within the " borough, town, parishes, and precincts afore" said. And that the mayor of the said city,
 " for the time being, shall be our escheator,
 " and escheator of our heirs, in the borough,
 " town

town, parishes, and precincts aforesaid. And that he shall have full power and authority to make his precept and commandment to the sheriff of the county of Surry for the time being, and do, execute, and finish there; all and singular, things which appertain to the office of escheator in any county of our realm. And that none other escheator of ours, or of our heirs, shall enter there, in any thing, which to the office of escheator appertaineth to be done; neither shall at all intermeddle with any thing to the office of escheator there belonging. And that the mayor of the said city, for the time being, shall be clerk of the market, and of the market of our heirs, within the borough, town, parishes, and precincts aforesaid; and shall do and execute therein all such things which to the clerk of the market appertaineth. And that the clerk of the market of our house, or of the house of our heirs, or any other clerk of the market, intermeddle not there. And that the said mayor and commonalty, and citizens, and their successors, shall and may from henceforth, and for ever, have, hold, enjoy and use, as well within the said manor, as in the town, borough, parishes and precincts aforesaid, as well all and singular liberties and franchises aforesaid, as tolls, stallages, pickages, and other our jurisdictions, liberties franchises, and privileges whatsoever, which any archbishop of Canterbury, and which the said Charles, late duke of Suffolk, or any master, brethren, or sisters, of the late hospital of St. Thomas's, in Southwark aforesaid; or any abbot of the said late monastery of St. Saviour's, St. Mary Bermondsey, next Southwark aforesaid, in the county aforesaid; or any prior and convent of the late priory of St. Mary Overy, in the said county of Surry, or any of them; ever had, held, or enjoyed, in the said manors, lands, tenements, and other the premises or places aforesaid, or any of them, or which we have, hold, or enjoy, by any means whatsoever, as fully, freely, and in as ample manner, as we, or our most dear father Henry the VIIIth, late king of England, had, held, or enjoyed, or ought to have, hold, and enjoy the same. And that none of our sheriffs, or any other officer or minister of ours or of our heirs and successors, shall any way intermeddle in the town, borough-town, parishes and precincts aforesaid, or in any of them, contrary to this our grant. And we, with the advice aforesaid, do farther by these presents grant to the said mayor, commonalty, and citizens of the said city of London, and to their successors, that all and singular persons, from time to time, inhabiting or resident within the town, borough, parishes, and places aforesaid, shall from henceforth be in the order, government, and correction of the mayor and officers of the city of London, and their deputies for the time being, as the citizens and inhabitants of the said city of London be, and ought to be, by virtue of the charter before this time by any means made, granted, and confirmed by any of our progenitors to the said mayor and commonalty, and citizens, of the said city, and their successors, shall and may from henceforth have, hold, and enjoy, so many and so great the same, such and the like rights, jurisdictions, liberties, franchises, and privileges whatsoever, in the towns, parishes, and places aforesaid, and in every parcel thereof, as fully, freely, and wholly, as the said mayor and commonalty, and citizens, of the said city enjoy and use, or may enjoy and use in the said city, by virtue of any of the charters and grants made, granted, and confirmed by any of our progenitors, kings of England to any mayor, commonalty, and citizens of the said city. And that the mayor of the same city, for the time being, and the recorder thereof, for the time being, after the said aldermen have exercised and born the charge of mayor of the said city, shall be justices of our peace, and our heirs, in the town, borough, parishes, and limits aforesaid, so long as the same aldermen shall be and remain aldermen of the said city; and every of them shall there do and execute all and singular things which other justices of our peace, and our heirs, may do and execute within the said county of Surry, according to the laws and statutes of our realm of England. And that the said mayor and commonalty, and citizens, and their successors, shall have on every week, on Monday, Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday, within the borough and town aforesaid, one market or markets, to be there holden, and all things which to a market do appertain, or may appertain, for ever. Except always, and reserved to us, our heirs, and successors, out of these our letters patent, all and all manner of rights, jurisdictions, liberties, and franchises whatsoever, within the walk, circuit, and precinct, over the capital messuage, gardens, and park, in Southwark aforesaid, and in all gardens, curtilages, and lands to the same mansion, gardens, and park appertaining; and except and always reserved the house, messuage or lodging there called the King's-bench, and the garden or gardens to the same pertaining, with the appurtenances, so long as it shall be used for a prison for the imprisoned as now it is. And except the messuage and lodging there called the Marshalsea, and the gardens to the same belonging, with the appurtenances, so long as it shall be used for a prison as now it is. Provided also, that these our letters patent, nor any thing therein contained, shall extend to the prejudice of the officers of the great master, steward, and marshal of our house, or of the house of our heirs or successors, to be exercised within the town, borough, parishes, and limits aforesaid, being within the verge: nor of John Gate, knight, one of the gentlemen of our privy-chamber, or for lands, tenements, offices, franchises or liberties, by us, or our father, to the said John Gate granted, during his life: which manors, lands, tenements, rents, privileges, and all other the premises, are now extended to the yearly value of 35l. 14s. 4d. to have, hold, and enjoy the said manors, messuages, lands, tenements, meadows, feedings, pastures, commons, woods, underwoods, rents, services, reversions, court-lects, view of frank-

“ frank-pledge, chattels, waved-strays, free-war“ rens, and all and singular the said premises, “ with the appurtenances, (except before except“ ed) to the said mayor and commonalty, and “ citizens of the said city of London, and to their “ successors for ever; to be holden of us, and “ our heirs and successors, as of our manor of “ East-Greenwich, in the county of Kent, by “ fealty only in fee soccage, and not in chief,
 “ for all services and demands whatsoever. We “ give also, and, for the consideration aforesaid,
 “ do by these presents grant unto the said mayor
 “ and commonalty, and citizens of the said city
 “ of London, all the issues, rents, revenues, and “ profits of the said manor, messuages, lands, “ tenements, and all other the premises, with “ their appurtenances, coming and growing from
 “ the feast of St. Michael the archangel last past “ hitherto, to have the same, to the said mayor
 “ and commonalty, and citizens, of our gift, “ without account, or any other thing to us, our “ heirs and successors, by any means therefore “ to be given, paid, or made. And furthermore,
 “ of our ample grace, we will, and for us, our “ heirs and successors, do by these presents
 “ grant to the said mayor and commonalty, and “ citizens, and to their successors, that we, our “ heirs and successors, will yearly for ever dis“ charge, acquit, and save harmless, as well the “ said mayor and commonalty, and citizens, and “ their successors, as the said manors, messuages,
 “ lands, tenements, and all other the premises,
 “ with their appurtenances, and every part there-
 “ of, against us, our heirs, and successors; and “ against whatsoever persons concerning all and “ all manner of corodies, rents, fees, annuities, “ sums of money, and charges whatsoever, by “ any means going out, or to be paid out of the “ premises, or to be charged thereupon: saving
 “ the services above by these presents reserved,
 “ and the demises and grants by any means made
 “ for terms of life, or years, of the premises,
 “ or any parcel whereupon the old rent and more “ is reserved, and shall be due yearly during the “ terms aforesaid, and besides the covenants in
 “ the demises and grants in being; and saving 10l.
 “ by the year of the ancient farm for the town of “ Southwark aforesaid, by the said mayor and “ commonalty, and citizens, due in our exche“ quer, yearly to be paid and payable: willing,
 “ and by these presents by streight injunction “ commanding, as well our chancellor and gene“ ral overseers, and council of our said court of “ augmentations, and revenues of our crown,
 “ and all receivers, auditors, and other our offi“ cers, of ours, or of our heirs, whatsoever, “ for the time being, that they, and every of “ them, upon the only shewing of these our let“ ters patents, or of the inrollments of the “ same, without any other writ or warrant from “ us or our heirs, by any means to be obtained
 “ or prosecuted, shall make, and cause to be “ made unto the said mayor and commonalty,
 “ and citizens of the said city of London, and “ their successors, full power and due allowance,
 “ and manifest discharge of all such corodies,
 “ rents, fees, annuities, and sums of money “ whatsoever, going out, or to be paid out of “ the premises, or thereupon charged or to be “ charged, (except as before excepted.) And “ these our letters patents, and the enrollment

 “ of the same, shall be yearly, and from time to “ time, a sufficient warrant and discharge, as “ well to the said chancellor and general over“ seers, and to our council of our said court of “ augmentations and revenues of our crown, as
 “ to all receivers, auditors, and other officers,
 “ and ministers of ours, our heirs and successors,
 “ whatsoever, for the time being, in this behalf.
 “ We will also, and by these presents do grant,
 “ to the said mayor and commonalty, and citi“ zens of the said city of London, that they may
 “ and shall have these our letters patents in due “ manner made and sealed under our great seal of “ England, without fine or fee, great or small,
 “ to us in our hamper or elsewhere, to our use;
 “ to be by any means given, paid, or made, al“ though express mention be not in these presents
 “ made of the true yearly value, or of the cer“ tainty of the premises or of other gifts or “ grants of us, or by any our progenitors, to the “ said mayor and commonalty, and citizens, be“ fore this time made; any statute, act, or or“ dinance, provision, or restraint thereof made, “ ordained, or provided to the contrary, or any “ thing, cause, or matter whatsoever, in any “ thing notwithstanding. In witness whereof we “ have caused these our letters to be made pa“ tents. Witness myself at Westminster the “ twenty-third day of April, in the fourth year
 “ of our reign.”

In the year 1551 the sweating sickness broke out again in London, which took off a great number of its inhabitants. And so peculiar was it to the English in particular, that it proved fatal even to those that were abroad.

At this time the king wanting money, applied to the citizens of London to be security for a considerable sum he intended to borrow of Anthony Fugger and Co. bankers in Antwerp: and his majesty, in conjunction with the lord-mayor and citizens, were bound for the payment thereof.

In consequence of an act of common-council passed this year, a postern gate was made out of the wall on the north-side of the dissolved cloister of Friars minors, or Grey-Friars, which is now Christ's-hospital, to pass through to the hospital of St. Bartholomew.

The manor of Southwark with its appurtenances having been purchased of the king by the mayor and citizens, they became possessed of an hospital dedicated to St. Thomas the Apostle, and endowed by Peter de Rupibus, bishop of Winchester, with land valued at 343l. per annum.
 Soon after which they repaired and enlarged it at the expence of 1100l. and in November following admitted into it two hundred and sixty poor, sick, and helpless objects. The king incorporated the Lord-mayor, commonalty, and citizens of London governors of this hospital, with those of Christ's and Bridewell.

In the year 1552 the duke of Somerset was accused of high treason, on account of an intended rebellion, and being found guilty, was sentenced to be beheaded. Accordingly, after two months imprisonment, he was brought to the scaffold on Tower-hill, and there executed, the 22d of January, amidst a great crowd of spectators, many of whom dipped their handkerchiefs in his blood, which they preserved as a sacred relick.

This year king Edward VI. perfected what Henry VIII. in the last year of his reign, had begun. He founded Christ's-Hospital in the Greyfriars convent, for the relief and education of young and helpless children; and incorporated the governors by the title of "The mayor, commonalty, and citizens of the city of London, governors of the possessions, revenues, and goods of the hospitals of Edward VI. king of England, &c." He likewise gave the old palace of Bridewell to the city for the lodging of poor way-faring people, the correction of vagabonds and disorderly persons, and for finding them work. The city having appointed Christ's-hospital for the education of poor children, St. Bartholomew's and St. Thomas's in Southwark, for the maimed and diseased, the king formed these charitable foundations into a corporation: for, in a charter granted for that purpose, it is declared, "and that our intention may take the better effect, and that the lands, revenues, and other things granted for the support of the said hospitals, houses, and poor people, may be the better governed, for the establishment of the same, we do will and ordain, that the hospitals aforesaid, when they shall be so founded, erected, and established, shall be named, called, and stiled, The hospitals of Edward VI. of England, of Christ's, Bridewell, and St. Thomas the Apostle; and that the aforesaid mayor, commonalty, and citizens of London, and their successors shall be stiled, the governors of the said hospitals of Bridewell, Christ and St. Thomas the Apostle; and that the same governors, in deed, and in fact, and in name, shall be hereafter one body corporate and politic of themselves for ever. And we will that the same governors shall have perpetual succession."

In the beginning of this year the company of Antieatic-merchants, having engrossed almost the whole woollen manufacture trade, were, by order of king and council, dissolved.

CHAPTER XXXI.

Death of Edward VI. Lady Jane Grey first proclaimed, and afterwards the princess Mary. Sir Thomas Wyatt's rebellion. The queen harangues the citizens at Guildhall. Execution of Wyatt. Queen Mary married. Expensive living retrenched by act of common-council. Regulation of the taverns. Woodstreet-compter built. First bellman. Reception of the Russian ambassador. Death of queen Mary, and accession of queen Elizabeth. Her reception at London. The forces of the twelve companies reviewed. Remarkable accident of Sir William Hewet's daughter. Violent storm of thunder and lightning. A conduit erected in Walbrook. First lottery. The city cleared of beggars. The queen dines at Sir Thomas Gresham's. Citizens trained in the art of war. Great rain and flood. Return of the plague. Regulation of plays. Lamb's conduit erected. Imprisonment of aldermen Kympton. Great earthquake. Cheap-side cross destroyed. London-bridge water-works invented. Remarkable shooting match. A school for pick-pockets. Tobacco first brought into England. Rioters. Five of them executed.

IN the year 1553, in the month of July, the Lord-mayor, aldermen and principal merchants being ordered to attend the privy-council, were informed of the death of the king, and of his having appointed lady Jane Grey * his successor; in consequence of which she was proclaimed queen with the usual formalities in London. The same counsellors afterwards finding reasons to alter their opinions and conduct, repaired to Baynard's castle, there consulted with the Lord-mayor and aldermen, who all proceeded on horseback to Cheap-side, where they proclaimed princess Mary, daughter of king Henry VIII. at the cross with the greatest demonstrations of joy. On the last day of the month her majesty rode from the Tower of London to Westminster in a chariot, before whom the Lord-mayor in a crimson velvet gown, carried the sceptre of gold: after her majesty followed the princess Elizabeth her sister, and the lady Anne of Cleve, in another chariot; and the procession was closed by a great number of ladies on horseback, richly trapped

* This lady was soon after committed to the Tower, where she continued some months, and then received a message from queen Mary, desiring her to prepare for immediate death. She received the news without the least perturbation, and as she mounted the scaffold, addressed the spectators in words to this effect: "That she came thither for an example to posterity, that innocence cannot be any protection against greatness; and that she was to die, not

"for aspiring to a crown, but not for refusing one when it was offered her." She was beheaded on Tower-hill in the seventeenth year of her age. Her husband, the lord Guilford, was beheaded the same day; and about eleven days after her father, Henry Grey, shared the same fate.—For a more particular account of this unfortunate lady and her family, see Clarendon's History of England, Vol. I. page 527.

with velvets. She was received by the citizens in so pompous and joyful a manner, that she was pleased to return them her hearty thanks.

At the coronation of queen Mary, the Lord-mayor and twelve of the aldermen, according to ancient custom, officiated as chief butler; and the mayor, as usual, received for his fee a golden cup and ewer.

In order the more effectually to root out protestantism from this nation, a match was proposed between the queen and the king of Spain. This proceeding alarmed the nation; and the public grew so discontented, that the court thought it necessary to prepare against all events. The privy-council desired the Lord-mayor and aldermen to exert themselves in so critical a juncture for the preservation of the city; and advice being received of a dangerous insurrection in the county of Kent under the command of Sir Thomas Wyatt, they were strictly enjoined to put the city into a posture of defence.

In compliance with this command, the citizens not only placed a strong guard at every gate of the city, but raised five hundred men to march against Wyatt: this they did with such expedition, that in two days after they were sent down to Gravesend under the command of Alexander Bret, an experienced officer; where they were joined by the duke of Norfolk, and with him marched to Rochester, at which place Wyatt was, and had fortified the bridge. He and his men were offered a general pardon on their submission; but this not being complied with, the duke advanced to attack him. On which captain Bret, who commanded the Londoners, drew his sword, and addressed his men in the following words:

“ Gentlemen,

“ Nothing can be more barbarous and unjust than for us to fight against our friends and countrymen; especially considering that they are engaged in defence of the rights and liberties of our dear country, in opposition to the proud and imperious Spaniard; from whom, if the intended match succeeds, we can expect no other than that, if it may be called so, of becoming their slaves. Therefore, as that worthy patriot, Sir Thomas Wyatt, has laudably undertaken to protect and prevent us from being imposed upon by those lordly foreigners, I am humbly of opinion, that, instead of opposing, we ought, in duty to our country, to join him, for the more easily obtaining so salutary an end.”

The Londoners were so highly pleased with this speech, that they not only cried out, a Wyatt, a Wyatt; but effectually turned their ordnance against the queen's forces, insomuch, that they were obliged to retreat so precipitately as to leave their ammunition and ordnance to be a prey to Wyatt, who marched the next day to Deptford in his way into London.

The citizens were so alarmed on this near approach, and the court thrown into such confusion, that even the very judges and counsellors sat and pleaded in armour.

In this state of affairs her majesty repaired to Guildhall, attended by the mayor, aldermen and sheriffs, where she harangued them in a long and soothing speech, in which she accused Wyatt and his adherents of seeking nothing less than the total subversion of all good government: she insisted on her right to the crown, and declared she was wedded to the realm and to the laws of the country, which she loved as affectionately as a mother doth her children. She said she had no desire to marry any man, much less a prince who might hereafter be detrimental to the welfare of her subjects. That notwithstanding a match had been proposed, by her council, with the king of Spain, yet she was determined not to listen thereto without the concurrence of the parliament; and concluded with exhorting them to stand fast against these rebels. She knew that Wyatt had many friends in London, and therefore put the care of the city into the hands of the mayor and lord Howard.

On the third day of February Wyatt and his army arrived in Southwark, when he was joyfully received and supplied with all necessaries for his men. His intentions were to march into the city, but these were frustrated by the gates being shut, and the draw-bridge cut down. He then marched to Kingston, in order to pass the river, that he might attack them on the land side; but the bridge was broke, and the opposite shore guarded by two hundred men. These he soon drove away with his ordnance; and ordered some sailors who were under his command, to wade the river, and bring the barges that were moored on the other side: with which he so expeditiously repaired the bridge, that he was able to pass his army over it the night after. Having had the promise of his friends in London to join him, and to admit him into the city at a certain hour, he continued his march with an intention to reach Whitehall the next morning by break of day. This scheme was rendered abortive by the carriage of one of his guns breaking at Turnham-green, where he was obliged to halt. The time he stopped there proved his destruction; for he lost the opportunity of joining his friends in London, who, at a certain time of that night, had promised to admit him into the city. This disappointment occasioned Harper, who had been very instrumental in bringing over Bret and his Londoners, to desert him; after which he discovered the whole design of Wyatt to the court. The example set by Harper was followed by many others; insomuch, that in a few hours he found himself forsaken by near one half of his army. Notwithstanding this he continued his march; and, with the remains of his forces, arrived at St. James's. He there mounted his artillery on an eminence; and having detached two companies, under the command of Cudbert Vaughan to Westminster, left the principal part of his army with the artillery, and, at the head of five companies only, halted away for London. At Charing-cross he was attacked by Sir John Gage, with a superior force, whom he not only repulsed, but obliged him to take shelter in the palace of Whitehall, where he left him, and continued his march towards the city. In his way thither, the earl of Pembroke, with his cavalry, fell fell upon his rear, and cut off a considerable number of his men. On his arrival at Ludgate the gate was shut, and he was scoffed and laughed at by lord Howard, who commanded within. Finding himself thus circumstanced, and surrounded by his enemies, who gathered about him from every quarter, he resolved to return, but this was prevented by Pembroke's horse cutting off his retreat at Temple-bar. Thus perverted in every attempt, he, in a fit of despair, and at the instigation of Clarenceux king at arms, who pressed him to yield, with promises of mercy, surrendered himself to Sir Maurice Berkley. Thus ended this rebellion.

Wyat was beheaded soon after on Tower-hill, his head stuck upon the gallows at Hay-hill near Hyde-park, and his quarters hung up in different parts of the city. On the fifteenth of February fifty of his men were hung on gibbets erected for that purpose, and on the twentieth of the same month four hundred others were brought before the queen, with halsters about their necks, and received her majesty's free pardon.

In the year 1554 the match between Philip and Mary being concluded, their nuptials were solemnized; and on the twelfth of August they made their public entry into the city, which on this occasion was sumptuously adorned, and embellished with a great number of stately pageants.

The woolen trade being greatly hurt by the increase of hawkers and pedlars, the parliament passed an act this year for its better regulation; in which it was enacted. "That no person or persons, dwelling any where out of the cities or towns, (the liberties of the two universities only excepted) shall hereafter sell, or cause to be sold, by retail, any woolen or linnen cloth (except of their own making) or any haberdashery, grocery, or mercery ware, at or within any of the said cities, boroughs, towns corporate, or market towns, within this realm (except in open fairs) on pain to forfeit and lose, for every time so offending, six shilling and eight-pence, and the whole wares so sold, offered or proffered to be sold."

At this time an act of common-council passed for retrenching the extravagant method of living by the Lord-mayor, aldermen, sheriffs, and companies; in which it was enacted, that thenceforth they should have no more than one course either at dinner or supper; and that on a festival, being a flesh day, to consist of no more than seven dishes, whether hot or cold; and on every festival, being a fish day, eight dishes; and on every common flesh day, six dishes; and on every common fish day, seven dishes, exclusive of brawn, collops with eggs, sallads, pottage, butter, cheese, eggs, herrings, sprats and shrimps, together with all sorts of shell-fish and fruits: that the aldermen and sheriffs should have one dish less than the above-mentioned; and all the city companies at their several entertainments the same number of dishes as the aldermen and sheriffs; but with this restriction, to have neither swan, crane, nor bustard, upon the penalty of forty shillings; and that all the serjeants and other officers belonging to the mayor or sheriffs on flesh days to have three, and on fish days four dishes: but, when any foreign ministers or privy-counsellors are invited to any of the city entertainments, then the regulations or additions are left to the discretion of the mayor; always provided, that no other entertainment be given after dinner than Ipocrasts and Wafers: and the annual feasts on three days after Whitsunday and Bartholomew-tide were entirely laid aside. It was also enacted that no wyth should be carried away from the mayor's or sheriff's houses; and that none of them should keep a lord of misrule: and in consideration of the great and annual expence the mayor and sheriffs are at in providing a sumptuous entertainment every Lord-mayor's day at Guildhall, for the honour of the city and regaling persons of the greatest distinction, it was ordained, that every subsequent mayor, as an alleviation of that charge, shall be paid, out of the chamber of the city, the sum of one hundred pounds.

The great number of taverns and wine-vaults being found prejudicial to the morals of the people, the parliament this year enacted, that thenceforth the number of taverns or retailers of wine, within the city and liberty of London, should not exceed forty, nor those of Westminster three.

This year the keeper of Bread-street compter having ill treated his prisoners, and dishonoured the city by making his prison the common receptacle for whores and thieves, the Lord-mayor and citizens, at the common expence, erected a large and convenient building for that purpose in Wood-street, to which the prisoners were removed.

In the year 1555, there was so great a scarcity of corn, that it sold at fourteen shillings the quarter; and on the last day of September there fell such a quantity of rain, that boats were rowed from Westminster to King-street.

The citizens being still greatly hurt by the encroachments of foreigners on their respective trades, applied to the Lord-mayor and common-council for further relief, who enacted, "That thenceforth no citizen should presume to employ any foreigner in any manner of business, exclusive of felt-makers, cap-thickers, carders, spinners, knitters, and brewers, upon penalty of five pounds for every offence; and all offenders, upon conviction, refusing to pay, to be committed to prison, without bail or main-prize, till such fines were paid."

In the year 1556, Christopher Draper, alderman of Cordwainer-street ward, appointed a man to go about his ward by night with a bell, and, at certain places, with an audible voice, to bid the citizens be careful of their fires and lights, to help the poor, and to pray for the dead. This institution was soon after adopted in all other parts of the city.

A malignant fever raged violently at this time in London, which took off a great number of citizens; among whom were seven aldermen.

In the year 1558, the queen wanting money to carry on the war with France, applied to the citizens, who advanced her twenty thousand pounds, upon security, at 12 per cent.

This year queen Mary dying, was succeeded by her sister the princess Elizabeth, who, on the seventeenth seventeenth of November, was proclaimed queen in London with the usual solemnities; at which the citizens expressed such demonstrations of joy as perhaps were never seen on the like occasion. The next day her majesty came from Hatfield to London; and at Highgate was met by the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and citizens, in their formalities, who conducted her to the Charter-house, where she continued till the 28th; on which day her majesty repaired to London, in great state; and from thence, on the first of December, to Somerset-house. On the twelfth of January she returned by water to the Tower; and on the fourteenth of the same month, she rode, in the most pompous manner, through the city to Westminster. At the west-end of Cheapside, her majesty was addressed by the recorder in an affectionate speech, who, at the same time, presented her, in the name of the citizens, with a velvet purse richly embroidered, containing one thousand marks of gold. Her majesty thanked them for this token of their affection, promised to continue their good and gracious sovereign, and that she would not hesitate even to spare her blood for their protection.

Her majesty now resumed that work of reformation which had been begun by her father, and supported by her brother Edward VI. On the first Sunday after her accession to the throne, by virtue of a proclamation for that purpose, the English liturgy was read in all churches throughout the city of London; and the epistle and gospel for the day was begun to be read at mass-time in the English tongue. The citizens encouraged her majesty to persevere in this great work by exhibiting a specimen of the strength and forces they could raise in matters of emergency: for, on the second of July the twelve principal corporations of London sent out twelve companies, consisting of fourteen hundred men, to be mustered in Greenwich park before the queen; eight hundred of whom were pikemen in bright armour; four hundred harquebusses, in coats of mail and helmets, and two hundred halberdiers in German rivets: these were accompanied by twenty-eight whiffers richly dressed, and led by the twelve principal wardens of the aforesaid companies, well mounted, and dressed in black velvet, with six ensigns in white satin, furred with black sarsnet, and rich scarves.

This year died Sir William Hewet the mayor, who was a clothworker, and possessed of six thousand pounds per annum. He had three sons and one daughter. The following remarkable story of this daughter is still represented in a painting carefully preserved in the noble family of the duke of Leeds. Sir William, her father, lived at this time on London-bridge, and as the maid-servant was diverting the infant on the edge of an open window, it accidentally, slipped out of her hands and fell into the Thames. An apprentice of Sir William's, whose name was Osborn, and one of the ancestors of the duke of Leeds, in a direct line, seeing the child drop, immediately jumped out of the shop window into the river, and, to the great joy of its parents, brought it out unhurt. When she arrived at the age of maturity she had many suitors, among whom was the earl of Shrewsbury; but Sir William, her father, rejected all their advantageous proposals, and gratefully betrothed her, with a very large fortune, to him who had saved her life at the risk of his own, declaring, that as Osborn had saved her, Osborn should have her.

In the year 1560 Richard Hills, merchant-taylor, gave five hundred pounds towards the purchase of a house called the Manor of the Rose, on which the Merchant-tailors founded their free school in London; together with the ground and some cottages on Tower-hill, where he built alms-houses for fourteen old women.

About this time William Lambert, esq; by company a draper, founded queen Elizabeth's college for poor people in East-Greenwich, and left it in trust to the company of Drapers: it was afterwards called queen Elizabeth's college.

In the year 1561, in the month of June, there fell a prodigious quantity of rain, attended with dreadful claps of thunder. St. Paul's steeple was struck by a thunderbolt within a yard of the top: at first a little fire appeared, resembling the light of a torch, which so soon communicated itself to the weather-cock, that it fell down in eight minutes after; the wind rising high, the fire within an hour destroyed the whole steeple down to the very battlements; there likewise, receiving the timber that fell from the spire, burnt so violently, that the iron and bells melted, and fell down upon the stairs in the church; the east and west roofs catching fire, communicated themselves to the north and south, all which were destroyed before twelve o'clock at night; many houses were pulled down in the church-yard near the north-door, and a pinnacle on the east end, fell on a house in which were many people, but luckily no one received any hurt.

In the year 1563, the plague broke out violently in this city, and on the fifth of July, the Lord-mayor, by command of her majesty, ordered the master and wardens of the company of clerks to enquire the number of those who died of the plague within their respective parishes, and to make a certificate thereof; and that the curates and church-wardens should give notice to them of such houses where the plague appeared, and to forbid every person in such a house coming to church for the space of one month following, after the plague had been in it, and to fix a blue cross on the door of every house, with a writing underneath, signifying that the infection was there, and to avoid it. It was further ordered, on the ninth, that every man, in every street and lane should make bonfires three times a week, on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, till the infection should cease. In the beginning of August the Lord-mayor issued a proclamation for killing all dogs that should be found in the streets either by night or day. The number of people that died this year of the plague and other diseases, from the first of January to the last of December, amounted to twenty thousand, three hundred and seventy-two.

The citizens were this year reduced to the greatest state of misery, not only on account of the late dreadful plague, but likewise from a great scarcity of money and dearth of provisions.

In the year 1564, on the twenty-sixth of January, the river Thames was so agitated, that the

the tide recoiled twice, five hours before its time; and the same on the twenty-seventh; and likewise once the day after.

The common-council of London this year enacted, that all such citizens as should thenceforth be constrained to sell their household goods, leases of houses, or such like, should first cause the same to be cried through the city by a man with a bell, and then to be sold by the common outcrier appointed for that purpose; and he to receive one farthing in the pound for his trouble.

The river Thames was frozen over so hard on the twenty-first of December, as to admit all sorts of carriages and diversions on it.

In the year 1566 a proposition was made by Sir Thomas Gresham, merchant of London, to the Lord-mayor and citizens, to erect, at his own expence, a commodious building for merchants to meet and transact business, provided they would find him a convenient site for the same. The citizens, agreeing to this proposal, purchased, for the sum of three thousand, five hundred and thirty-two pounds, eighty houses in the two alleys called New St. Christopher's, and Swan-alley, leading out of Cornhill into Threadneedle-street; the materials of which eighty houses were sold for four hundred and seventy-eight pounds, and the said ground, when cleared, was conveyed to Sir Thomas Gresham, who, on the seventh of June, accompanied by several aldermen, laid the first brick of the new building: each alderman likewise laid a brick, and a piece of gold for the workmen, who persevered with such assiduity and resolution, that the whole building was roofed by the month of November in the next year, and was soon after finished under the title of The Burse.

By the will of Sir Thomas, dated the twenty-sixth of November 1579, he devised this stately building, with all its appurtenances, and the profits arising thereby, to the mayor and citizens of London, and the company of Mercers, to be equally enjoyed and possessed by them, on condition that the citizens, out of their moiety, should pay a salary of fifty pounds per annum each, to four persons, who should read lectures in divinity, astronomy, music and geometry, in Gresham-college; and to pay six pounds, thirteen shillings and four-pence per annum each, to eight alms-people, situate behind the said college, in Broad-street; and ten pounds yearly to each of the prisons of Newgate, Ludgate, King's-bench, Marshalsea, and Wood-street Compter. That the Mercers, out of their moiety, should pay fifty pounds each per annum, to three persons to read lectures in law, physic, and rhetoric, in his mansion-house; and one hundred pounds per annum for four quarterly dinners to be provided at their hall for the entertainment of the whole company; and also to pay ten pounds per annum to each of the following places, viz. the Poultry Compter, Christ's-hospital, St. Bartholomew's, the Spital, Bethlehem, and St. Thomas's.

In the year 1567, there being a great increase of foreigners in the metropolis, and a jealousy subsisting between England and Spain, her majesty commanded the Lord-mayor to take the name, quality, and profession of all strangers residing within the city of London; on which examination there appeared to be, Scots forty; French four hundred and twenty-eight; Spaniards and Portuguese forty-five; Italians one hundred and forty; Dutch two thousand and thirty; Burgundians forty-four; Danes two; Liegeois one.

The following year Sir Thomas Rowe, knight, Lord mayor, among many other charitable actions, gave Old Bethlehem burial ground, containing about one acre, which he enclosed with a brick wall, for the interment of poor citizens, gratis. He likewise appointed a sermon to be preached every Whitsunday in the morning before the Lord-mayor and aldermen.

In the year 1569, a lottery began drawing at the west door of St. Paul's, on the eleventh of June, and continued incessantly night and day till the sixth of May in the following year. This is the first lottery mentioned in English history.

This year an order was made by the common-council for the sixteen beadles belonging to the hospitals to take up all sturdy beggars and vagrants, and to carry them to Bridewell; the sick, aged, lame, and blind to be taken to St. Bartholomew's; and all children beggars under the age of sixteen, to Christ's Hospital; appointing a proper district to the beadles of each hospital: on neglect of which they were to be punished with severe penalties. This, however, had not the desired effect; for the next year the streets swarmed again with beggars and vagrants. A resolution was then formed of appointing city-marshals; and the committee for this purpose chose William Symphon and John Read, whose office was to take such course with these vagrants and wandering people, as might clear the streets of them; for which a consideration was allowed of six shillings and eight-pence a day for them and their horses, and six persons a piece of their own choosing to attend them at one shilling each. For the more easy discharging this office, it was ordered that one month's pay should be given before hand; and accordingly the aldermen, by way of loan, disbursed the same, amounting to thirty-five pounds, nine shillings and four-pence. It was likewise thought convenient that twelve partisans suitably and conveniently armed, should be provided by the chamberlain for this service at the expence of the city, and coats or mandilions for the attendants on the marshals. The office of city-marshal took its origin from this incident.

The execution of the above office was attended with such expence to the city, that they soon after wisely determined to balance it, by suppressing the pompous cavalcade of the city-watch: instead of which the common-council substituted the common-watch, which, from that time has been continued to the present.

This year the plague broke out again in London, which occasioned the Michaelmas term to be adjourned to that of Hilary; and the Lord-mayor and aldermen issued their special orders for preventing its spreading, and for hindering idle persons going about, who might disperse it among the citizens.

About this time the city laid out eight hundred and fourteen pounds, fifteen shillings and eight-pence, in cleansing the city ditch, between Ald-

F f f

gate

gate and the postern on Tower-hill, and making a new sewer, and wharf, of timber, from the head of the postern into the town ditch, which, before this time, had always lain open, and was well stocked with good fish of divers sorts.

On the 23d of January, in the year 1570, her majesty, attended by the nobility, went into the city, and dined with Sir Thomas Gresham, knt. at his own house in Bishopsgate-street. After dinner her majesty returned through Cornhill, went into the Burs, newly built by Sir Thomas, and after viewing it in all parts, commanded proclamation to be made by a herald, with sound of trumpet, that thenceforth it should go by the appellation of the Royal-Exchange.

A dispute arose at this time between the tenants of the bishop of Ely, and the Lord-mayor of London respecting the exercise of the mayor's authority among them: the dispute was referred to the lord-keeper, the two chief justices, and the chancellor of the exchequer, who determined it in favour of the city: and that for the future, the mayor might as justly exercise his authority in the bishop's rents in Holbourn, as in any other part of the city.

In the year 1572 the poulterers of London having greatly enhanced the value of poultry, the Lord-mayor and aldermen, on the 4th of April, ascertained the following prices:

	l.	s.	d.
The best goose, at ———	0	1	0
The best wild mallard ———	0	0	5
The best capon at ———	0	1	0
The second sort ———	0	0	10
The best hen ———	0	0	7
The best chickens ———	0	0	3
An inferior sort ———	0	0	1½
The best woodcock ———	0	0	5
The green plover ———	0	0	3
Pidgeons, per dozen ———	0	1	0
Blackbirds ditto ———	0	0	10
Rabbits, each ———	0	0	3
Larks ditto ———	0	0	6
The best butter, at per pound ———	0	0	3
The best eggs five for ———	0	0	1

This year her majesty intending to make a tour into the countries, appointed the archbishop of Canterbury, the bishop of London, lord Wentworth, Sir Anthony Cook, Sir Thomas Worth, Sir Owen Hopton, Sir Thomas Gresham, Dr. Wylson, and Thomas Wilbraham, to assist the mayor and aldermen in the well governing the city during her absence.

On the 14th of September, in the year 1574, there fell such a violent shower of rain, that a young man eighteen years of age endeavouring to leap over the channel on Dowgate-hill, the stream was so rapid, that it carried him away, and he was drowned.

The institution of plays or interludes being at this time degenerated into nurseries of vice and lewdness, the common-council passed an act, "that no play should be openly played within the liberty of the city, wherein should be uttered any words, examples, or doings of any unchastity, sedition, or such like unfit and uncomely matter, upon pain of imprisonment for fourteen days, and five pounds for every

"such offence. That no inn-keeper, &c. shall shew or play, or cause to be shewn or played; within his house or yard, any play which shall not be first perused, and allowed by the Lord-mayor and court of aldermen's order. And that no person shall be allowed to play, but shall be thereunto admitted by the Lord-mayor and aldermen. And that every person to be licensed, shall pay to the use of the poor in the hospitals of the city, or of the poor visited with sickness, certain sums to be agreed upon, upon pain of forfeiting his said licence. And that all sums and forfeitures incurred by any offence against this act, and all forfeitures of bonds, shall be employed to the relief of the poor of the hospitals, or of the poor infected or diseased in the city; to be sued for and recovered by the chamberlain in the court of the outer chamber of Guildhall, London, called the mayor's-court."

An exceeding high tide happened this year on the sixth of November. After having ebbed about an hour, a preternatural reflux returned with such impetuosity, that the Thames soon overflowed its banks, and, by filling the marshes, and the neighbouring cellars and warehouses, did incredible damage.

Although the number of alehouses had been reduced in the late reign, yet they were at this time so greatly multiplied, that the mayor, assisted by the recorders of Southwark and Lambeth, put down, within their several jurisdictions, upwards of two hundred. This example was soon followed by those in Westminster, the duchy of Lancaster, Tower Hamlets, and other parts of Middlesex adjoining to London.

In the year 1576, on digging the well where the pump now stands in Leadenhall-street, near the end of Lime-street, about the depth of thirteen feet on the virgin earth, was discovered a hearth built of roman bricks with charcoals thereon.

The following year Mr. William Lamb, citizen and clothworker, erected a conduit of springs drawn together at the north extremity of Red-lion-street, Holbourn, to feed the conduit on Snow-hill, in a leaden pipe two hundred yards long, the expence of which amounted to fifteen hundred pounds. This conduit still retains the name of its builder, who left to the clothworkers company his dwelling-house, situate a little south-west from where Cripplegate stood, with lands and tenements to the value of thirty-pounds per annum, for a minister to read divine service on Sundays, Wednesdays and Fridays, every week, in the chapel adjoining to his house called St. James's in the wall, at the north-end of Monkwell-street, and for cloathing twelve men with a frize gown, one lockram shirt, and a good strong pair of winter shoes; and twelve women with a frize gown, a lockram smock, and a good pair of winter shoes, all made ready for wearing; to be given to such as were honest and in distress on the first of October.

In the year 1579 William Kympton, alderman, was, by the lord-chancellor, committed to the Fleet-prison for concealing a letter sent him by the vicar of Hadley in Middlesex, informing him of an insurrection at Northall, where the people had tumultuously

Engraved for Chamberlain's History of London.

View of an Ancient Shooting-match between the CITIZENS of LONDON.

tumultuously pulled down some pates: this offence being deemed a misprision of treason, he was, by the court of star-chamber, fined five hundred marks, and imprisoned during her majesty's pleasure.

The following year a dreadful earthquake happened in London on the sixth of April, which, though its duration did not exceed a minute, shattered many houses and churches, and killed several of the citizens.

About this time another inquisition was ordered to be taken of the number of foreigners in London, when, on the report being made, there appeared to be near three times the number as in the year 1568. This considerable increase produced a remonstrance from the Lord-mayor and aldermen, against the number of new buildings and inhabitants within the city and suburbs of London. In consequence of which her majesty issued out a proclamation, forbidding any new buildings of any house or tenement within three miles from the gates of the city, where no former house could be remembered to have stood; and likewise not to suffer more families than one to inhabit any house; empowering the Lord-mayor to commit offenders against this proclamation, or to hold them to bail. The next Lord-mayor when he took the oath in the exchequer, was strictly charged by the lord-treasurer to enforce the said proclamation, because, said he, from an increase of people there will arise an excessive price of victuals and fuel, and consequently great danger of infection and plague. His lordship farther admonished him to enquire diligently after fugitives, especially from Rome, who were mislikers of the religion, state and government, practicers of sedition, and persons dangerous to the realm.

The citizens of London became so extravagant in their dress, that it was thought necessary by her majesty to issue a proclamation against excess of apparel, gold chains and cloaks; which the men at this time wore down to their heels: by which also the length of daggers was limited to twelve inches beside the hilts, and swords to three feet.

In the year 1581, the cross in Cheapside having been frequently presented by the inquest as a public nuisance, in obstructing carriages, and the complainants not finding any redress, the inhabitants, (who were likewise offended at the figures with which the cross was adorned) so highly resented it, that in the night-time it was almost demolished by persons unknown.

In the year 1582, the luxury of the times having greatly prevailed among people of all degrees, in their apparel, particularly apprentices, the Lord-mayor and common-council enacted, "That no apprentice whatsoever should presume, 1. To wear any apparel but what he receives from his master. 2. To wear no hat, nor any thing but a woollen cap, without any silk in or about the same. 3. To wear neither ruffles, cuffs, loose collars, nor other thing than a ruff at the collar, and that only of a yard and half long. 4. To wear no doublets but what are made of canvas, fustian, sackcloth, English leather, or woollen, without any gold, silver, or silk trimming. 5. To wear no other coloured cloth, or kersey in hose or stockings, than white, blue, or russet. 6. To wear no other breeches but what shall be of the same stuffs as the doublets, and neither stitched, laced, or bordered. 7. To wear no other than a plain upper coat, of cloth or leather, without pinking, stitching, edging, or silk about it. 8. To wear no other lirtout than a cloth gown or cloak, lined or faced with cloth, cotton or baize, with a fixed round collar, without stitching, guarding, lace or silk. 9. To wear no pumps, slippers or shoes, but of English leather, without being pinked, edged, or stitched: nor girdles, nor garters, other than of crewel, woollen, thread, or leather, without being garnished. 10. To wear no sword, dagger, or other weapon, but a knife: nor a ring, jewel of gold, nor silver, nor silk, in any part of his apparel, on pain of being punished at the discretion of the master for the first offence; to be publicly whipped at the hall of his company for a second offence; and to serve six months longer than specified in his indentures for a third offence." And it was further enacted, "That no apprentice should frequent or go to any dancing, fencing, or musical schools: nor keep any chest, press, or other place, for keeping of apparel or goods, but in his master's house, under the penalties aforesaid."

This year one Peter Maurice, a German engineer, proposed a scheme to the Lord-mayor and aldermen for erecting a machine to supply the city with Thames water, which scheme being approved of, the same was erected in the River near London-bridge. As an encouragement for this great piece of ingenuity, Maurice obtained a lease of one arch, and a place for fixing his engine upon, at the north-end of the bridge, for the term of five hundred years, at the rent of ten shillings per annum. Two years after this, he obtained a lease for another arch: and the citizens finding the great utility of this invention, he and his posterity grew wealthy by its improvements. In 1701 they sold the property to Richard Soams, a goldsmith, for thirty-six thousand pounds. Maurice having first obtained another lease of the fourth arch. Soams got from the city a confirmation of Maurice's lease, at the yearly rent of twenty shillings, and a fine of three hundred pounds. After which Soams divided the whole property in three hundred shares, at five hundred pounds each, and made it a company.

In the year 1583, in the month of September, the citizens of London held a very splendid shooting match, under the direction of the captain of the London archers, who was stiled the duke of Shoreditch. * the captain summoned his * King Henry VIII, having appointed a great shooting match at Windsor, it happened, that, towards night, when the diversion was almost over, one Barlow, a citizen of London, and inhabitant of Shoreditch, out shot all the rest; with which the king was so well pleased, that he told Barlow, that thenceforth he should be called, the duke of Shoreditch: which title the captain of the London archers preserved for several generations after.

nominal

nominal nobility to attend him with their several companies under the following titles, viz. The marquisses of Barlow, Clerkenwell, Islington, Hoxton, and Shacklewell, and the earl of Pancrafts, &c. Being met at the time and place appointed, the pompous march began at the merchant-taylors hall, and proceeded through Broad-street, (the residence of the duke their captain) to Moorfields, and from thence by Finsbury to Smithfield; where, after performing several exercises, they shot at the target for glory. This body consisted of three thousand archers sumptuously apparelled, nine hundred and forty-two of whom had golden chains about their necks: those were preceded by whiffers and bellmen, that made up the number four thousand, besides pages and footmen.

In the year 1585 her majesty being apprehensive of an invasion from Spain, the citizens, at their own expence, sent five thousand men compleatly armed, to encamp on Blackheath; at which place they were reviewed different times by the queen: the said citizens soon after sent a considerable body of foldiers compleatly armed, and cloathed in red, to the assistance of the Dutch against the Spaniards.

This year a house was discovered on Smart's-key, near Billingsgate, wherein was a school for teaching young boys to pick-pockets, or cut purses: for which purpose two devices were hung up, the one was a purse, the other a pocket; the latter of which had counters in it, and was hung about with hawks-bells, and over it a small sacring-bell. In the purse was some silver, and he that could take out a counter without any noise was adjudged to be a public Foyster; that is, a pickpocket; and he that could take a piece of silver out of the purse without disturbing any of the bells, was allowed, according to the terms of that art, to be a Nypper; that is, a pick-purse, or cut-purse.

In the year 1586, the earl of Northumberland having been committed to the Tower on suspicion of conspiring, with some others, to invade England, and set the queen of Scots at liberty, was found dead in his bed, shot in the body with three bullets under his pap, and the door bolted on the inside.

This same year, on the sixth of December, Mary, queen of Scots was sentenced to be beheaded. The Lord-mayor and aldermen, together with many of the nobility, proclaimed the dreadful sentence in Cheapside, at Leadenhall, the end of London-bridge, and that of Chancery-lane. Soon after which she was executed on a scaffold erected for that purpose.

In the year 1587 her majesty still continued to prepare against any attempts that might be made by the Spaniards, sent the Lord-mayor, on the eighth of March, the following letter:

" Trusty and well-beloved we greet you well.
 " Whereas upon information given unto us of " great preparations made in foreign parts with
 " an intent to attempt somewhat against this our
 " realm, we gave present order that our said
 " realm should be put in order of defence;
 " which we have caused to be performed in all
 " parts accordingly, saving in the city of London.
 " We therefore knowing your readines,

" by former experience, to perform any service
 " that well-affected subjects ought to yield to
 " their prince and sovereign, do let you understand,
 " that within our said city our pleasure is,
 " that there be forthwith put in a readines to
 " serve for defence of our person, upon such occasions
 " as may fall out, the number of ten thousand able men,
 " furnished with armour and weapons convenient;
 " of which number, our meaning is, that six thousand be enrolled
 " under captains and ensigns, and to be trained
 " at times convenient, according to such further
 " direction as you shall receive from our privy-council,
 " under six of their hands, which our pleasure is
 " you do follow from time to time in the ordering
 " and training of the said numbers of men. And these
 " our letters shall be your sufficient warrant for the doing of the
 " same. Given under our signet, &c."

Two days after, this was supported by another letter from the privy-council. These being laid before a court of common-council, they unanimously agreed to grant ten thousand troops as required; and that the aldermen and common-council should raise them in their several wards respectively. No sooner was this executed than the lords of the privy-council sent another letter to the Lord-mayor, entreating him to have them ready to march where her majesty should command to attack the enemy. This was not only immediately complied with, but on the third of April, the common-council granted a supply of sixteen of the largest ships in the river, and four frigates, which were fitted out with the greatest expedition, and supplied with all the necessaries of war. The expence of the ten thousand men and these ships, which were afterwards increased to thirty-eight, was defrayed by the citizens during the time they continued in the service of her majesty.

The following is a list of the quota of troops raised in the several wards of the city.

			men
In Farringdon within	—	—	807
Aldgate	—	—	347
Coleman-street	—	—	229
Bassishaw	—	—	177
Billingsgate	—	—	365
Broad-street ward	—	—	373
Bread-street ward	—	—	386
Aldersgate ward	—	—	232
Bridge ward within	—	—	383
Dowgate ward	—	—	384
Cornhill ward	—	—	191
Castle-baynard ward	—	—	551
Lime-street ward	—	—	99
Cheap ward	—	—	358
Queenhithe ward	—	—	404
Farringdon without	—	—	1264
Cordwainers ward	—	—	301
Tower-street ward	—	—	444
Walbrook ward	—	—	290
Vintry ward	—	—	364
Portoken ward	—	—	243
Candlewick ward	—	—	215
Cripplegate ward	—	—	925
Bishopsgate ward	—	—	326
Langbourn ward	—	—	349
			This

This year Mr. Ralph Lane, on his return from the West-Indies, brought some tobacco with him, which was the first of that weed ever seen in England.

In the year 1590, the owners of the coal-works at Newcastle, entered into a combination to enhance the price of that commodity in London, from four shillings to nine shillings the chaldron. And the lord high admiral of England, in the year following, claimed a right to the coal-metage in the port of London; but the mayor and citizens shewing their prior right to the same, he receded from his pretensions. To prevent all controversies in that respect for the future, the citizens applied to the queen, who confirmed their right to the same.

The following year the plague broke out again so violently in London, that notwithstanding the most salutary measures were taken for stopping its progress, it took off no less than ten thousand, six hundred and seventy-five citizens.

In the year 1593, the city of London and its suburbs being greatly pestered with vagrants, beggars, and thieves, her majesty issued a proclamation for suppressing them, and commanded the Lord-mayor and other officers to execute the same within three miles of the city.

The following year, in obedience to her majesty's request, the Lord-mayor and common-council agreed to fit out six ships of war at their own expence, and two frigates; and to store the same with provisions and ammunition for three months; two days after which they likewise agreed to raise four hundred and fifty men for the service of her majesty, and to maintain them at their own expence; for which a fifteenth was granted and raised among the citizens.

In the year 1595 the apprentices of London, having been seduced by a set of incorrigible villains, were arrived at such a pitch of insolence, that, to prevent riots, it was found necessary by the mayor to lay the case before the lord-treasurer for her majesty's protection. On the fourth of July, a royal proclamation was issued for apprehending such vagrants and rioters; in which her majesty appointed a provost-marshal, with power to apprehend all such as might be refractory to the officers of justice, and, by order of martial law, to execute them on the gallows. Sir Thomas Wilford, who was appointed provost-marshal, patrolled the city, with a numerous attendance on horseback, armed with pistols, and apprehended many of the rioters, whom he took before the justices appointed for their examination. On the twenty-second of July they were tried at Guildhall, and five of them being condemned, were, two days after, agreeable to their sentence, executed on Tower-hill. This put a stop to rioting for a considerable time after.

This year, her majesty, having preferred the recorder of London, informed the citizens of her intent to make choice of one herself; for which purpose she desired the Lord-mayor to send her the names of such persons as were intended to be put in nomination for that office. The citizens, alarmed at this extraordinary proceeding, and suspecting it to be a stroke on their rights and liberties, nominated only one: with which nomination Sir John Spencer the mayor sent a letter to the lord-treasurer; the most material part of which runs thus: "The grave commoners of the city of London hearing a common bruit, that a new recorder was speedily to be chosen, at a common-council held at Guildhall on Tuesday last for other causes, one of them in that behalf made very earnest suit, because in all our counsels and consultations (which are almost daily for one cause or other) the recorder hath of ancient time been present as a principal man, both for advice in law and other direction; and now, of late, those which we have had have been for the most part absent; that therefore myself and the aldermen would take care, that hereafter we chuse no serjeant nor other stranger; but only some one that is resident and dwelling among us, and acquainted with our customs; and to make choice of ourselves, as we have been wont, without sending any names, as hath been mentioned: and therefore very urgent suit was made in common-council on the behalf of the commoners; whereof I have thought it my duty to advertise your lordship, most humbly desiring you to be a means, that we may herein have our own free election, according to our ancient custom: so that though we have lately had most worthy men, yet we have found their long and much absence a great mahim unto us. And for mine own opinion, my good lord, as also of many others, we have one born and dwelling amongst us, whom we have great experience of, and think very able to do us service in this behalf; his name is Mr. James Altham, son of Mr. Altham, late of Essex, esq; he is a bencher of Gray's-inn, and one of our ordinary sworn counsellors of the city, well acquainted with our customs, and very well thought of for his honesty and skill in law, both throughout the city and elsewhere." After which he concludes with his earnest request that her majesty would be pleased to approve this nomination.

In the year 1596, while the Lord-mayor and aldermen were attending a sermon at St. Paul's cross, they received a message from the queen, commanding them to raise a thousand able bodied men with all expedition. In compliance with which, they immediately left the church, and applied so diligently, that before eight at night, they obtained the number of men required, who were compleatly armed and ready to march before next morning: but unexpected advice being received from Calais, to whose relief they were intended, their appearance became unnecessary, and they were all discharged. The court, however, being again alarmed, on Easter-day in the morning sent another message to the Lord-mayor and aldermen, commanding them to raise the like number of men as before. In obedience to which they, with their proper officers, repaired to the different churches in their respective jurisdictions, and, causing the doors to be shut, they took, during the time of divine service, the number of men required; who being properly armed

G g g

armed with all possible expedition, began their march the night following for Dover, in order for their embarkation for France: but her majesty receiving advice of the reduction of Calais

by the Spaniards, they were countermanded, and received orders to return to their respective habitations.

CHAPTER XXXII.

A great Famine. Six thousand men and sixteen ships raised by the citizens for the use of her majesty. Remarkable hurricane. Earl of Essex endeavours to engage the city to his party. Is defeated. Surrenders and executed. Act of common-council against bawlers, &c. Accession of king James I. to the throne. His reception into London, and coronation. Prohibition of fairs and new buildings. The power of the Court of Conscience farther enlarged by parliament. The king's first charter to the citizens. Is entertained by the Lord-mayor, and afterwards by the merchant-tailors. Great frost. The king's second charter. Rebuilding of Aldgate. Erecting of public graneries. Foundation and endowment of the Charter-house. Hicks's-ball founded.

IN the year 1597 the harvest failing by the great quantity of rain that fell in England, so great a famine ensued, that wheat sold in London for five pounds four shillings the quarter, and rye at three pounds twelve shillings.

In the year 1599 the enemies of the earl of Essex having been apprized of his coming with an army from Ireland to suppress these courtiers, artfully gave out, that the Spaniards were meditating another invasion. In consequence of which her majesty demanding the assistance of the city of London on this occasion, they supplied her with six thousand soldiers, and fitted out sixteen ships of war; one moiety whereof were to take the field, and the other, composed of eminent citizens, to attend the queen as her body guard, at their own and the city's expence. During this time of public danger, by command of her majesty, strong guards were kept in all quarters of the city, chains drawn across every night at the ends of all streets and lanes, and a candle and lantern hung out at every door on pain of death.

In the year 1600, on the 23d of December, there was a most terrible hurricane, which did great damage to the city by blowing down chimnies, stripping churches and houses, and tearing up trees by the roots. The Gravescend tilt-boat was lost in the storm, and nineteen persons who were on board perished.

This year the citizens raised 500 soldiers, and, by the command of the queen, sent them into Ireland. And in the following year they fitted out several gallies for her service at sea, towards the charge of which three fifteenths were raised in the city by the common-council.

The earl of Essex, accompanied only by a few of his friends, arrived from Ireland at his house in the Strand: and having been made to believe that the citizens were disposed to rise in his favour should he enter the city, he too precipitately made the attempt, but found himself disappointed: at last, by order of the queen, he was proclaimed a traitor in Cheapside, and his retreat cut off by forces placed at Ludgate. In consequence of this his few friends deserted him, and he was obliged to fly by water to Essex-house; to which place being pursued by the earl of Nottingham, and finding no prospect of success from his defence against the queen's forces, his lordship surrendered at discretion. Whereupon he was taken prisoner to Lambeth palace, and afterwards removed to the Tower, in which place he was beheaded. He was the last person who was executed within the walls of the Tower.

The trade and navigation on the coast of England having been greatly interrupted by Spanish privateers, her majesty commanded a number of ships of war to be built; for the defraying of which expence no less than five fifteenths were raised by the city of London; and a proclamation was issued for discharging all such debtors in the goals of London as were willing to enter on board the said ships.

In the year 1602, the trade of the city of London having been greatly detrimented by the increase of hawkers and pedlars, the common-council enacted, "That no citizen or other inhabitant of London, for the future, should under any pretence whatsoever, presume to let, before his, her, or their house, any stall, stand, or perpresture, upon the penalty of twenty shillings. And that all hawkers offending against the tenour of this act, not only to forfeit all their goods so offered to sale, but likewise pay a fine of twenty shillings for every such offence."

In the year 1603 queen Elizabeth made her last demand of the citizens; which was, to fit out two ships of war and a tender for her service, and to maintain them at the expence of six thousand pounds per annum.

It is something very singular, that, during the long reign of this queen, and considering the readiness with which the citizens of London always answered her demands, she did not grant them any new charter of privileges, nor even so much as confirm their ancient franchises.

On the demise of queen Elizabeth, the privy-council, assisted by the Lord-mayor, having acknowledged knowned James king of Scotland to be the lawful successor to the crown of England, he was proclaimed in the city of London on the 24th of March with the greatest demonstrations of Joy.

On his majesty's approach to London, he was met at Waltham by Sir John Swinnerton, one of the sheriffs, (his colleague being ill) attended by sixty servants in rich liveries; and on his arrival at Stamford-hill, he was received by the Lord-mayor and aldermen in their scarlet robes, with gold chains about their necks, accompanied by five hundred of the principal citizens on horseback. His majesty was conducted from hence to the Charter-house, where he was sumptuously entertained by lord Howard, for four days successively. But the great preparations that had been making for the king's public entry into London, and the city rejoicings, was postponed to the following year, on account of the plague, which at this time raged so violently in the city, that within the year it carried off thirty thousand five hundred and seventy eight persons, three thousand and ninety of whom died in one week.

This calamity, however, being happily over, on the fifteenth of March the king, and queen, and prince Henry rode from the Tower of London through the city, which on this occasion was decorated in the most pompous manner, and embellished with seven magnificent triumphal arches, and a great number of stately pageants. The streets were adorned with the richest silks and carpets, and lined on each side by the several corporations in their formalities and stands, with their flags and bands of music.

On the twenty-fifth of July, the day appointed for the coronation; the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and twelve principal citizens, attended in quality of chief butler of England, and received the usual fee of a gold cup and ewer. The following day the Lord-mayor and aldermen waited on his majesty agreeable to the royal command, and those who had not been knighted were now dignified with that honour.

In consequence of the great plague in London, a proclamation was issued for suppressing not only Bartholomew fair, but all others within fifty miles of the city: and another strictly prohibiting all persons from building on new foundations within the walls, and within three miles of the city gates, on the penalty that all such houses should be destroyed.

In the year 1604, the Court of Requests or Court of Conscience, which had been originally established in 1517, by act of common-council, was found so beneficial to the inferior class of citizens, that the corporation, in order to strengthen their own act against the artful attempts of the lawyers and unmerciful creditors, applied to parliament, and obtained an act for more firmly establishing the said court. This precaution, however, did not answer the good end proposed; for many persons converted some particular words in the said act for their own lucre and benefit, contrary to the good meaning of the said act. To remedy which, another act of parliament passed the following year, whereby the authority of the said court was much farther enlarged, viz. "That every citizen and freeman of London, and every other person and persons, inhabiting, or that shall inhabit, within the city of London, or liberties thereof, being a tradesman, victualler, or labouring man, which have, or shall have, any debts owing to him or them, not amounting to forty shillings, by any citizen or freeman, or by any other person or persons, being a victualler, tradesman, or labouring man, inhabiting within the said city, or the liberties thereof, should or might cause such debtors to be warned to appear before the said commissioners of the said court of requests. And the said commissioners or any three or more of them, shall have power to set down such orders between plaintiff and defendant, creditor and debtor, touching such debts not amounting to forty shillings, as they shall find to stand with equity and good conscience, and to administer an oath to the creditor or debtor, and to such witnesses as shall be produced on each part; and to commit to prison, in one of the compters, such creditor and debtor as shall not appear upon lawful summons, or not perform such order, as the said commissioners, or any three or more of them, shall set down." With this proviso, "That this shall not extend to any debt for any rent upon any lease of lands or tenements, or any other real contracts; nor to any other debt that shall arise by reason of any cause concerning testament or matrimony, or any thing concerning, or properly belonging to the ecclesiastical court, albeit the same shall be under forty shillings."

The citizens had so effectually wrought themselves into the favour of the king, that his majesty, this same year, granted them the following charter:

"James, by the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c. To all to whom our letters patents shall come, greeting. Whereas our beloved the mayor and commonalty, and citizens, of our city of London, time out of mind, have had, exercised, and ought, and have accustomed themselves to have and exercise, the office of bailiff, and conservation of the water of Thames, to be exercised and occupied by the mayor of the said city for the time being, during the time of his mayoralty, or by his sufficient deputies, in, upon, and about the water of Thames, that is to say, from the bridge of the town of Staines, in the county of Middlesex, and toward the east unto London-bridge, and from thence to a certain place called Kentdall, otherwise Yenland, otherwise Yenlet, towards the sea, and towards the east, and in Medway, and in the port of the city of London aforesaid, upon whatsoever bank, and upon every shore, and upon every wharf, of the said water of Thames, within the limits and bounds aforesaid, and in, and upon, and about all and every of them: and also for all the time aforesaid, have, had, and taken, and ought and have accustomed to have and take, to their own proper use, by the mayor of the same city for the time being, during the time of his mayoralty,

" mayoralty, or by his sufficient deputies, all
 " wages, rewards, fees and profits, belonging to " the said office of water-bailiff. And whereas the " said mayor and commonalty, and citizens, from
 " all the time aforesaid, have had and exercised
 " the office of measurer, and measuring of all
 " coals and grain of whatsoever kind; and also
 " of all kinds of salt, and all kind of apples,
 " pears, plumbs, and other fruits whatsoever;
 " and also all kind of roots eatable, of what
 " kind soever, and of onions, and of all other
 " merchandizes, wares, and things whatsoever
 " measureable, and the measuring of every of " them, in or unto the said port of London com" ing, carried, or brought upon the said waters
 " in whatsoever ship, boat, barge, or vessel, float" ing, laden, and being on whatsoever part of " the said water of Thames, or upon whatsoever
 " bank, shore, or wharf of the said water of " Thames, which shall come to, arrive, abide, be " delivered, or laid down, from the said bridge
 " of the said town of Staines westward to the " said bridge of London, and from thence to the " said place called Yendall, otherways Yenlet, to" wards the sea, and towards the east, and in Med-
 " way: and in the said port of the city of Lon" don aforesaid, to exercise and occupy the same
 " office by the mayor of the city, for the time,
 " during the time of his mayoralty, or by his
 " sufficient deputies. And also for all the said
 " time they have had and taken, and ought to " have and take, to their proper use, by the mayor
 " of the said city for the time being, during his
 " mayoralty, or by his sufficient deputies, all
 " wages, rewards, fees, and profits to the said of" fice belonging: and notwithstanding they,
 " the mayor and commonalty, and citizens, of " late times thereof have been disquieted, and in
 " some measuring aforesaid unjustly hindered, and
 " especially in the said office of measuring coals,
 " supposing that office to the mayor and com-
 " monalty, and citizens, anciently not to apper-
 " tain, neither by any lawful grant or prescrip" tion as yet to appertain and belong, whereas
 " in truth it doth manifestly and plainly appear,
 " that the same offices, and all other premises to
 " them of old time appertaining, and do now
 " of right appertain, and that they lawfully re" ceived and enjoyed, and ought to have, take
 " and enjoy the wages and rewards, fees and
 " perquisites thereof: we therefore, to take away
 " all controversies, and remove all doubt in this
 " behalf, and to the intent that the said mayor
 " and commonalty, and citizens, may securely,
 " freely, and quietly use, have, exercise and en" joy the offices aforesaid, and every of them,
 " and the measuring aforesaid, and the fees,
 " wages, rewards and profits to the said office
 " and measuring belonging, and all and singular
 " other the premises to them and their successors
 " for ever, without the contradiction, molesta-
 " tion, or hindrance any ways of us, our heirs
 " or successors, admiral of England, justices,
 " escheators, sheriffs, bailiffs, or other our officers
 " or ministers whatsoever. And because it is " well pleasing unto us to shew favour in this
 " behalf to the same mayor, commonalty, and " citizens, and rather increase, strengthen, and

" enlarge, than diminish the liberties, franchises,
 " jurisdictions, privileges, and free-customs of
 " the city of London aforesaid, of our special
 " grace, and from our certain knowledge and
 " meer motion, we do by these presents approve,
 " allow, certify and confirm, for us, our heirs,
 " and successors, all and singular the offices and
 " measuring aforesaid, and other recited premises,
 " and the wages, fees, and profits, belonging
 " and appertaining thereto, and the use and
 " customs aforesaid, to the said mayor and com-
 " monalty, and citizens of the said city aforesaid,
 " and their successors. And further of our spe" cial grace, and certain knowledge and meer
 " motion, we have granted, and by these pre" sents, for us, our heirs and successors, do
 " grant to the said mayor and commonalty, and
 " citizens, and their successors, that they may ex" ercise and execute the said office of water-bailiff,
 " and conservation of the water of Thames, by
 " the mayor of the said city for the time being,
 " during the time of his mayoralty, or his suffi" cient deputies, from time to time, for ever,
 " in, upon, or about the same water of Thames;
 " that is to say, from the bridge of Staines to the " bridge of London, and from thence to a cer" tain place called Yendall, otherwise Yenlet, to" wards the sea, and towards the east, and in Med-
 " way, and in the port of the city of London
 " aforesaid, and upon whatsoever bank, shore,
 " and wharf of the same water of Thames,
 " within the limits and bounds aforesaid, in, upon,
 " and about every one of the same, and to receive
 " and collect, and enjoy all and singular wages,
 " rewards, fees, and profits to the same office of
 " bailiff pertaining, to the proper use of the said
 " mayor and commonalty, and citizens, by the " mayor of the same city for the time being,
 " during the time of his mayoralty, or by his
 " sufficient deputies: and also of our more ample
 " grace, and from our certain knowledge and
 " meer motion, we have given, and by these
 " presents, for us, our heirs and successors, do
 " grant to the said mayor and commonalty, and
 " citizens, and their successors that they may
 " peaceably and quietly, from time to time, for " ever execute and exercise the aforesaid office
 " of measurer of all and singular coals and grain,
 " of what sort soever, and all kind of apples,
 " pears, plumbs, and other fruit whatsoever;
 " and all roots to be eaten of whatsoever sort;
 " and also of onions, and other merchandizes,
 " wares, and things measureable, and the mea" suring of them, whatsoever in or to the port
 " of London coming, carried, or brought, in
 " whatsoever ships, boats, barges, or other ves" sels, floating, laden, remaining, or being in " any part of the same river of Thames, and
 " upon any bank, or shore, or wharf of the same
 " water of Thames, happening to unlade, stay,
 " remain, be delivered, or laid down, from the
 " said bridge of the town of Staines, in the coun" ty of Middlesex, and towards the west unto " London-bridge aforesaid, and from thence to the " said place called Yendall, alias Yenlet, towards
 " the sea and east, and in Medway, and in the said
 " port of the city of London, by the mayor of
 " the aforesaid city for the time being, during
 " the

“ the time of his mayoralty, or by his sufficient deputies; and to have, receive, collect, and enjoy all and singular the wages, rewards, fees, and profits whatsoever, to the same office of measuring, belonging or appertaining, to the use of the said mayor and commonalty, and citizens, and their successors, to be received and taken up by the mayor of the aforesaid city for the time being, during the time of his mayoralty, or his sufficient deputies, without the hindrance of us, our heirs or successors, or any of our officers, bailiffs, or ministers, or of our admiral of England, or of our successors, or any others of our subjects, or of our heirs and successors, to be made to the contrary; to have, hold, and enjoy the said office, and all and singular the premises, with all and singular wages, rewards, fees, profits, and appurtenances whatsoever, to the said offices, and every or any of them, belonging or appertaining, to the aforesaid mayor and commonalty, and citizens, and their successors forever, by the mayor of the aforesaid city for the time being, during the time of his mayoralty, or his sufficient deputies, to be exercised and executed, without any account, or any other thing, to be rendered or made thereof to us, our heirs or successors; so as no other bailiff, or conservator, of the said water, or measurer of coals, grain, salt, apples, pears, plumbs, roots to be eaten, onions, or other merchandizes and commodities, or of any thing or things above-mentioned, shall be, or shall in any wise intermeddle in the premises, or any of them. And we, willing to shew to our said mayor and commonalty, and citizens, more ample favour, of our special grace, from our certain knowledge and meer motion, for us, our heirs and successors, grant, and by this our present charter confirm unto the said mayor and commonalty, and citizens, and their successors, hitherto in some case happening, have not used, or peradventure have abused the offices aforesaid, or any, or some of the offices, or the measuring aforesaid, or any thing or things, to any or some of them appertaining or belonging: notwithstanding they the mayor, and commonalty, and citizens, and their successors, from henceforth freely and peaceably shall use and enjoy the said offices, so not without hindrance used or abused, and every of them, without the let or impediment of us, our heirs or successors, or of our justices, escheators, sheriffs, or other bailiffs, officers or ministers of us, our heirs or successors; any statute or ordinance made, or judgment rendered, or any charters of us, our progenitors or predecessors, in times past made or granted notwithstanding: although there be no express mention in these presents of the true yearly value or certainty of the premises, or of any of them, or of other gifts or grants by us, or by any of our progenitors or predecessors to the said mayor, and commonalty, and citizens of the city of London aforesaid, before these times made, or any statute, act, ordinance, provision, proclamation or restraint to the contrary thereof theretofore had, made, published, ordained or provided; or any other thing, cause or matter whatsoever notwithstanding.

“ In witness whereof, these our letters we have caused to be made patents: witness myself at Westminster, the twentieth day of August, in the third year of our reign of England, France and Ireland, and of Scotland the thirty-ninth.”

In the year 1605, the king borrowed of the city of London sixty thousand pounds, and in the month of October he was proclaimed, in Cheap-side, king of Great Britain, France and Ireland.

On the twelfth of June, 1606, the Lord-mayor entertained his majesty in a most splendid manner at Clothworkers-hall; and presented him with a purse of gold, which his majesty accepted with the strongest marks of affection for the citizens: and on the fifteenth of July he conferred the same honour on the master and wardens of the Merchant-tailors, who likewise presented him with the same compliment, and another to his son prince Henry, who, by command of the king, honoured the company by accepting the freedom thereof. His majesty this day discharged a debt of sixty thousand pounds, which he had borrowed of the citizens.

The proclamations hitherto published to prevent buildings on new foundations having proved ineffectual, another proclamation was made this year to enforce the said acts: but this not being regarded, the matter was taken into consideration by the star-chamber, and many persons were censured for not regulating their buildings according to the royal edict. To prevent the decay of wood, it was also enjoined, “ That all persons should build the fronts of their houses either with stone or brick.”

In the year 1607, the city being still greatly pestered with foreign hawkers and pedlars, the common-council enacted, “ That no foreigner whatsoever should presume to vend his, her, or their goods in the city, by connivance or otherwise, either in house, shop, stall, or street, upon the penalty of five pounds for every offence; except such as bring provisions to the city.”

This year the river Thames was frozen over so hard, that it became the place of all public entertainments and diversions: and on the nineteenth of February following, the tide ran so contrary to its natural course, that it was high water at London-bridge at the time it should have been low water. This preternatural tide, after it had ebbed about half an hour, returned with such impetuosity, that it arose two feet higher than at first, it gradually ebbed and flowed a second and third time, and then returned to its natural course.

In the month of May following, the king wanting money, applied to the citizens, who, in consideration of his former good payment, advanced him the sum of sixty-three thousand pounds.

Soon after this his majesty, in order to confirm the citizens of London in their love and affection for him, granted them the following advantageous charter:

H h h

“ James,

“ James, by the grace of God, of England,
 “ Scotland, France and Ireland, king, defender
 “ of the faith, &c. to all to whom these present “ letters shall come greeting. Whereas very many “ of our progenitors, sometimes kings of Eng“ land, of their special grace, and for free, laud“ able, multiplied, and continued service, done
 “ and expended in times past by the mayor,
 “ commonalty, and citizens of the city of Lon“ don, and their predeceffors; and also, for di“ vers other urgent causes and considerations them
 “ thereunto especially moving, have given, grant“ ed, and confirmed, to the said mayor and com“ monalty, and citizens, of the city of London,
 “ and their successors, divers liberties, privileges,
 “ franchises, immunities, authorities, jurisdic“ tions, ordinances, customs, and quittances, as
 “ by the several letters patent of our progenitors
 “ and predeceffors, sometimes kings of England,
 “ more fully and manifestly is and appeareth.
 “ We also, for and in consideration of the high “ fidelity, constancy, and ready and laudable ser“ vice, by the said mayor and commonalty, and “ citizens, of our said city of London, to us in the “ beginning of our reign, and continually ever “ since manifested, faithfully done and expended;
 “ have ratified and allowed, and by us, our “ heirs, and successors, as much as in us is, do “ accept of and approve, all and singular the “ letters patent, charters, and confirmations of “ our most famous progenitors and ancestors, to
 “ the same mayor and commonalty, and citizens,
 “ of the said city of London, and their predeces“ sors, by whatsoever name of incorporation be“ fore these times made, granted, or confirmed;
 “ and all and singular gifts, grants, confirmations,
 “ restitutions, customs, ordinances, explanations,
 “ and all other things whatsoever, in whatsoever
 “ letters patent, or charters, of our predeceffors, “ progenitors, or ancestors, kings of England;
 “ and also all and singular things in the said let“ ters patent, charters, grants, confirmations,
 “ or any of them, contained, cited, confirmed,
 “ or explained; and all and singular jurisdictions,
 “ authorities, privileges, quittances, and free-“ customs and hereditaments whatsoever, which
 “ the said mayor and commonalty, and citizens of “ the said city of London, or their predeceffors, “ by the name of mayor and commonalty, and “ citizens of the city of London; or by the name
 “ of the mayor and aldermen of the city of Lon“ don; or by the name of the mayor, citizens,
 “ and commonalty of the city of London; or by “ the name of the mayor and commonalty of the “ city of London; or by the names of the citizens “ of the city of London; or by the names of the “ barons of London; or by the names of the ba“ rons of the city of London; or by any other “ names whatsoever; by reason or force of any “ letters patent, charters, or confirmations, of “ any of our progenitors, kings of England,
 “ which in any time or times they had reasonably “ used or exercised: and them all and singular to
 “ the said mayor and commonalty, and citizens, of “ the said city of London, and their successors, do “ ratify and confirm; to have and hold, enjoy
 “ and exercise, all and singular the premises to
 “ the same mayor and commonalty, and citizens

“ of the said city of London, and their successors
 “ for ever; so fully, clearly, and entirely, and in
 “ as ample manner and form, as if they were or “ had been severally, particularly, and by name
 “ in these presents expressed and declared. And “ further, we will, and of our special grace, for “ us, our heirs, and successors, do grant, that
 “ the said mayor and commonalty, and citizens,
 “ and their successors, be restored to all and sin“ gular their authorities, jurisdictions, liberties, “ franchises, privileges, acquittances, immuni-“ ties, and free-customs; and we do restore the “ same to them, and their successors, by these “ presents, as fully, freely, and entirely, as they
 “ or their predeceffors, in any time of our pro“ genitors or predeceffors, kings of England, used
 “ or enjoyed, or ought to have, use and enjoy
 “ the same. And we will also, and by these “ presents for us our heirs and successors, of “ our special grace, do grant, that although the “ same mayor and commonalty, and citizens of “ the city aforesaid, in some case happening, have “ not hitherto used, or peradventure have abused
 “ the same, or any authorities, jurisdictions, li“ berties, privileges, franchises, immunities, “ quittances and free-customs, in the letters-
 “ patent and charters aforesaid, or any of them “ contained, and other their customs: they “ notwithstanding, the mayor and commonalty,
 “ and citizens of the said city, and their succeff“ sors, from henceforth, fully may enjoy and “ use the same authorities, liberties, privileges, “ franchises, immunities, quittances, and free-
 “ customs whatsoever, totally not used or abused,
 “ and every of them, without let or hindrance
 “ of us, our heirs, or successors, the justices,
 “ sheriffs, coroners, escheators, or any other bai“ liffs, or ministers of us, our heirs, or succeff“ sors whatsoever, any cause, matter, or thing,
 “ whatsoever in times past to the contrary there-
 “ of notwithstanding; to hold all and singular
 “ the premises of us, our heirs, and successors,
 “ by the same and such like services, fee-farm
 “ rents, sums of money, and demands whatso“ ever, by which, and as the same of us and “ our progenitors or predeceffors before this time
 “ were holden. And whereas within the said “ city of London, the liberties and suburbs, and “ port of the same, we are informed the search
 “ and surveying of oil, hops, soap, salt, butter, “ cheese, and such other like things coming or “ brought to the port of the said city, to the in“ tent to be sold or exposed to sale by way of “ merchandize; and also the measuring of all
 “ corn whatsoever of any kind, onions, salt, “ sea-coals, and fruits of all kinds, fish called “ shell fish, measurable and used to be measured,
 “ which are coming or brought to the said city of “ London, to the intent to be sold by way of mer“ chandize, hitherto have pertained to the mayor
 “ and commonalty, and citizens of the city of “ London, and their predeceffors, to be exercised “ and executed by the mayor of the same city for “ the time being, according to the laws, ordi“ nances, and statutes made concerning the same,
 “ and the custom of the said city: we, of our “ certain knowledge and meer motion, for us,
 “ and our successors, do ratify the same search, “ surveying,

" surveying, and measuring aforesaid, in and by
 " all things, as the said mayor and commonalty,
 " and citizens of the said city, or their successors,
 " lawfully had and enjoyed before this time; and
 " to the said now mayor and commonalty, and
 " citizens of the said city of London, and their " successors, confirm by these presents. And
 " further we will, and by these presents, for us,
 " our heirs, and successors, do ordain, and grant
 " to the said mayor and commonalty, and citi" zens of the said city of London, and their suc" cessors, that the said city of London, and the cir" cuit, bounds, limits, franchises, and jurisdiction
 " of the same, do extend and stretch forth, and
 " may and can extend and stretch forth, as well in
 " and through all and singular the several circuits,
 " bounds, limits, franchises, and jurisdictions of
 " the late dissolved priory of the church of Tri" nity, near Aldgate, London, commonly called
 " Creed-church-street, or the Duke's-place; and
 " the late dissolved priory of St. Bartholomew,
 " London, near Smithfield; and the late dissolved
 " hospital of St. Bartholomew, in Smithfield,
 " without Newgate, London, commonly called
 " Great St. Bartholomew's and Little St. Bartho" lomew's; and also the late dissolved house or
 " priory of Preaching Friars, within Ludgate,
 " London, commonly called Black-Friars, and
 " also the late dissolved house or priory of Friars
 " of the order of the Virgin Mary of Mount
 " Carmel, called White-Friars; and also the inn
 " or liberty of Cold Herbage, otherwise Cold
 " Harburgh, and Cooled Harborough-lane, with" in the liberty of London aforesaid; so as from
 " henceforth for ever, all and singular the cir" cuits and franchises aforesaid of the late dis" solved priory church of St. Trinity, and the " said dissolved priory or house of St. Bartholo" mew, and the said late dissolved hospital of St.
 " Bartholomew, and also the late dissolved house
 " or monastery of Preaching Friars, and also the " late dissolved house or priory of Friars of the " blessed Virgin Mary, and also the said inn and " liberty of Cold Harbour, be, and every of " them is, and for all times to come shall be and
 " remain within the circuits, precincts, liberties,
 " franchises, and jurisdictions of the same our " city of London. And that all and singular
 " the inhabitants and dwellers within the same,
 " or any of them, shall be, and every of them
 " is, and for all time to come shall be and remain
 " under the rule, government, jurisdiction,
 " oversight, search, correction, punishments, pre-
 " cepts, and arrests of the said mayor and com-
 " monalty, and citizens of our city of London
 " aforesaid, and their successors, and the sheriffs
 " of our city of London for the time being,
 " and their officers and ministers for ever, any
 " liberties, franchises, privileges, exemptions, or
 " authority whatsoever, to the contrary notwith-
 " standing. Provided nevertheless, and we will
 " and ordain, that all persons now inhabitants,
 " or who shall inhabit in time to come, within the
 " liberties and franchises aforesaid, of the said late
 " dissolved priory called the Black-Friars, and the " late dissolved priory called the White-Friars,
 " and the whole precinct, circuit and compass of
 " them, and all buildings therein built, and " to be built from henceforth for ever, shall be

 " quit and exonerated of and from all taxes,
 " fifteenths, and other burdens of scot, and of
 " watch or ward, through or within the city of " London; to be paid, made, sustained, or con" tributed, except the charges and expences due
 " and reasonable for setting out soldiers; and for
 " the defence of our realm, and such like special " services, concerning us, our heirs, and succes" sors; and except the charges for pavements
 " and cleansing the lanes, ditches, ways, water-
 " courses, and sewers, within the circuits, pre-
 " cincts, liberties, and jurisdictions of the same
 " late houses or priories called Black-Friars and
 " White-Friars aforesaid, respectively to be paid;
 " and that the inhabitants shall be quit and ex-
 " onerated of and from the office of constable
 " and scavenger, and such offices of charge with-
 " in the city aforesaid, without the circuits and
 " limits of the said late house or priory called the " Black-Friars, and the White-Friars respective" ly, to be executed and exercised. Nevertheless,
 " we will that all freemen of the city aforesaid,
 " for the time being, inhabiting, or who shall
 " inhabit, within the said liberties and franchises
 " of the said late house or priory of Black-Friars
 " and White-Friars, shall be charged eligible un-
 " to all offices and charges, as well mayor or
 " sheriffs and aldermen of the said city, as of the " company within the said city of London, of " which they are or shall be free, as other free-
 " men of the said city are. And furthermore,
 " for the better and common profit of our city
 " of London, and for the accommodation and " supportation of the charges and expences of " the said city, for us, our heirs, and successors,
 " we will and grant to the same mayor and com-
 " monalty, and citizens of the said city, and to
 " their successors, that from henceforth all and
 " singular persons, though they be not free of " the same city, who now are or hereafter shall
 " be dwelling within the said city, the liberties
 " or precincts of the same, (except the inhabi" tants within the liberties and franchises of the " aforesaid several late houses or priories of the " late friars, called the Black-Friars and the " White-Friars) in whatsoever aids, tallages,
 " grants, and other contributions whatsoever, to
 " the use and service of us, our heirs, and suc" cessors, or to the use of the said city, for main" taining the state, good, or benefit of the said
 " city, howsoever to be assessed, shall reasonably
 " be taxed and shall contribute. And the same
 " mayor and commonalty, and citizens of the
 " city aforesaid, may and can levy the same aids,
 " tallages, grants, and other contributions, (ex" cept before excepted) by their officers and mi" nisters, by distress of the goods and chattels of " such persons, who from time to time shall be " charged with the payments of such aids, tal-
 " lages, grants, and other contributions, of any
 " of them, and so levied, they can and may have,
 " hold, and enjoy, to the use and behoof afore-
 " said: provided nevertheless always, that such " residents and dwellers in any houses within the " aforesaid city, who are not or will not be free-
 " men of the aforesaid city, shall be taxed such
 " aids, tallages, grants, and other contributions,
 " from

" from time to time, only for the houses in which
 " they shall inhabit or reside, or are dwelling
 " within the same city of London, liberties or
 " precincts of the same, according to the custom
 " of the said city shall be assessed and taxed, and
 " no otherwise: provided also, that if any one,
 " or any of the said inhabitants, residents, or
 " dwellers, who are not, or shall not be a free-
 " man, or freemen of the said city, shall think
 " himself, by reason of the said aids, tallages,
 " grants or contributions, unjustly grieved; that
 " then, and in such cases, the chancellor of Eng" land of us, our heirs and successors, for the " time being, upon the complaint of any person
 " or persons grieved, shall moderate and qualify
 " such aids, tallages, grants and contributions,
 " as to him in that behalf shall be thought fit,
 " which moderation shall stand and be of force.
 " And furthermore we will, and by these pre" sents, for us, our heirs and successors, do grant
 " to the aforesaid mayor and commonalty, and
 " citizens, and their successors, that the mayor
 " and recorder of the said city which now are,
 " and every mayor and recorder of the same city,
 " who hereafter for the time being shall be, as well
 " those aldermen of the said city, as those alder-
 " men who shall for the time to come bear the " charge of mayoralty of the same city, after
 " that they have ceased, or removed from the " office of mayoralty of the same city, and so " long as they shall continue aldermen of our " city of London aforesaid, for ever be, and shall
 " be our justices, and of our heirs and successors,
 " and every one of them be, and shall be ju" stices and keepers of us, our heirs and succes" sors, in and through all and singular circuits,
 " precincts, liberties, franchises, and places afore-
 " said, commonly called Black-friars, the White-
 " friars, Duke's-place, otherwise Creed-church-
 " street, Great St. Bartholomew's, Little St. Bar" tholomew's, and Cold Harburgh aforesaid, and
 " every of them, and to keep, or cause to be " kept and executed, all ordinances and statutes
 " of this realm, made for the good of our peace,
 " and for the quiet rule and government of our " people, in all their articles, according to the " force, form and effect of the same; and to " chastise and punish those, who, contrary to the " form and effect of those ordinances and statutes,
 " or any of them, within the limits, franchises,
 " and places aforesaid, are found to offend, as
 " ought to be done, according to the form of the " said ordinances and statutes, and to make to " come before them, all those who threaten any
 " of the people of us, our heirs or successors,
 " concerning their bodies, or burning their houses,
 " to find sufficient security of the peace or good
 " behaviour towards us, our heirs or successors;
 " and if they refuse to find such security, them
 " to cause to be safely kept in prison, until they " shall find such security. And further we will
 " and grant for us, our heirs and successors, that
 " the mayor of the said city for the time being,
 " and the recorder of the same now being, and
 " who for the time to come shall be, and every
 " alderman as aforesaid, who has been, or here" after shall be, mayor of the said city, after
 " they shall cease to be removed from the office of

" mayoralty of the said city, and so long as the " aldermen of the said city shall continue, or any
 " four or more of the same, mayor, recorder, and " aldermen, (whereof the mayor and recorder of
 " the same city for the time being we will to be
 " two) from henceforth for ever, may be justices
 " of us, our heirs and successors, to enquire of " all and all manner of felonies, witchcrafts, in-
 " chantments, sorceries, magic art, trespasses,
 " forestallers, regrators, ingrossers, and extor-
 " tions whatsoever, and of all and singular other
 " misdeeds, and offences, of which our justices
 " of the peace may and ought lawfully to en" quire, howsoever, or wheresoever done or com" mitted, or which hereafter shall be done or " attempted, in the liberties, franchises, and
 " places aforesaid; and also of all other who
 " within the said franchises, liberties and places,
 " go or ride in assemblies, or armed force, against
 " our peace, and to the disturbance of our peo" ple; and also of those who lie in wait to kill
 " our people, or hereafter shall presume to lie in
 " wait: and also of hostlers, and all and singu" lar other persons who have offended or at" tempted, or hereafter shall presume to offend
 " or attempt, in abuse of weights and measures,
 " and in selling victuals, against the form of the " ordinances and statutes, or any of them, made " for the common profit of our kingdom and
 " people; and also to hear and determine all and
 " singular the same felonies and misdeeds, ac" cording to the laws and statutes of our realm
 " of England; and also to hear and determine,
 " do, execute, all and singular other thing or " things which pertain, have pertained, or in " time to come may pertain, to justices of the " peace within the said city of London: so al" ways, that the said mayor, commonalty, and
 " citizens, and their successors, may have and
 " hold all and singular their ancient privileges
 " free, whole, and unhurt; and that no other
 " keepers of the peace, or justices, or other offi" cers or ministers, of us, our heirs or successors
 " whatsoever, shall intermeddle in the same, or " any of them. We will also, and by these pre" sents, for us, our heirs and successors, charge
 " and command our sheriffs of the said city of " London for the time being, that from time to " time they be assisting, aiding, attending and
 " devising, as it behoveth to the said mayor, re" corder, and aldermen, and every or any of " them, in execution of the premises, and ac" cording to our true meaning herein expressed.
 " And further, we do hereby give and grant,
 " for us, our heirs and successors, to the said
 " mayor and commonalty, and citizens of our
 " said city of London, and their successors, that
 " the said mayor and commonalty, and citizens,
 " and their successors for the time being, may
 " have and enjoy to their own proper use, with" out any account thereof to be rendered to us,
 " our heirs and successors, all treasure found or
 " to be found in the said franchises and places,
 " called Black-friars, White-friars, Duke's-place,
 " Great St. Bartholomew's, Little St. Bartholo-
 " mew's, and Cold Harbour aforesaid, and
 " waved goods and chattels, and estrays, goods
 " and chattels of felons, and fugitives, for what" soever

“soever felony done, or to be done by them, within any the franchises or places, adjudged, or to be adjudged, before us, our heirs and successors, or any the justices aforesaid: and it shall be lawful for the said mayor and commonalty, and their successors, by their deputy or minister, deputies or ministers, of the said city, liberties, or suburbs of the same, to put themselves in seisin and possession of and in all manner of treasure found, goods and chattels waived and estrayed, goods and chattels of felons and fugitives, from time to time, when they shall happen, by virtue of these our letters patents, without any further warrant whatsoever. We will also and by these presents grant, to the said mayor and commonalty, and citizens of the said city of London, that they shall have these our said letters-patent under the great seal of England, in due manner and sealed, without fine or fee, great or small, to be rendered, paid, or made to us in our hamper, or otherwise to us in any wise for the same, for that express mention is made of the time, yearly value, or certainty of the premises, or any of them, or of any other gifts or grants made by us, or by our progenitors or predecessors, to the said mayor and commonalty, and citizens of London, before their time; or any statute, ordinance, provision, proclamation, or restriction, to the contrary thereof heretofore made or ordained, set forth or provided, or any other thing, cause or matter whatsoever; whereof these our letters we have caused to be made patent. Witness ourself at our honour of Hampton-Court, the 20th day of September, in the year of our reign of England, France, and Ireland, the sixth; and of Scotland the two and fortieth.”

By this valuable charter, not only the ancient rights, liberties, and immunities of the citizens are in the most ample manner confirmed, but likewise the precincts of Duke's-place, St. Bartholomew's the Great and Less, Black and Whitefriars, and Cold Harbour, are added to the bounds of the city and jurisdictions thereof.

In the year 1609 his majesty was pleased to offer the citizens of London, the whole province of Ulster, in the kingdom of Ireland, on the condition that they would engage to settle an English colony therein; which offer being accepted of, the common-council passed an act to raise twenty thousand pounds for carrying the design into execution; and a committee was appointed of six aldermen and eighteen commoners to be annually chosen for the government thereof.

The late proclamation against the increase of new buildings in and about London not having its intended effect, and his majesty being apprehensive that it might in time bring the plague to Whitehall, he, by the advice of his council again strictly prohibited the erecting buildings on new foundations within two miles of the city, on the penalty of having them demolished.

This year Aldgate, which had been taken down in 1606, owing to its ruinous condition, was completely finished. In a large square on the east front was placed the statue of king James I. In gilt armour, with a golden lion and chained unicorn couchant at his feet. On the top was a vane supported by a gilt sphere; on each side of which stood a soldier, holding a bullet in his hand, on the top of the upper battlements. The figure of Fortune was placed on the west side standing on a globe, with a prosperous sail spreading over her head; under which was carved the king's arms. On the south-side, somewhat lower, stood Peace, with a dove perched on one hand, and a gilded wreath in the other: and on the north side was the emblem of Charity. Over the arch were genteel apartments allotted for one of the Lord-mayor's carvers, to which they ascended by a pair of stairs from the postern on the south side of the gate. In the postern, on the north-side, was the watch-house for Aldgate ward. This beautiful building was taken down and totally demolished by virtue of a late act of parliament.

In the year 1610 the proprietors of the fields for two miles without the city walls, having restrained the exercise of archery by enclosing their grounds and destroying the old marks, especially about Mile-end, his majesty empowered commissioners to go upon those places, and view and survey such grounds, next adjoining to the city and suburbs, within the compals of two miles, and the same to reduce into such order and state for the archers as they were in the reign of Henry VIII. and to cause the hedges, banks, ditches and quicksets to be made plain and re-formed.

This year the Lord-mayor and citizens, suspecting that the great increase of inhabitants might produce a famine, prepared for its dreadful consequences by erecting twelve new public graneries at Bridewell, large enough to contain six thousand quarters of corn, which, in case of a scarcity, or any combination by the dealers in that commodity, was to be sold to the poor at prime cost.

Mr. Thomas Sutton, a rich bachelor, purchased this year of the earl of Suffolk, the religious house of the Carthusian-monks, called the Charter-house, for thirteen thousand pounds, and in the year following obtained a patent for his intended charitable foundation, which, in 1628, was confirmed by parliament. He endowed his hospital and school with fifteen manors, and other lands, to the value of four thousand four hundred and ninety pounds per annum and upwards, which now goes at six thousand pounds a year, for the maintenance of eighty pensioners, who are to be provided with handsome apartments, and all necessities of life, except cloaths, instead of which each is allowed a gown and seven pounds per annum. These must be decayed gentlemen, merchants or soldiers. Forty four-boys lodged and boarded, and instructed in classical learning: twenty nine students at the universities, who have each an allowance, for eight years, of twenty pounds per annum. The governors have the patronage of nine ecclesiastical benefices, and they are obliged to give the preference to such as are educated in the Charter-house. There is a master and usher, a preacher, and some person of great reputation for his learning to be master of the house, all of whom are chosen by the governors, who likewise admit the pensioners and boys:

the

the latter of which, on being put out to trades, have forty pounds given with each of them.

In the year 1611, Sir Baptift Hicks, one of the justices of peace in Middlesex, built a sessions-house in St. John's-street for the better accommodation of the justices, who, before this time, used to transact their business in the Castle-Inn. The justices gave it the name of Hicks's-hall, which it has retained from that day to this.

In the following year Frederick the Elector Palatine arrived in London, and was espoused to princess Elizabeth, only daughter to king James I. from whom is descended the house of Hanover. On the wedding day the city presented the electoral bride with a necklace of oriental pearl of above two thousand pounds value. Soon after the prince palatine honoured the Lord-mayor with his company to dinner at Guildhall; and received from his lordship, in the name of the citizens, a very large bason and ewer, and two large pots or flagons of silver richly gilt.

The citizens having been dilatory in settling the province of Ulster in Ireland, lately conferred on them by royal favour, were severely reprimanded by his majesty. In consequence of which the common-council came to a resolution to send a deputation from their body to superintend the work of plantation, and to compleat the establishment of that colony. Accordingly they deputed an alderman and a commoner, and the governor and committee of direction added to them three gentlemen of great abilities and experience, as their assistants; and by their united endeavours it was soon settled on the best foundation; not only to the satisfaction of his majesty, but to the honour and interest of this great city.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

New River cut by Sir Hugh Middleton. Smithfield paved. Muster of the city militia. King James I's third charter granting the measuring of coals. Rebuilding of Aldersgate. Book of sports rejected. The king's carriages stopped by the Lord-mayor on a Sunday. Sir Walter Raleigh beheaded at Westminster. Foundation of Dulwich college. The king goes to St. Paul's Cathedral. The citizens assault the Spanish ambassador, for which they are severely reprimanded by the king. Fatal vespers. Accession of Charles I. Great plague. King demands one hundred thousand pounds of the citizens, but is refused. Repentment of the court on this occasion. Murder of Dr. Lamb. Privy-council commands enquiry to be made, and the offenders to be punished. City fined six thousand pounds. Riot in Fleet-street. One of the rioters executed. Act of common-council against selling provisions in the streets. A grand masque. King's writ for ship money. The clergy's petition for increase of tythes.

IN the year 1613 Sir Hugh Middleton finished that most useful and expensive scheme of supplying this city with sweet and wholesome water.

By virtue of an act of parliament passed in the reign of queen Elizabeth, and another in that of king James I. granting powers to cut and convey a river from any part of Middlesex or Hertfordshire, to supply the city of London with water, Sir Hugh undertook, after it had been attempted by several others without success, to bring such a river from Chadwell and Amwell, near Ware, in Hertfordshire, to a bason or reservoir near Islington. He began this great undertaking on the 20th of February 1608, and with great difficulty, art, industry, and expence (which is said to have been not less than five hundred thousand pounds, with the assistance of king James and the mayor and commonalty of London) cut a trench in some places full thirty feet deep, through ouzy, muddy, stiff, craggy, and stony ground, and with so many windings to find out a proper current, that, from the fountain to the reservoir, it measured thirty-eight miles, three quarters, and six poles.* So far

* This river, in its present situation, has forty-three sluices and two hundred and fifteen bridges in and over it, and is carried over two vales in wooden frames or troughs lined with lead; one at Bushill, six hundred and sixty feet in length, and thirty feet high, under which is an arch to receive the land-waters, and large enough for the passage of any cart or waggon laden with hay or straw; the other is a little to the northward of Highbury, and is in length four hundred and sixty-two feet, and seventeen feet high: and over and under the same river a great number of brooks, rills, and water-courses, have their passage; besides many considerable currents of land-waters. This river is conducted, in other places, through subterraneous passages; and its head or reservoir at Islington fills fifty eight main pipes of seven inch bore, (besides those added to serve the liberties of Westminster) by which the water is conveyed into the several streets, lanes, alleys, courts, &c. of London and its suburbs, and to the northern liberties of Westminster, and parts adjacent, to the great convenience and use of the inhabitants.

After Sir Hugh had spent his whole fortune in the execution of this noble work, he was not only obliged to part with a moiety of the profits for a sum of money advanced by the king, and to sell many other shares, but in the end was entirely ruined by a project which had turned out of such inestimable value to the city of London. At that time so little did the people understand the advantages that might be made of this river, that for upwards of thirty years the proprietors did not divide above five pounds to each of the seventy-two shares into which the property was divided; so great a difference is there between that time and this, that the far did Sir Hugh accomplish this great work as the bringing it to the intended reservoir; but the water was not admitted into it till Michaelmas-day in the above year: on which occasion Sir Thomas Middleton, his brother and Lord-mayor elect, accompanied by Sir John Swinnerton the mayor, many aldermen, and other gentlemen repaired, in solemn cavalcade; to the place called New-River-head. On their arrival there, sixty labourers, handsomely dressed with green caps, marched with pickaxes, shovels and spades three times round the basin, preceded by drums and trumpets, who stopped before the Lord-mayor, &c. seated on an eminence, one of whom addressed them in a long copy of verses adapted to the occasion. This being ended, the sluices were opened, and the stream ran plentifully into the reservoir, under the sound of drums and trumpets, the discharge of cannon, and loud acclamations of the beholders.

In the year 1614 Smithfield, the public market-place for cattle, having become so ruinous that it was almost impassable, his majesty, to prevent the dangerous consequences attending the same, enjoined the citizens to pave it at their own expence: to which they readily complying, it was set about and finished within six months, at the expence of sixteen hundred pounds.

This year his majesty having appointed a general muster of the militia throughout the kingdom, the city of London mustered six thousand citizens completely armed, who performed their evolutions with such dexterity as gained them universal applause. The martial spirit of the citizens was so great, that the children endeavoured to imitate their parents: they chose themselves officers, formed themselves into companies, often marched into the fields with colours flying and drums beating; where, by frequent practice, they became very expert in military exercises.

About this time, the citizens being greatly distressed by monopolizers, regtators, and forestallers in coals, his majesty, to redress their grievances, granted them the following charter:

"James, by the grace of God, king of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, &c. to all to whom these present letters shall come, greeting. So great is the force of our love towards our city of London, our royal chamber, as whatsoever is in us, that we shall see necessary and profitable to the mayor, commonalty, and citizens of our city of London, that we have been ready freely to give from our soul to the said mayor, commonalty, and citizens of our said city: and it pleases us well, that all grants made by our predecessors in times past to our city of London be not only confirmed but also enlarged: therefore, whereas amongst other things it appears, that, amongst other things, the said mayor and commonalty, and citizens of London, from all time whereof the memory of man is not to

"the contrary, have had and lawfully exercised the office of measuring all coals, of what kind or sort soever, in any port of the same city; coming, brought, or carried upon the water of Thames, in any ship, boat, barge, or other vessel whatsoever, floating or being upon what part soever of the said water of Thames, or on what bank, shore, or wharf soever; of the same water of Thames, from the bridge in the town of Staines in the county of Middlesex; and to the bridge of London, and from thence to a certain place called Yendall, or Yenland, or Yenleet, towards the sea, and east, and also in Medway, in the port of the city of London: Nevertheless a question is risen, whether the weighing of coals, brought within the limits aforesaid, together with the measuring of coals, doth belong to the mayor, commonalty, and citizens of the said city: We therefore, to take away all controversies in this part; as well for the present as for the time to come; and to remove all doubt; and to the intent the said mayor and commonalty, and citizens of the said city may use, have and enjoy, as well the weighing as measuring; as each and the wages, rewards, fees, and profits used for the same, of our especial grace, have given, granted, and confirmed, and by these presents, for us, and our heirs, and successors, do give, grant, and confirm, to our beloved the mayor and commonalty, and citizens of our said city of London, and to their successors, the weighing of all coals, called stone-coals, pit-coals, earth-coals, and all other coals weighable, of what kind or sort soever, in or at the said port of London, coming or brought up the said water of Thames, in any ship, boat, barge, or other vessel whatsoever, floating or being in any part of the same water of Thames: and upon whatsoever bank, shore, or wharf of the said water of Thames, from the said bridge of Staines to the said river of London, and from thence to the said place called Yendall, towards the sea; and also in Medway, and in the port of London, to be sold or put to sale; and also all fees, wages, rewards, profits, and advantages used, or to that belonging or any wise appertaining: to be exercised by the mayor of the said city for the time being, and by the deputies, officers, and the ministers of the said mayor. And further, we do hereby, for us, our heirs, and successors, give, grant, and confirm to the said mayor and commonalty, and citizens of the said city, and their successors, that they for ever have and enjoy the office of weighing all coals, called stone-coals, pit-coals, earth-coals, and all other coals weighable, of what kind or sort soever, at the port of the said city of London, coming or brought upon the said water of Thames in any ship, boat, barge, or other vessel whatsoever, floating or being in any part of the said water of Thames, or upon any bank, shore, or wharf the present value of each share is estimated at eight thousand pounds. The direction is incorporated in a governor, deputy governor, treasurer, and twenty six directors, who are always chosen out of the proprietors of the first thirty-six shares; for although the moiety of the crown is in private hands, they have no share in conducting it.

of

“ of the same, from the said bridge of Staines
 “ to the said bridge of London, from thence to “ the said place called Yendall, towards the sea;
 “ and also in Medway, and in the port of Lon“ don aforesaid, to be sold or set to sale; and “ also all fees, wages, profits, rewards, and ad“ vantages whatsoever used, or to the same office “ belonging, or in any way appertaining, to be “ exercised by the mayor of the same city for the “ time being, and by the deputies, officers, and “ ministers of the said mayor.

“ And we have also constituted, and by these “ presents, for us, our heirs, and successors, do
 “ constitute and ordain, create and make, the said
 “ mayor and commonalty, and citizens of the
 “ said city of London, and their successors, by the “ mayor of the same city for the time being,
 “ during the time of his mayoralty, or by his “ deputies, officers, or ministers, to be weigher
 “ of all and singular coals, called stone-coals, “ pit coals, earth-coals, and all other coals weigh-“ able of what kind soever, in or at the port “ of the said city of London, coming, carried, or “ brought upon the same river of Thames, in any “ ship, boat, or barge, or other vessel whatsoever,
 “ floating or being in any port of the said water
 “ of Thames; and upon any bank, shore or wharf
 “ of the same water of Thames, which shall hap“ pen to stay, be delivered, or laid down from the “ said bridge of Staines, to the aforesaid place, “ called Yendall, towards the sea; and also in “ Medway, and in the port of London aforesaid,
 “ to be sold or put to sale. And whereas there
 “ is a question risen of the quantity of the fee “ demanded and received by the mayor of the “ said city for the time being, and by their de“ puties, ministers, and officers, for the weighing “ of every tun weight of coals, containing five “ score and twelve pounds weight to every tun
 “ weight of coals, brought within the limits aforesaid: we wholly to take away every the said “ question, and the like question, do declare, es“ tablish, and for us, our heirs, and successors,
 “ do grant to the said mayor and commonalty,
 “ and citizens of the said city, and their successors,
 “ that it shall be lawful for the mayor, common“ alty, and citizens of the said city for the time “ being, by the mayor of the same city, and by
 “ the deputy, minister, and officers of such mayor
 “ for the time being, to ask and demand, take
 “ and receive, a fee of 8d. of lawful money of “ England, to the use of the said mayor and com“ monalty, and citizens of the said city, and their “ successors, for the weighing of every such like “ tun of coals aforesaid, and all other coals weigh-“ able of what kind soever; and according to “ the same rate for a smaller quantity, if the per“ son bringing such like coals for and in respect
 “ of the charge and costs of them, the said mayor, “ commonalty, and citizens of the said city of “ London, and their successors, in the beam and “ weights, and for and in respect of their attend“ ance, labour, and necessary costs and expences,
 “ to be had in and about the premises; which fee
 “ of 8d. aforesaid the said mayor and common“ alty, and citizens of the said city, had and re“ ceived formerly. And also we command, and
 “ by these presents, for us, our heirs, and suc-

“ cessors, firmly enjoin and charge all merchants,
 “ and other persons, whatsoever, who shall bring “ coals called sea-coal, pit-coals, of what kind or “ sort soever, the same shall be within the limits “ aforesaid, upon the water of Thames aforesaid,
 “ in any ship, boat, or vessel whatsoever; that “ none of them shall henceforth unlade, deliver,
 “ or lay down, nor cause or permit such like coals
 “ to be unladen, delivered, or laid down out of “ such ships, boats or other vessels, being within “ the limits and bounds aforesaid, upon any wharf,
 “ bank or shore, upon either part of the said
 “ water of Thames, or to be discharged or laid “ down before the mayor of our said city for the “ time being, shall take certain notice of the quan“ tity of such coals, and shall give direction for “ the unlading of the same, and for the measuring “ or weighing of such coals, to the intent that
 “ the same mayor of the said city, for the time “ being, may be able to render a better and more “ ready reason and account to us, our heirs, and “ successors, what quantity of coals, of what sort “ soever, from time to time, have been brought “ within the port of our said city and limits aforesaid, and how the said city, and the ports and “ places next adjoining, are from time to time “ provided, when we, our heirs, and successors, “ shall require the same from the mayor of our “ said city for the time being: and also to the “ intent that the sums and other profits due to us,
 “ our heirs and successors, for such coals, so to “ be brought within the limits aforesaid (if there “ shall be any due) may be better answered and “ paid into the offices and ministers of us, our “ heirs, and successors, under pain of contempt
 “ of our royal mandate, and incurring all such “ pains and punishments which by the laws and “ statutes of this realm of England may be inflicted “ upon such neglecters and contemners. And “ whereas it is notoriously known, that the river
 “ of Thames is so necessary, commodious, and “ practicable to the said city of London, and with“ out the said river our said city would not long “ subsist, flourish, and continue: and for that,
 “ by forestalling, ingrossing and regrating of “ coals, in and at the port of the said city, brought “ from the water of Thames aforesaid, such coals
 “ are made more dear, to the great loss and pre“ judice as well of us as of our subjects. And “ whereas divers ill-disposed persons, more affect“ ing their own private gains and profits than the “ general and public good and benefit of our said
 “ city, little weighing the conservation of the said “ river of late, and at present do daily and usually “ sell coals, and other things by retail, in less “ quantities in boats, commonly called lighters,
 “ and other vessels floating and being on the water
 “ of Thames aforesaid, after such coals have been “ unladen from the ships and other vessels which “ first brought them within the limits aforesaid,
 “ which persons make the same boats or lighters
 “ as their common shops and warehouses, and in “ them do daily hold, upon the said water of “ Thames, a common market for selling of such “ coals, and other things, having one, two, three,
 “ and sometimes more boats and lighters lying “ together, and fastened one to another, in the “ river of Thames aforesaid, by which forestalling, “ ingrossing ingrossing, and regrating aforesaid, to the great

 "cousenage, damage, and oppression, as well of "the poor as of the rich, daily increases and aug-
 "ments, and the price of coals and other things
 "is made dearer. And for that, by the frequent "importation, unlading, and measuring of such
 "coals, and such like things, in and from the said
 "boats and lighters, many of the same coals and
 "other dirt often fall, and are cast into the river
 "of Thames, to the great harm and choaking up
 "the stream of the same river, and the passage
 "of the passengers upon the water of the same
 "river: we therefore thinking it fit that such an "evil ought not to be permitted to continue, we
 "command, and for us, our heirs, and successors,
 "prohibit all persons whatsoever, that they, nor
 "any of them, from henceforth sell, or presume
 "to sell, any coals, of what kind soever, upon
 "the water of Thames, in any boat, lighter, or
 "other vessel whatsoever, except only in such ships
 "or other vessels which at first brought the same
 "coals within the port of the said city, and the "limits aforesaid, unless upon some port, key,
 "or wharf, near the said river, upon pain of con"tempt of our royal mandate, and incurring such "pains and punishments which may be inflicted
 "by the laws and statutes of this our kingdom
 "upon such contemners and neglecters. And
 "because it is our intent, that the same mayor
 "and commonalty, and citizens of the said city,
 "and their successors, shall fully enjoy the pre"mises; we therefore by these presents declare
 "and signify, for us, our heirs, and successors,
 "do grant and covenant to and with the said
 "mayor and commonalty, and citizens of the said
 "city, and their successors, that they may safely,
 "freely, and quietly have, use, and enjoy all and
 "singular the premises forever, without hindrance
 "of us, our heirs, and successors. And if any "doubt, in time to come, shall be found in these "presents, or any default, scruple, or question
 "concerning the premises shall happen to arise,
 "we, our heirs, and successors, shall vouchsafe
 "to make and grant other letters patents under
 "the great seal of England, our heirs, or succe-
 "sors, to the same mayor and commonalty, and
 "citizens of the said city, and their successors, for
 "the better giving, granting, and confirming,
 "and for the better enjoining of the premises,
 "when it shall be desired by the said mayor
 "and commonalty, and citizens of the said
 "city, and their successors, for that the ex"press mention of the true yearly value, or of
 "the certainty of the premises, or of other gifts
 "and grants, by us, or by any of our ancestors,
 "made in times past, to the said mayor and com-
 "monalty, and citizens of the said city, is not "made, or being in these presents, or any other
 "statute, act, ordinance, proclamation, or re"striction, to the contrary heretofore made, or"dained, or published, or any other matter or "thing whatsoever in any wise notwithstanding.
 "In witness whereof we have caused these our let"ters to be made patents. Witness myself at "Westminster, the fifteenth day of September,
 "in the twelfth year of our reign of England,
 "France, and Ireland; and of Scotland the forty-
 "eighth."

In the year 1615, the citizens of London began paving the sides of the principal streets before their doors with free-stone for the better accommodation of foot passengers.

This year Sir Thomas Overbury was poisoned in the Tower, for which the earl of Somerset and his lady were condemned, but afterwards pardoned; and Sir Gervase Elwes, then lieutenant of the Tower, and some others, who were the meaner instruments made use of in that murder, were executed.

In the year 1616, the plantation of Ulster in Ireland, went on with such success, that two good towns were colonized by the names of Londonderry and Colerain. His majesty was pleased to distinguish the first by forming it into a city, the latter he made a mayor-town. Soon after,
 by a special commission from the king and the city of London, Sir Peter Proby, alderman of London, and governor of the said colony, attended by many capital citizens, went over to Ireland, and presented each of the above-mentioned towns with a rich sword of state to be carried before their chief magistrates.

This year the citizens of London rebuilt Aldersgate. Over the arch, in a large square, was the figure of king James I. on horseback, in the same attitude as when he made his first entry into London. Over his head were quartered the arms of England, Scotland, and Ireland. In a niche, on the east side, stood the prophet Jeremiah, with the words of the twenty-fifth verse of the 17th chapter of his book; and on the west side stood the prophet Samuel, with the first verse of the 12th chapter of 1 Sam. In a chair of state, on the south side, sat king James I. in his royal robes, done in relief. Over the gate were apartments appropriated to the use of the common crier; the way to which was from the postern on the east side: and on the west side was another postern for the convenience of foot passengers.
 This gate shared the common fate with others,
 and was entirely taken down.

In the month of September this year, king
 James returned from Scotland by way of Windsor; and was received at Hyde-Park by the Lord-mayor, aldermen, &c. in their formalities, who presented his majesty with a purse containing five hundred broad pieces of gold; for which compliment the honour of knighthood was conferred on the recorder of London.

In the year 1617 his majesty, at the intercession of many bishops, caused certain rules to be published under the title of the Book of Sports, by which the people were tolerated to exercise recreations and diversions on the Sabbath-day. The Lord-mayor and citizens, together with many of the clergy so far opposed it, that they incurred the resentment of the high-commission court. Notwithstanding which the Lord-mayor persevered so strongly in shewing his contempt at such an unchristian licence, that he even caused the king's carriages to be stopped as they were driving through the city in the time of divine service.
 The matter being related to his majesty with the most aggravating circumstances, he swore, in a great rage, "He thought there had been no
 "more kings in England than himself." After the heat of his passion had subsided, he sent a warrant to the mayor, commanding him to let them pass; which he obeyed, with this declaration: "While it was in my power, I did my duty; but that being taken away by a higher power, it is my duty to obey." Which being told the king, he was highly pleased at the conduct of the mayor.

The following year Sir Walter Raleigh was beheaded on a scaffold erected for that purpose, in palace-yard, Westminster. In the year 1603 he was arraigned and condemned, but kept prisoner in the Tower (where he wrote his history of the world) till the year 1617, when he was allowed by king James I. at his own request, to fetch gold from a certain mine in Guiana in the West-Indies, wherein he miscarried. Soon after which king James affirmed the sentence which had been before passed on him, and, after fifteen years reprieve, he was executed to the great unhappiness of the public in general, who thought it hard that such a punishment should be inflicted on a man of his uncommon abilities.

In the year 1619 Mr. William Alleyn, a very principal comedian, retired from the stage, and founded a college by the name of God's gift, at Dulwich; which he endowed very plentifully for a master and warden, who must be always of the name of Alleyn; and four fellows, viz. three divines and an organist; likewise for six poor men and women. Also twelve poor boys from the age of four or six years, are maintained and educated by one of the fellows as schoolmaster, and by another as usher, till they are fourteen or sixteen years of age. Mr. Alleyn himself became the first master; and, in his original endowment he excluded all other benefactions to this foundation; and constituted the church-wardens of St. Botolph's Bishopsgate, St. Giles's Cripplegate, and St. Saviour's Southwark, to be perpetual visitors, who, on occasion, were to appeal to the archbishop of Canterbury, before whom, at their admission, all members were to be sworn. Though the visitors are the electors, yet they have no farther power than to nominate two out of the number of candidates who shall apply for admission; which two must draw lots, and that party is entitled to the election who draws the lot marked God's gift. The master and warden must remain unmarried or be excluded the college; and on the death of the master he is always succeeded by the warden. Mr. William Alleyn likewise founded and endowed alms-houses for ten poor men and women, with forty shillings a year each, and coats and breeches for the men, and gowns and petticoats for the women, every other year, in Petty-France; which place being afterwards improved by new buildings, the alms-houses were removed to Lamb's-alley, in Bishopsgate-street. He likewise founded ten other houses for men and women, who receive six-pence per week each, and coats and gowns every other year in Pesthouse-lane, Old-street: and likewise other houses for ten poor men and women, with six-pence per week each, in Soap-yard, Deadman's place, Southwark.

In the year 1620 a determination having been formed of repairing St. Paul's Cathedral, his majesty, attended by the prince of Wales, and many of the chief nobility, came in great state from Whitehall to the city, on Sunday the 26th of March. At Temple-bar he was received by the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and sheriffs, in their formalities, who presented him with the city sword, and a purse of gold; the former of which being returned, it was carried by the mayor on horseback before his majesty, to St. Paul's Cathedral; when the king, alighting at the west door, repaired to a brazen pillar, and, kneeling down before it, invoked the Almighty to give a blessing on his present design. After which, an anthem being sung, he repaired to St. Paul's cross, where he heard a sermon, and then proceeded to the bishop of London's palace to concert measures for the more effectual execution of this great and good work.

This year his majesty being in great want of money applied to the citizens for twenty thousand pounds to be raised by way of benevolence; but they would advance no more than half that sum, which was raised by the several companies.

The following year the Londoners were so exasperated at the influence which Gondomar the Spanish ambassador had over the king, that they assaulted him in the public streets. At which his majesty was so enraged, that he came in person to Guildhall, and not only reprimanded the Lord-mayor and the other city magistrates for the insolence of the populace, but threatened to restrain them by a military power in case of such offence for the future. He likewise commanded diligent enquiry to be made after the aggressors; and one person, though no otherwise guilty than reflecting on the said ambassador, was, by order of the king, cruelly whipped the next day from Aldgate to Temple-bar.

In the year 1623, on the 24th of October, a very melancholy accident happened in the French ambassadors house in Black-friars, where one Drury, a jesuit, preaching in a large upper room three stories high, to a congregation of 300 people, and upwards, the floor gave way, and, falling downwards, the preacher and above a hundred of his hearers were killed, and near the same number miserably wounded, maimed or buried in the ruins.

The following year his majesty issued out warrants for the immediate raising of ten thousand men for the elector palatine his son-in-law, and for the support of the protestant interest in Germany. The citizens on this occasion, to shew their great zeal for the interest of their prince, readily raised two-thousand men towards that purpose.

In the beginning of the year 1625 his majesty being seized with a tertian ague, the violence of the fits was so great, that he expired at Theobald's, in Hertfordshire, in the fifty-ninth year of his age, after having swayed the scepter of England twenty-two years, and that of Scotland even from his infancy.

In the above reign the manufacture of whited-brown paper was first made in England, particularly in Surry and about Windsor.

On the demise of king James, the privy-council, accompanied by the Lord-mayor and aldermen, repaired to Lydgate, whither his majesty king king Charles I. arriving on horseback, he was there proclaimed, as well as at all other places in the city, with the usual solemnities, and the greatest acclamations of joy from the populace.

The citizens were obliged to lay aside the intended solemn reception of the king's entry into London, by a circumstance which predicted those miseries which were afterwards felt both by the king and nation: for at this time the plague raged so violently both in the city and suburbs, that in one year it carried off thirty-five thousand four hundred and seventy people, besides upwards of eighteen thousand, who died of other distempers.

On account of this dreadful calamity the coronation was postponed to the second day of February; at which the Lord-mayor carried the short sceptre, and, after discharging his office as chief butler, received the usual fee of a golden cup and ewer.

In the year 1626, in the month of June, there happened so violent a storm of hail, rain, and wind, attended by thunder and lightning, that the church-yard walls of St. Andrew's Holbourn, and St. Botolph's Bishopsgate, were entirely blown down, and many corps who had died of the plague were exposed to public view.

This is the year from which may be dated the misfortunes of king Charles I. A war between England and France subsisting at this time, and his majesty not being able to obtain assistance from the parliament, applied to the citizens for the sum of one hundred thousand pounds, but to his great mortification they rejected his demand. This so inflamed the king's ministry, who looked on the people as slaves, and their property at the disposal of their sovereign, that they prevailed on his majesty peremptorily to demand the above sum. The citizens, however, evaded the demand as modestly as they could before the privy-council, who, looking on their excuses as frivolous and insignificant, a positive command was sent to the mayor and aldermen, either to comply, or risque the consequences of an obstinate refusal. The citizens were inflexible in their determination, nor would they listen either to remonstrances or threats.

Soon after this his majesty commanded them to fit out immediately twenty of the best ships in the river, well manned, and stored with ammunition and provisions for three months. On which the lord mayor and aldermen pretending their inability to comply with this request, begged that his majesty would be pleased to accept of half that number. But they were answered, "that the number demanded were necessary for the preservation of the state, and that the charge imposed did not exceed the value of some (one) of their estates: that all excuses on that occasion were to be rejected, as tending to the manifest danger of the public: and that as the said demand was not only directed to the generality of the city, but likewise to the several members, his majesty would therefore require an account of every citizen in particular." In consequence of this answer the citizens were obliged to fit out the twenty ships above demanded.

The resentment of the ministry did not rest here. Determined to raise money at all events, they arbitrarily seized and imprisoned many persons of distinction who opposed the loan; among whom was twenty principal citizens: and the lower class of people were forced into the service of his majesty either by sea or land.

The citizens were so alarmed at these arbitrary proceedings, that they grew more resolute as they found themselves more oppressed; and to such an issue was matters brought, that the parties imprisoned on account of the loan, were, by order of council, released; and the Lord-mayor was ordered to proceed moderately in his demands of the citizens within his jurisdiction.

In the year 1628 one Dr. Lamb (who was not only hated by the populace for being a creature of the duke of Buckingham, the king's favourite, but likewise a reputed conjuror) being found in the city, was attacked first by a few boys, and soon after by a great multitude, who pursued him down Woodstreet, crying out "Conjuror, vizard, devil;" and seizing him bodily, they dragged him along the street, kicking and thumping him with their feet and fists. His majesty having been informed of the tumult arrived just time enough with his body guard to save the doctor's life: he remonstrated with the citizens on their conduct, mildly exhorted them to keep the public peace, and to deliver up the doctor to be tried by the laws of his country, assuring them, that whatever offence the law should find him guilty of he should be severely punished. This was so far from having any effect on the enraged populace, that they only answered, "they had judged him already;" and then pulling him inhumanly by his legs and arms, they so dislocated his joints, and otherwise beat him, that he instantly died.

His majesty finding himself unable to chastise such insolence, immediately returned to his palace: soon after which the privy-council sent a letter to the Lord-mayor, aldermen and sheriffs, commanding them to make strict enquiry for the principal actors and abettors, and to bring them to punishment: but so little regard did the Lord-mayor and aldermen pay to this order of council, that they reported they were not able to discover any of the said rioters. They were thereupon commanded to attend the privy-council, where they were threatened, that if they did not deliver up the principal actors in the late murder, their charter should be confiscated. Their resolution was so great to screen the parties sought after, that they gave no other answer, than that they could not be found. At which the king was so offended that he amerced the city in a fine of six thousand pounds, but, on the commitment of several rioters afterwards, this fine was mitigated to fifteen hundred marks.

The following year the ministry adopted another expedient to raise money without parliamentary authority; which was to impose new duties on merchandize by order of privy-council only; and those who had resolution to oppose the said order had their effects arbitrarily seized on, and others, by command of the king, were committed to prison.

About

About this time an order was made by the privy-council to confine the south-side of Cheap-side from the Old-change to Bucklersbury, then called Goldsmith's-row, and Lombard-street, to the trade of goldsmiths only. And about the same time the Lord-mayor published an order for keeping the sabbath day holy.

In the year 1630 the sheriff's officers having arrested a man in Fleet-street, the populace, in a tumultuous manner, attempted his rescue; but being strongly opposed by the constables, a desperate fray ensued, in which many persons were killed, and others dangerously wounded. In order to suppress this dangerous commotion, the Lord-mayor issued a proclamation for apprehending the ring-leaders, many of whom being taken were tried and convicted of murder; but only one who was the chief of the rioters, was executed.

The following year the streets of London being greatly incumbered with stalls and stands for the sale of various goods, in defiance of the laws against those nuisances, the common-council enacted, "that no inhabitant whatever should
 " presume to sell any thing in the streets or lanes
 " of the city, on pain of forfeiting for the first " offence twenty-shillings, for the second forty-
 " shillings, for the third four pounds, and for
 " each offence afterwards the penalty to be
 " doubled."

In the year 1633 complaint being made of engrossers, and the bad practice of vintners, bakers, &c. in London, the star-chamber made a decree,
 " that no person whatsoever should presume to engross
 " any sort of provision; and particularly,
 " that no chandler should buy corn, grain, meal,
 " or flour, to sell again at market or elsewhere.
 " that no vintner should sell any thing but bread
 " and wine; nor permit any flesh or other sorts
 " of provision to be brought into his house, to " be there eaten by any of his guests. That no
 " baker should sell bread at any other rate than
 " twelve, or at most thirteen, loaves to the dozen.
 " That the keepers of victualling houses should " take no more of each guest for a meal than two " shillings including wine and beer; and of a " servant eight-pence. That no inholder within " London and Westminster, and ten miles of " the same, should take above sixpence in twenty-" four hours for hay for one horse, nor more " than six-pence for a peck of oats. That to " prevent the many inconveniences that might
 " arise from the increase of the number of livery
 " stables in London, Westminster, and South-
 " wark, it was decreed, that the said stable-
 " keepers, after they had consumed their stocks
 " of hay and oats, should not lay in any further
 " provision, but lay the business entirely aside.
 " And finally, that neither victuallers nor vint-
 " ners should suffer cards, dice, tables, or other
 " unlawful games in their houses, under penalty
 " of losing their licence."

This year his majesty was entertained by the gentlemen of the four inns of court with a masque, which cost them upwards of twenty thousand pounds. The procession began at Ely-house in Holbourn, and proceeded under the royal inspection to Whitehall, where their majesties viewed them with great pleasure from a window of the banqueting-house. This masque for curiosity of fancy, excellence in the performance, and dazzling splendor, exceeded every thing of the kind ever exhibited in England. Her majesty was so particularly delighted with this pompous pageantry, that she expressed a great desire to have it repeated: which Ralph Freeman, the mayor, receiving intimation of, invited their majesties to dine at Merchant-taylors-hall; they accepting the offer, his lordship entertained them with the greatest magnificence, and caused the abovementioned masquerade to be performed in all its parts, with the same dexterity, splendor and applause as it had been done at Whitehall.

In the year 1634 his majesty greatly offended the citizens of London by issuing a writ for levying ship-money without the assent of parliament towards fitting out a formidable fleet. In consequence of which a common-council was called, who resolved to address his majesty for relief against that illegal and exorbitant demand, in the following form: "whereas your majesty, by writ,
 " bearing teste the twentieth of October last,
 " commanded your petitioners, at their charge,
 " to provide seven ships of war, furnished with
 " men, victual, and all warlike provisions, to be " at Portsmouth by the first of March next, and
 " to continue from thence by the space of twenty-
 " six weeks in your majesty's service, upon de" fence of the seas, and other causes in the said
 " writ contained; your petitioners do, in all sub-
 " missive humbleness, and with acknowledgement
 " of your sacred majesty's many favours unto
 " your said city, inform your majesty, that they
 " conceive, that by ancient privileges, grants and
 " acts of parliament, (which they are ready hum" bly to shew forth) they are exempt and are to
 " be freed from the charge. And do most hum" bly pray, that your majesty will be graciously
 " pleased, that the petitioners, with your princely
 " grace and favour, may enjoy the said privile" ges and exemptions, and be freed from pro" viding of the said ships and provisions." This had so contrary an effect to what the citizens expected, that his majesty extended the ship money over the whole kingdom, which at first was imposed on maritime towns only.

This year the clergy petitioned his majesty for an increase of their tithes; alledging, that by the collusion between landlord and tenant, the decree for tythes was greatly evaded; and that, in their present condition, they were not able to contend with their parishioners. His majesty so far condescended to give them redress, that he appointed a commission to enquire into the alledged grievances: during which time the citizens opposed their proceedings so warmly by petitions to the king and council, that the decision of the point in question was entirely left to his majesty's determination; who was unwilling to pass an award in a matter so unpopular at a time when the nation was in the greatest ferment. And they the matter dropped.

CHAP.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

Hackney coaches first ply in the streets. Return of the plague. Prosecutions for ship-money. King Charles's first charter to the citizens. Pay dear for it by being condemned to forfeit Ulster. The citizens raise 1200 men to fight against the Scots. Order of privy-council for a double watch, and for assembling the train bands. Several aldermen committed to prison. Prosecution ordered against the Lord-mayor and sheriffs with respect to ship-money. The king's second charter confirming the rights of package, portage and scavage. The Scots take possession of the town of Newcastle. Their letter to the Lord-mayor. The city petition for abolishing episcopacy. The king applies to the city for a loan of one hundred thousand pounds. Petition to parliament against the earl of Strafford. The Spanish ambassador's house attacked by the city apprentices. Another petition against the earl of Strafford. Dispute concerning election of sheriffs. Loan of fifty thousand pounds to the parliament.

IN the year 1635 the number of hackney coaches having greatly encreased, they plied in the streets in the same manner they do at this time. But great inconveniences being found by their obstructing the common passages, and rendering the streets dangerous to his majesty and the nobility, a proclamation was issued, on the nineteenth of January, strictly commanding, "that after the 24th of June next ensuing, no hackney coach should be used in the city of London, nor suburbs thereof, other than by carrying of people too and from their habitations in the country, and that no person should make use of a coach in this city, except such persons as were capable of keeping four able horses fit for his majesty's service; which were to be ready when called for, under a severe penalty."

About this time London was again visited with the plague, which raged so violently, that, within the year it took off ten thousand four hundred citizens; on which account the fairs of St. Bartholomew and Southwark were suppressed.

The citizens were afflicted with a still greater plague than this: for the ministry were determined, at all events, to support the authority of the king and council, by raising money without consent of parliament; nor indeed did they want men in power to countenance their arbitrary proceedings: for Sir Edward Bromfield, Lord-mayor of London, committed Mr. Richard Chambers, a merchant, to prison, for peremptorily refusing to pay ship-money. This gentleman brought an action against Sir Edward for false imprisonment; but Sir Robert Berkley, one of the justices of the King's-bench, soon quashed the cause by declaring in court, "that there was a rule of law, and another of government; and that many things that could not be done by the rule of law, might be done by that of government."

This, however, did not deter the citizens from their resolution not to pay ship-money. Another order was soon after sent by the privy-council, requiring their submission to the authority of the king and council; but this they rejected with such resolution, that it produced the following letter to the Lord-mayor and aldermen: We "have received, by some of you the aldermen, a denial, in the name of the city, to our late letter for the setting forth of shipping for the present and necessary defence of the kingdom; and the excuses that are made on the like occasions, we cannot impute truly to any thing but want of duty. We do therefore, in his majesty's name, and by his commandment, require you to see the directions of our said letter performed, upon your allegiance, and as you will answer the contrary at your perils. And so, &c."

The citizens then petitioned the council for an abatement of the number of ships rated on the city; but this was absolutely rejected. And in order to perplex the Londoners still more, the privy-council sent an arbitrary letter, in the king's name, commanding the Lord-mayor and aldermen to shut up all shops in Goldsmith's-row, Cheapside and Lombard-street that were not occupied by goldsmiths; which order was soon after enforced by a decree of the court of star-chamber. However, the citizens paid no regard either to this order or a future letter, which was sent by the privy-council to the Lord-mayor and aldermen, commanding them to inform their deputies of those wards in which Cheapside and Lombard-street, are situated, that if they did not forthwith put their former directions in that particular in execution, they would then give such further orders, as should teach them to know, that the commands of that board ought not to be slighted.

Notwithstanding this contention between the city and court, yet the former prevailed on his majesty to grant them a more extensive charter than they had ever received from any other kings. By which his majesty confirmed all their former letters patent, the garbling of tobacco only excepted. And after reciting the charter granted by king Henry VI. and making all other charters of the said king void, his majesty grants as follows:

L 11

" That

" That the mayor, recorder, and aldermen,
 " belonging to the city of London, be justices of
 " the peace; with power to commit those to the " prison of Newgate, &c. who shall refuse to
 " find securities for the preservation of the peace;
 " and to do and to execute all such things, which
 " justices and keepers of the peace in any county
 " of England do, or are wont to do. That four " of the said justices, the mayor or recorder al" ways to be one, may hold a sessions, to enquire
 " into weights and measures, and selling victuals
 " contrary to the statutes, &c. And to receive
 " and inspect into indictments taken before them,
 " to make and continue process, and punish of" fenders, according to the laws of the kingdom,
 " and custom of the city: and to execute the
 " laws as fully and largely, as any other justices
 " of the peace in any other county. And or-
 " dains, that the sheriffs, &c. shall attend, aid,
 " and assist the said justices, when desired. He
 " also grants them the forfeiture of recogni-
 " zances, particularly those relating to bastard
 " children, inmates, and alehouses: with recog-
 " nizances for appearances at the sessions of goal
 " delivery. He likewise grants them all fines,
 " amerciaments, &c. imposed by the conservator
 " of the river Thames, and by the commissioners " of sewers. And he grants Moorfields and " West-Smithfield, with liberty to hold fairs and
 " markets in the said fields, with all tolls, profits,
 " &c. thereunto belonging. To which grant is " added this particular clause: We, our heirs or
 " successors, will not erect or cause to be erected,
 " nor will permit or give leave to any person or " persons to erect and build a new one, or any
 " messuages, houses, structures, edifices in or
 " upon the said field called Inner Moor, or the " field called Outward Moor, or the said field
 " called West-Smithfield; but that the said sepa" rate fields and places be reserved, disposed and
 " continued to such like common and public uses,
 " as the same fields heretofore and now are used,
 " disposed or converted to, (saving nevertheless
 " and always reserving to us, our heirs and suc-
 " cessors, all streets, lanes and alleys, and now
 " waste and void ground and places, as they are
 " now within the city and liberties of the same)
 " to hold and enjoy the said messuages, houses,
 " edifices, court-yards and all and singular the " premises granted or confirmed, or mentioned
 " to be granted and confirmed, with all their " appurtenances, (except before excepted) to
 " the said mayor and commonalty, and citizens
 " of the said city, and their successors for ever;
 " to hold in fee and common burgage, and not
 " in capite, or by knights service. He fur" ther grants the garbling of all spices and mer-
 " chandize, and other things, which ought to
 " be garbled; (except only tobacco) with power
 " to take fees for the same: and also the office
 " of gauging wines, oils, and other merchan-
 " dizes and things gaugable, with all and sin" gular fees, profits and emoluments, appertain-
 " ing to the said office: and to keep the great
 " balance or weight, within London, and all
 " weights whatsoever of all sorts of wares, mer-" chandizes, and things within the said city. And
 " he constituted the Lord-mayor, commonalty,

" and citizens of London, and their successors,
 " keepers of the great standard, balance and
 " weight, and all weights whatsoever; with power
 " to take fees, &c. appertaining to the said office.
 " And then he proceeds in these words: Also we " will, and for us, our heirs and successors, do
 " erect and create in and through the said city,
 " and liberties thereof, and in and through our
 " borough and town of Southwark, in our county
 " of Surry, a certain office called outroper, or
 " common cryer, to and for the selling of hous-
 " hold stuff, apparel, leases of houses, jewels,
 " goods, chattels, and other things, of all per" sons who shall be willing that the said officers
 " shall make sale of the same things by public
 " and open claim, commonly called outcry, and
 " sale in common and open place or places in the " said city, and the liberties of the same, and
 " for the town and borough of Southwark afore" said: and the same office, for the consideration
 " aforesaid, we, for us, our heirs and successors,
 " do give and grant to the said mayor, commo-
 " nalty, and citizens, of the city of London,
 " and their successors for ever, to have and exer" cise the same office, by them or their deputy,
 " officer or minister, officers, deputies, and mi" nisters, being first allowed or admitted thereto
 " by the mayor and commonalty, and citizens of " the said city, for the time being, in common-
 " cil of the said city assembled, or the major part
 " of them: and that it shall and may be lawful
 " to the said mayor and commonalty, and citi" zens of the city of London, and their successors,
 " and their deputy or deputies, officers or mi" nisters to demand, take, and keep, for the use
 " of the said mayor and commonalty, and citi" zens, aforesaid, the wares and fees expressed in
 " a certain schedule hereunto annexed. And we
 " will, and, for us, our heirs and successors, do
 " strictly appoint, command, and charge all per" sons, that neither they nor any of them pre" sume to sell any goods, chattels, household-stuff,
 " apparel, jewels, and other things in public
 " claim, called outcry in the city aforesaid, or the " liberties of the same, or in the borough and
 " town of Southwark, under pain of our royal " displeasure.

" And also we, for us, our heirs and succes" sors, do grant to the said mayor and common-
 " alty, and citizens of the said city, and their " successors, and by these presents do declare,
 " that the relicts and widows of freemen of the
 " said city, using manual arts and occupations, so " long as they shall continue widows, and remain
 " in the same city from time to time, and at all " times hereafter, may and be licensed to use and " execute, and exercise the same arts and manual
 " occupations in the said city, although they were
 " not educated by the space of seven years as ap" prentices, notwithstanding the statute made and
 " published in parliament of lady Elizabeth, late " queen of England, in the 5th year of her reign;
 " or any other statute or ordinance to the contrary
 " notwithstanding. And further, that no market
 " shall henceforth be granted, erected, or per" mitted, by us, our heirs, and successors, with-
 " in seven miles in compass of the said city.
 " And that whensoever, and as often as there " shall

" shall happen any issues to be taken of or upon
 " the custom of the said city between any parties
 " in pleading (although they themselves be parties)
 " or if any thing shall be moved or happen
 " in pleading, act, or question, touching the " customs aforesaid, before us, our heirs or successors
 " or justices for holding pleas before us,
 " our justices of the common bench, treasurer
 " and barons of the exchequer, or any other justices
 " of us, our heirs or successors, which " shall exact or require inquisition, search, or
 " trial, the mayor and aldermen of the said city
 " for the time, may record, testify, and declare,
 " by word of mouth, by the recorder of the said
 " city for the time being, those customs; and
 " that by such record, testimony, and declaration,
 " without taking any jury thereupon, or making
 " any further process, they may speedily proceed
 " to the caption or determination of the plea,
 " deed, or cause of business. We have given
 " also and granted, and by these presents, for us,
 " our heirs and successors, do give and grant to
 " the said mayor and commonalty, and citizens,
 " and their successors, treasures found in the same
 " city, or liberty of the same; and also waived
 " or strayed goods and chattels of all felons
 " and fugitives, for felonies committed by them
 " in the said city, or the liberties of the same,
 " judged or to be adjudged before us, our heirs
 " or successors, or any of our justices. We have " granted also, that the mayor of the said city,
 " and their successors, for the time being, may
 " name to the Chancellor of England for the time
 " being, two of the aldermen of the said city,
 " of which one, at the nomination of the said
 " mayor, shall be one of the keepers of the peace
 " in the county of Middlesex, and the other in " the county of Surry, who shall be inserted with " others into all commissions henceforth to be made
 " for the conservation of the peace, in the counties
 " aforesaid; and may henceforth do, concern,
 " and execute those things which are to be " done by the keepers of peace of the counties
 " aforesaid; according to the force and effect of
 " the commissions directed or to be directed to " them and others. And we will, appoint, ordain,
 " and declare, for us, our heirs and successors,
 " that all they who are, or hereafter shall
 " be sons of freemen of the city, or who are, or " hereafter shall be apprentices or servants of " freemen of our said city, and now do, or hereafter
 " shall reside or inhabit in the same city, or
 " the liberties of the same, or within ten miles " distant from any part of the same, and do or " shall use merchandizes; and who do or shall
 " refuse or delay to become freemen of the said
 " city, shall not be permitted at any time henceforth,
 " by themselves or by others, directly or " indirectly, to transport any goods, wares, or " merchandizes, by way of merchandizing, in " any way, from the port of our said city of " London, to ports foreign or beyond the seas;
 " and we do firmly command the governors,
 " assistants, and merchant adventurers of England,
 " &c. and other societies of merchants,
 " trading or merchandizing into foreign parts beyond
 " the seas; that they, or any of them, admit,
 " licence or permit any such like person or " persons to merchandize and traffic, or have

 " commerce as merchants to foreign parts, unless
 " such persons first become freemen of the said
 " city, and bring a testimonial from the chamberlain,
 " or under-chamberlain of the said city
 " for the time being, that they are admitted into
 " the liberty of the said city.

" And that no merchant, being a freeman of
 " the said city, shall take any apprentice to serve
 " him in such like merchandizes within the city
 " aforesaid, liberties or suburbs of the same, or " within ten miles of the same city, for less than " seven years, to be bound and enrolled according " to the custom of the said city, and not otherwise.
 " And we ordain and constitute, that there shall " be a certain office of the clerk of the court of " Requests, to be named and appointed by the
 " mayor and commonalty, and citizens of the
 " said city, assembled in common-council of the " same city, or the greater part of them. And " that there shall be a beadle of the court of Requests,
 " to be named and appointed by the said
 " mayor and commonalty, and citizens of the
 " said city, assembled in common-council, to " summon, serve, and execute warrants, precepts,
 " and process of the said court; and to receive
 " for his labour in the said office the wages and
 " fees expressed in a certain schedule hereunto
 " annexed. And whereas divers burglaries, felonies,
 " robberies, clandestine stealings, and thefts
 " of goods, jewels, apparel, and household stuff,
 " and other things, are daily committed within
 " our city of London, and liberties of the same,
 " to the grievous damage of some of our subjects
 " inhabiting there, or in the parts adjoining;
 " We, for the better discovery of such like offenders,
 " and of things so lost, will, and for us, our heirs
 " and successors, by these presents, do ordain,
 " grant, and constitute, that from henceforth
 " for ever, within the said city of London, and
 " the liberties of the same, there be and shall be
 " a certain office of register of all, and for sales
 " and pawns made or to be made to retailing
 " brokers within the said city and liberties of the " same; and for any goods, jewels, apparel, household
 " stuff, and other things so to be sold or pawned
 " by any persons. And that it may be lawful for
 " the said mayor, and citizens of the said city,
 " to demand, take, or have the wages and fees
 " expressed in a certain schedule annexed to these " presents. And further, we do grant, that it may
 " and shall be lawful to the citizens of the same
 " city, to expose and hang in and over the streets
 " and ways, and alleys of the said city, and suburbs
 " of the same, signs and posts of signs affixed to " their houses and shops, for the better finding out
 " such citizens dwellings, shops, arts, or occupations,
 " without impediment, molestation, or interruption
 " of us, our heirs, or successors. We do grant
 " and confirm to the mayor and commonalty, and
 " citizens of the said city, and their successors,
 " the custody, ordering, and government of the " hospital called Bethlehem; and all manors, lands,
 " tenements, possessions, and reversions whatsoever
 " and wheresoever lying and being, belonging and
 " appertaining to the same house and hospital called
 " Bethlehem. And do
 " make

" make, ordain, and constitute by these presents, those the mayor and commonalty, and citizens of the said city, and their successors, masters, keepers, and governors of the said house and hospital called Bethlehem, and of the said manors, lands, tenements, and other the premises belonging to the same house and hospital called Bethlehem; to have, hold, and enjoy the said custody, ordering and government of the said house and hospital called Bethlehem, and of the said manors, lands, tenements, possessions, revenues, and hereditaments, belonging to the same house and hospital called Bethlehem, to the said mayor and commonalty, and citizens of the said city, and their successors for ever; to the same uses, intents and purposes, as in the letters patent of lord Henry the VIIIth are ordained and appointed: Willing moreover, and for us, our heirs and successors, we do declare and ordain, that the said house or hospital of Bethlehem, or the manors, lands, tenements, possessions, revenues, and hereditaments belonging or appertaining to the same house or any part thereof, be not delivered, converted, or disposed to any other use than to the charitable works now used and applied in the same hospital.

" And further we will, and command the same mayor and commonalty, and citizens of the said city, and their successors, that they do not deliver or grant the said manors, lands, tenements, possessions, and revenues, belonging to the same house or hospital, or any part of them, for any term or terms of years, exceeding the number of 21 years; to commence from the time of the making of such like grant or lease in possession, and not in reversion, reserving half of the yearly value at least of such manors, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, so leased and granted, yearly to be paid during the said term, to the said mayor and commonalty, and their successors, to the uses, intents, and purposes above mentioned. And moreover we grant and give special licence, that it shall and may be lawful to the said mayor and commonalty, and citizens of London, and their successors, to purchase and receive, and hold to them and their successors, of any person or persons whatsoever, five acres of land, situate, lying, and being in the parish of St. Giles's in the Fields, in the county of Middlesex, now or late in the tenure or occupation of Margaret Pennell, or her assigns; although the same five acres, or any part of them, be held of us in capite by knights service; to have to the same mayor and commonalty, and citizens, of the same city, and their successors for ever. And we declare it to be our royal pleasure, by these presents, that the said mayor and commonalty, and citizens, or their successors, or any other person or persons by the assent and consent of the same mayor and commonalty, and citizens, shall build and erect, without the royal licence of us, our heirs, or successors, in that behalf first had and obtained, any houses, edifices, or structures upon the premises, or any parcel thereof. In witness whereof, we have made

" these our letters patents; witness myself at Westminster, the eighteenth day of October, in the fourteenth year of our reign."

A schedule of the fees taken by the common crier.

For selling all goods, in every shilling	—	6	0	4
For writing and keeping the books, in every pound	—	0	1	0
To the crier for crying the goods	—	1	0	0

Fees taken by the register for brokers.

For the bond to be entered into by every broker, broker and huckster, to the chamber	—	0	8	0
For every bargain, contract, pawn, for or upon which there shall be lent or given 11. or above and under 51.	—	0	0	4
For every the like, for which shall be lent 51. or more, and under 20s.	—	0	0	4
For every the like, on which shall be lent 20s. or more and under 40s.	—	0	1	0
For every the like, on which shall be lent 40s. or more	—	0	2	0

Fees taken by the Court of Conscience.

For every plaint	—	0	2	0
For every appearance	—	0	2	0
For every order	—	0	4	0
For every remittance to the common law	—	0	4	0
For every precept or warrant to commit to prison	—	0	6	0
For every search	—	0	2	0
For every satisfaction acknowledged on an order	—	0	6	0
For warning every person within the liberties	—	0	4	0
For warning every person without the liberties	—	0	6	0
For serving every precept or warrant	—	0	4	0

The granting of this charter must not be looked on as a free gift from the king; for the citizens paid very considerable sums to obtain this confirmation of their ancient rights and privileges; and so soon after, as

In the year 1639 the ministry, in an illegal, arbitrary, and unjust manner, commenced a suit in the court of star-chamber, against the Lord-mayor, and citizens, together with the governor and assistants of the new plantation in the province of Ulster in Ireland, in order to deprive them of the improvements they had made, at a very considerable expence, in that province; when after a hearing of seventeen days, they were, by a decree of that court, condemned to lose all their lands and possessions which had been granted to them by king James I. in that kingdom. Not satisfied with this, they at the same time amerced the citizens in a fine of fifty thousand pounds; but the parliament thinking it high time to stop such arbitrary proceedings, came to such resolutions as deterred the king from executing the said decree with respect to the fine: he moreover declared the decree against the Irish estate unlawful, and confirmed the grant of the province of Ulster made to them by the late king.

The citizens, knowing this lenity arose from the power of parliament and not the inclination of the king, gave him afterwards reason to repent of such illegal measures, by joining the parliament, whom they looked on as their protectors and guardians.

In the year 1640, an army being immediately wanted to march against the Scots, the privy-council called on the city to send twelve hundred men men to join that expedition, which were accordingly raised, and shipped at Blackwall, though not without some opposition from the rabble.

Engraved for Chamberlain's History of London.

The populace in general were so enraged at the archbishop of Canterbury, whom they looked on as a principal leader in all ministerial oppressions, that, in consequence of a paper stuck up in the Royal Exchange, they assembled to the number of five hundred, and marched in the night to the palace at Lambeth with an intent to destroy him and the building: but the bishop being apprized of their coming, was so guarded that he frustrated all their attempts, and obliged them to retire without accomplishing the purposes they intended.

The court being greatly alarmed at this, the privy council sent an order to the Lord-mayor to provide a double watch, and to oblige every housekeeper to keep his apprentices and servants quiet and peaceable.

Notwithstanding the Lord-mayor strictly obeyed these orders, yet so turbulent and enraged were the citizens against the court and ministry for their despotic government, that they stuck up papers in various parts of the city, exciting the people to a general insurrection. This occasioned another order from the privy-council to command the Lord-mayor to draw forth the city trained bands, the more effectually to suppress all disorderly and riotous meetings.

The king at this time committed several aldermen to prison for refusing to give in the names of the most substantial housekeepers within their jurisdiction: this was done the more strongly to enforce them to advance such sums as he should think proper without power of parliament; and to assess on them all the sum of two hundred thousand pounds. To effect which the attorney-general was ordered to proceed against them in the star-chamber. This flame was still farther increased by another order of the privy council, to prosecute the Lord-mayor and the sheriffs of London and Middlesex for their contempt and default in the prosecution of the writ for ship-money.

Notwithstanding these various persecutions, it did not in the least affect the firmness of these magistrates, who, to shew his majesty that their conduct was not directed in contempt to him, but in opposition to his evil counsellors, immediately complied with his majesty's command in furnishing him with four hundred able bodied men well accoutred, and conducted to march and join his army against the Scots, on a promise of being repaid the expence out of his majesty's exchequer.

The citizens, after this, advanced the king a considerable sum of money in consideration of his granting them another charter: by which, after first reciting their former privileges of package, survey, or scavage of all goods, and of baillage, his majesty, in consideration of four thousand two hundred pounds, confirms the said offices, and created, ordained, and constituted an office or officer of package of all sorts of goods and merchandize whatsoever, and an office of carriage and portage of all wools, &c. and merchandize whatsoever: and did ratify and confirm the fees set down in the tables hereunto annexed, due to the said office. And his majesty did also give and grant the said offices of scavage, or surveying, baillage, package, carriage, and portage, and their lawful fees, to the Lord-mayor and citizens of London, to be exercised and occupied by sufficient ministers or deputies, with this particular clause, "That no other porter or carrier, or any other person or persons whatsoever, shall presume to intermit or intrude him or themselves to carry or lade any of the said goods or merchandizes, from any wharf or shore within the limits aforesaid, into any ship or vessel; or to unlade any goods or merchandizes from any vessel upon any wharf, shore, or lane, within the limits aforesaid; without the special appointment or licence of the said mayor and commonalty, and citizens of the city aforesaid, or of their officers or deputies for that purpose first had and obtained." And concludes with giving power and authority to the said mayor and his proper officers, in the foresaid employments, "to give and administer the oath upon the holy evangelists, from time to time, to all such persons suspected or to be suspected of withdrawings, concealments, colourings, frauds, covins. And that it shall and may be lawful to the said mayor, his minister, and deputy, or officer for the time being, by all lawful ways and means to compel all such persons suspected, or to be suspected, as shall refuse or deny to take the said oath, to take the same oath." Which charter is dated the fifth day of September, in the sixteenth year of his reign.

The SCAVAGE Table of rates inwards.

	s.	d.
ALLUM, the C. weight, qt. 112lb.	0	1
Amotto, the C. qt. five score	0	4
Apples and pears, the little barrel	0	0½
Aquavitz the hoghead	0	6
Argol, white or red, the C. weight qt. 112lb.	0	1½
Babies heads, the dozen	0	0½
Bacon, the C. weight, qt. 112lb.	0	4
Bandstrings, the dozen knots	0	0½
Balks { Great, the C. qt. six score	1	8
{ Middle, the C. qt. ditto	0	9
{ Small, the C. qt. ditto	0	4
Barlings, the C. qt. ditto	0	4
Barley, the quarter, qt. eight bushels	0	0½
Barilla or sassa, the barrel, qt. C. weight	0	4
Basket-rods, the dozen bundles	0	4
Bast-ropes, the C. weight qt. 112lb.	0	0½
Battery basherows, or kettles, the C. weight qt. 112lb.	0	6
Beef, the barrel	0	1
Bell-metal, the C. weight, qt. 112lb.	0	2
Beans, the quarter	0	0½
Blacking or lamb-black, the C. weight, qt. 112lb.	0	3
Bottles of all sorts, the dozen	0	0½
Boards { Barrel boards, the thousand	0	4
{ Clapboards, the C. qt. six score	0	1
{ Pipe-boards, the C. qt. six score	0	1
Boratto or { Narrow, the single piece not above 15 yards	0	2
Bombasins { Broad, the single piece not above 15 yards	0	3
Books unbound the basket or maund	0	8
Bow staves, the C. qt. six score	0	2
Brass and irons, lavercocks, chaffing dishes, and all other brass or latten wrought, the C. qt. five score	0	3
Brimstone, the C. weight 112lb.	0	0½
Bristles, the dozen pound	0	0½

M m m

Buckrams

Buckrams	{ Of Germany, the dozen pieces	o 3	Galls, the C. weight, quantity 112lb.	o 2
	{ Of France the dozen pieces	o 2	Glas for windows, the chest or case	o 3
Buffins, Liles	{ Narrow, the single piece not above	o 1	Glas, called Venice drinking glasses, the dozen	o 0½
and	15 yards		Half-penny ware, the gross, qt. 12 dozen	o 0½
Moccadoes	{ Broad, the single piece not above	o 2	Penny ware, the gross, qt. 12 dozen	o 0½
	15 yards		Of steel, small dozen	o 0½
Bull-rushes, the load		o 1	Glasses, Of steel, large dozen	o 1
Burs for mill-stones, the C. qt. five score		o 3	Looking-glasses	{ Of crystal, small dozen under No. 6.	o 1
Butter, the C. weight qt. 112lb.		o 1		{ Of crystal, middle, the dozen No. 6.	o 2
Cable ropes for cordage, the C. weight qt. 112lb.		o 1		{ Of crystal, the dozen, No. 7, 8, 9, 10	o 4
Cabinets	{ Great, the piece	o 2		{ Of crystal, the dozen, No. 11, 12.	1 6
	{ Small, the piece	o 1	Glas stone plates for spectacles, rough, the dozen	o 0½
Caddas, or crewel ribbons, the dozen pieces, qt. each		o 1		{ Of crystal small under No. 6. the	o 0½
piece 36 yards			Glas-plates	dozen	o 0½
Candle-wick, the C. weight qt. 112lb.		o 1	or sights for	{ Of crystal, No. 6. the dozen	o 0½
Candles of tallow, the dozen pound		o 0½	looking-glasses,	{ Of crystal No. 7, 8, 9, 10, the do-	o 2
Capers, the C. pound qt. five score		o 2	unfoiled	zen	o 2
Capravans, the C. qt. six score		o 3		{ Of crystal No. 11, 12, the dozen	1 0
Cards	{ Playing cards, the small gross qt. 12 dozen	o 2	Gloves of Spanish leather, the dozen pair	o 0½
	pair	o 2	Grain for	{ Of scarlet powder, the pound	o 0½
	Wool cards, the dozen pair	o 0½	dyers	{ Of Sevil, in berries and grain, of Portu-	o 0½
	Turkey, Persia, East India, and Venice,			gal or Rotta, the pound	o 0½
Carpets	{ long, the piece	o 6		Almonds, the C. weight, qt. 112lb.	o 3
	{ Of the same, or like sorts, short, the piece	o 4		Anniseeds, the C. weight, qt. 112lb.	o 2
	{ Carpets of all other sorts, the piece	o 0½		Cloves, the C. weight, qt. five score	1 6
Cases	{ For looking glasses, gilt, from No. 3. to No.			Currants, the C. weight, qt. 112lb.	o 2
	10. the dozen	o 1½		Dates, the C. weight, qt. 112lb.	o 3
	{ For looking glasses, ungilt, the dozen	o 0½		Figs, the C. weight, 112lb.	o 1
Chamlets mohair, and Turkey programs, each 15 yds.		o 1½		Fusses of cloves, the C. qt. five score	o 8
Cheese, the C. weight qt. 112lb.		o 1		Ginger, the C. qt. five score	1 0
Cherries, the C. weight qt. 112lb.		o 1½		Liquorish, the C. weight, qt. 112lb.	o 1½
Cloth	{ French woollen, each 20 yards	o 8		Mace, the C. pound qt. five score	2 0
	{ Scarlet, the yard	o 1		Nutmegs ditto	1 6
Cochineal	{ Silvester, or Campecha, the lb.	o 0½	Grocery	Pepper, the C. qt. ditto	o 6
	{ Of all other sorts, the lb.	o 1		Prunes, the C. weight qt. 112lb.	o 1
Combs of box, or light wood, the gross qt. 12 dozen		o 0½		Raisins of the sun, the C. wt. qt. 112lb.	o 2
Copper bricks or plates, round or square, the C. wt.		o 4		Raisins great, or malaga, the C. weight,	1 0
Copperas, the C. weight qt. 112lb.		o 1		qt. 112lb.	o 0
Corral, rough or polished, the mast, qt. 22lb		o 2		Cinnamon, the C. weight, qt. five score	1 0
Cork, the C. weight qt. 112lb.		o 1		{ Refined, the C. wt. qt. 112	o 10
Cork, the dozen pieces, for shoemakers		o 0½		Candy, brown or white, the C.	o 8
Deal boards of all sorts, the C. qt. five score		1 0		weight	o 8
Dogs of earth, the small gross, qt. 12 dozen		o 1½		Sugar	{ Muscavadoes and white, the C.	o 4
Durance of	{ With thread each 15 yards	o 1½			weight	o 4
Duretty	{ With silk, each 15 yards	o 2			{ St. Thome and Pennellis, the	o 2
	Amber-grease, the ounce	o 1½			Ct. weight	o 2
	Allofocratina, the pound	o 0½	Goats hair the C. lb. qt. five score			o 6
	Barley hulled, the C. qt. 112lb.	o 1	Gun powder, the barrel, qt. 112lb.			o 3
	Carway and comin-feed, the C. weight	o 1½	Gum Arabick, the C. weight, qt. 112lb.			o 2
	China roots, the C. qt. five score	1 6	Hawks of all sorts, the hawk			o 2
Drugs	Civit, the ounce	o 1		{ Beast or straw hats, the dozen	o 0½
	Gum Armoniac, the C.	o 6		{ Beast or straw hats, plain, the gross, qt. 12	o 1½
	Musk, the ounce	o 1	Hats	dozen	o 1½
	Musk-cods, the dozen	o 1		Wool fells, the dozen	o 1½
	Saunders, white or red, the C. qt. five score	o 6		Demi-castors, the piece	o 0½
	Treacle, common, the C. qt. five score	o 2		Bever hats, the piece	o 2
	Turpentine, common, the C. wt. qt. 112lb.	o 1	Headings for pipes, hogsheds, or barrels, the thou-			o 2
Feathers for beds, the C. weight qt. 112lb.		o 2	sand			o 2
	Cod-fish, the C. qt. five score	o 4	Heath for brushes, the C. weight, qt. 112lb.			o 1
	Cole fish, the C. qt. five score	o 1	Hemp	{ Undrest, the ditto	o 1
	Eels, the barrel	o 1		{ Drest, ditto	o 2
	Eels quick, the ship lading	10 0	Hides	{ Buff hides, the piece	o 0½
	Herrings white or red, the last	o 6		{ Cow hides or horse hides the dozen	o 3
Fish	Lings, the C. qt. five score	o 6		Honey, the barrel	o 1½
	Lub-fish, the C. qt. ditto	o 2		Horses and mares, each horse or mare	o 6
	Croplings, the C. ditto	o 1		Hops, the C. weight, qt. 112lb.	o 2
	Titlings, the C. ditto	o 0½		Indico the C. lb. qt. five score	2 0
	Sturgeon, the firkin	o 1		Indico dust, ditto	o 8
	Sturgeon, the keg	o 0½		{ Wrought, the dozen pound	o 1½
	Salmon, the barrel	o 1½	Incle	{ Roles, the dozen pieces, of 36 yds. each piece	o 1
Flax, the C. weight, qt. 112lb.		o 2		{ Unwrought, the C. lb. quantity five score	o 4
Flax undrest, the C. weight, qt. 112lb.		o 1½	Iron wrought, the C. qt. 112lb.		o 1
Flax drest or wrought, the C. weight, qt. 112lb.		o 4	Iron unwrought, the ton		o 6
Frankincense, the C. qt. 112lb.		o 1½	Iron pots, the dozen		o 1½
	Barmillions, the piece, or two half pieces,		Lattin, vocat	{ Shaven Lattin, the C. wt. qt. 112lb.	o 6
Fustians	qt. 15 yards each half piece	o 2		{ Black Lattin the C. wt. qt. 112lb.	o 3
	Naple fustians, tripe, or velvet, the piece,			Bone-lace of thread the dozen yards	o 0½
	qt. 15 yards.	o 2	Lace	{ Silk-bone-lace, the pound, qt. 16 ounces	o 2
	Bever skins, the piece	o 0½		Silk lace of all sorts, the pound, qt. 16	o 1
	Bever-bellies, or wombs, the dozen	o 4		ounces.	o 1
Furrs	Budge, tawed or untawed, the C. weight,	o 2	Lemons	{ The thousand	o 1
	qt. five score	o 2		{ Juice of Lemons, the pipe	o 6
	Fox skins, the C. qt. five score	o 4		{ Pickled Lemons, the pipe	o 3
	Fonies without tails, the dozen	o 1½	Linseed, the quarter		o 1
Galley dishes, each 12 dozen		o 1	Leaves of gold, the C. leaves, qt. five score		o 0½
			Lures for hawks, the dozen		o 0½

Leather

Leather	Bazel leather, the dozen skins	0	0½	Pans	Dripping or frying-pans, the C. weight, qt. 112lb.	0	1½
	Hangings, gilt, the piece	0	3		Warming pans, the dozen	0	1½
	Leather for masks, the dozen lb.	0	2	Paper	Brown, the C. bundles	0	6
Lutes, the dozen		0	4		Of all other sorts, each five score reams	1	8
Latefrings	Catling, the great gros, qt. 12 small gros of knots	0	0½	Pease, the quarter		0	0½
	Minikins, the gros, qt. 12 dozen of knots	0	0¼	Pitch and tar, the last		0	3
	British Cloth, the C. ells, qt. five score	0	2	Plates	Single, white or black, the C. plates	0	1
Linnen	Brabant, Emden, Flemish, Freeze, Gentish, Holland, Ifingham, Overifily, Rowse, and Cowfield cloths, or plats, each piece 30 ells	0	2		Double ditto	0	2
	Callicoes or dutties the piece	0	0½	Pomegranates, the thousand		0	2
	Cambricks the whole piece, qt. 13 ells	0	2	Pork, the barrel		0	1½
Damask for tabling	Of Holland making the dozen yards	0	4	Pots	Of earth or stone, covered, the C. qt. five score	0	1½
	Of Slecia making the dozen yards	0	2		Of earth or stone, uncovered, the C. cast, qt. a gallon to every cast, if in one plot or more	0	2
	Of Holland, making the dozen yards	0	1	Quails, the dozen		0	0½
Damask for towelling and nap-kenning	Of Silesia making the dozen yards	0	2	Quicksilver, the C. lb. qt. five score		0	10
	Of Holland making the dozen yards	0	1	Quinces, the C. qt. five score		0	0½
	Of Slecia making the dozen yards	0	2	Rape-feed, the quarter		0	1
Diaper for tabling	Of Holland making the dozen yards	0	1	Rosin, the ton		0	8
	Of Slecia making the dozen yards	0	0½	Rice, the C. weight, qt. 112lb.		0	1
	Of Holland, making the dozen yards	0	1	Rye, the quarter		0	0½
Diaper for towelling and nap-kenning	Of Silesia making the dozen yards	0	0½	Rims for sieves, the gros, qt. 12 dozen		0	0½
	Of Holland making the dozen yards	0	1	Saffron the lb.		0	0½
	Of Slecia making the dozen yards	0	0½	Saffore, the C. lb. qt. five score		0	4
French canvas and line, ell and half quarter broad, or upwards, the C. ells, qt. fix score		0	3	Salt, the C. weight		0	2
	French or Normandy canvas and line, narrow vaudales, or vittry canvas, Dutch barras and Hessian canvas, the C. ells, qt. fix score	0	2	Salt-petre, the C. weight, qt. 112lb.		0	1½
	Gutting and spruce canvas drillings pack, duck hinderlands, middle good headlock, Muscovy linnen, narrow, Hamburgh cloth, narrow, and Irish, cloth, the C. ells, qt. fix score	1	0	Sayes	Double sayes, or Flanders serges, the piece	0	3
Hamburgh and Silesia cloth, broad, the C. ells, qt. fix score		0	3		Hounscot sayes, and middle sayes, the piece	0	2
	Poldavis, the bolt	0	1	Shumack the C. weight, qt. 112lb.		0	1½
	Lawns, the whole piece, qt. 13 ells	0	2	Silk, vocat.	Bridges filk, Granadoes, Naples, Organfine, Pole, and Spanish Sattin, filk, flear filk, fine and thrown filk, the lb. qt. 16 ounces	0	1
Callicoe lawns, the piece		0	0½		Raw China filk, the lb. 24 ounces	0	1
French lawns, the piece		0	0½		Ferret or Floret filk, fillozel, fleave filk, coarse, the lb. qt. 14 ounces	0	0½
Lockrams, the piece, of all sorts, qt. 106 ells		0	1½	Silk stockings, the pair	Raw long filk, the lb. qt. 14 ounces	0	0½
Southwick, the C. ells, qt. fix score		0	1½		Raw short filk, and raw Morea filk, the lb. qt. 24 ounces	0	0½
Straibourg linen, each 30 ells		0	1		Boradoes of filk, Catalopha, China, damask filk, chamlet, china, program, phillofellas, narrow, tabbies of filk towers, taffaty, the dozen yards	0	2
Striped or tufted canvas, with thread, the piece, qt. 15 yards		0	1	Silk wrought	Silk program narrow, filk say calunaucoes and phillofellas, broad, the dozen yards	0	4
Striped, tufted, or quilted canvas, with filk, the piece, qt. 15 yards		0	1		Silk programs, broad, caff or damask, the dozen yards	0	4
Littimus, the C. weight, qt. 112lb.		0	1		Sattins
Malt, the quarter		0	0½		Bolonia, Lukes, Jean, and other of like making, the dozen yards	0	6
Magnus, the C. weight, qt. 112lb		0	1		Bridges sattin, China and Turkey sattin, the dozen yards	0	1½
Masks of velvet or fatten, the dozen		0	1		Sarcenets
Masts	Great, the mast	0	2		Of Bologna or Florence, the dozen ells	0	1½
	Middle, the mast	0	1		Of China, the dozen ells	0	1
	Small, the mast	0	0½		Cyprefs
Maps printed, the ream		0	1		Of filk, broad, the dozen yards	0	0½
Madder	Crop madder, and all other bale madder, the C. weight, qt. 112lb.	0	2		Of filk, narrow, each 24 yards	0	0½
	Fat madder, the C. weight, qt. 112lb.	0	1½		Taffaties
	Mull madder, the C. weight, qt. 112lb.	0	0½		Ell broad, each dozen yards	0	2
Meal, the last, qt. 12 barrels		0	4		China and Levant, each dozen yards	0	0½
Mocado ends, the dozen pounds		0	1½		Velvets
Oats, the quarter		0	0½		China velvet, each dozen yards	0	1
Oil	Seville, Majorca, Minorca, Provence, Portugal and salad oil, the ton	2	8		All other velvets or plushes, each dozen yards	0	6
	Rape and linseed oil, the ton	2	6	Skins	Cordovant skins, the dozen	0	2
	Train-oil of Greenland or Newfoundland, the ton	1	4		Goat skins in the hair, the dozen	0	1
Olives, the hogthead		0	4		Kid skins of all sorts, the C. qt. five score	0	3
Onions	The C. bunches	0	1	Smalt, the C. lb. qt. five score		0	4
Oranges, the 1000	Seed, the C. weight, qt. 112lb.	0	3	Spars	Bonnispars, the C. qt. five score	0	4
		0	1		Cantspars, the C. qt. fix score	0	2
		0	1½		Small spars, the C. qt. fix score	0	1
Orchal, the C. weight, qt. 112lb.		0	1½	Stones	Dog-stones, the last	0	6
Packthread, the C. qt. five score		0	1½		Marble-stones, the ton	0	8
					Mill-stones, the piece	0	6
				Sword-blades, the dozen	Quern-stones, the last	0	2
						0	1
					Pipe or hogthead staves, the thousand	0	6
				Staves	Barrel staves ditto	0	3
					Firkin ditto	0	1½
					Long steel, wisp steel, and such like, the C. weight, qt. 112lb.	0	2
				Steel	Gad steel, the half barrel	0	4

Succade

Succads, wet or dry, the C. qt. five score	s. d.
Syder, the ton	0 10
Tallow, the C. weight, qt. 112lb.	0 4
Tapestry { With hair, the C. Flemishells, qt. five score	0 1
{ With wool ditto	0 4
{ With caddas ditto	0 6
{ With silk, the dozen Flemish ells	1 0
Tarras, the barrel	0 2
Tazells, the thousand	0 0½
Tykes of all sorts, the tyke	0 0½
Thread { Bridges thread, the dozen lb.	0 1
{ Outnal thread the dozen lb.	0 1
{ Whitened brown or piecing thread, the dozen lb.	0 1½
{ Sisters thread, the lb.	0 0½
{ Lyons or Paris thread, the bale, qt. C. bolts	8
{ Spanish verins, Brazil tobacco, the C. qt. five score	2 0
Tobacco { St. Christopher's tobacco, or the like, the C. qt. five score	2 0
Tow, the C. weight, qt. 112lb.	0 0½
Tiles, vocat. pantiles, or Flanders tiles, the thousand	0 2
Wax, the C. weight, qt. 112lb.	0 4
Wainscot, the C. qt. five score	0 6
Whale-fins, the dozen	0 1
Wheat, the quarter eight bushels	0 1
Woa { Island wood, the ton	1 0
{ Tholoufe wood, the C. qt. 112lb.	0 1
{ Box wood, the thousand pieces	0 2
{ Brazil or Fernando buck-wood, the C. wt. qt. 112lb.	0 3
{ Brazeletto or Jamaica wood, the C. weight, qt. 112lb.	0 1
Wood { Fustic, the C. weight, 112lb.	0 0½
{ Red or Guinea wood, the C. qt. 112lb.	0 2
{ Sipeet-wood of East-India, the C. wt. qt. 112lb.	0 1
{ Beaver wool, the lb.	0 1
{ Cotton wool, the C. qt. five score	0 3
{ Irish { Combed, the C. qt. five score	0 4
{ Uncombed, the C. qt. 112lb.	0 2
{ Elstridge wool, the C. weight, qt. 112lb.	0 2
{ Polonia ditto	0 3
{ French ditto	0 2
{ Lambs ditto	0 3
{ Spanish ditto	0 4
{ Red ditto, the lb.	0 0½
Wire, vocat. Littin wire; and all other wire, the C. wt.	0 4
Wine eager, the ton	0 6
Wines { Gascoyne and French wines, and all other wines of the growth of the French king's dominion, the ton	0 2
{ Rhenish wine, the awm	0 6
{ Muskadell, and all other wines of the growth of the Levant, the butt	1 0
{ Sack, Canary, Malaga, Madera, Romney, bastard, tent, and Alicant wines, the pipe	1 0
{ Cable yarn the C. weight, qt. 112lb.	0 1
{ Camel program, or mohair yarn, the C. qt. five score lb.	1 6
{ Cotton yarn the C. lb. qt. five score	0 4
Yarn { Irish yarn, the pack, qt. four C. weight at fix score lb. to the C.	0 6
{ Raw linen yarn, Dutch or French, the C. lb. qt. five score	0 4
{ Spruce or Muscovy yarn, the C. wt. qt. 112lb.	0 2

All other goods not mentioned in this TABLE, shall pay, for scavage duties inward, after the rate of one penny in the pound, according as they are expressed or valued in his majesty's late book of RATES. And all other, not expressed therein, shall pay the same rates according to the true value.

The BALLIAGE Duties outwards.

BEER, the ton	s. d.
Canvas, the C. ells, at fix score	0 4
Coals, the chaldron	0 2
Drapery { Broad cloth, the piece	0 1½
{ Kerfies of all sorts ditto	0 0½
{ Perpetuannoos, ditto	0 0½
{ Stuffs, woollen or worsted, the single pce.	0 0½
{ Ditto, the double piece	0 1

Dying com- { Cochineal, the C. qt. five score	s. d.
modities { Indico, the C. qt. five score	0 7
{ Wood of all sorts for dyers, the C. wt. qt. 112lb.	0 4
Fustians, English, each 15 yards	0 1
{ Cloves, mace, nutmegs or cinnamon, the C. qt. five score	0 0½
Grocery { Pepper or ginger, the C. qt. five score	0 6
{ Raisins, the piece or frail	0 2
{ Raisins of the sun, the C. wt. qt. 112lb.	0 0½
Iron { The ton unwrought	0 1
{ Wrought the C weight, qt. 112lb.	0 6
Lamprones, the thousand	0 1
Lead, the fodder	0 0½
Saffron the lb.	0 6
Salt, the wey	0 0½
Salt petre, the C. weight, qt. 112lb.	0 2
Silk, raw or thrown, the lb. qt. 16 ounces	0 1
{ Bever skins, the C. qt. five score	0 0½
{ Badger skins, the C. qt. ditto	1 6
{ Coney skins, black, ditto	0 6
{ Cat skins, ditto	0 2
{ Calf skins, ditto	0 2
{ Fox skins, ditto	0 2
{ Fitches, the timber	0 6
{ Morkin, the C. qt. six score	0 1
{ Otter skins, the C. qt. five score	0 2
{ Sheep or lamb, the C. qt. six score	0 6
{ Squirrel skins, the thousand	0 2
Tin or pewter, the C. weight, qt. 112lb.	0 1
Wax, ditto	0 2
Wool of all sorts, ditto	0 2

Other merchandize, liquid and dry, that are not particularly rated in the above Table, shall pay balliage duties outward by their bulk, as follows :

A Great pack, trufs, or fardel, containing between fifteen or twenty cloths, or other goods to that proportion	s. d.
An ordinary pack, trufs, or fardel, containing in big- nefs about ten or twelve cloths, or twelve or fourteen baize, or to the like proportion, in friezes, cottons or other goods	1 6
A bale containing three or four cloths, or four or five baize, or the like proportion in other goods	1 0
A great maund or great basket	0 6
A small maund or basket, poize three C. weight. or under	0 3
A hamper or coffer, poize two C. wt. or under	0 8
A but or pipe	0 3
A hoghead or puncheon	0 8
A barrel	0 4
A firkin	0 1
A dry fat	0 2
A drum fat	0 3
A bale	0 4
A great chest or great case	0 6
A small chest or case, poize three C. wt. or under	0 8
A small box	0 4
A great trunk	0 2
A small trunk, poize not above two C. wt.	0 6
A bag or sack	0 3
A feron	0 4

The PACKAGE Table of Rates.

A Rnetto the C. qt. five score	s. d.
Aquavitæ, the hoghead	0 3
Argol, white or red, the C. weight, qt. 112lb.	0 4
Ashes { Ashes, pot-ashes, the barrel, qt. two C. wt.	0 1½
{ Soap-ashes, the last	0 2
Awl-blades for shoemakers, the thousand	1 0
Barilla or Saffora, the barrel, qt. two C. weight	0 0½
Beer, the ton	0 4
Birding shot-lead, the C. weight qt. 112lb.	0 6
Books, the maund	0 2
Bottles of glass, covered with leather, the dozen	0 1
Brimstone, the C. weight, qt. 112lb.	0 1
Brushes, the dozen	0 2
Broken glass, the barrel	0 0½
Buttons,	0 0½

Buttons, vocat.	Brass, best; copper, or latten buttons, the great gross, qt. twelve small gross	o 1	Knives	Iron, the ton, unwrought	o 6
	Hair buttons, the great gross	o 1		Iron wrought, the C. wt.	o 1
	Silk buttons, ditto	o 0 1/2		Iron spurs, the dozen pair	o 1
	Thread buttons, ditto	o 0 1/2		Ivory combs, the dozen lb.	o 2
Buckweed, the quarter		o 1	Knives	London knives ordinary, the small gross	o 3
Buckrams of all sorts, the dozen pieces		o 2		Sheffield knives, ditto	o 1 1/2
Caps for sailors, Monmouth and others, the dozen		o 1	Face	Shoemaker's pairing knives, ditto	o 0 1/2
Canary seed, the bushel		o 0 1/2		Bone-lace of thread, the dozen yards	o 0 1/2
Cloaks, old, the piece		o 0 1/2	Lamparnes, the thousand	Silk-lace the lb. qt. 16 ounces	o 1 1/2
Copperas, the C. weight qt. 112lb.		o 1			o 1 1/2
Cochineal	Silvester or Campecha, the lb.	o 0 1/2	Lead, the fodder		o 8
Cobweb lawns, each 15 yards	Of all other sorts the lb.	o 1	Lemons pickled, the pipe		o 3
		o 0 1/2	Lemon juice, ditto		o 0
		o 0 1/2	Linseed, the quarter		o 0 1/2
		o 0 1/2	Callicoe, the piece		o 0 1/2
Drugs, vocat.	Affafetida, gum armoniac, gum laek, oil banum, and saffras wood, the C. qt. five score	o 6	Cambricks, two half pieces, 13 ells		o 1 1/2
	Cassia Fistula, the C. qt. ditto	o 1	Damasks for tabling of all sorts, the doz. yds.		o 2
	Cassia Lignea, the C. lb. ditto	o 8	Damask for towelling and napkening of all sorts, the doz. yards		o 0 1/2
	Cubebs, the C. ditto	o 6	Diaper of all sorts, for tabling, the doz. yards		o 1
Elephants teeth, the C. qt. five score	Rhubarb, the lb.	o 1	Diaper for towelling and napkening of all sorts, the dozen yards		o 0 1/2
	Seemoady, ditto	o 1	Lawns, the piece, qt. 13 ells		o 1 1/2
	Estridge, alias Ostrich feathers, the lb. and rest	o 0 1/2	Linnen	Linnen cloth, called Brabant, Embden, Flemish frieze, Kentish holland, Ivingham
	Filing of iron, called swarf, the barrel	o 2		Overisilis and Rows cloth, each 30 ells	o 2
Flasks of horn, the dozen		o 1		French or Normandy canvas, the C. ells, qt. six score	o 3
Flax dress, the C. weight qt. 112lb.		o 4		Dutch barras, Hessian and Vittry canvas the C. ells, qt. six score	o 3
Flax undress, ditto		o 2		Canvas tufted, striped or quilted with copper, silk, or thread, or such like, the piece, qt. 15 yards	o 1
Frankincense, ditto		o 1 1/2		Linnen threads the maund	o 2
Fish	Herrings full or shotten, the half	o 6	Madder, all but mall madder, the C. wt. qt. 112lb.		o 2
	Stock-fish of all sorts, the half	o 6	Melasses, the hoghead		o 4
Fassians	English Million, the piece, qt. two half pieces of 15 yards the piece	o 1	Mustard seed, the C. wt. qt. 112lb.		o 0 1/2
	Venetian, English make, each 15 yards	o 1	Nails	Chair nails, brass or copper, the thousand	o 0 1/2
Gauls the C. weight, qt. 112lb.		o 2		Copper nails, rose nails, and saddle nails, the sum qt. ten thousand	o 0 1/2
Ghee, ditto		o 1	Oaker, red or yellow, the C. wt. qt. 112lb.		o 1
Gloves	Gloves clapping, the maund or basket	o 1 1/2	Onion-seed, ditto		o 4
Grains	Scarlet powder, and of Sevil in berries, and grain of Portugal or Rosta, the C. lb.	o 6	Orchal, ditto		o 1
	Grain French or Guiney, the C. lb.	o 4	Ox-bones, the thousand		o 1
	Of cloves, the C. wt. qt. five score	o 4	Ox-guts, the barrel		o 1
	Of almonds, the C. wt. qt. 112lb.	o 1	Oils	Seville, Majorca, Minorca, Provence, Portugal, linseed, or rape oil, the ton	o 4
Garble	Of ginger, the C. lb. qt. five score	o 1		Train or whale oil, ditto	o 8
	Of mace, ditto	o 9	Ostrich feathers. See Estridge
	Of pepper, ditto	o 3	Paper, printed or copy paper, the C. reams, qt. five score		o 6
	Buck leather, the dozen pair	o 1	Pewter, the C. wt. qt. 112lb.		o 4
Gloves	Gloves with silk fringe and faced with satin, the dozen pair	o 1	Rape seed, the quarter		o 1
	Gloves lined with coney or lamb skins, or plain, the dozen pair	o 0 1/2	Rapeseeds, the thousand		o 0 1/2
	Almonds, the C. wt. qt. 112lb.	o 2	Red dead, the C. wt. qt. 112lb.		o 1
	Anniseeds, ditto	o 2	Red earth, ditto		o 0 1/2
Grocery, vocat	Cloves, the C. wt. qt. five score	o 1	Rice, ditto		o 0
	Currants, the C. wt. qt. 112lb.	o 3	Rosin the ton		o 1
	Dates, ditto	o 4	Saffron, the lb.		o 2
	Figs, ditto	o 0 1/2	Salt, the weigh		o 2
Hemp, the C. wt. qt. 112lb.	Ginger, the C. wt. qt. five score	o 9	Salt-petre, the C. wt. qt. 112lb.		o 2
	Liquorish, the C. wt. qt. 112lb.	o 1 1/2	Seamerse teeth, the C. wt. qt. five score		o 10
	Mace, the C. lb. qt. five score	o 6	Sea coals, the chaldron		o 4
	Nutmegs, ditto	o 1	Stockings	Childrens stockings, the dozen pair	o 0 1/2
Hats	Prunes the C. wt. qt. 112lb.	o 0 1/2		Kersey or leather stockings, ditto	o 1
	Raisins, great and Malaga, the C. wt. qt. 112lb.	o 1		Silk stockings the pair	o 0 1/2
	Raisins of the sun, ditto	o 2		Worked stockings the dozen pair	o 2
Hats	Sugar candy, ditto	o 8		Woollen knit stockings, ditto	o 1 1/2
	Sugar of St Thome and Pennellis, ditto	o 3	Shumack, the C. wt. qt. 112lb.		o 2
	Sugar of all sorts, ditto	o 6		Badger skins, the C. qt. five score	o 6
	Cinnamon, the C. lb. qt. five score	o 1		Beaver skins, ditto	o 6
Hairs	Hair of goats or kids, the C. wt. qt. five score	o 4		Cat skins, ditto	o 4
	Ox or cow tail hair, the Ct. wt. qt. 112lb.	o 0 1/2		Calf skins, ditto	o 8
	Ink-horns, the small gross, qt. 12 dozen	o 0 1/2		Coney skins, grey, tawed, seasoned or flag, the C. qt. six score	o 2
	Horns of lanthorn, 1000 leaves	o 1	Skins and Furs	Elk skins, the piece	o 0 1/2
Hops, the C. wt. qt. 112lb.	Tips of horns, the 1000	o 1		Fitches, the timber	o 1
	Indico of all sorts, the C. lb. qt. five score	o 2		Fox skin, the C. qt. five score	o 8
	Indico dust, ditto	o 6		Jennet skins, black, seasoned or raw	o 0 1/2
India hides, the C. ditto	Irish rugs, the piece	o 1		Kid skins, the C. qt. five score	o 2
				Lamb skins, tawed or in the oil, the C. qt. six score	o 6
				Morkins, tawed or raw, the C. qt. six score	o 4

Skins and Furs	Of Otter skins, the C. qt. five score	0 8	Waincoats	Of Kersey or flannel, the dozen	0 6
	Rabbit skins, ditto	0 1		Of woollen knit, ditto	0 2
	Sheep skins, the C. qt. six score	0 6		Of worsted ditto, the piece	0 0 1/2
	Sheep pelts, the C. qt. five score	0 3		Wrought with cruel, the piece	0 0 1/2
	Squirrel skins, the thousand	0 3		With silk	0 1
Silk	Silk of all sorts, raw, the lb. of 16 ounces	0 1	Wool	Cotton wool, the C. qt. five score	0 3
	Silk nubs, or husks of silk, the C. lb. qt. 21 ounces to a pound	0 4		Esridge wool, the C. wt. qt. 112lb.	0 2
	Silk English thrown, the lb. qt. 16 ounces	0 1		French, ditto	0 2
	Silver, vocat. Quick-silver, the C. qt. five score	0 8		Spanish, ditto	0 4
	Slip, the barrel	0 1		Worm seed, the C. qt. five score	0 6
Stuffs, vocat.	Buffins, the piece broad, qt. 14 yards	0 2	Wood	Box wood, the C. wt. qt. 112lb.	0 0 1/2
	Ditto, narrow	0 1		Brazil, ditto	0 3
	Bridgewaters, the piece	0 2		Ebony, ditto	0 1 1/2
	Carra, ditto	0 1		Fustick, ditto	0 0 1/2
	Cametians, the piece, qt. 25 yards	0 2		Red, ditto	0 1 1/2
Stuffs, vocat.	Camblets, or grograms, the piece, qt. about 14 or 15 yards	0 2	Wines	French wines, of all sorts, the ton	0 8
	Damascellours, or damascins, the piece	0 2		Muskadels and wines of the Levant the butt	0 6
	Durance, ditto	0 1		Sack, Canary, Madera, Romneys, and Hullo, the butt or pipe	0 6
	Dimity, each 30 yards	0 1		Cotton yarn, the C. qt. five score	0 4
	Floramedas, the piece	0 1		Grogram, or mohair yarn, ditto	1 6
Stuffs, vocat.	Fugaratoes, ditto	0 2	Raw linnen yarn, of all sorts, the C. wt. qt. five score		0 4
	Hangings, of Bristol, or striped stuff, the piece	0 4
	Lindsey-woolsey, the piece	0 1 1/2
	Liles, the piece broad or narrow, not above 15 yards	0 2
	Mocadoes, double, the piece, qt. 28 yards	0 2
Stuffs, vocat.	Ditto, single or tufted, the piece, qt. 14 yards	0 1	All other goods, not mentioned in this TABLE shall pay for package duties, after the rate of one penny in the pound, according as they are expressed or valued in his majesty's late book of RATES: and all other not expressed therein shall pay the same rate, according to their value.
	Mohair, the piece, qt. about 15 yards	0 1 1/2	For every entry in the Packer's book, for writing bills to each entry outward, as usually they have done
	Messellawny, the piece, qt. about 30 yards	0 1	The strangers shall pay the labouring porters for making up their goods at their own charge, as always they have done.
	Perpetuanoes, the piece ell broad	0 2 1/2	The strangers shall pay the water-side porter, belonging to the package office, such fees and duties, for landing and shipping their goods, as they have usually paid within these ten years last past. [i. e. from and before the 16 Car. I.]
	Paragon or paropas, the piece	0 2	Fees taken by the PACKERS and water-side porters for landing and shipping out the goods of strangers.
Stuffs, vocat.	Piramides or maramuffe, the piece, narrow	1 0	FOR a butt of currants		1 4
	Ditto broad	0 2		A carrel of ditto	0 8
	Rafhes, of all sorts, the piece, qt. 24 yards	0 4		A quarter roll of ditto	0 4
	Saves, hounscot or mild, the piece	0 3		A bag ditto	0 4
	Ditto, of all sorts	0 2 1/2		Pieces of raisins, the ton	1 8
Stuffs, vocat.	Serges, double the piece, yard broad, qt. 24 yards	0 3	A barrel of raisins		0 4
	Hard cattle, the C. wt. qt. 112lb.	0 2		All sorts of punchcons	0 6
	The barrel	0 3		A barrel of figs	0 2
	Spectacles, without cases, the gross, qt. 12 dozen	0 0 1/2		Tapners and fraills of figs, per ton	1 8
	Succads, wet or dry, the C. lb. qt. five score	0 8		Brazil, or other wood for dying, per ton	1 8
Stuffs, vocat.	Tallow, the C. wt. qt. 112lb.	0 1	Iron, the ton		1 2
	With hair, the C. Flemish ells, qt. five score	0 4		Coppersas, ditto	1 2
	Tapestry	0 6		Oil, wine, or vinegar, ditto	1 2
	With wool, ditto	1 0		Hemp and flax, the last	1 8
	With caddas, ditto	0 2		Loose flax and tow, the C. wt.	0 2
Stuffs, vocat.	With silk, the dozen Flemish ells	0 2	A great bag of tow		0 8
	Taffaty, ell broad the dozen yards	0 2		A small ditto	0 4
	Taffaty	0 4		A great bag of hops	0 8
	Silk taffaty, broad, ditto	0 2		A packet or little bag of hops	0 4
	Ditto, narrow	0 2		Packs, trusses, flats, or maunds, per piece	0 8
Stuffs, vocat.	Thread, white, brown, or coloured, ditto	0 1	A great chest		0 8
	Thread points, the great gross	0 0 1/2		A small ditto	0 4
	Tiffany, each dozen yards	0 1		All cases, barrels, or bales, per piece	0 4
	Tobacco	2 0		A bale of madder	0 8
	Spanish tobacco, the C. qt. five score	0 6		A bale of ginger, shumack, qt. 400 wt.	0 8
Stuffs, vocat.	Of all other sorts, ditto	0 6	A faggot of steel		0 1
	Tin	0 3 1/2		Any ferriens, the piece	0 4
	Tin, unwrought, the C. wt. qt. 112lb.	0 4		A fat of pot ashes	0 8
	Ditto wrought	0 2		A last of soap ashes	1 0
	Velures	0 2		A last of pitch or tar	1 0
Stuffs, vocat.	Ditto double	0 2	A last of fish		1 0
	Vinegar of wine, the ton	0 2 1/2		Waincoats, the C. qt. six score	5 0
	Wax	0 4		Clap boards, ditto	0 6
	English wax, the C. wt. qt. 112lb.	0 8		Deal boards, ditto	1 4
	Ditto hard, the C. wt. qt. five score	0 8		A great mast	5 0
Stuffs, vocat.	Baize single, the piece	0 2	A middle ditto		2 6
	Double, ditto	0 4		A small ditto	1 3
	Minikin baize, the piece	0 6		Great balks, the C. qt. six score	5 0
	Broad cloth, the short piece, qt. 24 yards	0 6		Middle ditto	2 6
	Broad cloth, the long piece, qt. 32 yards	0 8			Small
Stuffs, vocat.	Cotton, of all sorts, the C. goods	0 6	Waincoats, the C. qt. six score
	Devonshire dozens the piece	0 1
	Fizadoes, the piece	0 3
	Kerfies, of all sorts, the piece	0 2
	Lifts of cloth, the 1000 yards	0 6
Stuffs, vocat.	Northern dozens, the single piece	0 3	Clap boards, ditto
	Ditto, double piece	0 6
	Penny-stones, the piece	0 2
	Spanish cloth, English making, each 20 yards	0 6

	s.	d.
Small ditto	1	3
A mill-stone	5	0
A dog-stone	2	6
A wolf-stone	2	0
A yard-stone	0	3
A grindle-stone	1	0
A step-stone or grave-stone	0	8
Quern-stones, the last	1	0
Emery-stones, the ton	1	2
Ten C. wt. of Holland cheese	1	0
Rosin, the ton	1	2
Woad, ditto	1	2
A chest of sugar	0	6
Half wainscots, the C. qt. six score	2	6
Raw hides, the C. wt. five score	5	0
Bonnifpars, the C. qt. six score	0	6
Small spars, ditto	0	4
Ends of bonnifpars, ditto	0	9
A horse, gelding, or mare	2	6
Allom, the ton	1	8
Heath for brushes, the C. wt. qt. 112lb.	0	1
Iron pots, the dozen	0	3
Rings of wier loose, the ring	0	0½
Pipes-staves, the thousand	2	6
Rhenish wine, the awm	0	6
Bur-stones, the C. qt. five score	2	6
Half packs of tazels, the piece	0	4
Wicker bottles, the dozen	0	0½
Stone, the C. qt. five score	0	1
Loose fish, the C. landing	0	3
A barrel of salmon	0	2
Ditto of stub ells	0	2
A bundle of basket rods	0	0½
A ton of cork	1	8
A thousand ox bones	1	0
Ditto tips of horns	0	6
Ditto of shank bones	1	0
Brimstone, the ton, loose	1	3
A fodder of lead	1	4
Rims for sieves, the load	1	0
A load of fans	1	0
A load of balrushes	0	8
A C. ream of paper, loose	1	0
A barrel of tarra	0	2
Ditto of ling	0	2
A keg of sturgeon	0	2
Iron backs of chimneys, the piece	0	1
A C. wt. of elephants teeth	0	1
Copper and iron plates, per piece	0	0½
A hundred small barrels of blacking	1	0
A dozen of scales	0	1
A hundred of oars	2	6
Every twenty sugar flags	0	4
A barrel of shot	0	4
A bundle of canes	0	1
A cage of quails	0	4
Ditto of pheasants	0	4
A winch of cable yara	0	4
A firkin of shot	0	2

All other goods not mentioned in this TABLE shall pay portage duties, as other goods do of like bulk or condition herein expressed.

The Scots having defeated the king's army at Newburn, immediately took possession of Newcastle upon Tyne. This greatly alarmed the citizens, fearing they should be deprived of the usual and necessary supply of coals from thence. But these apprehensions were soon laid aside by a letter sent from the Scotch commanders to the city magistrates, in which they promised not to stop the free traffic of coals in the river Tyne, and declared themselves friends to the liberties of England.

The Lord-mayor and citizens not finding the ministry had any intention of removing their grievances, drew up a petition to his majesty to call a new parliament, and to redress the many impositions complained of by the whole nation.

The contents of which petition were as follows:

" Most gracious sovereign,
 " Being moved with the duty and obedience,
 " which by the laws your petitioners owe unto
 " your sacred majesty, they humbly present unto
 " your princely and pious wisdom, the several
 " pressing grievances following, viz.
 " 1. The pressing and unusual impositions up" on merchandize, importing and exporting, and
 " the urging and levying of ship-money, not" withstanding both which, merchants ships and
 " goods have been taken and destroyed both by
 " Turkish and other pirates.
 " 2. The multitude of monopolies, patents,
 " and warrants, whereby trade in the city, and
 " other parts of the kingdom is much destroyed.
 " 3. The sundry innovations in matters of re" ligion.
 " 4. The oath and canons lately enjoined by
 " the late convocation, whereby your petition" ers are in danger to be deprived of their minis" ters.
 " 5. The great concourse of papists, and their
 " inhabitations in London, and the suburbs,
 " whereby they have more means and opportu" nity of plotting and executing their designs
 " against the religion established.
 " 6. The seldom calling, and sudden dissolu-
 " tions of parliaments, without the redress of " grievances.
 " 7. The imprisonment of divers citizens for " non-payment of ship-money, and impositions;
 " and the prosecution of many others in the star-
 " chamber, for not conforming themselves to " committees in patents of monopolies, whereby
 " trade is restrained.
 " 8. The great danger your sacred person is " exposed unto in the present war, and the va" rious fears that seized upon your petitioners
 " and their families by reason thereof; which
 " grievances and fears have occasioned so great
 " a stop and distraction in trade, that your peti" tioners can neither buy, sell, receive or pay as " formerly, and tends to the utter ruin of the " inhabitants of this city; the decay of naviga" tion, and clothing, and the manufactures of
 " this kingdom.
 " Your humble petitioners conceiving, that
 " the said grievances are contrary to the laws of
 " this kingdom, and finding by experience, that " they are not redressed by the ordinary course
 " of justice, do therefore most humbly beseech
 " your most sacred majesty, to cause a parlia" ment to be summoned with all convenient
 " speed, whereby they may be relieved in the " premises.
 " And your petitioners and loyal subjects
 " shall ever pray, &c.

By this petition the ministry foresaw the fatal consequences which must inevitably arise to themselves should it be carried into execution: they therefore sent a letter to the Lord-mayor and aldermen, signifying that such a petition was very dangerous, and unwarranted by the charters and customs of the city, and that it was unnecessary as his majesty was already taking the said grievances

ances into consideration. This, however, had no effect on the citizens: they sent the petition, by a deputation from the court of aldermen and common-council, to his majesty, who was then with his army at York.

This had so good an effect, that his majesty, in a letter dated the twenty-fifth of September, promised them a parliament should be immediately called to redress their grievances; requesting, at the same time, a loan of two hundred thousand pounds to enable him to pay his army. Which sum the citizens promised to advance, on condition the noblemen who were with his majesty would join in the security.

The king, to fulfil his engagement with the citizens, summoned a parliament to meet on the third of November at Westminster; when Mr. alderman Pennington, in the name of the city, delivered a petition to the house of commons, with a schedule of twenty-eight articles of grievances annexed. This petition, which was for the abolishment of episcopacy, with all its dependencies, roots and branches, was signed by upwards of fifteen thousand citizens. And was thought to be strongly abetted by the Scotch commissioners, who were now arrived in London, and had opened a kirk at Oxford house, near London-stone, to which many of the citizens resorted.

The king at this time wanting money, the parliament applied to the citizens for a loan of one hundred thousand pounds, on the credit and security of the subsidy bills: but this they absolutely refused, alledging, that the city were a body not constituted for any such purpose, nor able to make laws for the lending of money; and that they could only persuade, and not compel. A petition was then presented to the house of lords, signed by twenty thousand citizens, to hasten the punishment of the earl of Strafford, "who," they alledged, "had counselled the plundering of the city, and putting it to fine and ransom; and had said, that it would never be well, till some of the aldermen were hanged up, because they would not yield to illegal levies of money." In this petition they complained that the freedom and fulness of trade was still greatly hindered; the affairs of the church remained unsettled; the papists tolerated and armed; the Irish army not disbanded, nor the courts of justice yet reformed; and humbly prayed that his majesty would redress these their grievances.

The citizens not meeting with any redress from these petitions, the populace were so incensed, that on the twenty-ninth of April 1641, a great number of apprentices and others assembled before the house of the Spanish ambassador, threatening to pull it down, and even to kill the ambassador himself for permitting English papists to frequent his chapel. To appease this commotion, the Lord-mayor immediately repaired to the ambassador's, and, with much difficulty, prevailed on the mob to disperse. After which his lordship entering the house was desired by the minister to drop the point of his sword, saying, that he was then in a place where the king of Spain, his master, had jurisdiction. To which his lordship complying, the ambassador told him, that if he would prevent the English subjects coming to mass in his house, he would not send for them; but if they came, he could neither in conscience to his religion, nor his master's honour, deny them access to their devotions, or protection to their persons, while they were with him. His lordship apologized for the rudeness of the mob, and ordered a strong guard to be placed at the ambassador's house, which not only protected him from farther insults, but prevented the popish citizens from frequenting mass.

No sooner had this storm subsided, than another far more impetuous began: for a discovery being made of a design to bring the army to London to surprize the Tower, and favour the escape of the earl of Strafford, the citizens were so enraged, that the next day six thousand of them, armed with swords, staves, and cudgels, repaired to Westminster, where, posting themselves in the avenues leading to the house of lords, they stopped all coaches, crying out for justice against Strafford; and petitioned the said house, "Forasmuch as your petitioners understand, that the Tower of London is presently to receive a garrison of men, not of the hamlets, as usually they were wont to do; but consisting of other persons, under the command of a captain, a great confident of the earl of Strafford, which doth increase their fears of the king and kingdom; and that this is done to make way for the escape of the earl of Strafford, the grand incendiary: they therefore humbly pray, that instant course may be taken for the discovery thereof; and that speedy execution of justice be done on the said earl." These riotous proceedings were complained of by the lords to the commons; but the citizens would not disperse till they saw the protestation of both houses of parliament for the defence of the king and kingdom.

The next day an order was sent from the house of commons to the Lord-mayor, strictly enjoining him to disarm all papists under his jurisdiction within the space of three days. And soon after another order was sent from the same house, commanding the Lord-mayor and the respective magistrates within the bills of mortality, to use their best endeavours to prevent his majesty's subjects from frequenting the chapels of popish ambassadors.

A contest arose about this time between the Lord-mayor and the commonalty, respecting the right of a choice in one of their sheriffs, which the former claimed by a prescription of three hundred years. The commonalty admitted of the mayor's nominating a person proper for that office, but insisted that he should not serve, unless by their approbation. The king was applied to by the mayor and aldermen to determine this controversy, but his majesty referred it to the house of lords, who first recommended a reconciliation and settlement; but finding that ineffectual, their lordships thought proper (with a salvo on each side) to order them to proceed in the following manner: "That from this time the commonalty shall forthwith proceed to the nomination and election of both their sheriffs for the year following, hoping that for the first of the two sheriffs

" Sheriffs they will make choice of that party that was nominated by the Lord-mayor: and their lordships do further declare, that this order shall be no way prejudicial to any right or prerogative claimed by the lords, the mayors of the city of London, for the time being; nor yet to any right or claim made by the commons or citizens in this matter, now in question amongst them."

Advice being received from Scotland of an intended conspiracy by the papists against the lives of many Scotch nobility, the parliament, were so alarmed, that they sent orders to the Lord-mayor to place guards in various parts of the city to prevent any bad effects from the same, and that they should continue till his lordship received farther directions.

About the same time the parliament were informed of a most dreadful conspiracy by the papists in Ireland against all protestants; and so little sense had they of pity or remorse, that they committed the most horrid tortures on those who fell in their way; without distinction of age or sex.

On this melancholy occasion the parliament applied to the city for a loan of fifty thousand pounds towards the relief of those who had escaped their insatiable fury; which the citizens readily assenting to, the parliament passed an order not only for securing the money now advanced, but likewise the fifty thousand pounds they had lent his majesty for the support of his army in Yorkshire.

CHAPTER XXXV.

The king's return from Scotland. His reception by the citizens. The city's petition to parliament for reformation, and against the removal of Sir William Belfour from the lieutenancy of the Tower. Petition of the apprentices against the new lieutenant and the bishops. Five members impeached of high-treason, but protected by the citizens. A committee appointed by parliament to sit at Guildhall. The parliament-house protected by the city train-bands. The Lord-mayor committed to the Tower. The battle of Edge-hill. The city fortified. Cheap-side cross pulled down. The women petition to parliament. Consequences thereon. Battle of Newbury. City clergy petition for redress of grievances. The king retires to the Scotch army. The city lends the parliament two hundred thousand pounds, &c. &c.

NEVER perhaps was a prince received with greater magnificence or more sincere rejoicings from his subjects than king Charles I. at his return through the city of London from Scotland; as a testimony of which the following is part of the recorder's speech to his majesty on the occasion: "I can truly say this from a representative body of your city, from whence I have my warrant; they meet you with as much love and affection as ever citizens of London met with any of your royal progenitors, king or queen of this kingdom; and with as hearty a desire to shew it fully, &c." To which his majesty answered, "I thank my citizens of London for their love; and now I see that all these tumults and disorders have only risen from the meaner sort of people; and that the affections of the better and main part of the city have ever been loyal and affectionate to my person and government. And it comforts me to see that all those misreports that have been made of me in my absence, have not the least power to do me prejudice in your opinion, as may be easily seen in this day's expressions of joy." His majesty then continued with a promise to restore the citizens to their property in the Irish estate of Londonderry, and to govern them according to the laws of this kingdom, by maintaining and protecting the true protestant religion, as by law established.

As soon as this speech was ended, the procession began. His majesty and the prince of Wales rode on horseback; the queen, duke of York, princess Mary, the prince elector and the duchess of Richmond remained in the coach. They entered the city at Moorgate, and proceeded along London-wall, through Bishopsgate-street, Cornhill, and so to Guildhall, where they were most sumptuously entertained by the Lord-mayor and aldermen. After this refreshment the procession was resumed, and the Lord-mayor conducted his majesty in the most pompous manner to Whitehall; for which, at parting, the king embraced the mayor, thanked him, and charged him, that in his name the whole city might be thanked. His lordship gave information of this message from his majesty to a court of common-council for that purpose: at which the recorder having also informed them of his speech, in the name of the citizens made to his majesty, and the king's answer thereto, they were so pleased, that they made an order for the recorder, and a committee of aldermen and commoners to attend his majesty with their most humble thanks for his great and friendly favours to the city. His majesty received this address with great pleasure and fair promises in favour of the city; created the Lord-mayor a baronet, dubbed all the aldermen attending with the order of knighthood, and caused the whole committee, in his name, to be elegantly entertained by the earl of Dorset

Dorset, who honoured them with his presence at dinner.

Notwithstanding these reciprocal professions of love between prince and subject, yet so unsearchable are the secrets of the human heart, that on the eleventh of December, Mr. Fookes, attended by two hundred merchants and others, presented to the house of commons a petition signed by twenty thousand citizens, complaining of the growth of popery, and praying the said house, that they would take speedy and effectual means to deliver the city and nation from the danger of being surprized by their bloody hands, from the obstructions they caused in the trade of this city and kingdom, and for immediate reformation in religion. This petition was inscribed, "The humble petition of the aldermen, common-council-men, subsidy-men, and other inhabitants of the city of London and suburbs thereof." Another petition of the like nature was presented the same day by the city apprentices.

On the twenty-third of the same month his majesty having discharged Sir William Belfour, a Scotchman, from the lieutenancy of the Tower of London, appointed colonel Lunsford, a person obnoxious to the house of commons, to succeed him. This so offended the Londoners, who looked on him as a very bad man, that they drew up a petition in the name of the common-councilmen, and others of the city of London to the following effect; "Whereas the petitioners are informed that Sir William Belfour, a person of honour and trust, is displaced from the office of lieutenant of the Tower of London, and the same place is bestowed upon colonel Lunsford, a man outlawed, and most notorious for outrages, and therefore fit for any dangerous attempt; the petitioners are therefore so alarmed at this proceeding, that they cannot rest till they have discharged their duty in representing the same to this honourable house. May it therefore please this honourable assembly to take the premises into such consideration as may secure both the city and kingdom against the mischiefs which may happen, as to your great wisdom shall be found most fitting, &c."

This petition occasioned the commons to request a conference with the lords; but the latter refused joining with them to address his majesty for the removal of Lunsford; alledging, that they conceived it would be an infringement on his majesty's prerogative. The Lord-mayor, however, on the Sunday following waited on the king at Whitehall, where he represented the dissatisfaction of the people at the promotion of the said Lunsford, and informed him of a general insurrection being intended by the citizens in general, should Lunsford be continued in the lieutenancy of the Tower. On which his majesty was graciously pleased to remove him from the said office.

Before this was publicly known, the citizens and apprentices who had petitioned against Lunsford and the bishops, assembled in a large body, and proceeded to Westminster, crying out, No bishops, no bishops, no popish lords. This so irritated the bishop of Lincoln, who was then passing to Westminster, that he imprudently seized one of the most active in the mob: but the populace so far payed that regard to his cloth and dignity, that after rescuing their comrade, and dinning his ears with No bishop, no bishop, they permitted him to depart. One captain Hyde, with some of his friends, being fired with indignation at such treatment of a bishop, was still more imprudent; for he drew his sword, and threatened to cut the throats of those round-headed dogs who bawled against the bishops. For which he was seized by the apprentices and carried before the house of commons, who not only immediately committed him to prison, but rendered him incapable of ever serving his majesty after.

Colonel Lunsford going to Westminster the same day, as imprudently drew his sword, on which a scuffle ensued, and many persons were wounded. This commotion soon reaching the city, the Lord-mayor and sheriffs took such precautions as prevented any considerable number getting out of the city gates. After which his lordship patrolled the streets all night with a sufficient guard, and in the morning raised the trained bands to keep the city peaceable and quiet. This occasioned his majesty to send a message to be read in the common-council of the city of London, commanding them to preserve the peace of the city, and concluding in these words: "We do desire them (the Londoners) not to be disturbed by any jealousies that ill-affected people may endeavour to sow, but to rest most confident and assured, that the safety, protection, and prosperity of the city shall ever be with us a principal care."

The connection between the Londoners and parliament was so strong, that they resented every affront or opposition made by the court to the house of commons. Nor had they yet thrown off their affection for the king, till his majesty being most imprudently and wickedly advised to go with an armed force and take five members out of the house of commons, whom, with lord Kimbolton, the attorney-general, by his majesty's command, had impeached in the house of lords of high treason, the citizens not only gave those members refuge in the city, but armed themselves for their protection. By this proceeding, the house of commons, not thinking themselves safe at Westminster, appointed a committee to sit in the Guildhall of London, to deliberate on such things as might be most beneficial to the safety of the city and kingdom.

His majesty having miscarried in his design of securing the five members impeached, came into the city on the fifth of January to demand the assistance of the citizens to find them out. On his way thither, the people cried out, in a tumultuous manner, "Privileges of parliament!" And one of them threw into his majesty's coach a paper, on which was written, "To your tents, O Israel!" for which he was immediately apprehended and committed to prison. His majesty being arrived at Guildhall, where the court of common-council, by his order, was assembled, he spoke to them as follows:

"Gentlemen,

"Gentlemen,

"I come to demand such persons as I have already accused of high treason, and do believe are shrowded in the city. I hope no good man will keep them from me; their offences are treason and misdemeanours of an high nature. I desire your loving assistance herein, that they may be brought to a legal trial.

"And whereas there are divers suspicions raised that I am a favourer of the popish religion, I do profess, in the name of a king, that I did and ever will, and that to the utmost of my power, be a prosecutor of all such as shall any ways oppose the laws and statutes of this kingdom, either papists or separatists; and not only so, but I will maintain and defend that true protestant religion which my father did profess, and I will continue in it during life."

After this his majesty dined with one of the sheriffs, and returned to Whitehall without any farther disturbance from the populace.

The citizens, however, neither approving of the demand nor declaration, drew up an answer by way of remonstrance from the mayor, aldermen, and common council of the city of London. In which, after representing their fears and danger, by reason of the prevailing progress of the rebels in Ireland, fermented and acted by the papists and their adherents; the throwing out people of trust and honour from the lieutenancy of the Tower, and the preparations there lately made; the fortifying of Whitehall, in an unusual manner, with men and ammunition; and the drawing swords and wounding many citizens that were unarmed in Westminster-hall, they conclude as follows: "The petitioners therefore most humbly pray your most sacred majesty, that, by the advice of your great council in parliament, the protestants in Ireland may be speedily relieved; the Tower put into the hands of persons of trust; that, by removal of doubtful and unknown persons from about Whitehall and Westminster, a known and approved guard may be appointed, for the safety of his majesty and parliament; and that the lord Mandeville, otherwise Kimbolton, and the five members of the house of commons, lately accused, may not be restrained of liberty, or proceeded against otherwise than according to privileges of parliament."

His majesty returned an answer to this remonstrance, the purport of which gave little satisfaction to the citizens.

The grand committee appointed by the house of commons to sit in Guildhall, finding great inconveniences from the city business, adjourned to Grocer's-hall, where they consulted measures for their safe return to Westminster on the Tuesday following: On which day they, with the lord Kimbolton, and the five members of the house of commons above mentioned, went by water, well guarded by a thousand sailors in boats, and were received at Westminster by the London trained bands. After which the house of commons ordered, that, for their security, two companies of the said trained bands should attend the house daily. And for the more effectually securing the stores in the Tower of London, the sheriffs were ordered to place a sufficient guard round it both by land and water.

The service of the militia was so well approved of by the house of commons, that they took them out of the power of the Lord-mayor, whom they found to be under influence of the court, and ordained, "that the persons entrusted with the ordering of the militia of London, should have power to draw the trained-bands of the city into such usual and convenient places, within three miles of the said city, as to them from time to time should seem meet, for the training and exercising of the soldiers; and that the said soldiers, upon summons, should from time to time appear, and not depart from their colours without the consent of their officers, as they would answer their contempt to the parliament."

In the year 1642 his majesty, being informed that the parliament had applied to the city for large supplies of men and money, sent a letter to the Lord-mayor, commanding him and the citizens of London not to lend or contribute the said supplies to the parliament, under the penalty of his displeasure, and the forfeiture of their charters. The parliament, in consequence of this made a declaration, justifying their demands, and promising protection and security to those who should contribute to their assistance. And, as an example of their power and authority, they committed Sir Richard Gurney, Lord-mayor, to the Tower of London, for causing his majesty's commission of array to be proclaimed in divers parts of the city; and preferred several articles of impeachment against him: for which he was, by the sentence of the peers, not only divested of the office of mayor, but likewise rendered for ever incapable of bearing any office or receiving further honour; and also to remain a prisoner in the Tower of London during their lordship's pleasure.

The king finding himself in a condition to face his enemies, began his march from Northampton to London with fifteen thousand men. Of which the parliament receiving information, immediately ordered the London trained bands to be in readiness, and all the passages and avenues leading to the city to be fortified with posts, chains, and courts of guard. The citizens on this occasion were so alarmed, that a great number of all ranks, ages, and sexes, applied so diligently to work in digging and carrying of earth, that their fortifications were soon accomplished.

The earl of Essex, by an express order from the parliament, hastening his march after the king, both armies met at Edge-hill on the twenty-third of October, and fought a most terrible battle in which much blood was spilt on both sides; and each army claimed the honour of victory. His majesty, however, was so far disabled from proceeding to London, that he was obliged to retreat to Oxford.

The parliament fearing the bad consequences that might arise from any insinuations of advantage gained over their forces by the royalists, deputed lord Wharton, Mr. Strode, the earl of Pembroke, the earl of Holland, and the lord Say to represent represent the issue of this battle in the most favourable circumstances, and to spirit up the citizens to a more vigorous opposition to the king's forces. These lords of parliament went to Guildhall on the the 27th of October for this purpose; and lord Wharton, who introduced the matter, among other things, said, to the Lord-mayor, aldermen, common-council, &c. "Gentlemen, I shall tell you the worst as well as the best, that you may know all, and that, when you have known the worst, you may find it in your judgments, to give the most praise to God for his mercy, after there was so much probability of having such an ill success. After that we had shot two or three pieces of ordnance, they began for to shoot some of theirs, and truly not long after, before there was any near execution, there were three or four of our regiments fairly run away, I shall name you the particulars, and afterwards name you those that did the extraordinary service, whereof you will find those of this city to have been very extraordinary instruments. There were, that ran away, Sir William Fairfax's regiment, Sir Henry Cholmleys, and my lord Mandevil's, and, to say the plain truth, my own: these ran away. Gentlemen, you see by this time I am like to tell you the truth, I hope, of every thing; but yet I must say this, that, tho' they did so, yet I hope there will be very convenient and very good number of them got together again, that they may shew themselves in better condition and better way of service than yet they have done. I hope so, and by the blessing of God it may be so." However, continues that noble lord, "Upon the close of the day we know it for certain that the best regiment of the king's was cut off, and the next his best regiment, which was that under my lord of Linsey; and there was, as we conceive (this I tell you upon information, as we conceive, and are informed by the countrymen that saw them bury the dead next day, and bring them up into heaps, there was, as is informed and conceived) about three thousand of theirs slain; and we cannot believe, nor we cannot have any information to give us reason to believe, that there were above three hundred of ours slain. And this was to be observed of God's providence in this day's work, that though it began so improbably, yet before the close of the night, which was two hours, (for they began to fight indeed but about four o'clock) we had got the ground that they were upon, we had gotten the wind, and we do not know, nor by information conceive, that there were twenty men of ours killed by all the king's cannon."

Mr. Strode then spoke: "As God did this great work, and we ascribe to him the honour, so you will look upon the persons by whom he did it. You have heard when as it was a thousand to one but that we had lost the day by running away of the troop of horse and the four regiments, and then the general did draw up his own regiment, and then did God begin in them to shew his own work. God hath shewed himself with us; be you but courageous, and we never need doubt it; and so we say all."

The earl of Pembroke producing an intercepted letter to the earl of Cumberland, general of his majesty's forces, whereby it appeared, that his majesty was preparing to march to London, addressed the Lord-mayor, &c. Gentlemen, you have shewed yourselves like brave and noble citizens; you have done it with that nobleness, with that alacrity, with that love to God, king, and parliament, that none of your ancestors before you never shewed more love, nor care, nor zeal, nor performed, that you have done, better. I have only this to say to you: if the times are such (not that I think there is any great peril in the king's army now, for they have told you nothing but truth) yet, when you have seen this letter, you will find there is very good cause for you to crown this work, which must be by following it with the same zeal, love, care, and nobleness, and alacrity, which if you do, you may well crown yourselves with the name of a glorious city; and none more."

The earl of Holland, improving the danger threatened in that letter, adds, "If you will now consider how God hath shewed you first, that he kept the first blow from you, by delivering of you indeed from such an imminent danger, as it could not be believed it could have been recovered, but by himself, and by the power of his hand; this may give you just encouragement to pursue all things that are for his glory, and for the defence of your religion and his cause. I am confident, as you will do it with thankfulness, and duty, and sincerity to him, so in wisdom and reason you will (seeing what threatnings there are unto you) defend yourselves and families; nature directs you to it, as well as piety: we only commend this to you, that you may but know it, and take it into your thoughts, and into your hearts, and then we are confident your hearts will be raised with so much piety, with so much courage, and with so much resolution, as you will defend yourselves, and in defending yourselves, defend us, the parliament, and the kingdom. You may do it, you have power, and we expect it from your affections."

The lord Say and Seal then enforced the premises in these words: "My lords and gentlemen, That little that I have to say shall not be to set forth your approaching danger; but I shall rather apply myself to stir up your spirits, to encourage you, and to settle this opinion in you, that, if you be not wanting unto yourselves, which cannot be imagined in this cause, you will have no cause to fear danger: it cannot be doubted, by that which you have heard, but that these malignant mischievous counsellors, and these men of desperate fortunes that they have gathered to them, and into whose hands they have put our king, that their intentions are, that this rich glorious city should be delivered up as a prey, as a reward to them for their treason against the kingdom and the parliament, and that your lives should satisfy their malice, your wives, your daughters, their lust, and religion itself, the dearest thing of all others to us, should be made merchandize of,

“ of, to invite papists, to invite foreigners. Notwithstanding their intentions, let no man’s heart be discouraged; you have power enough in your hands to bring all this wickedness upon their own heads, through God’s blessing; if you will use your hands, if you will hold them up to serve your God, to defend the true religion of Almighty God, to defend your lives, to defend this kingdom and the parliament, you need not fear any thing that can be done by this broken army, nor fear those things that are here threatened, nor those things that are falsely buzzed abroad by a malignant party in your city to amaze you: there is no fear of danger but in security, in sitting still; and therefore if you will be stirred up (as I cannot doubt, we cannot imagine but you will) to do that that every man, both by the law of God and by the law of nature, in this case will be induced to do, through God’s blessing, you shall both honour God, maintain the true religion, save this kingdom, save the parliament, and crown your good beginnings that God hath pleased to shew himself unto us in. This is now not a time for men to think with themselves that they will be in their shops, to get a little money; this is a time to do that that you do in common dangers; let every man take his weapons in his hand, let him offer himself willingly to serve his God and to maintain true religion: you may remember what God saith by the prophet, My heart is set upon those people that are willing to offer themselves willingly upon the high places: let every man therefore shut up his shop, let him take his musket, let him offer himself readily and willingly, let him not think with himself, who shall pay me, but rather think this, I will come forth to save the kingdom, to serve my God, to maintain his true religion, to save the parliament, to save this noble city: and, when this danger is overcome, I will trust the state, that they will have a regard unto whatsoever may be fit, either for my reparation in any loss, or for my reward. Do as you do in common dangers: when there is a fire, men ask not who shall pay him for his day’s wages, but every man comes forth of his doors, helps to quench the fire, brings a bucket if he have one, borrows one of his neighbour if he have not; when the fire is quenched, then the city will regard to repair any man that hath suffered all day: that do you; every one bring forth his arms, if he have it; if he have it not, let him borrow arms of his neighbour, or he shall be armed from the state; let every man arm himself, and arm his apprentices, and come forth with boldness, and with courage, and with cheerfulness, and doubt not but God will assist you; for, though you be concerned in all you have, yet this is God’s cause; that should be your encouragement: for they are papists, they are atheists, that come to destroy you: they come indeed, in the first and principal aim they have, to destroy religion: papists are invited, they have commissions: are these men that should defend the protestant religion, when they are papists and recusants? therefore, if that you shall come forth, God will go forth with you, he will fight for you, he will save you: but how? he will not save you without yourselves. You may remember what was said, Curse ye Merolh, because they came not out to help the Lord against the mighty. He needs not your help; but he will use your service, that he may bless you. And therefore let every man be encouraged; let him shew his readiness, let him shew his forwardness. Remember what the scripture saith, hear, O Israel, God is with you, so long as you are with him: the Lord will be with you in this cause, for it is his cause; but then you must shew yourselves ready to be with him.”

The parliament now endeavoured, to the utmost of their power, not only to recruit, but likewise to encrease their army; for the better effecting of which they gave great encouragement to the city apprentices, who enlisted by an ordinance of parliament which delivered them from the authority of their masters, who were commanded to receive them on their return and disbanding from the military service, with a clause to indemnify the said masters from any damages they might sustain by their apprentices being absent.

The common-council, on the twenty-third of February, passed an act for the better defence of the city, by fortifying the same with outworks at certain places. It was likewise enacted by the said common-council, that all the passages and ways leading to the city should be shut up, except those entering at Charing-cross, St. Giles’s in the Fields, St. John’s-street, Shoreditch and White-chapel, and that the exterior ends of the said streets should be fortified with breast works and turnpikes; musket-proof; that the several courts of guards, and rails at the extreme parts of the liberty of the city, be fortified with turnpikes; musket proof; that all the sheds and buildings contiguous to London-wall without be taken down; and that the city wall, with its bulwarks, be not only repaired and mounted with artillery, but likewise that divers new works be added to the same at places most exposed. For defraying the expence of which the common-council imposed eight fifteenths on the several wards of the city, which was confirmed, on the seventh of March following, by an ordinance of parliament.

In consequence of this the work was begun with the greatest alacrity, and prosecuted with such amazing dispatch, that an earthen rampart or wall, with bastions, redoubts, &c. was in a short time erected round the cities of London and Westminster, and Borough of Southwark.

Exclusive of the above expence the parliament passed an order for a weekly assessment throughout the kingdom, and imposed the weekly sum of ten thousand pounds on the city of London and its liberties; notwithstanding which, so great a spirit of opposition had the citizens to the king, that they did not think themselves in the least oppressed.

In the year 1643, the common-council ordered their representatives to apply to parliament for leave to take down the crosses in Cheapside, and destroy all the superstitious figures thereon.

P p p

His

His majesty finding the Londoners were more strongly attached to the parliament, and that his obtaining their friendship was impracticable, issued a proclamation, forbidding all commerce with London. On which the common-council, the day following the date of the said proclamation, made an act for raising the sum of fifty thousand pounds by way of loan, on the security of the city seal, to be employed in defence of the city; and at the same time passed an order to move the parliament for an ordinance, to compel all monied men, within the bills of mortality, to advance money on this occasion, in proportion to their respective abilities.

A rumour prevailing at this time among the citizens, that the parliament were disposed to accommodate matters with the king, the lord-mayor summoned a common-council, who presented a petition to the house of commons, in the strongest terms, against a reconciliation. When his lordship presented the above petition, he was attended by such a prodigious concourse of citizens, that many of the members withdrew from the house through fear; and those who continued and received the petition, requested his lordship to prevent such riotous proceedings for the future. The petition was approved of, and the propositions of peace with the king were rejected.

This was soon after followed by another petition, intituled, "The humble petition of many civilly-disposed women, inhabiting in the cities of London and Westminster, the suburbs, and parts adjacent." It was carried up on the 9th of August, by some thousands of the meaner sort of women, with white ribbons in their hats. The purport of their petition was, "That God's glory, in the true reformed religion, might be preserved, the just prerogatives of king and parliament maintained, the true liberties and properties of the subject, according to the known laws of the land, restored, and all honourable ways and means for a speedy peace endeavoured." The commons, after reading their petition, returned them for answer, that they were no enemies to peace, and that they hoped, in a short time, to answer the ends of their petition. But this not satisfying them, they continued about the house, and before noon, increased to upwards of five thousand; among whom were a great number of men dressed in their apparel: at their instigation they went to the door of the house of commons, and loudly exclaimed, "Peace! peace!" After which they cried out, "Give us those traitors that are against peace, that we may tear them to pieces. Give us that dog Pym." In short, they grew so outrageous, that it was found necessary to send for a party of the trained-bands to repress their fury; but they were so little intimidated, that they threw brick-batts and stones at them, which occasioned a fire, and many of them being killed and wounded, the rest soon dispersed.

The common-council enacted, on the 11th of August, that a further sum of fifty thousand pounds be advanced by the city companies; for which, as a security, they were to have a bond from the Lord-mayor and commonalty.

The city of Gloucester, being closely besieged by the king, the committee of trained bands lent six regiments, one of horse, two of trained bands, and three of auxiliaries, to the relief of the said city, which obliged his majesty to raise the siege. These forces behaved with such bravery and resolution at the battle of Newbury, that they preserved the army of the Earl of Essex, and contributed greatly to the success of the parliament in their future proceedings; for it disabled the king from any farther attempts to reduce London to his obedience, and ruined his interest among those who waited the issue of a battle, before they would declare themselves, being determined to join that side which was strongest. This was the longest and most desperate battle during the course of that unnatural war; for it began about six o'clock in the morning, and continued till near eleven at night, with the greatest obstinacy on both sides.

About this time a parliamentary ordinance was published, that none should elect, or be elected common-councilmen of this city, but such as had taken the covenant lately brought from Scotland. And, on the 2d of October, the common-council, for the better security of the city by night, appointed one thousand and ninety-seven watchmen, to be provided and paid by the several wards and precincts of the city and liberties.

Although his majesty had, by his proclamation, issued the 17th of October, prohibited all manner of trade and commerce with the city of London; yet, on the 26th of December following, matters had been so contrived to bring about a treaty of reconciliation, that the king wrote a letter for that purpose, directed to the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and all other well-affected subjects of the city, with an expectation of having it read and approved of, in a common-hall to be called for that purpose, by the contrivance of Sir Basil Brook, and others. The parliament receiving information of this, Sir Basil, with two others, were secured, and the letter seized upon them: after which a committee of eight lords, and sixteen commoners, was appointed to attend the common-hall, where the earl of Northumberland spoke so effectually against an accommodation, that put an end to all hopes of the city being reconciled to the king.

In the year 1644, the city sent out two regiments of auxiliaries to join the army under the command of Sir William Waller, who having received considerable reinforcements from other parts, marched in quest of the royalists; when both armies meeting on Cheriton-down, a sharp and bloody battle ensued, in which the latter were defeated. In this action, the city forces behaved with the greatest honour and intrepidity.

On the sixteenth of May, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council addressed the house of commons, thanking them for the great care they had already taken of them and the public safety, and praying for a preservation of the said house, for the promoting of the public good. To which the house of commons returned a full and satisfactory answer, concluding with a declaration, that they would, in a most peculiar manner, be mindful

mindful of the merit of the city, which, upon all occasions, they should acknowledge, and would endeavour to requite.

The trade of this city, westward, by water, being greatly obstructed by the garrisons of Greenland and Basing-houses, the city sent out two brigades of horse and foot, under the command of colonel Brown, who attacked, and obliged them to retire. And the marquis of Newcastle, in possession of the coal-trade in the river Tyne, prohibited the exportation of coals to London: on which the parliament issued an ordinance for supplying the city with turf and peat, with power to the Lord-mayor to nominate and appoint persons to enter into, and dig any quantity of turf and peat, in and upon any grounds, except orchards, gardens, and walks.

The clergy of London being tired of the state of spiritual anarchy, under which they had so long laboured, petitioned to parliament for redress of their religious grievances: in which they said, "The orthodox ministry is neglected, the people seduced, congregations torn asunder, families distracted, rights and duties of relations, national, civil, and spiritual, scandalously violated, the power of godliness decayed, fearful confusion introduced, and imminent destruction threatened." This produced an ordinance of parliament for the ordination of ministers, according to a form by them prescribed, with punishment for those who should presume to preach, or exercise the ministerial function, not being ordained according to that form.

In the year 1646, a rumour being spread of the king's intending to come privately to London, the parliament gave orders to secure the city against all attempts that might be projected by such cavaliers; and the more strongly to intimidate his majesty from making any farther attempt, they passed an order, that all papists, officers, and such as had borne arms against the parliament, and soldiers of fortune, should depart the city of London, Westminster, and lines of communication, before the end of the sixth day of April, on the penalty of being proceeded against as a spy.

The Londoners, however, found themselves mistaken in their apprehensions, for his majesty, instead of coming to London, proceeded northward, and threw himself into the power of the Scotch army, lying before Newcastle, with a resolution to submit to any conditions that might be proposed through the mediation of the Scots, and fit for a king of England to submit to. These intentions his majesty communicated to the city of London by a letter to the Lord-mayor and aldermen, dated the nineteenth of May.

To such a height were the independent faction grown at this time, both in the city and the house of commons, that it occasioned the presbyterians, who had the greatest sway in London, to present a remonstrance to both houses of parliament, against separate congregations and sectaries, and other grievances: among these, mentioned the old complaint against protections; for, said they, "It may now become a tenure for life, if this privilege should be so made use of by such members of parliament as owe great sums of money, and protect divers under them, as servants, attendants, officers; yea, and their servants. If all this should be exempted from course of law, how many citizens of London, and other subjects of this kingdom, may be undone!" The lords returned them thanks for this testimony of their duty and affection; but the independent members of the commons shewed a detestation of this freedom taken by the presbyterian faction in the city, to prescribe laws to the parliament. And the only answer they received was, that the house, at a proper time, would take the said remonstrance into consideration. In the mean time designs were set on foot to raise divisions among the citizens; to which end, the independents were prevailed on to present a counter petition, signed by many thousands of citizens, setting forth the power of parliaments, and the labours and successes of the present parliament, and praying them to proceed in managing the affairs of the kingdom, according to their own best wisdoms, and trust reposed in them; to punish delinquents, and to procure peace; and that they would never, on any pretence whatever, suffer the free-born people of England to be enslaved, or any other to share with the parliament, or to prescribe to them, in the government or power of this nation; adding, that the petitioners will stand by the parliament with their lives and fortunes.

In order to satisfy the demands of the Scotch army, the city, soon after this, advanced two hundred thousand pounds to the parliament, at eight per cent. on the security of the excise and bishops lands. And on the sixth of April following, they were prevailed on to lend the parliament the same sum for the service of England and Ireland.

All things tending to a rupture between the parliament and the army, the Lord-mayor and common-council, on the eighth of June 1647, presented a petition to the house to prevent such a dangerous event. Among other things in this petition, they expressed their earnest desire, "That according to their allegiance, the covenant and agreement of both nations, his majesty's royal person might be preserved, and so disposed of, that the parliaments of both kingdoms might have free access unto him; that thereby a right understanding might be obtained between them, and this tottering church and kingdom, after all their fears, sorrows, and sufferings, might be better enabled to send speedy relief and help to miserable bleeding Ireland." But concluding, "As this city, from the beginning of these troubles, had faithfully adhered to the parliament, so they were resolved by the blessing of God, never to desert the same; but with the utmost of their lives and estates, would stand and fall, live and die with the parliament of England, according to their covenant." An ordinance was brought in according to the prayer of the said petition; and the speaker, by command of the house, declared to them the true sense the commons had of their constant care and sincere affection for the parliament, who are well well assured, that no vicissitude whatever could alienate their duty and love; for which he gave them the hearty thanks of the house.

The Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council, received a letter from the army, encamped at Royston, in Hertfordshire, dated January tenth, 1647, and signed by Thomas Fairfax, Oliver Cromwell, &c. in which, after complaining of false suggestions and misrepresentations, they say, "The thing we insist upon as Englishmen, is a settlement of the peace of the kingdom, and of the liberties of the subject, according to the votes and declarations of parliament."

In consequence of this, both houses immediately dispatched letters to the general, desiring that the army might not advance within twenty-five miles of the city: but the next day intelligence arrived of the army's nearer approach, and that the horse would certainly be at London the day following by noon. On which strong guards were immediately placed round the cities of London, Westminster, Borough of Southwark, and places adjacent.

In the mean time the city, with the approbation of parliament, returned an answer to the above letter, by the hands of four aldermen and eight commoners, who were empowered to treat with the general about a right understanding and fair correspondence between the city and army. In which they requested the army not to come within thirty miles of the metropolis, to prevent the increase of the price of victuals, and discontented people raising tumults. That they detested the very thoughts of engaging the kingdom in a new war; but nevertheless that they had put themselves into a posture of defence against all events; and that they had already recommended their case to the parliament.

The citizens of London now became mediators between the parliament and the army. And the former, which had just before been adored by most men, were now become at one time the dupes of the army, at another those of the city. This is evident from the instability of their proceedings at this juncture; for the army compelled them to reverse the ordinance of the fourth of May, concerning the city militia, and to make a declaration against subscribing an engagement proposed by the citizens for the defence of their religion, property and liberty.

Soon after the young men of London presented a petition to the house of commons against their proceedings on the fourth of May; and keeping open the doors of the house, with their hats on, they cried out, "Vote, vote; agree, agree; dispatch, we'll wait no longer;" Whilst those without incessantly exclaimed to have such members delivered to them as voted against their interest. In this manner they continued till the house was compelled to repeal both the ordinance and declaration.

General Fairfax, however, pretending to defend the parliament from the insults of those citizens, wrote a letter to the Lord-mayor, dated Bedford, July 29, 1747, in which he says, "It was a prodigious and horrid force done upon parliament, and tending to dissolve all government; and demanded the chief actors therein to be delivered up to justice." These threats were backed with his march towards London. On advice of which the Lord-mayor ordered the city militia to march to the works of fortification; and immediately issued a proclamation, commanding all persons capable of bearing arms to repair to the place of rendezvous early the next morning.

After the departure of those parliament-men, who were intimidated by the young petitioners, the remaining members, who were entirely in the interest of the city, voted

1. That the king should come to London.
2. That the committee of the city militia should have full power to raise such forces as they should deem requisite for the defence of the city; and
3. That they make choice of a commander in chief, to be approved of by parliament; and such commander to present other officers for the approbation of the said committee.

In consequence of these votes the committee chose a general, and ordered that all reformed officers, and others, should appear the next day in St. James's fields, in order for their being taken into the city's service, and the persons already enrolled to be forthwith formed into regiments. They likewise published a declaration by sound of trumpet, that the ordinance which put the land forces under the command of Sir Thomas Fairfax, did not give him any power over the trained bands, garrisons, &c. And on the last day of July the parliament dispatched their commands to the general of their army, forbidding their march towards London. And the next day the power of the city militia was enforced by an ordinance passed for that purpose.

Notwithstanding all precautions were taken, and the greatest encouragement given to the citizens, to oppose the army, yet the nearer they approached London, the more inclined were the citizens to receive them. After various debates the aldermen and common-council sent a submissive message to the general, encamped at Colebrook, who treated them with great haughtiness, and insisted that those members who had been driven away by the young men of London should be immediately restored to their seats in parliament.

The city was greatly agitated by this determination of the army; which occasioned the common-council and commission of the city militia to assemble at Guildhall, whither a great number of citizens repaired to wait the result of their deliberations. In the mean time an express arrived of the army's halting; and the citizens, imagining this arose from a dread of their power, cried out, "let us one and all march out and destroy them; but soon after, another express arriving, with an account of the army's being in full march to the city, their courage failed, and they instantly changed their tone to "treat, treat, treat." And the common-council being informed that the inhabitants of Southwark had invited general Fairfax, and delivered up the Borough to a party sent by him for that purpose, withdrew the militia, and delivered their fortifications to the different parties sent from the army for that purpose. And so great was their timidity on this occasion, that the Lord-mayor and aldermen, in the name of the citizens, met the general next day at Hyde-park, with congratulations on his arrival, and the accommodation between the army and city. He was saluted in the same manner by the common-council, who waited for him at Charing-cross, and soon after the city presented him with a golden basin and ewer worth twelve hundred pounds. Notwithstanding this, he took all measures to humble the city of London, and to make the citizens, as well as the parliament, subservient to his dictates.

The parliament at this time wanting money for the service of the army, demanded a loan of fifty thousand pounds from the city, which being rejected, they, at the desire of the army, demolished the rampart, bastions, and other works of fortification, which incircled the cities of London and Westminster, and Borough of Southwark.

The city of London not complying with the request of the parliament, in advancing the above sum, a committee was appointed to enquire into the late outrageous attempt made on both houses of parliament, by the London apprentices; when the Lord-mayor, and four aldermen being impeached of abetting the said tumult, were committed to the Tower.

The first petition made by the army, after this revolution, was adjudged by the commons to be destructive of the being of parliaments, and fundamental laws of the kingdom: on which many of the petitioners were committed to Newgate, and the Gatehouse in Westminster. This so irritated the Londoners, that the week following they attended the house with another petition, in much stronger terms, reflecting on the proceedings and partiality of the commons; abruptly demanding the reasons for the commitment of these last mentioned petitioners; what their freedoms were, and the immediate enlargement of those committed for the last week's petition. This was backed by another petition from the common-council, to the same purport, and demanding a redress of grievances.

Such are the vicissitudes of fortune, and such was the situation of the parliament at this time, that the very people who had before supported them, at the hazard of their lives and fortunes, now scorned, reproached, and despised them.

The house of commons being informed of a conspiracy in the city for raising an army, an ordinance was passed by both houses, for obliging all papists, officers, soldiers, and others, who had carried arms against the parliament, or assisted the enemy in the late war, to depart the city, and all places within twenty miles thereof, in the space of six days, on pain of being apprehended, and proceeded against as traitors. And the more effectually to prevent the carrying on any such design for the future, they passed another ordinance for regulating the choice of common-council-men, by which all persons disaffected to, or who had appeared in opposition to the measures and proceedings of parliament, were disqualified both to be chosen, and to vote, in any city election.

In the year 1647, on Sunday the tenth of April, a great mob assembled in Moorfields to divert themselves at play; but being obstructed by a party of trained-bands posted at Finsbury to suppress the prophanation of the Lord's-day, they fell upon them in the most furious manner, seized all their colours and drums, and compelled them to disperse. After this, the mob encreasing very fast, divided themselves into several divisions; one of which went to Whitechapel, and seized the colours of a captain's company; another marched to Smithfield; and the greatest body hurried to Whitehall; after which, being dispersed by the parliament's troops at the Meuse, they returned like furies into the city, where, being joined by other parties, they drove all before them; they broke open houses, prisons, and magazines; carried off arms, plate, money, and other things of value; seized the drums belonging to the trained-bands, which they used in beating up for others to join them; and after forming themselves into military order, took possession of the gates and chains of the city; attacked the Lord-mayor's house, and, with the loss of one man, forced the guard, and carried off a piece of ordnance, by the use of which, they soon got possession of the magazine of arms lodged in Leadenhall. However, early next morning, they were attacked by two regiments detached by general Fairfax, who received the fire of the cannon, by which many soldiers were wounded, and one woman killed. The rioters now finding themselves not able to make any farther resistance, took to their heels, and dispersed themselves into all parts of the city. The soldiers pursued them, and after killing some, wounding and taking others, the gates were opened, and the whole city became as quiet as before.

The day after this dangerous tumult was suppressed, the common-council met, and resolved that the committee of the London militia should attend both houses of parliament, and, in the name of the city, acquaint them with their utmost detestation and abhorrence of the late villainous outrage; and humbly to request, that a day of thanksgiving might be appointed for the city's great and wonderful deliverance from such imminent danger; and likewise to apply for a special commission of oyer and terminer, for trying the aggressors concerned in the late detestable sedition.

Two days after, the parliament granted their request, and at the same time ordered, that the posts and chains in and about the city should be taken down; and that, for the better security of the city in future, the garrison of the Tower should consist of one thousand foot, and one hundred horse.

Soon after this the common-council being informed of a dangerous conspiracy intended by some officers of the army against the city, they drew up, and presented a petition to both houses of parliament, setting forth the said information and reports, and expressing their uneasiness at the late measures taken to draw and continue the army so near the city, and to increase the number of soldiers in the Tower; at the removing the posts and chains, and at the disuniting of the command of the forces of the city and the parts within the late lines of communication, and the weekly bills of mortality; and praying for redress in the said grievances.

The house of commons soon after acquainted the Lord-mayor and common-council, that they had received intelligence of a dangerous conspiracy entered into by the cavaliers, who under an oath of secrecy had enlisted many thousands of horse and foot with intent to destroy the city, parliament, presbyterians and independants: and ordered, that the committee of the London militia should immediately put the several regiments of trained bands into a good state of defence; and that the city be required to enter into a stricter union with the parliament, for their mutual security, and more effectually defeating the mischievous designs of their enemies. To which the Lord-mayor and common-council answered, "that as theirs, and the interest of both houses, were inseparable, they would, according to their protestation, live and die with them."

The parliament were so highly pleased at the conduct of the citizens, that they granted the discharge of Mr. Glyn, the recorder, and seven others, from prison. And a few days after the Lord-mayor and common council receiving a letter from the Kentish male-contents, desiring assistance and an association with them, communicated the same to parliament, which was so well received, that they not only returned them thanks, but immediately ordered the discharge of three of their aldermen from their long imprisonment in the Tower.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

The citizens petition for a treaty with the king. The army quartered in London and Westminster. They plunder Weavers-hall. The king's trial proclaimed. The common-council petition to try the king. Execution of Charles I. The Lord mayor committed to the Tower for refusing to proclaim the abolishment of the kingly office. House of Commons entertained by the city. Richmond Park given to the city by the parliament. Sixty houses blown up by gun-powder. Cromwell's new government, protectorship, and reception by the city. Death of Oliver, and proclamation of his son Richard. A free parliament demanded by the apprentices. Restoration of Charles II. His entrance into London; and Coronation. The Irish estates in the province of Ulster restored. The king grants a charter of confirmation. The citizens advance two hundred thousand pounds for the Dutch war. Great plague. Fire of London. Description of the monument.

THE citizens being apprehensive, at this time of general confusion, that their trade and constitution must, sooner or later, be overthrown and ruined, petitioned the parliament, that a personal treaty might be had between the king, and both houses, in London, or some other place, convenient and most consistent with his majesty's honour, and the safety of the parliament. And they desired that their brethren of Scotland might be invited; so that, according to their allegiance and the covenant, his majesty's royal person, honour and estate, might be preserved, the power and privilege of parliament maintained, the just rights and liberties of the subject restored, religion and church-government in purity established, all differences composed, a firm and lasting peace concluded, the union of the two kingdoms according to the covenant constituted, all armies disbanded, and the soldiers arrears justly paid.

This petition was received by the parliament with thanks; but their remissness to proceed to a treaty of accommodation with his majesty being daily more and more apparent, the citizens presented the following petition:

"That the militia of London, and parts adjacent, might be settled in one committee: and that if any person should be added by both houses to the said committee, from the

"out-ports, such person or persons to enjoy no place of profit under the parliament, whereby they might be encouraged to continue the war. That the king might be brought to London with freedom, honour and safety, to treat with his parliament about a safe and lasting peace. And that the city, if requisite, may have power to raise horse, for the security of his majesty's person, parliament, and city."

Soon after this, a third petition, to the same purport, was presented to both houses of parliament, praying that the king's majesty might be free from restraint, and invited to a treaty: that all hostilities by sea and land might, by command of the king and parliament, cease: and in order to defray the expence which might attend the treaty with his majesty, then under restraint at Newport, in the Isle of Wight, the citizens advanced the sum of six thousand pounds.

All these measures taken by the citizens to bring about a reconciliation between the parliament and city, and to reinstate the king, were soon frustrated: for, on the fourth of December 1648, the army marched to London, and were quartered in Westminster, and the suburbs and villages about the metropolis. This was done in order to extort forty thousand pounds from the city, to disarm the citizens, and prevent all kind of resistance to their measures, and to prepare matters, matters, not for the safety of his majesty's person, and to treat with him about a peace, but to bring him to a speedy and public trial, as had been concerted by the army, in conjunction with many members of the house of commons.

The citizens not having answered the demand of the army, the general commanded two regiments of foot, and several troops of horse, to march into London, and take up their quarters in Black-friars and its neighbourhood; whence, by order, they went and secured the treasuries in Weaver's, Haberdasher's, and Goldsmith's-hall; from the first of which they carried off upwards of twenty thousand pounds.

The house of commons being entirely anti-monarchical, resolved now to punish all the citizens that subscribed the petition for a treaty with, and bringing the king to London: for which purpose an ordinance was passed, that all such citizens should be rendered incapable of being elected mayor, aldermen, or common-councilmen.

On the ninth of January, by order of the house of commons, Dendy, serjeant at arms, proclaimed the king's trial in Cheapside, in the city of London, in order to encourage all persons to bring in their accusations against his majesty: and general Fairfax issued a proclamation, strictly commanding all papists, delinquents, and disaffected persons, to depart London, and ten miles thereof, in twenty-four hours, and not to return for the space of one month, on pain of being punished as deserters.

In order to countenance these iniquitous proceedings, the common-council moved for a petition to the house of commons, to bring the king to justice: and though the Lord-mayor and many of the aldermen withdrew before the question was put, yet they carried their point, and the house of commons not only received the illegal petition, but sanctified and confirmed the same.

Soon after this every circumstance of the trial was adjusted, and the high court of justice finally erected. The charge was opened by the solicitor-general, who represented that Charles Stuart, king of England, was accused as a tyrant, traitor, murderer, and a public and implacable enemy to the common-wealth. In answer to this his majesty disowned the authority of the court, and refused to acknowledge their usurped jurisdiction. The court, however, informed him, that he must not deny the authority of his judges: and Charles having, on three several appearances before the court, refused to acknowledge their jurisdiction, on the fourth time sentence was pronounced against him.

On the thirtieth of January, in consequence of a warrant from the high court of judicature, he was conducted on foot through St. James's Park, to Whitehall, accompanied by doctor Juxon, and guarded by a regiment of foot soldiers, commanded by colonel Tomlinson. When he came on the scaffold he directed his discourse to the colonel, doctor Juxon and some others about him, declaring himself innocent of having commenced the war against the parliament, but owned at the same time, that his having consented to the execution of the earl of Strafford had brought the judgment of heaven on himself. He died forgiving all his enemies, even the chief instruments of his death; but advised them, and the whole nation, to restore the constitution of the kingdom, by paying obedience to their lawful sovereign, his son and successor. When he was preparing himself for the block, doctor Juxon told him, there was but one stage more, which was short, though troublesome, and would convey him to the regions of ineffable joy. He replied, "I go from a corruptible to an incorruptible crown, of which I shall never be bereaved." Having thus spoke he laid his neck on the block, and at one blow his head was severed from his body. After which a man held up the head streaming with blood, and exclaimed, "this is the head of a traitor." Such was the fate of Charles I. king of England.

After the king's execution the house of commons passed an act for the exheredation of the royal line; the abolishment of monarchy, and the erection of a common-wealth: in consequence of which an order was sent to the Lord-mayor for proclaiming the same personally: but his lordship refusing to comply with this command, he was deposed, imprisoned, and fined. Soon after another was chosen, who, with twelve aldermen, on the thirtieth of May, proclaimed the ordinance for abolishing the kingly office in England and Ireland.

The parliament having appointed a day of thanksgiving for suppressing the levellers, accepted of an invitation from the city to hear the sermon on that occasion at Christ-church, Newgate-street, and to dine at Grocer's hall, where they were most sumptuously entertained by the city: and the surplus of the provisions, together with the sum of four hundred pounds, were given to the poor. The next day, the commons sent a committee to return thanks to the Lord-mayor and common-council. And the city, as a proof of their sincere affection, presented the general of the army with a large basin and ewer of massy gold; and lieutenant-general Cromwell with plate, to the amount of three hundred pounds, and a purse containing two hundred pieces of gold.

In consideration of the many services the parliament received from the city, they made the citizens a present of Richmond-park in Surry; besides which, they also gave them many houses, and a thousand pounds for the use of the poor: the citizens, in return, promised to stand by them on all emergencies, with their lives and fortunes.

In the year 1649, on the fourth of January, about sixty houses were blown up by a blast of twenty-seven barrels of gun-powder, which accidentally took fire at a ship-chandler's, in the neighbourhood of Barking-church, Tower-street. It unfortunately happened, that a parish-feast was then held at the Rose-tavern, next door but one to the church, at which the principal part of the parishioners were assembled; all of whom perished, and were mangled in a most dreadful manner, except the mistress of the tavern, who was found sitting upright in the bar, and a drawer standing without it, with a pot in his hand, both being suffocated with smoke and dust, and preserved in these postures by the casual falling of timber, timber, without the least sign either of fracture or confusion. But the most remarkable thing was, a cradle with a child in it, blown upon the upper leads of Barking-church, which the next day was taken down, without either of them receiving the least damage.

In the year 1653, Cromwell having the chief command of the army, divested the parliament of all power, by turning them out of doors; and though the aldermen and citizens petitioned for their being reinstated, yet Oliver paid no regard to their intreaties. On the contrary, he constituted a certain number of persons, who were his creatures, to take upon them the government of the kingdom, by the name and stile of the Supreme Authority, with power to assume the name of Parliament. The Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council, immediately acknowledging this new form of government, and his creatures resigning their sham power into his hands, he was, by the officers of the army, chose "Oliver Cromwell, Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland;" after which he was installed in Westminster-hall. The Lord-mayor, aldermen, and recorder attended the installation in their scarlet gowns: and the instrument of the protector's government, which he swore to preserve inviolable, contained the following heads: 1. To call a parliament every three years. 2. No parliament to be dissolved before it had sat five months. 3. Bills offered to and not signed by the protector within twenty days, to be laws without him. 4. The protector's council not to exceed twenty-one, nor be less than thirteen. 5. Future protectors eligible by the council immediately upon the demise of any one. 6. No protector, except the present, to be general of the army. 7. The power of war and peace in the protector. 8. A power for the protector and his council to make some laws during the intervals of parliament. Soon after this, he was entertained at Guildhall, with all those formalities which are usual at the reception and entertainment of a crowned head. And so great was his vanity, that, at his departure, he conferred the honour of knighthood on the Lord-mayor. On the sixteenth of May following, he returned the favour of the entertainment, by a splendid dinner which he gave the Lord-mayor and aldermen.

In the year 1654, Cromwell, in order to render himself and his government popular, pretending to discover a conspiracy against his life, seemed to place great confidence in the citizens, whom he granted the power of the militia, and to raise forces under the command of their favourite leader, major general Skipton; remitted them some impositions and taxes, and permitted the citizens to revive the artillery company, on promise, that only those who were well affected to his highness should be admitted into that company.

The following year an ordinance was passed by the protector, to limit the number of hackney-coaches to two hundred, and to place them under the care and government of the Lord-mayor and court of aldermen.

In the year 1656, the protector revived the several proclamations and orders prohibiting the increase of new buildings. To effect which, he passed an ordinance, that all persons who had erected houses in contempt of former prohibitions, since the twenty-fifth of March 1620, should, for every such house, not having four acres of land thereunto belonging, pay to the protector one year's rent; and for every house, erected after the twenty-ninth of September 1656, without land, as aforesaid, to forfeit one hundred pounds for his use.

In the year 1658, Cromwell was removed from his usurped dominion by the interposition of death. In consequence of which, the privy-council, attended by the Lord-mayor, proclaimed his son Richard protector, to succeed him in the government of these kingdoms. And the Lord-mayor and aldermen, attended by a great number of the principal citizens, assisted at the celebration of the funeral obsequies of Cromwell.

The citizens continued to join with the same zeal in the measures taken under Richard's protectorship for the continuance of the usurpation; till, worn out by the continual changes and apprehensions under the new administration, and dispirited by the pusillanimity of their councils, which began to render England despicable abroad, and jealous that the time of the royal family's restoration was not very distant, (it being suspected by the very houses in being that general Monk, who was now at the head of the common-wealth's army, was concerting a plan to bring in king Charles II.) the citizens very wisely declined all invitations to join either the parliament or the army, when it appeared that a rupture between them was unavoidable. Although the magistrates acted with so much caution to keep as clear as possible of the fatal consequences of a new war, yet the apprentices, who were spirited up to shew a dislike to the present government, assembled in great numbers, and demanded a free parliament. This commotion was soon suppressed by colonel Hewson, who marched into the city, and killed many of the apprentices; the loss of whom so inflamed the citizens against the army, that the common council from that time, fell off from their attachment to a government which placed all their hopes in the power and spirit of an army; and resolved, "that they conceived the city of London to be in imminent and extraordinary danger; that they judged it absolutely necessary to put the city forthwith into a posture of defence; that the mayor, aldermen, and common-council should forthwith settle six regiments of trained bands, with officers and commanders of their own appointment, and their commissions sealed in open court with the common seal of the city; and that commissioners should be appointed to confer with the officers of the fleet, in order to the safety of the city, and the peace and settlement of the nation; to give an answer to general Monk; and to propound the convention of a free parliament."

This conduct of the citizens was supported by a revolt of part of the army and fleet, who declared clared for a free parliament, in opposition to the government by a committee of safety. And the citizens, on the eighth of January, presented a remonstrance to the common-council, touching freedom and liberty, in which they thankfully acknowledged the above resolutions to be just and prudent; and humbly remonstrated, that no power or persons whatever might impose any law or tax upon any of those citizens, with whose general concernment that court was entrusted, till the authority thereof be derived from their representatives in parliament.

This remonstrance produced great debates; and it was put to the vote, whether they should prosecute those lawful means that might lead to the attainment of a free parliament: but the Lord-mayor dissenting, the sense of the court was transmitted to the council of state. The powers in being immediately ordered general Monk to march with his army into the city, and to reduce it to the obedience of the parliament. Accordingly several regiments, both of horse and foot, were posted round the metropolis, at the city gates, and in the streets; and two aldermen and eight common-council-men were seized and committed to custody, for exerting themselves in the cause of liberty.

Soon after this, by an ordinance of parliament, general Monk pulled down the posts and chains, broke and cut to pieces the city gates, and took down and destroyed the portcullisses at Cripple-gate, Bishopsgate, and Aldgate; but such was the extraordinary strength of the works at Aldersgate and Newgate, that they could only dismount the gates from their hinges, and rent part of the portcullisses.

In the year 1659, general Monk finding the parliament had come to resolutions, which, by joining others with him in the command of the army, threatened his destruction, consulted with his officers; and being assured of their friendship and assistance, resolved, if possible, to counteract their resolutions, to maintain his supreme command, and to recover his lost favour with the citizens. For these purposes he next morning drew up his army in Finsbury fields, from whence he dispatched a messenger to the Lord-mayor, with the declaration of his sorrow for what he had done to the prejudice of the city, and earnestly desired a conference with his lordship and the common-council, hoping therein to make reparation for his past misconduct.

In compliance with this request, a common-council was immediately summoned to receive his proposals: at which the general testified his great concern for having accepted a command, which in the execution had given so much uneasiness to the citizens; urging, that he was under a necessity of accepting thereof, or throwing up his commission, which he judged necessary to keep for the good of the city and kingdom, whose happiness and prosperity no man had more at heart than himself. After this he produced a copy of a letter sent by him to the parliament at his leaving Whitehall, in which he upbraided them with their unjust and unreasonable proceedings, advising them (by way of command) within a certain time, to issue out writs for a new parliament, as the only expedient to restore peace and happiness to the kingdom, which both the army and nation expected from them.

There appeared so great sincerity in this open manifestation of the general's sentiments, that the citizens resolved to join him, and they mutually agreed, at all events, to stand by each other. This happy coalition was no sooner published than a universal joy spread all over the city; and the day concluded with ringing of bells, illuminations, and bonfires. The most contemptible marks of ridicule were shewn to the parliament; and there was no invention of fancy, wit, or ribaldry, that was not exercised that night, either to extol the general or degrade the parliament.

General Monk having thus regained the city's favour, returned to his quarters at Whitehall, and disposed of his army as he thought most proper and convenient. Soon after, having restored the excluded members to their seats in the house of commons, an ordinance passed to restore the common-council to their ancient rights, the imprisoned apprentices released, and the posts, chains, gates, and portcullisses of the city to be replaced. In return for this, the city cheerfully advanced the parliament the sum of sixty thousand pounds; and farther, to evince their good opinion for Monk, they chose him major-general of all their forces. By whose advice, the citizens disarmed all persons suspected to favour the Rump, and kept a strong guard for the peace and quiet of the city, till the meeting of a free parliament, which was now resolved upon, as well as to call home the king, and to restore the monarchy, the royal family, and the church. The citizens contributed all in their power for accomplishing this great work; and declared, that they were firmly resolved to adhere to their general, the council of state, and the ensuing parliament.

All things being now ripe for the restoration, king Charles II. among many others, sent a letter, dated at Breda, April fourteen, 1660, to the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council of the city of London; in which his majesty expressed extraordinary satisfaction with their conduct, and good intention to assist in the work of his restoration, and his peculiar regard for the city, which, says he, "we will manifest on all occasions, not only by renewing their charter, and confirming all those privileges which they have received from our predecessors, but by adding and granting any new favours which may advance the trade, wealth, and honour of that our native city."

The receipt of this letter produced such an effect upon the citizens, that they presented the messengers with three hundred pounds, and deputed fourteen of the common-council to proceed immediately to Holland, with a present of ten thousand pounds to his majesty, and to assure him of their fidelity and most cheerful submission, and that they placed all their felicity and future hope of prosperity in the assurance of his royal grace and protection; for the meriting of which, their lives and fortunes should be always at his majesty's disposal.

R r r

The

The common-council, four days after, made an order, that Richmond-park, lately conferred on the city by Cromwell, should be presented to his majesty at his return, with assurances, that they had kept it with no other view than to preserve it for the royal interest.

The day following his majesty was proclaimed king at the usual places in London, with the greatest solemnity, in the presence of the Lord-mayor, aldermen, recorder, and sheriffs, amidst the universal and joyful acclamations of the citizens.

In the mean time, the city deputies, being arrived at the Hague, were introduced to his majesty, who, in return to their message, told them, that he had ever a particular affection for the city of London, the place of his birth; and that he was exceedingly pleased to find them so anxious for his restoration, which he acknowledged, not only by returning them thanks, but likewise conferring on them the honour of knighthood.

On the twenty-sixth of May, 1660, his majesty arrived at Dover; and on the twenty ninth, made his public entry into London. He was met at St. George's-fields, in Southwark, by the Lord-mayor and aldermen; the former of which, delivering the city sword to his majesty, had the same returned with the honour of knighthood. From this place his majesty, after taking some refreshment under a magnificent tent erected for that purpose, proceeded through the streets of London, which were lined with the city companies in their liveries, and the trained bands. On this occasion, the houses were adorned with the richest silks and tapestries; and the windows and balconies were crowded with a great concourse of spectators. The manner of the cavalcade was thus: First, a troop of gentlemen in cloth of silver, brandishing their swords, and led by major-general Brown. Another troop of two hundred, in velvet coats, attended by footmen in purple liveries. Alderman Robinson's troop in buff coats, with cloth of silver sleeves, and very rich green scarves. Another troop of two hundred men, in blue uniform, trimmed with silver, and attended by six trumpets and footmen in sea-green, trimmed with silver lace. A troop of two hundred and twenty, with thirty footmen, in grey and silver liveries, and four trumpeters, richly clothed. Another troop of one hundred and five, in grey uniform, with six trumpets. Another of seventy, with five trumpets. Three troops, two of three hundred, and one of one hundred men, all gloriously habited and gallantly mounted. Two trumpets with the king's-arms, Eighty sheriff's men in red cloaks, richly laced with silver, and half pikes in their hands. Six hundred liverymen on horseback, in black velvet coats and gold chaines, divided according to their companies; each company having footmen in their proper liveries, and carrying streamers, &c. Kettle drums and trumpets, with streamers. Twelve ministers at the head of his majesty's life-guards of horse, commanded by Lord Gerard. City marshal, and eight footmen in divers colours, attended by the city waits and officers, in due order. The two sheriffs. The aldermen in their scarlet gowns on horseback, with rich trappings, and footmen in red liveries, trimmed with silver, and cloth of gold. Heralds and maces in rich coats. Lord-mayor carrying the sword bare, and supported by the general and duke of Buckingham. The king himself on horseback, between his brothers the dukes of York and Gloucester. A troop of horse with white colours. The general life-guard. A troop of gentry. Five regiments of the army, horse, with back, breast, and head pieces.

On the fifth of July following, the citizens entertained the king and royal family, the great officers of state, and both houses of parliament, at Guildhall, where they were sumptuously regaled with those dainties, adapted for the entertainment of such illustrious guests.

On the twenty-third of April, being the day appointed for the coronation, his majesty, according to ancient custom, rode from the Tower of London, through the city to Westminster; and the cavalcade was performed with more magnificence and splendor than had ever been seen before on the like occasion.

In the year 1662, the hackney-coaches having created an extraordinary charge on the inhabitants of London and Westminster, by destroying the pavements, the parliament enacted, that all hackney-coaches, in and about the cities of London and Westminster, should annually pay towards the charge of paving and cleansing the ways and streets in and about the said cities, the sum of five pounds each, and every load of hay sixpence, and straw twopence. The same act likewise provided for enlarging the passages at Stock's-market, from Fleet-conduit to St. Paul's church, the passage and gateway out of Cheapside into St. Paul's church-yard, the passage at St. Dunstan's church, in Fleet-street, from Cheapside into Bucklersbury, the passage at Temple-bar, and several others in the out parts; and to pave Petty-France to St. James's house, St. James's-street, Pall-mall, and Hedge-lane.

The citizens of London having been violently deprived of the Irish estates in the province of Ulster by an arbitrary decree in the star-chamber during the reign of Charles I. his majesty, on the tenth of April, granted the said lands again to the city of London, and incorporated the society for the plantation in Ulster a-new; and by a charter of licence empowered them to re-grant the manors and lands to the respective companies. Accordingly the society conveyed to each of the twelve companies the manor and lands which formerly belonged to it; and the companies have quietly enjoyed their estates ever since, under the direction of a governor and deputy governor, chosen annually, and twenty-four assistants, viz. two out of each of the twelve companies; of whom twelve go off every year, and twelve new ones are chosen in their stead by the common-council.

These meet by the appointment or summons of the governor or deputy governor, as often as necessary, in a place called the Irish chamber, in Guildhall, to transact their affairs; and nine, whereof the governor or deputy governor to be one, make a court. This society have a secretary and a messenger of their own appointment: they also chuse a general agent in Ireland to correspond with

Engraved for Chamberlain's History of London.

*View of the manner of burying the dead Bodies
At Holy-well mount during the dreadful PLAGUE in 1665*

with them, who look after their concerns and transact their business; and a receiver to gather their rents. They have a right of presentation to the churches of Londonderry and Colerain: and all by-laws made by the corporation of Londonderry must be confirmed by the Society before they can be of any effect.

In the year 1663 his majesty, in return for the late tokens of loyalty discovered in the citizens towards his person and government, by their effectual aid to restore him to the crown and dominion over these realms, granted them a confirmation of all their charters, privileges, liberties, rights and customs: in which, after having recited the particular charters granted to them by his predecessors, he proceeds as follows:

" Now know ye, that we, at the humble petition of the mayor and commonalty, and citizens of our city of London aforesaid, of our special grace, certain knowledge and meer motion, and for divers good causes and considerations us hereunto especially moving, all and singular the letters patents, charters and confirmations aforesaid, and all and singular the gifts, grants, confirmations, restitutions, customs, ordinances, explanations, and articles, and all other things whatsoever in the said letters-patents, charters, grants, and confirmations, or any of them, contained, recited, specified, confirmed, explained or mentioned; and all and singular the lands, tenements, offices, jurisdictions, authorities, privileges, liberties, franchises, freedoms, immunities, liberties, customs and hereditaments whatsoever, which the said mayor and commonalty, and citizens of our city of London, or their predecessors by the name of the mayor and commonalty, and citizens, of the city of London; or by the name of the mayor; aldermen, citizens, and commonalty of London; or by the name of the mayor and citizens of London; or by the name of the mayor and commonalty of the city of London; or by the name of the citizens of the city of London; or by the name of the barons of London; or by the name of the barons of the city of London; or by any other name whatsoever, by reason or force of the said letters-patent, charters, or confirmations before mentioned; or of any use or uses, prescription or prescriptions, or any other lawful means whatsoever, at any time or times heretofore have had, or reasonably used or exercised, (except as above is excepted) ratifying, and gratefully for us, our heirs, and successors, as much as in us lies, accepting and approving, do them, and every of them, to the said mayor and commonalty, and citizens, of our city of London aforesaid, and their successors, ratify and confirm, by these presents, to have, hold, enjoy, and exercise, all and singular the premises aforesaid, (except before excepted) to the said mayor and commonalty, and citizens, of our city of London aforesaid, and their successors for ever, as fully, freely, and entirely, and in as ample manner and form, as the same are abovementioned to be given or granted, or as the same otherwise by use, prescription, or

" any legal way or right whatsoever, have been heretofore respectively had, obtained, or enjoyed, as if the same were separately, singly, and nominally, in and by these presents expressed, named, declared, granted, and manifested. And further, we will, and by these presents we do, for us, our heirs, and successors, grant to the said mayor and commonalty, and citizens, of the city of London aforesaid, and their successors, that these our letters-patent shall be in and by all things, according to the true intent thereof, good, firm, valid, and effectual in the law, notwithstanding any misnaming, or any ill or false naming or recital in the same contained; or any statute, ordinances, provision, proclamation, or restriction heretofore in any wise had or made. We will also, &c. without any fine in our hanaper, &c. although express mention, &c. Witness myself at Westminster the twenty fourth day of June, in the fifteenth year of our reign."

In the year 1664 the king wanting money to carry on a war with the Dutch, the city of London, at the request of the privy-council readily advanced the sum of two hundred thousand pounds on that occasion; for which they received the thanks of both houses of parliament.

In the year 1665, about the beginning of May, there broke out in London the most dreadful plague that ever infested this kingdom, which swept away sixty-eight thousand, five hundred and ninety-six persons, which, added to the number of those who died of other distempers, raised the bill of mortality in this year to ninety-seven thousand three hundred and six. And the mortality raged so violently in July, that all houses were shut up, the streets deserted, and scarce any thing to be seen therein but grass growing, innumerable fires for purifying the air, coffins, pest-carts, red crosses upon doors, with the inscription, " Lord have mercy upon us!" and continual cries of " pray for us;" or the melancholy call of " bring out your dead." The cause of this dreadful calamity was ascribed to the importation of infected goods from Holland, where the plague had committed great ravages the preceding year. And it was observed, during the whole time of its continuance, that there was such a general calm and serenity of weather, as if both wind and rain had been expelled the kingdom.

The citizens of London having been greatly oppressed by the carmen and wood-mongers, the common-council (in order to provide a sufficient supply of fuel, and to overthrow the secret combinations and contrivances of the dealers in wood and coals, and of the carmen) passed an act on the thirty-first of June; in which, among other things, it was enacted,

" That the president and governor of Christ's hospital, London, shall, from time to time hereafter, have the rule, oversight and government, of all the carrs, carts, carters, and carmen, and of all other person or persons whatsoever, working any carrs or carts, within the city of London, and liberties thereof: that no more than four hundred and twenty carts shall, by

“ by the mayor, commonalty, and citizens of this city, or any other person or persons claiming by, from, or under them, be allowed or permitted to work within this city and liberties thereof; and that seventeen shillings and fourpence per annum, and no more, shall be received or paid for a car-room, and twenty shillings and no more or greater fine, upon any admittance or alienation of a car-room; and that if any person or persons shall presume to work any carr or carrs, by himself or servants, not being duly allowed as aforesaid, such person or persons, for every time so offending, shall forfeit and pay the sum of forty shillings, to be recovered, received and obtained, as is hereafter mentioned: on pain of forfeiting and paying ten shillings for the first and second offence respectively; for the third and every other offence the carr or carrs of the offender to be seized and carried to the new store-yard, or green-yard, at the postern.”

“ And for the prevention of such deceit hereafter, as divers woodmongers have practised, in the sale and measure of their coals; it is enacted, that all sea-coals hereafter to be sold or uttered by retail, by any person or persons whatsoever, shall be filled and brought home to the buyers, in the sea-coal meter's sacks, or such other sacks as contain the full measure of the sea-coal meter's sacks, and are, and shall be marked by the keepers of the Guildhall for the time being, according to an order of the court of aldermen, made the twenty-fifth day of October, in the time of the mayoralty of Sir Thomas Campbell, knight, deceased, and carried by some street-carr, or carrs, of persons duly licenced and allowed as aforesaid, and bearing upon the same carrs the mark of the red cross for a note of their allowance, as hath anciently been accustomed.

“ And that all person and persons vending or uttering sea-coals by retail, and their carmen, servants, or agents, shall hereafter from time to time, and at all times, when they carry or send abroad any coals within the city of London or liberties thereof, carry along in their carr or carrs, together with their sea-coals, a good and lawful bushel, sealed according to the bushel in the Guildhall, allowed for measuring of sea-coals, which agreeth with the fatt anciently used for measuring of sea-coals, which bushel shall be, and contain in breadth, from out to out, the ring not exceeding half an inch, nineteen inches and a half, and in depth within the bushel, seven inches and a half.

“ And if any person or persons shall bring home in his or their carr or cart, to any buyer, any coals in any other sack or sacks, and without such bushel, as are beforementioned and appointed, such persons so offending shall forfeit and pay ten shillings for the first and second offence respectively; for the third and every other offence, the carr or carrs of the offender to be seized and carried to the new store-yard, on the postern, as is aforesaid.

“ And for a constant store and provision of sea-coals to be had and made hereafter, for supply of this city, and specially for the benefit

“ and relief of the poor in times of dearth and scarcity, which hath happened in this and many other years heretofore, by reason of wars and troubles at sea, or by the subtle combination and practice of the retailers at home, for their private gain and profit, to the common abuse and detriment of the citizens, and others his majesty's subjects:

“ Be it enacted, by the authority aforesaid, That besides the general stock employed by this city, for provision of coals for the benefit of the poor within the said city and liberties, there shall be provided yearly hereafter, at the best hand, betwixt Lady-day and Michaelmas, by the several companies of this city, the several chaldrons of sea-coals hereafter mentioned: that is to say,

	Chald.		Chald.
Mercers,	418	Cutlers,	75
Grocers,	675	White-bakers,	45
Drapers,	562	Wax-chandlers,	19
Fishmongers,	465	Tallow-chandlers,	97
Goldsmiths,	525	Armourers,	19
Skinners,	315	Girdlers,	105
Merchant-taylors,	750	Butchers,	22
Haberdashers,	578	Sadlers,	19
Salters,	360	Carpenters,	38
Ironmongers,	225	Cordwainers,	60
Vintners,	375	Barber-surgeons,	60
Clothworkers,	412	Painter-stainers,	12
Dyers,	105	Curriers,	11
Brewers,	104	Masons,	22
Leathersellers,	210	Plumbers,	19
Pewterers,	52	Inholders,	45
Founders,	7	Woodmongers,	60
Poulterers,	12	Scriveners,	60
Cooks,	30	Fruiterers,	7
Coopers,	52	Plasterers,	8
Tylers and Bricklayers,	19	Brown Bakers,	12
Bowyers,	3	Stationers,	75
Fletchers,	3	Imbroiderers,	30
Blacksmiths,	15	Upholders,	9
Apothecaries,	45	Musicians,	6
Joiners,	22	Turners,	13
Weavers,	27	Basketmakers,	6
Woolmen,	3	Glaziers,	6

“ And that the said quantity of sea-coals, shall be stored or laid up in convenient places, by every the said companies respectively, and brought out, sold, and uttered, at such other hard and dear seasons of the year, in such manner, and at such price, as the Lord-mayor and court of aldermen of this city, for the time being, shall judge most requisite and convenient, and by their precept in writing shall direct and require, for the ends and purposes before mentioned, so as such companies, as aforesaid, be not by such prices ordered to sell the same coals to loss.

“ And whereas divers woodmongers and others, using to sell and utter coals by retail, within this city and liberties, in design to raise and enhance the prices thereof for their own private gain and commodity, have commonly heretofore gone or sent down the river of Thames,

or

Engraved for Chamberlain's History of London.

View of Part of LONDON as it appeared in the Dreadful Fire in 1666.

" or otherwise travelled or employed their agents
 " to meet the ships and vessels coming from New" castle and other parts toward this city, laden
 " with coals; and at distant places from the said
 " city, or by precontract within the same city
 " and liberties, have bought up, forestalled and " ingrossed great quantities of coals, (which " should have been brought to the said city by
 " the owners and sellers thereof, to be there sold
 " and uttered at reasonable prices) and the same
 " have been conveyed and brought to the said
 " city, to sell again at high and excessive prices,
 " against the custom and privileges of this city,
 " and to the public detriment, oppression of the " poor, and great charge of all others inhabiting
 " and dwelling within the said city and liberties
 " thereof:

" For reformation whereof, be it enacted, or" dained and established by the authority afore-
 " said, That no person or persons whatsoever,
 " inhabiting or dwelling, or that hereafter shall
 " inhabit and dwell within the said city or liber" ties thereof, shall, from and after the feast of " the nativity of St. John Baptist, now next en" suing, either by themselves, or any for them,
 " or to their use, provide, buy, bargain; or con" tract for any sea-coals, Scotch-coals, pit-coals,
 " or other coals, coming towards this city to be
 " sold, other than such as shall be provided and
 " brought to be spent within their own private
 " houses; nor shall sell or utter the same by re" tail or in gross within this city or liberties to
 " any person or persons; but that the owners
 " and sellers thereof, at their own costs and
 " charges, shall and may bring the same coals to
 " the city themselves, here by them to be sold;
 " upon pain that all and every person or persons
 " whatsoever, that shall offend contrary to the " true intent and meaning hereof, shall forfeit and
 " lose five shillings for every chaldron of sea-
 " coals, and the like sum for every ton of Scotch
 " or pit-coals, that shall be bought, bargained
 " or contracted for."

In the year 1666, on the 2d day of Septem" ber, about one o'clock in the morning, a most " dreadful fire broke out in Pudding-lane, near
 " new Fish-street; from whence, in about thirty
 " hours, it spread to Gracechurch-street, towards
 " the north-west, and to the Three Cranes in the " city, towards the south-west, including Canon-
 " street, and the lanes, allies, and courts in the " city. The flames being assisted by a violent east-
 " ly wind, communicated themselves in various
 " and distant places, and the conflagration became
 " so general, that there was not a house, hall, or
 " church left standing, from the west-end of Tower-
 " wharf in the east, to the Temple-church in the " west; nor from the north-end of Mincing-lane,
 " in Portchurch-street, from the west-end of Leaden-
 " hall-street, and from the south-west end of Bi-
 " shopsgate-street, as far as the entrance into Thread-
 " needle-street, to Holborn-bridge, on the west, in
 " a direct line; exclusive of the damage done in
 " Throgmorton-street, Lothbury, Coleman-street,
 " Basinghall-street, Cateaton-street, Aldermanbury,
 " Addle street, Love-lane, Wood-street, Staining-
 " lane, Noble-street, and Silver-street: after all which ravagements, it stopped at Pye-corner, near West-Smithfield.

By this horrid conflagration, many thousand citizens were compelled to retire to the fields, destitute of all necessities, and exposed to the inclemency of the weather, till a sufficient number of huts could be erected for their relief: his majesty immediately ordered a great quantity of naval bread to be distributed amongst them, and gave command to the magistrates of the city to encourage the bringing of all sorts of provisions.

This dreadful and destructive fire laid waste and consumed, the buildings on four hundred and thirty-six acres of ground, four hundred streets, lanes, &c. thirteen thousand two hundred houses, the cathedral church of St. Paul, eighty-six parish churches, six chapels, the magnificent buildings of Guildhall, the Royal Exchange, Custom-house, and Blackwell-hall, many hospitals and libraries, fifty-two of the companies halls, and a great number of other stately edifices; together with three of the city-gates, four stone-bridges, and the prisons of Newgate, the Fleet, the Poultry and Wood-street Compters; the loss of which, by the best calculation, amounted to ten millions seven hundred and thirty thousand and five hundred pounds. And notwithstanding all this destruction, yet only six persons lost their lives.

Various have been the conjectures respecting the cause of this dreadful catastrophe: but the best authority we have is that upon the monument, erected and inscribed by act of parliament, to perpetuate the memory of the above calamity.
 And in order to preserve our intended plan, of inserting all public buildings in their proper order of time, we shall here give

A Description of the MONUMENT.

This beautiful piece of architecture, which is situated on the east-side of Fish-street-hill, was begun by Sir Christopher Wren, in the year 1671, and finished by him in 1677. It is a round pillar of the Doric order, all built with the best Portland stone, 202 feet in height from the ground, and fifteen in diameter. It stands on a pedestal forty feet high, and twenty-one square; and over the capital is an iron balcony, encompassing a cone thirty-two feet high, which supports a blazing urn of gilt brass. Within is a large stair-case of black marble, containing three hundred and forty-five steps, each six inches thick, and ten inches and a half broad.

The front of the pedestal, on the west-side of the pillar, is adorned with a very curious emblem in alto relief, denoting the destruction and restoration of the city. The first female figure represents the city of London, at her back many houses in a blaze, and she sitting on the ruins, in a languishing and disconsolate posture, with her head dejected, hair dishevelled, her hand carelessly lying on her sword, and the cap of maintenance lying at her side. Behind is Time, gradually raising her up; at her side a woman gently touching her with one hand, whilst a winged scepter in the other directs her to regard the goddesses in the clouds;

S f f

clouds; the with the Cornu-copia denoting Plenty, and that with the palm-branch Peace. At her feet a beehive, shewing, that by industry and application, the greatest difficulties are to be surmounted. Behind Time are divers citizens, exulting at his endeavours to restore her; and beneath, in the midst of the ruins, is a dragon, who, as supporter of the City-arms, with his paw endeavours to preserve the same. Opposite the city on an elevated pavement, stands Charles II. in a Roman habit, with a laurel on his head, and a truncheon in his hand; and approaching her, commands three of his attendants to descend to her relief. The first represents Science, with a winged head, and circles of naked boys dancing thereon: and in its hand Nature, with her numerous breasts, ready to give assistance to all. The second is Architecture, with a plan in one hand, a square and a pair of compasses in the other. The third is Liberty waving her hand in the air, shewing her joy at the pleasing prospect of the city's recovery. Behind the king is his brother, the duke of York, with a garland in one hand, to crown the rising city, and a sword in the other for her defence. The two figures behind are Justice and Fortitude; the former with a coronet, and the latter with a reined lion. Under the royal pavement lieth Envy, gnawing upon a heart, and emitting pestiferous fumes from her invenom'd mouth. In the uppermost part of the plinth the re-construction of the city is represented, by builders and labourers at work upon houses. The whole emblem is finely imagined, and executed as well.

The north and south sides of the pedestal have each a latin inscription; one describing the desolation of the city laid in ashes, and the other its glorious restoration. That on the north side in English runs thus:

" In the year of Christ 1666, the second day
" of September, eastward from hence, at the distance of two hundred feet, (the height of this column) a fire broke out about midnight, which, being driven on by a strong wind, not only wasted the adjacent parts, but also very remote places, with incredible noise and fury. It consumed eighty-nine churches, the city-gates, Guild-hall, many hospitals, schools, and libraries; a vast number of stately edifices, above thirteen thousand two hundred dwelling-houses, and four hundred streets; of the twenty six wards it destroyed fifteen, and left eight others shattered, and half burnt. The ruins of the city were four hundred and thirty-six acres, from this pillar, by the Thames side, to the Temple-church; and, from the north-east side, along the City-wall, to Holbourn-bridge. To the estates and fortunes of the citizens it was merciless, but to their lives very favourable; that it might in all things resemble the last conflagration of the world. The destruction was sudden; for in a small space of time the same city was seen most flourishing, and re" duced to nothing; and three days after, when this fatal fire had baffled all human counsels and endeavours, it stopt, as it were, by the will of Heaven, and was extinguished on every side."

The south inscription in English runs thus:

" Charles the second, son of Charles the first, martyr, king of Great-Britain, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, a most clement prince, who compassionating the loss by fire, which happened to the greatest part of the inhabitants of this city, (the ruins of which were yet smoking) and which, before that, was his greatest glory, was pleased to provide for it; he remitted the taxes, and recommended them to the parliament, who thereupon ordered, that the public buildings should be rebuilt in a better structure than they were before, from the monies arising from the duties upon coals; viz. the churches, and the cathedral of St. Paul's, were to be rebuilt from the foundation, with all possible speed and magnificence; that they should rebuild the bridges, gates and prisons; that the common sewers should be cleansed; that the descents should be levelled; that the narrow streets or lanes, highways, and markets, should be made wider; that no house should be built without a separation-wall between each; that they should be all of the same height forwards, and of polished free-stone, or bricks. And, lastly, that none should be above seven years in rebuilding his house; adding also an annual fast-day, for a perpetual memory thereof to posterity. Three years completed what was thought would have been the work of an age."

The east-side of the pedestal has also an inscription, signifying, that " this pillar was begun in 1671, Sir Richard Ford being then Lord-mayor; carried on in the mayoralty of Sir George Waterman, Sir Robert Hanson, Sir William Hooker, Sir Robert Viner, Sir Joseph Sheldon, and finished in 1677, Sir Thomas Davis being Lord-mayor."

As it appeared at the time, that this dreadful fire was contrived and carried on by the popish faction, the same is expressed in a line, round the pedestal, beginning on the west side, in these words:

" This pillar was set up in perpetual remembrance of the most dreadful burning of this protestant city, begun and carried on by the treachery and malice of the popish faction, in the beginning of September, in the year of our Lord 1666, in order to execute their horrid plot, to extirpate the protestant religion, and the old English liberty, and to introduce popery and slavery."

Engraved for Chamberlain's History of London.

View of ST BENNETS Grace Church Stenbury's Street.

*VIEW of the MONUMENT
St. John Street Wall.*

View of ST MAGNUS Church London Bridge.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

The king's declaration to the city of London on occasion of the late fire. Proceedings of parliament thereon. Act of common-council for enlarging the streets. The same confirmed and enforced by his majesty and council. Precept from the Lord-mayor against immorality and beggars. Public markets regulated by act of common-council. His majesty made free of the city of London. Princess Mary given in marriage to the prince of Orange. The papists attempt to burn London; for which five of them are executed. Solemn procession for burning the effigy of the pope. Remarkable storm of hail. Violent contest at election of sheriffs. An alderman and the two sheriffs committed to the Tower. A Quo Warranto issued out to seize the city charter. The city's petition to the king. Conditions imposed on the city. A violent frost. Death of Charles II.

THE general conflagration having reduced the city of London to a mere heap of rubbish, his majesty issued a proclamation for prohibiting the rebuilding of houses, till public care might be had to re-edify it with such propriety, uniformity, and security as might effectually prevent the like destruction for the future. For which purpose his majesty made the following declaration to the city of London.

“ CHARLES R.

“ As no particular man hath sustained any loss
“ or damage by the late terrible and deplorable “ fire in his fortune or estate, in any degree to be “ compared with the loss and damage we ourself
“ have sustained, so it is not possible for any man
“ to take the same more to heart, and to be more “ concerned and solicitous for the rebuilding this “ famous city, with as much expedition as possible:
“ and since it hath pleased God to lay this “ heavy judgment upon us all in this time, as “ an evidence of his displeasure for our sins, we “ do comfort ourself with some hope, that he will,
“ upon our due humiliation before him, as a new “ instance of his signal blessing upon us, give us “ life, not only to see the foundations laid, but
“ the buildings finished, of a much more beautiful “ city than is at this time consumed; and “ that as the seat and situation of it is the most “ convenient and noble, for the advancement of “ trade, of any city in Europe; so that such care
“ will be taken for the re-edification of it, both
“ for use and beauty, and such provision made
“ for the future, against the ordinary and casual “ accidents by fire, as may, as far as human “ wisdom can provide, upon the sad experience
“ we have had, reasonably secure the same, and “ make it rather appear to the world as purged
“ with the fire (in how lamentable a manner soever)
“ to a wonderful beauty and comeliness,
“ than consumed by it: and we receive no small “ encouragement in this our hope, by the alacrity
“ and cheerfulness we observe in those who have “ undergone the greatest loss, and seem the most “ undone: who, with undaunted courage, appear
“ to desire the same we do, and resolved to “ contribute their utmost assistance thereunto.

“ We have therefore thought fit, most necessary,
“ and agreeable to the great and constant affection
“ we have always had, and always shall retain “ for this our native city, to use this expedition
“ in publishing our thoughts, resolutions,
“ and intentions, upon this great affair; that “ though such present rules and directions cannot “ be formed, as must upon more mature deliberation “ be established for the re-edification, yet such “ inconveniences may and shall be prevented, which “ may arise by the hasty and unskilful buildings
“ many may propose to erect, for their present “ conveniences, before they can know how the same “ will suit and consist with the design that shall “ be made: and if this censure of ours, which resolves
“ with the blessing of God, so to provide for the just “ right and interest of all, that no man shall have “ cause to complain of wrong and oppression: and if “ this our reasonable animadversion shall not meet “ with that prudent submission we expect, but that
“ some obstinate and refractory persons will presume
“ to erect such buildings as they shall think fit, “ upon pretence that the ground is their own, and “ that they may do with it what they please, such “ their obstinacy shall not prevail to the public
“ prejudice; but we do hereby require the Lord-mayor,
“ and the other magistrates of the city of London,
“ in their several limits, to be very watchful in such “ cases, and speedily to pull down whatsoever such “ men shall presume to set up, so much to the disturbance
“ of public order and decency, and that they forthwith “ give notice to us, or our privy-council, of such “ their proceedings, and return the names of such “ refractory persons who presume to contemn this “ our injunction, and we shall give order for their “ exemplary punishment, without the violation of the “ public justice.

“ And because no men shall complain or apprehend “ that by this caution or restraint of ours, they shall “ or may, for a long time be kept from providing “ habitations for themselves, and for the carrying on “ their trades, though we make no question, but in a “ short time, with the assistance and advice of the “ Lord-mayor

“ mayor and court of aldermen, (who have be-“ fought us for some time to put this restraint)
 “ to finish the whole design, even before any men
 “ can make provision of materials for any valu“ able edifices : we do declare, that if any confi“ derable number of men (for it is impossible to “ comply with the humour of every particular “ man) shall address themselves to the court of “ aldermen, and manifest to them in what places “ their ground lies, upon which they design to “ build, they shall in a short time receive such “ order and direction, for their proceeding there-
 “ in, that they shall have no cause to complain :
 “ and so we proceed to the setting down such “ general, to which all particular designs must “ conform themselves.

“ in the first place, the woeful experience in “ this late heavy visitation hath sufficiently con“ vinced all men of the pernicious consequences
 “ which have attended the building with timber,
 “ and even with stone itself, and the notable be“ nefit of brick, which in so many places hath “ resisted, and even extinguished the fire ; and “ we do therefore hereby declare our express will
 “ and pleasure, that no man whatsoever shall “ presume to erect any house or building, great “ or small, but of brick or stone ; and if any “ man shall do the contrary, the next magistrate “ shall forthwith cause it to be pulled down, and “ such further course shall be taken for his pu“ nishment as he deserves : and we suppose that
 “ the notable benefit many men have received “ from those cellars which have been well and “ strongly arched, will persuade most men, who “ build good houses, to practise that good hus“ bandry, by arching all convenient places.

“ We do declare, that Fleet-street, Cheapside, “ Cornhill, and all other eminent and notorious “ streets, shall be of such a breadth, as may, with “ God’s blessing, prevent the mischief that one “ side may suffer if the other be on fire, which “ was the case lately in Cheapside ; the precise “ breadth of which several streets, shall be, upon “ advice with the Lord-mayor and aldermen,
 “ shortly published, with many other particular “ orders and rules, which cannot yet be adjusted ;
 “ in the mean time we resolve, though all streets “ cannot be of equal breadth, yet none shall be “ so narrow as to make the passage uneasy or “ inconvenient, especially towards the water-side ;
 “ nor will we suffer any lanes or alleys to be “ erected, but where, upon mature deliberation,
 “ the same shall be found absolutely necessary ;
 “ except such places shall be set aside, which “ shall be designed only for buildings of that “ kind, and from whence no public mischief
 “ may probably arise.

“ The irreparable damage and loss by the late “ fire, being, next to the hand of God in the “ terrible wind, to be imputed to the place in “ which it first broke out, amongst small timber “ houses, standing so close together, that as no “ remedy could be applied from the river for the “ quenching thereof, to the contiguity of the “ buildings, hindering and keeping all possible “ relief from the land side, we do resolve and “ declare, that there shall be a fair key or wharf
 “ on all the river side, that no house shall be “ erected within so many feet of the river, as shall “ be within few days declared in the rules for“ merly mentioned ; nor shall there be in those “ buildings which shall be erected next the river, “ which we desire may be fair structures, for the “ ornament of the city, any houses to be inha“ bited by brewers, or dyers, or sugar-bakers,

 “ which trades by their continual smoke, contri“ bute very much to the unhealthiness of the “ adjacent places ; but we require the Lord-“ mayor and aldermen of London, upon a full “ consideration, and weighing all conveniences
 “ and inconveniences that can be foreseen, to “ propose such a place as may be fit for all those “ trades which are carried on by smoke to habit
 “ together, or at least several places for the se“ veral quarters of the town for those occupa“ tions, and in which they shall find their ac“ count in convenience and profit, as well as “ other places shall receive the benefit in the “ distance of the neighbourhood, it being our “ purpose, that they who exercise those necessa“ ry professions, shall be in all respects as well “ provided for and encouraged as ever they have “ been, and undergo as little prejudice as may “ be, by being less inconvenient to their neigh“ bours.

“ These grounds and foundations being laid,
 “ from the substance whereof we shall not depart,
 “ and which, being published, are sufficient ad“ vertisements to prevent any man’s running-into,
 “ or bringing an inconvenience upon himself,
 “ by a precipitate engagement in any act which “ may cross these foundations, we have, in order
 “ to the reducing this great and glorious design
 “ into practice, directed, and we do hereby direct,
 “ that the Lord-mayor and court of aldermen
 “ do with all possible expedition cause an exact “ survey to be made and taken of the whole “ ruins, occasioned by the late lamentable fire,
 “ to the end that it may appear to whom all the “ houses and ground did in truth belong, what “ term the several occupiers were possessed of ;
 “ and at what rents, and to whom, either corpo“ rations, companies, or single persons, the re“ version and inheritance appertained ; that so “ provision may be made, that though every “ man must not be suffered to erect what build“ ings and where he pleases, he shall not in any “ degree be debarred from receiving the reason“ able benefit of what ought to accrue to him
 “ from such houses or lands ; there be nothing less
 “ in our thoughts, than that any particular per“ son’s right and interest should be sacrificed to
 “ the public benefit or convenience, without such “ recompence as in justice he ought to receive “ for the same. And when all things of this “ kind shall be prepared and adjusted, by such “ commissioners, and otherwise, which shall be “ found expedient, we make no doubt but such “ an act of parliament will pass, as shall secure “ all men in what they shall and ought to “ possess.

“ By the time that this survey shall be taken,
 “ we shall cause a plot or model to be made for
 “ the whole building through those ruined places ;
 “ which being well examined by all those persons “ who have most concernment as well as ex“ perience,

Engraved for Chambers's History of London.

"perience, we make no question, but all men
"will be well pleased with it, and very willingly
"conform to those orders and rules which shall
"be agreed for the pursuing thereof.

"In the mean time we do heartily recom"mend it to the charity and magnanimity of all
"well disposed persons, and we do heartily pray
"unto almighty God, that he will infuse it into
"the hearts of men speedily to endeavour by
"degrees to re-edify some of those many churches
"which in this lamentable fire have been burnt
"down and defaced, that so men may have
"those public places of God's worship to resort
"to, to humble themselves together before him
"upon this heavy displeasure, and join in their "devotion for his future mercy and blessing up-
"on us; and, as soon as we shall be informed
"of any readiness to begin such a good work,
"we shall not only give our assistance and direc"tion for the model of it, and freeing it from
"buildings at too near a distance, but shall en"courage it by our own bounty, and all other
"ways we shall be desired.

"Lastly, that we may encourage men by our "own example, we will use all the expedition we "can to re-build our custom-house, in the place
"where it formerly stood, and enlarge it with the "most conveniences for the merchants that can
"be devised; and, upon all the other lands
"which belong unto us, we shall depart with
"any thing of our own right and benefit, for the "advancement of the public service and beauty
"of the city; and shall further remit, to all "those who shall erect any buildings according "to this declaration, all duties arising to us up-

"on the hearth-money for the space of seven "years.

"Given at our court at Whitehall the thir"teenth day of September, 1666 in the "eighteenth year of our reign."

On the 18th of September, the parliament met, and immediately passed an act for erecting a court of judicature, and for settling all differences between landlords and tenants with respect to houses which had been destroyed by the late fire. At the same time, they appointed the justices of the courts of King's Bench and Common Pleas, and the barons of the exchequer to be judges of the said court. These judges conducted themselves with such impartiality and strict justice, that they obtained the general esteem of the citizens, who, as a testimony of respect, caused their portraits to be hung up in Guildhall.

Soon after an act of parliament passed for re-building the city; in which were laid down rules and directions for the regulation of all persons concerned in re-edifying the city of London.

On the twenty-ninth of April 1667, the common-council, in consequence of the before-men- tioned royal declaration, passed an act, in which they allotted what streets should be enlarged and widened within the said city and liberties thereof. Which act was so highly approved of by his ma- jesty, that on the eighth of May following, he confirmed and enforced the same by an order of council *.

On

* The following is the order made by the Lord-Mayor, al- dermen, and common-council of the city of London, on the twenty-ninth of April.

"It is ordered that the surveyors take special care, that
"the breast-summers of all the houses do range of an equal "height, house with house, so far as shall be convenient,
"and there to make breaks by their directions.

"And that they do encourage and give directions to all
"builders, for ornament sake, that the ornaments and pro"jections of the front-buildings be of rubbed bricks; and
"that all the naked part of the walls may be done of rough
"bricks, neatly wrought, or all rubbed, at the discretion
"of the builder, or that the builders may otherwise enrich
"their fronts as they please.

"That if any person or persons shall desire, in any street
"or lane of note, to build on each side of the street or lane,
"opposite one to the other, six or more houses of the third
"rate, or that the upper rooms or garrets may be flat roofs,
"encompassed with battlements of bricks covered with
"stone, or gable ends, or rails, and bannister of iron or
"stone, or to vary their roofs for the greater ornament of "building; the surveyors, or one of them, shall certify their "opinions therein to the committee for re-building, who "shall have liberty to give leave for the same, if they see "cause.

"That in all the streets no sign-posts shall hang cross, but
"the signs shall be fixed against the balconies, or some other
"convenient part of the side of the house.

"It is ordered that a postern shall be made on the north"side of Newgate, for conveniency of foot passengers, and
"that Holborn-bridge shall be enlarged to run straight on
"a bevil line from the timber house on the north-side there-
"of, known by the sign of the Cock, to the front of the "buildings at the Swann-inn on the said north-side of Hol-
"born-hill.

"Forasmuch as it is provided in the late act for re-build"ing, that the surveyors shall take care for the equal setting
"out of all party-walls and piers, and that no person be "permitted to build till that be done; therefore, for pre"vention of any exaction in the taking of such surveys, and

"of all quarrels and contentions that may arise between the "builders, it is ordered, that no builder shall lay his foun"dation until the surveyors, or one of them, according to
"the act, shall view it, and see the party-walls and piers
"equally set out, and that all persons observe the surveyors
"directions concerning the superstructure to be erected upon
"the said foundation.

"And that for the defraying that and all other incident
"charges of measuring, staking out, taking the level, and "surveying the streets and ground, each builder, before he
"lay his foundation, or such survey shall be taken, do repair
"to the chamber of London, and there enter his name, with
"the place where his building is to be set out, and to pay to
"the chamberlain the sum of six shillings and eight-pence
"for every foundation to be rebuilt. For which Mr. Cham"berlain shall give acquittances upon receipt of which ac-
"quittance the surveyors shall proceed to set out such per"sons foundations.

"And it is ordered, that all persons who have already laid
"any foundations, shall forthwith pay into the chamber of "London, six shillings and eight-pence for every founda"tion.

"And this court is consenting and desirous that all straight
"and narrow passages, which shall be found convenient for "common benefit and accommodation, and shall receive his "majesty's order and approbation, shall and may be en"larged and made wider, and otherwise altered, before the "20th of May now next ensuing, as shall be fitting for the "beauty ornament, and conveniency thereof, and staked
"and set out accordingly.

"Several late inhabitants of Fleet-street, intending to re-
"build their houses, which did formerly stand backward of "other foundations near adjoining, and desiring liberty to "advance their houses, that the whole front may run on a
"a straight line; the committee did agree to the same, if
"the right honourable the lord high chancellor of England
"and the other lords shall approve thereof, and procure his "majesty's approbation to the same: and the committee do
"desire liberty may be given for other persons in other pla"ces where it shall be found convenient.

T t 4

"And

On the fifteenth of November following, the common-council passed another act, for preventing and suppressing of fires within the city of London and its liberties: in which, among other things, they enacted as follows:

“ That the city and liberties thereof shall be divided into four equal parts or quarters. The east part or quarter to contain the wards of Portoken, Aldgate, Tower, Billingsgate, Bridge, Langborn, and Lime-street. The west part or quarter to contain Farringdon Within, Farringdon Without, Castle Baynard, Cheap-side, and Aldersgate. The north part or quarter to contain Cornhill, Broad-street, Coleman-street, Bassishaw, Bishopsgate and Cripplegate. And the south part to contain Queenhithe, Bread-street, Vintry, Cordwainer, Dowgate, Wallbrook, and Candlewick-street.

“ That each of the said quarters shall be provided with eight hundred leathern buckets, fifty ladders of different sizes, from twelve to forty two feet in length; and to each parish forty shod shovels, twenty-four pick-ax-sledges, and two brazen hand-squirts.

“ That thirty buckets, one engine, six pick-ax-sledges, three ladders, and two hand-squirts of brass, be provided and kept in readiness by each of the twelve companies: and that the inferior companies provide buckets and engines in proportion to their respective abilities; the number of which are to be allotted and prescribed, from time to time, by the direction of the Lord-mayor and court of aldermen.

“ That every alderman, who hath passed the office of sheriff, provide twenty-four buckets, and one hand-squirt of brass; and all those who have not been sheriffs, twelve buckets, and one hand-squirt of brass, to be kept at their respective dwellings: and all other principal citizens and inhabitants, and every other person, being a subsidy-man, or of the degree of a subsidy-man, shall provide and keep in their houses a certain number of buckets, according to their quality.

“ That every householder, upon any cry of fire, shall place a sufficient man at his door, well armed, and hang out a light at his door, if in the night; upon default whereof, every party offending shall forfeit twenty shillings.

“ That every inhabitant procure some secure place in their dwellings (not under or near any stair-case) to lay in their seacoal-ashes, embers, or any other sort of fire-ashes; and that the said ashes be quenched with water every night before they go to bed: and that all constables make enquiry of the security of hearths, ovens, and stoves, and places for laying fire-ashes in, twice every year.

“ That plugs be put into the pipes in the most convenient places of every street.

“ That the several companies of carpenters, bricklayers, plaisterers, painters, masons, smiths, plumbers, and paviors, do yearly, for each company, elect two master-workmen, four journeymen, eight apprentices, and sixteen labourers, to be ready, upon all occasions of fire, to attend the Lord-mayor and sheriffs for quenching the same; and that all workmen and labourers, belonging to any public water-works within the city, the seacoal meters, porters, Blackwell-hall porters, Leadenhall porters, ticket-porters, and package porters, do constantly attend the Lord-mayor and sheriffs for the said purpose.

“ That all persons, except such as are employed or allowed by the Lord-mayor or sheriffs, aldermen, deputies, or common-councilmen, do keep, during the time of any fire, within their own houses, till they are summoned to attend, that the streets may be kept clear from disorder and confusion.

“ That where any fire happens, the constables and watchmen of that ward shall immediately assemble at such place, and there attend on, and follow the directions of the Lord-mayor and sheriffs.

“ That all brokers on the Exchange, according to their obligation at their admittance, do attend, in order to take care of such goods and household-stuff as may be removed.

“ That no person whatever be permitted, at any time, to make, or cause to be made, any sort of fire-works, within the city or liberties thereof, except such persons only as shall be thereunto appointed by his majesty, or any other lawful authority.

“ That no person lay hemp, flax, wax, gun-powder, pitch, tar, rosin, brimstone, or the like combustible commodities, in any cellar, warehouse, or other place, on that side next the street, which, by the shaking of links, torches, or casting in of other fire at the windows next the street, may be in danger of such fire.”

In the year 1668, the Lord-mayor issued a precept to prevent immoralities, prophanation of the Lord's-day, drunkenness, and gaming; and for suppressing rogues, vagrants, and sturdy-beggars. And, in conformity to a late act of parliament, the citizens were ordered to keep the streets before their houses and ground, duly paved and swept, and to preserve their dirt in tubs or baskets, till the coming of the raker, on pain of forfeiting three shillings and fourpence; and that they should not suffer any ashes, dirt, or other filth, to lay before their doors, on the penalty of five shillings, nor before their neighbour's, or any church, church-yard, or other public place or building, on the penalty of twenty shillings; and that the inhabitants should duly hang and keep out their candles lighted to the accustomed hour; and the constables should sit and continue their

“ And it is ordered, that the committee for rebuilding do present the particulars aforesaid to the right honourable the lord high chancellor of England and the other lords, and that the same, if they receive his majesty's approbation, shall be forthwith printed and published.

“ Which being this day represented to the board by the “ right honourable the lord high chancellor of England, the same was allowed and approved of; and it was ordered that the same be punctually observed in every part thereof. And all persons concerned are required and commanded to yield due obedience, and conform themselves therunto.”

watches

watches at such time as had been directed and appointed by former acts of common-council.

In the year 1669, on the eighth of September, the common-council passed an act for abolishing the market, which had been kept in Aldersgate-street, and for establishing Newgate-market, Honey-lane-market, and the market at Woolchurch. And,

The following year the parliament enacted, that, exclusive of the streets which had already been appointed to be widened, the following should also be enlarged: Pater-noster-row, Warwick-lane, Watling-street, Candlewick-street, Eastcheap, Swithin's-lane, Little Wood-street, Milk-street, Tower-street, Water-lane, in Tower-street, Rood-lane, St. Mary-hill, Thames-street, from London-bridge to Puddle-dock, Pye-corner, and Threadneedle-street. That the sum of one shilling per chaldron on coals, which had been granted to the Lord-mayor and citizens, for the term of seventeen years and five months, not being found sufficient, for the accomplishment of the said works, the same should be increased to three shillings per chaldron; and that the sole power for regulating and paving the streets of the city of London, and making and cleansing drains and sewers shall remain in the mayor, commonalty, and citizens, to be executed by such persons as the mayor, aldermen, and common-council shall appoint.

The commissioners of the sewers, in consequence of these powers granted them by parliament, did, on the first of March 1670, publish an act of common-council, which had been made the twenty-seventh of October preceding. In this act, they appointed a lay-stall in Whitechapel-road, leading to Mile-end, now called White-chapel Mount; others contiguous to Dowgate-dock, to Puddle-dock, and to Whitefriars-dock; and after having summed up the ancient customs and other statutes relative to the paving and cleansing the streets and lanes in the city of London, they appointed the following rules, orders, and directions:

1. That hereafter all streets within this city, called, known, or set down to be high streets, shall be paved round or causeway fashion, and, upon notice given to the commissioners of any defective pavements in any of the streets, lanes, and passages within this city and liberties, the same shall be forthwith made good and amended, unless by general consent some better expedient be found and published.

2. That inasmuch as it hath been found by common experience, that the paviors, to hide and cover their bad workmanship, have oftentimes spread and laid great quantities of gravel over their pavements, to greater charge to the persons setting them on work than was needful, and which, upon a sudden rain, did either choak the common sewers, or turn to dirt and mire in the streets; therefore the said paviors are required, that hereafter they do forbear to lay or spread any more gravel on the pavements than will only fill up the joints of their work, and cause the same to be swept and well rammed, and leave the pavements bare of gravel, and keep a regular method of paving, not paving one door higher than another, upon pain of paying five shillings for every complaint.

3. That the breadth of six feet at the least, from the foundation of the houses in such of the said high streets which shall be allowed to be posted, shall be paved by the inhabitants or owners with flat or broad stone for a foot-passage, unless such parts thereof as shall lie before any gate-way, which may be done with square rag by the said breadth of six feet, upon pain of paying five shillings for every week the same shall be omitted to be done after notice given.

4. That every person, having occasion to rebuild or repair any house or houses fronting any street, lane, or common passage, do first procure licence of Mr. Chamberlain, for the time being, to board in a piece of ground before his building, within which to lay his materials for building, or in default, shall pay forty shillings, and twenty shillings for every week's omission so to do.

5. That a fall or cist-pool, of convenient bigness, shall be made and continued to every grate of the common sewer within this city and liberties, to receive the sand or gravel coming to the same, so to prevent the choaking thereof: and upon complaint at any time made of the want, decay, or defect thereof, the commissioners will forthwith cause the same to be made or amended.

6. That the fellowship of carmen of this city, having undertaken for one year, to commence from the first of January, 1671, to sweep and cleanse the streets, lanes, and common passages, within the said city and liberties, from dung, soil, filth, and dirt, and to carry the same, together with what shall be brought out of the houses of the inhabitants, unto certain lay-stalls appointed or that shall be appointed, by the said commissioners for the time being, the several persons by them employed in and about this affair, whose names, places of abode, number of tunbrils or carts, and the wards to which they are respectively designed, are hereafter set down, or such others as, by death or removal of any of them, shall be employed therein, shall keep, observe, and follow the rules and orders hereafter following, viz.

7. That they, their agents, or servants, shall come out with their tunbrils, or carts and horses, on Mondays, Tuesdays, Wednesdays, Thursdays, and Fridays, in every week of the year, from the eleventh of October, to the eleventh of February, by five of the clock every morning of the same days, and not continue and remain in the streets, lanes, or passages, after the hour of nine of the clock the same morning; and from the eleventh of February, to the 11th of October to come out, as aforesaid, by four of the clock every morning of the same day, and not to continue or remain in the streets, lanes, or passages, after the hour of seven of the clock the same morning; and upon every Saturday in the year to come out as aforesaid, by two of the clock in the afternoon of the same day, to remain and continue till night, if need be: and within the hours and times aforesaid, shall cleanse all the streets, lanes and passages, every man within his or their respective divisions, from its soil, filth, and dirt, by sweeping of the same, and carrying it away, together with what what shall be brought out of the houses of the inhabitants to the lay-stalls appointed, or that shall be appointed, upon pain to forfeit, for every offence, twenty shillings.

8. That the several inhabitants within this city and liberties, or their servants, do take care that the dirt, ashes, and soil of their houses be in readiness for the carmen, their agents or servants, either by setting out the same over night in tubs, boxes, baskets, or other vessels, near and contiguous to their houses, or by bringing out the same within convenient time before the hours for their departure as aforesaid.

9. That the said carmen, their agents, or servants, in their several wards or divisions, with the assistance of the servants of the inhabitants who are hereby directed to give such assistance, shall, in times of frost or snow, daily employ themselves in the opening of the channels, and heaping up the ice and snow, that so the passages may be cleared; and, upon a thaw of the same, that all the soil and filth found in the streets, lanes, and passages, be carried away, upon pain of ten shillings for every day's omission.

10. That no person whatsoever do presume to cast out any soil, horse-dung, or filth, or carry the same into any street, lane, or common passage, after the hours aforesaid, either by night or by day, upon the penalty that the person offending, if known, (and if a servant, his or her master or mistress) shall forfeit and pay five shillings, and if not known, the party against whose house the same shall be found, having been laid there in the day-time after the hours is mentioned, shall forfeit one shilling, which said several forfeitures shall be paid, the one moiety to the discoverer, and the other to the carman or carmen appointed to cleanse that ward wherein the offence shall be committed.

11. That the several tunbrils or carts, employed or to be employed in this work, shall be marked or numbered according to the number of carts appointed for each ward, upon the penalty of two shillings for every load carried without such mark.

12. That the several carmen, undertakers in this affair, shall set upon the fore-part of his tunbril or cart, open and plain to view, a board, whereon to be painted the city arms, the ward to which he or they are appointed, and the mark or number of his tunbril or cart, upon the penalty of paying three shillings and four-pence a day for want thereof, which said marking is to betoken the allowance of the commissioners, and to caution the inhabitants from employing of foreign carts.

13. That the said carmen, undertakers, their agents or servants, shall give notice of their being in the streets with their tunbrils or carts, by loudly knocking a wooden clapper, especially in courts, allies, and other back passages, upon pain to forfeit three shillings and four-pence upon every complaint duly proved.

14. That the said carmen, their agents or servants, do take care that the falls or cest-pools, belonging to any grate within their respective wards, be once in every week, or oftner if need require, cleansed of its dirt and filth, and the same carried away, upon pain to forfeit five shillings for every complaint duly proved.

15. That the aforesaid carmen, their agents or servants, and no other, shall also carry away, to the lay-stalls aforesaid, all such soil, dirt, and dung, (rubbish or earth excepted) that shall be made or found in any of the houses or stables of any inn-keeper, livery-stable-keeper, brewer, dyer, sugar-baker, rope-maker or other trader or inhabitant within any the wards to which they are respectively appointed and designed; for which such quarterly allowance (over and above the customary rates by the scavengers book) shall be made by the assessors of each ward according to their best discretion, respect being had to the trade, or other occasions, in the making of more or less dung and soil by such traders or inhabitants.

16. That the aforesaid carmen, their agents or servants, and no other, shall take up and carry away, to such persons or places as will receive the same, all such rubbish or earth that shall be made or found within their respective wards or divisions; for which there shall be paid them by the owners or proprietors thereof one shilling per load, and no more, provided they carry it away within one day after notice given for the convenience of the owners, and to avoid complaint of them, upon pain that the person, offending in either of these cases, shall pay two shillings per load.

17. That no other tunbril or cart than what is or shall be appointed and allowed by the said commissioners, for doing the works aforesaid, shall be employed, or shall intermeddle with the carrying of any soil, rubbish, earth, dung, paving stones, Thames-gravel, or the like, within this city or liberties, bricks or tiles from the water-side within the said city and liberties, upon pain to pay, to the carman or carmen employed in cleansing the streets, as aforesaid, of the ward where this offence shall be committed, two shillings for every load so taken up, or carried in a tunbril or cart; and for non-payment that such tunbril or cart shall be carried to the city's pound, called the Greenyard, and there remain till payment thereof. Provided, that if any of the said carmen shall not, immediately after notice, employ himself in carrying the said materials, to forfeit and pay two shillings for every load thereof, and the owners at liberty to employ foreign carts.

18. That no coachman, carman, carter, drayman, or other person, shall feed his or their horse or horses with hay or grains in the streets, lanes, or common passages, within this city and liberties, upon pain to forfeit and pay, for every offence, two shillings and six-pence over and above the like sum formerly imposed and to be paid to the governors of Christ's-hospital; the one moiety to the discoverer and prosecutor, and the other to the carman or carmen of the ward in which the said offence shall be committed; and, in case of non-payment, to carry the horse or horses to the city's pound, called the Greenyard, there to remain till payment thereof.

19. That none of the aforesaid carmen, their agents or servants, or other person or persons, do sweep the filth or soil of the streets, lanes, or passages, into any of the channels of this city, in time time of rain or otherwise, upon pain to pay six shillings and eight-pence for every complaint duly proved.

20. That no man shall cast or lay in the streets, lanes, common passages or channels, within this city or liberties, any dogs, cats, inwards of beasts, cleaves of beasts feet, bones, horns, dregs or dross of ale or beer, or any noisom thing, upon pain of ten shillings for every offence.

21. That no man set a tunbril, car or cart, in the street by night-time upon pain to pay two shillings, besides satisfaction to any person hurt thereby.

22. That no man do ride or drive a tunbril, car, cart, or dray, a troe in the street, or sit on any part of the car, cart, tunbril, or dray, (unless another skilful person lead the horse) upon pain to forfeit and pay two shillings; in case of non-payment to carry the horse to the pound, as afore-said, to remain till payment thereof.

23. That no waggon, car or cart, shod with iron or spignails, or having more horses than are allowed by the afore-said act of common-council, shall take up any goods within this city or liberties, to carry for hire about the streets, upon pain to pay five shillings for every offence; and, in case of non-payment, to carry the horse or horses to the afore-said pound till payment thereof.

24. That no gounge-fermer shall carry any ordure till after ten o'clock in the winter, and eleven o'clock in the summer at night, nor shall spill any ordure in the streets, upon pain to forfeit and pay thirteen shillings and four-pence.

25. That no pudding-cart or shambles shall go out till after the hours last before mentioned, upon pain to forfeit six shillings and eight-pence.

26. That no artificer, labourer, or other person, shall make any stop or dam in any channel, nor shall flake any lime in the streets, lanes, or passages, upon pain to pay two shillings for every offence.

27. That no man shall feed any kine, goats, hogs, or any kind of poultry, in the open streets, upon pain to forfeit three shillings and four-pence for every offence.

28. That no man shall cast into the ditches or sewers, grates or gulleys, of the city, any manner of carrion, stinking flesh, rotten oranges or onions, rubbish, dung, sand, gravel, or any other thing that may stop the course of the same, upon pain of forfeiting forty shillings for every offence.

29. That no man shall make or continue any widraught, seat or seats for houses of easement over, or drains into, any of the common sewers, without licence of the commissioners for the time being, upon pain to forfeit forty shillings and forty shillings a month for so long time as the same shall be continued after warning.

30. That no person or persons do presume to keep any lay-stall for dung, rubbish, earth, or other soil, either at the water-side or other place within this city or liberties, other than the common or public lay-stalls appointed, or to be set out and appointed by the said commissioners for the time being, upon pain to forfeit and pay two pounds thirteen shillings and four-pence, and forty shillings a week for every week he or they shall so continue to do after warning, or be indicted from time to time as a common nuisance.

31. That no tyler, bricklayer, or other person, do throw out of gutters, or off roofs or other parts of houses, any tiles, loam, or rubbish, into any street, lane, or common passage, but do bring down the same in baskets or trays, upon pain to forfeit three shillings and four-pence for every offence.

32. That no person or persons do set out, in the streets, lanes, or passages, any hogheads, barrels, or other casks or vessels, to hoop, wash or dry, or otherwise incumber the passage, upon pain to forfeit and pay twenty shillings for every offence.

33. That the dung, mud, filth, and soil of the wards of Billingsgate, Bridge, Langborn, Cornhill, Candlewick, Wallbrook, Vintry, and Dowgate, shall be carried down to the lay-stall at Dowgate-dock; of the ward of Portoken, Tower, Aldgate, Duke's-place and Lime-street, to the lay-stall set out at Mile-end; of the ward of Bishopsgate, within and without, to the lay-stall at Holloway-lane end, being part of a meadow there belonging to the city; of the ward of Cripplegate within and without, Aldersgate without, Bassishaw, Coleman-street, and Broad-street, to the lay-stall at Bun-hill; of the wards of Cheap, Cordwainer, Queenhithe, and Bread-street, to the lay-stall at or near Three-cranes, and in Dung-hill-lane near Broken wharf, until such time as the publick wharf or key at the river-side shall be laid open, and afterwards to the lay-stall at Puddle-dock; of the wards of Farringdon within, Castle-baynard, Aldersgate within, and St. Martin's-le-grand, to the lay-stall at Puddle-dock; of the ward of Farringdon without to the lay-stall at White-friars; and this course to be used, until the commissioners shall see cause to alter the same; and whoso shall offend herein shall forfeit and pay five shillings for every offence.

34. That the carmen undertakers, their agents or servants, shall have liberty to carry rubbish from any parts of the city or liberties into the vineyard near Aldgate, for levelling the same, till the first of May next, and to shoot the same there gratis, and after that time to pay such sum, for what they there shoot as the commissioners shall require.

35. That inasmuch as the said carmen have undertaken to do this work in better manner and to greater satisfaction than heretofore hath been done, and the commissioners believing, from what they have already observed, that they will accordingly perform the same, do therefore exhort all persons, that shall be rated towards this work, willingly and readily to pay the same, so to prevent trouble to themselves, and discouragement to the said carmen in a work of this nature, so requisite and necessary to the health and trade of the inhabitants of this city.

36. That the several pains and penalties before-mentioned, not particularly expressed to whom to be paid, shall be paid into the chamber of London, upon summons or warning by the officers attending the commissioners, or either of them; or in default, the offender or offenders to be indicted at the sessions for his or their respective offences.

U u u

37. That

37. That if any of the aforesaid carmen, their agents or servants, do offend in any of the particulars aforesaid, or otherwise relating to this affair, that complaint be made thereof to the commissioners at the Guildhall, who will deal with them according to their offences.

38. That the scavengers for the time being, in the several wards or precincts within the city and liberties, do take care, either by their own observations or complaints made to them by any of the inhabitants, that the said carmen their agents or servants, do accordingly perform the several branches afore-mentioned to them relating, or to make complaint thereof to the commissioners, upon pain that the said scavengers shall from time to time, for their negligence, or remissness, be indicted at the sessions, unless they shall submit to the censure and judgment of the said commissioners for the time being.

The tythes of the city having been very unequally levied, the parliament, in the year 1671, enacted, that instead thereof, the parishioners of the underwritten respective parishes should pay to their ministers annually the following sums:

	£
Allhallows, Lombard-street	110
St. Bartholomew, Exchange	100
St. Bridget or St. Bride's	120
St. Benet Finck	100
St. Michael's, Crooked-lane	100
St. Christopher's	120
St. Dionis Back-church	120
St. Dunstan in the East	200
St. James, Garlick-hithe	100
St. Michael, Cornhill	140
St. Margaret, Lothbury	100
St. Michael, Bassishaw	132 11s.
St. Mary, Aldermanbury	150
St. Martin, Ludgate	160
St. Peter's, Cornhill,	110
St. Stephen, Coleman-street	110
St. Sepulchre's	200
Allhallows, Breadstreet }	140
St. John Evangelist }
Allhallows the Great }	200
Allhallows the Less }
St. Alban's, Wood-street }	170
St. Olave's Silver-street }
St. Anne, St. Agnes, and }	140
St. John Zachary's }
St. Augustine and St. Faith	172
St. Andrew Wardrobe }	140
St. Ann, Black-friars }
St. Antholine }	120
St. John Baptist }
St. Benet's, Grace-church }	140
St. Leonard, Eastcheap }
St. Benet, Paul's wharf }	100
St. Peter, Paul's wharf }
Christ's-church }	200
St. Leonard Foster lane }
St. Edmund the King }	180
St. Nicholas Acons }
St. George, Botolph-lane }
St. Botolph, Billingsgate }

	£
St. Lawrence, Jury	120
St. Mary Magdalen, Milk-street }
St. Magnus }	170
St. Margaret, New Fish-street }
St. Michael Royal }	140
St. Martin Vintry }
St. Matthew Friday-street }	150
St. Peter cheap }
St. Margaret Pattens, }	120
St. Gabriel Fenchurch }
St. Mary at Hill }	200
St. Andrew Hubbard }
St. Mary Woolnorth }	160
St. Mary Woolchurch }
St. Clement Eastcheap }	140
St. Martin's Ogars }
St. Mary Abchurch }	120
St. Laurence Poultny }
St. Mary Aldermay }	150
St. Thomas Apostle's }
St. Mary le Bow }	200
St. Pancrass Soper-lane }
Allhallows, Honey-lane }	170
St. Mildred Poultry }
St. Mary Colechurch }	100
St. Michael, Woodstreet }
St. Mary Staining }	130
St. Mildred, Bread-street }
St. Margaret Moses }	160
St. Michael, Queenhithe }
Trinity }	120
St. Mary Magdalen, Old fish-street }
St. Gregory }	110
St. Mary Somerset }
St. Mary Mounthaw }	130
St. Nicholas Cole-abbey }
St. Nicholas Olave's }	120
St. Olave Jewry, }
St. Martin, Ironmonger-lane }	100
St. Stephen, Walbrook }
St. Bennet, Sherehog }	140
St. Swithin }
St. Mary Bothaw }	160
St. Vedast, alias Foster's }
St. Michael le Quern }

Notwithstanding this act the clergy suffered greatly by many of the houses in the respective parishes standing untenanted. This, however, was adjusted by lord-chancellor Harcourt, assisted by Mr. Baron Bury and Mr. Baron Price, on the 24th of December, 1713, who decreed, that the sums assessed pursuant to this act became a real charge upon the houses, buildings, and other hereditaments whereupon they were so assessed, and that arrears might be levied by distress and sale of the goods of the present occupiers, which shall be found in or upon the said premises.

On the seventeenth of September 1674, the common-council, for the better regulation of public markets, enacted, that any country person, not keeping shop, in or within two miles of London, may sell openly in each market, all sorts of butchery, poultry, and other country provisions, on Mondays, Wednesdays, Fridays, and and Saturdays. That a bell, in each respective market, shall ring thrice every day; and if any person sell, or expose to sale, any of the aforesaid goods before the first bell rings, he shall be proceeded against as a foreteller; or, if he sells, or exposes to sale any goods after the last bell has rung, he shall forfeit twenty shillings for each offence.

The market being principally intended for the benefit and advantage of housekeepers, and others, who buy for their own use, to be spent in their families, the common-council farther enacted, that if any retailer or trader in this city, who buys to sell again, do come into any of the said markets, to buy, or cause to be brought, or carry away, or cause to be carried away, any of the provisions brought into the market to be sold, to his, her, or their respective houses or shops before the ringing of the bell, at ten o'clock in the forenoon, such offenders shall, for every offence, forfeit and pay the sum of forty shillings.

On the twenty-ninth of October 1675; the Lord-mayor magnificently entertained his majesty at Guildhall, where he was most graciously pleased to accept the freedom of the city, from the hands of Sir Thomas Player, the chamberlain. In consequence of this, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council, willing to testify their sense of his majesty's superior condescension to any of his progenitors, waited on him in the banqueting-house at Whitehall, on the eighteenth of December following, when the Lord-mayor, on his knees, presented his majesty with a copy of his freedom, in a large square box of massy gold, and the seal thereof inclosed in another box of the same metal, beautifully enriched with large diamonds of great value, which his majesty accepted of, with many expressions of great kindness to the city.

In the year 1676, the common-council, being composed of many persons, whose characters did not redound to the honour of that respectable body, it was ordered, by the Lord-mayor and aldermen, on the twelfth of December, that the precepts to be issued for holding of wardmotes, require, that no person be chosen a common-councilman, who has been convicted of defrauding in weights, measures, or such like crimes, nor any person who has compounded, through inability, to pay his debts.

The following year, in the month of October, the marriage was concluded between William, prince of Orange, and the princess Mary, eldest daughter to the Duke of York. This news no sooner reached the city, than it was proclaimed in all parts by ringing of bells, firing of guns, and every other mark which could demonstrate universal satisfaction.

In the year 1678, his majesty granted a charter for erecting a corporation for the relief of poor widows and children of clergymen, in which was set forth, that they should be a body politic and corporate, with perpetual succession, and power to purchase and hold lands, to the value of two thousand pounds per annum, subject to the visitation of the archbishop of Canterbury, Lord chancellor, archbishop of York, lord keeper of the great seal, lord high treasurer, bishop of London, lord almoner, and Lord-mayor of London, to settle all differences about the government thereof, and the disposition of their revenues.

The following year, about the beginning of May, the citizens discovered a horrid conspiracy formed by the jesuits and other papists, for destroying the city of London a second time by fire. One Elizabeth Oxley, a servant in Fetter-lane, having set fire to her master's house, was apprehended and committed to prison; when she confessed the fact, and declared, that she had been hired to do it by one Stubbs, a papist, who was to give her five pounds as a reward. Stubbs being immediately secured, confessed that he had persuaded her to it; but that he himself had been prevailed on by one father Gifford, his confessor, who assured him, that instead of its being a sin, it would be a great service to the church, to burn and destroy all the houses of heretics; saying that he had conversed many times on that affair with Gifford and two Irishmen. And the maid and Stubbs jointly declared, that the papists intended to rise in London, in expectation of being assisted by a powerful army from France. Soon after a prosecution was commenced against many of the jesuits for the above plot, and five of them were convicted and executed; and the king issued a proclamation for banishing all papists from the city of London, and ten miles of the same.

This wicked plot so highly incensed the citizens of London against the papists, that on the seventeenth of November, being the annual solemnity of burning the pope, they were determined to shew their abhorrence to popery; by celebrating the day with peculiar pomp and magnificence. For which purpose, the procession began with a person on horseback, personating Sir Edmundbury Godfrey; (who was murdered by the papists for being too active in discovering their late atrocious crimes) attended by a bell-man, proclaiming his execrable murder; then went a large silver cross, followed by priests in copes; after these Carmelites and Grey-friars; followed by six jesuits; then proceeded divers waiters; and after them several bishops, some with lawn sleeves, and others adorned with copes and mitres: next went six cardinals, who preceded the pope, enthroned in a stately pageant, attended by a great number of boys with pots of incense, and the devil whiffling in his ear. About five o'clock in the evening, they marched in this order from Bishopsgate to Fleet-street, where they committed his holiness to the flames; in the presence of an innumerable multitude of spectators.

On the tenth of May 1680, a most violent storm of hail fell in this city and its neighbourhood, which did incredible damage; the stones whereof were of such prodigious size, that many of them measured above nine inches in circumference.

Although the citizens received and entertained the duke of York on his arrival from Scotland, with great respect, yet the influence his highness had in the cabinet, and over the king, his brother, deprived him by degrees of the hearts and affections of the Londoners, who were determined;

ed, for the future, to chuse such sheriffs as were proof against the corruption of the court, and who would not suffer traitors to escape, as had been lately done by several juries, to serve the interest of the popish faction. For this purpose, on Midsummer-day following, the citizens, in the interest of their country, put up and supported Slingsby Bethel and Henry Cornish, in opposition to Box and Nicholson, who were offered by the court; the former of whom, having obtained a very considerable majority, and a poll being demanded in behalf of the latter, a tumult ensued, which was improved by the Lord-mayor, and other devotees to the duke of York, into a riot; who representing it to the king in the most aggravating manner, his majesty, the same evening, issued out a commission for trying the rioters. This, however, was so far from deterring the anti-courtiers, that they supported the country interest with greater spirit, and not only pursued all measures for a vigorous prosecution against the popish conspirators, but likewise for excluding the duke of York.

His majesty, to prevent their proceeding in the enquiry into the popish plot, and in the bill of exclusion, prorogued the parliament on the tenth of January, which so greatly affected the citizens of London, that on the thirteenth following, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council, presented a petition to his majesty, representing the prejudice it would be to him and the nation, should the parliament's enquiry into the late plot be stopped and prevented; and the bad consequences that must attend their being disenabled to proceed against chief justice Scroggs, and other judges, impeached for treason. That, as the welfare of the city, the protestant religion, and tranquillity of the nation, were greatly endangered thereby, they most humbly prayed, that his majesty would be pleased to permit the parliament to sit from the day to which they were prorogued.

This petition so highly offended his majesty, that instead of complying with their request, he immediately dissolved the parliament; and writs being issued out for a new election, the citizens applied themselves so diligently, that notwithstanding the greatest efforts used by the court-party to oppose them, they carried their election with a high hand, in favour of their late four worthy representatives, to whom the citizens immediately gave the following instructions: first, "thanking them for their faithful and unwearied endeavours, in the two last parliaments, to search into and discover the design of the popish plot, to preserve his majesty's royal person, the protestant religion, and the well established government of this realm, to secure the meeting and sitting of frequent parliaments, to assert our undoubted rights of petitioning, and to punish such as have betrayed those rights; to promote the long-wished-for union of his majesty's protestant subjects, to repeal the thirty-fifth of Elizabeth, and the corporation act, and more especially for their assiduous endeavours in promoting the bill of exclusion of James duke of York." And concluded thus: "that being confidently assured, that the said members for the city will never consent to the granting any money supply, till they have effectually secured them against popery and arbitrary power, they resolved, by God's assistance, to stand by their said members with their lives and fortunes."

In the year 1681, on the nineteenth of May, the common-council, (to prevent abuses, which had been discovered in the weighing of goods and merchandize at the kings beam, to the prejudice of the freemen of London) enacted, "that an abatement shall be made of the ancient duties and rates, unto all persons that shall be sellers to the freemen of the said city, viz. That a freeman buying of a non-freeman's goods sold by weight, shall be acquitted of the fourth part of the duties and rates which have been paid by the freeman buyer thereof." They likewise further enacted, "that the weigh-house should be for the future in Little Eastcheap, and that it should be the market for hops of English growth brought into London."

On the fifteenth of October following another act of common-council passed, in which it was enacted, "that every car, cart or caroon, shall have the arms of the city of London on its shaft, and a piece of brass with the number engraven on it; and that those who shall work unlicensed carrs shall, for every offence, pay thirteen shillings and four-pence."

About this time the duke of York's picture in Guildhall being very much cut and mangled by some person unknown, (which was looked upon by the York faction as an act of the city) the Lord-mayor and aldermen, to remove the imputation of it, offered a reward of five hundred pounds for discovering the perpetrator.

Soon after this the duke was invited by the artillery company to their annual feast at Merchant-taylor's-hall; which, as their captain-general he accepted of; and at the time prefixed, attended by a great number of the nobility, and other personages, he was there entertained in a very splendid and elegant manner. But the citizens, who were more active against popery, and a popish succession, and, as it were, in opposition to the abovementioned entertainment, appointed a public meeting, with a sermon and a dinner, as is usual among public societies; and the guests were invited by a ticket to the following purport: "It having pleased Almighty God, by his wonderful providence, to deliver and protect his majesty's person, the protestant religion, and English liberties, hitherto, from the hellish and frequent attempts of their enemies the papists; in testimony of thankfulness herein, and for preserving and improving mutual love and charity among such as are sensible thereof, you are desired to meet many of the loyal protestant nobility, gentry, clergy, and citizens, on Friday the twenty-first inst. April 1682, at ten of the clock, at St. Michael's church, in Cornhill, there to hear a sermon, and from thence to go to Haberdasher's-hall to dinner, and to bring this ticket with you." This amicable proposition being represented to the king and council, in a most dangerous light, on the nineteenth of the said month, they issued out an order, strictly charging and commanding them, as they should answer the contrary at their peril, "To take immediate

"mediate and effectual care to prevent and hinder the said meeting, as an unlawful assembly."

Party-matter running very high, each side exerted themselves to secure the sheriffs of London and Middlesex in their interest. And the Lord-mayor, who was a tool to the court, insisted on his right of nominating one, by the ceremony of drinking to a fellow-citizen; and accordingly, at the Bridge-house feast, on the eighteenth of May, his lordship was pleased to pass the compliment of drinking to Dudley North, Esq; a ceremony, by which the person so drank to, has been looked upon as put in nomination, or to be, in the judgment of the chair, a very fit man to be one of the sheriffs, if he shall be elected by the common-hall.

In consequence of this nomination, Mr. North, before he was chosen by the common-hall, and indeed a considerable time before the election, came to a court of aldermen, and gave bond to hold sheriff. After which, the Lord-mayor issued forth his precept to the several companies in the following unaccustomed manner:

"By the MAYOR.

"These are to acquaint you, that at Midsummer-day next, being the day appointed, as well for confirmation of the person who hath been by me chosen, according to the ancient custom and constitution of the city, to be one of the sheriffs of this city and county of Middlesex, for the year ensuing, as for the election of the other of the said sheriffs, and other officers, you cause the livery of your company to meet together at your common-hall, early in the morning, and from thence to come together, decently and orderly in their gowns, to Guildhall, there to make the said confirmation and election. Given the nineteenth of June, 1682.

"JOHN MOOR."

This precept occasioned great distraction among the companies; some issuing out summons to their members to meet and choose sheriffs, &c. as anciently: others after this new mode, for confirmation and election; and some only, for electing city officers. However, on the twenty-third of June the matter being taken into debate at the court of aldermen, after some time it was desired, that Mr. recorder would deliver his sentiment; who, in a judicious speech, gave his opinion, that the right of election of both the sheriffs lay in the commonalty; and that the sheriffs, pro tempore, were judges of the poll, if any were, and the whole court acquiesced therein. On which some companies, who had sent out summons for confirmation and election, awarded new ones only for election.

The appointed time for choice being arrived, the livery assembled very numerous in common-hall. And after the Lord-mayor and aldermen were arrived on the hustings, the common-crier made proclamation, and said to this purpose: "you gentlemen of the livery of London attend your confirmation." On which the common-hall vigorously interrupted, and cried, "no confirmation! no confirmation!" and continued to urge their right in that behalf near half an hour, not suffering him to go on. Mr. recorder then stepped on the hustings, and made a speech; in which he set forth the excellency of government in general, and the happiness particularly of our own, and especially of this great and opulent city, more immediately as to their great privilege of choosing their own sheriffs, citing for the same, the grant of the charter of king John, &c. After this the Lord-mayor and aldermen withdrew, and Mr. common serjeant offering to speak, the common-hall cried, "election! election!" and the work of the day!" but the sheriffs desiring their patience, he went on and spake a few words relating in general to the business of the day.

The hall then proceeded in the usual ancient method, and the contest about confirmation being relinquished, there were put in nomination for sheriffs the before named Dudley North, Thomas Papillion, John Dubois, and Ralph Box, esquires. On a view of the hands the election was declared to fall upon Mr. Papillion and Mr. Dubois, they having apparently the majority by one thousand or twelve hundred hands. However, a poll was demanded and granted for all the said four candidates.

About three o'clock the poll began; previous to which eight or nine books and writers were prepared in Guildhall-yard, and persons to inspect them on either side. Some desired that a distinct column might be adapted for such as were for confirmation; but that being before resolved in the negative, and the only dispute now not being for or against confirmation, but which two of the four gentlemen should be chosen by the common-hall for sheriffs, the same was refused as impracticable and impertinent; but all left at liberty to poll for which of the four competitors they pleased.

The choice appearing likely to fall on Papillion and Dubois, many that were for North and Box applied themselves to the Lord-mayor, suggesting, as if they were denied to poll, and that many of their party were absent, and the like complaints; occasioned his lordship's coming to the hall; where, sending for the sheriffs into the council-chamber, they excused themselves for the present, being busy in the work of the day, but promised to wait on his lordship as soon as the poll was over. His lordship went to the polling place, and seemed to forbid their farther proceeding; but the sheriffs offered several reasons why they ought to go on; being in the legal discharge of their office, and so continued the poll.

The mayor, and some few aldermen came to the hustings about seven o'clock in the evening, where the common-crier, by direction from his lordship, spoke to the company in the hall to the following purpose: "All you that were summoned to appear here this day, are required to depart, and to give your attendance on Tuesday at nine o'clock in the morning." The occasion not being mentioned, some of the people asked, for what? but the generality called "a poll! a poll!" His lordship going soon after; the sheriffs continued the poll as before, intending, for the ease of their fellow citizens; to have dispatched it that night; but it growing near nine o'clock, and there being some small number of persons

X x x

persons who then unseasonably demanded to be polled, the sheriffs thought proper to adjourn for half an hour into the hall: in which time there were assembled in the great-hall three or four thousand people, calling out, "a hall! a hall!" till the sheriffs came upon the hustings; one of whom spoke as follows: "Gentlemen, we have had a poll to day, and we the sheriffs, as we are the king's ministers, so we have done and will act therein with all fairness and honesty, as becomes us. My Lord-mayor hath taken upon him to adjourn this court: but we do now tell you, that we do adjourn the court until Tuesday morning nine o'clock, then to declare the poll, or to poll any such as have right to poll, and have not yet polled already." After which the sheriffs went home, attended by a great concourse of citizens, who followed them with loud and grateful acclamations of "God bless the protestant sheriffs, God bless Papillion and Dubois, &c."

The Lord mayor, however, made complaint to the king and council of his having been insulted: on which he, together with the aldermen and sheriffs were ordered to attend the privy-council on the Monday following: when Mr. Pilkington and Mr. Shute, the sheriffs and alderman Cornish, were committed prisoners to the Tower by warrant signed by twenty-four privy-counsellors; who, at the same time gave orders to the attorney-general to prosecute with the utmost severity all such as should be found to have been promoters and encouragers of the late tumult.

On the Friday following these prisoners were admitted to bail at the king's bench bar, by virtue of the Habeas Corpus act; and on the first of July, they called a common-hall; where, in defiance to the Lord-mayor's order to the recorder to adjourn it to the seventh, they proceeded in the election, and declared Papillion and Dubois duly elected.

This so irritated the Lord-mayor, that he and his party met at Guildhall on the fourteenth, when his lordship produced an order of council to begin all proceedings anew, and to carry them on in the usual manner as they ought to have been on the twenty-fourth of June last.

This order was vigorously opposed by many of the most eminent citizens, as an innovation tending to destroy their ancient rights and privileges.

The Lord-mayor, however, in obedience to the said order, declared North duly elected by him, without the sanction of a common-hall; and then proceeded to a poll for another sheriff, to which none coming that had voted for Papillion and Dubois at the former election, Box was chosen without opposition; and North and he were returned duly elected, while Papillion and Dubois were left to seek their remedy at law.

Soon after Box, finding that the manner of his election could not be legally justified, prudently declined serving the office, by paying the accustomed fine of exemption. In consequence of which a common-hall was summoned to proceed to a new election; when Mr. Peter Birch being chosen, he, together with Mr. North, was sworn in before the Lord-mayor.

These arbitrary proceedings are a convincing proof that the court was determined to carry their point at any rate: not that their motives rose from a principle of serving any particular man, but for securing the sheriffs of London in their interest; by which means they could select such juries as might acquit or condemn those whom they pleased to favour or ruin. As a proof of which we refer to the juries that found lord Ruffel guilty of treason: that fined alderman Pilkington, on a false information of Sir William Hooker and Sir Henry Tulse, one hundred thousand pounds for saying, "that the duke of York had fired the city, and was now come to cut their throats:" and that brought in Sir Patience Ward guilty of perjury, because he, on the trial of alderman Pilkington, swore that he did not hear him say the words above-recited.

The common-council having appointed a committee to inspect the acts and proceedings entered into the journals of the court in the times of usurpation, or at any time before or since, that might be fit to be explained or repealed; the said committee, on the sixth of June 1683, made the following report:

To the right honourable the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, in common-council assembled.

"Whereas by a late order of this honourable court it was referred unto us, whose names are subscribed, to inspect the acts and other proceedings entered in the journals of this court in the times of usurpation, or at any time before or since, that may be thought fit to be explained or repealed; now we do humbly certify, That in pursuance of the said order, we have perused and examined the journals of this court in the times of the late rebellion, wherein we find not only many innovations and irregularities brought into this court and the government of this city; but also most pernicious and abominable proceedings, in abetting and carrying on those wicked and unnatural divisions then raised in the kingdom, and serving the usurpation of those times. All, or most of which, we persuade ourselves, could never have had place in this court, had not violence been offered to the government of this city, the Lord-mayor been arrested and imprisoned, divers loyal aldermen and commons, some imprisoned, others disgraced, and all loyal citizens generally discountenanced and discouraged; and others of factious, unquiet, and turbulent spirits, got themselves into the common-council, and made up the greater number therein. All which acts and proceedings might, as they well deserve, be obliterated and wholly expunged, that no remembrance thereof should be transmitted to posterity, to the shame and dishonour of this court and city; but that other matters are therewith intermixed, which for the substance of them are, in our opinions, inoffensive, useful, and fit to be continued. Several committees have formerly been appointed by this court to obliterate the said unjust proceedings, and

“ and there are lines crossed over divers of them, which, we presume, were made by the said committees; but not being thereby obliterated, and still remaining in the books as the acts and proceedings of this court, and never having been particularly disclaimed and repealed by any vote or act of this court, that we have observed; we think it very fitting, that the same and all other like disloyal and irregular proceedings, should by an express act of this court, be renounced, repealed, and made absolutely null and void. Which proceedings, or most of them, we have here set down and present to this honourable court for that purpose; and desire that some few of them may be here openly read, to beget in this court, as it hath done in us, a just abhorrence and detestation of such proceedings.”

After reciting the heads and dates of these proceedings, the said report continues thus:

“ All which particulars aforesaid being highly disloyal, or favouring of the faction and usurpation of those unhappy times, are fit by act of this court to be disclaimed, revoked, abrogated, and repealed to all intents and purposes whatsoever; which as it will demonstrate the loyalty and good affections of the present members of this court to his majesty and the established government, and vindicate them from all imputation of the like pernicious and destructive principles and practices, and will also express their dislike of all factious innovation in the usages and constitutions of this city; so will it prevent any ill use that may be made in time to come of the said irregular actions.”

These reports being openly read in court, they were approved of, agreed, to, and confirmed. And it was enacted by the Lord-mayor, aldermen and commons, “ that all the several acts, orders, and proceedings, therein propounded to be disclaimed and repealed, be repealed and made void; and they and every of them were, by authority of the court, disclaimed, repealed and made null and void.”

The said court then passed an act for regulating the election of sheriffs: in which it was enacted, “ that every person chosen sheriff of London and county of Middlesex, and refusing to serve the said office; shall pay four hundred pounds to the mayor and commonalty of the said city, unless he can purge himself upon oath on account of his want or defect of ability in wealth: if an alderman he shall pay six hundred. And whereas it hath been an ancient custom and usage in choosing the sheriffs of London and county of Middlesex allowed and approved by divers acts of common-council, for the Lord-mayor to elect a person to be one of the said sheriffs, and the commons in common-hall, to confirm the said election; and there have been of late great and fierce disputes and contests within this city touching the said usage, which hath given great disturbance to very many good citizens, and offence to his majesty, upon whose grace and favour

“ the welfare of this city so much depends; and feuds and animosities have thereby arisen, and are still too much continued among many citizens; and other manifold inconveniencies and mischiefs have been occasioned thereby to this city, and greater may ensue, if due remedy be not provided to take away and remove all occasion of the like differences for the future: for prevention therefore of the said mischiefs, and to remove all disputes and controversies that may arise in time to come, touching the confirmation of such person as shall be chosen to be one of the said sheriffs by the Lord-mayor, for the time being. Be it declared and enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that hereafter the person who shall be nominated and elected according to ancient usage, by the Lord-mayor of this city for the time being, to be one of the sheriffs of the city of London and county of Middlesex, and such election shall be declared to the commons of the said city, assembled in common-hall, upon the twenty-fourth day of June, being the day appointed by the aforesaid act, as well for confirmation and allowance of such person as shall be chosen and elected by the Lord-mayor to be sheriff of the said city and county, as also for the choice and election of such other persons as by the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons, shall be chosen to be sheriffs of the said city and county, shall there, by the said commons, be confirmed and allowed to be one of the sheriffs of the said city and county accordingly. And that upon proposing the said person to be confirmed to the said common-hall, in case any hands shall be holden up in token of confirmation, the said person shall be taken to be confirmed and allowed: and then another person shall be chosen, by majority of hands, to be the other of the said sheriffs, and to join with him that shall be so confirmed; any former law, usage, or other matter whatsoever to the contrary notwithstanding.”

The court, having long before determined to seize on the chartered rights of the citizens, took this additional opportunity of executing their intentions. And in the Michaelmas term following, a quo warranto was issued, by the attorney-general, for overthrowing the city charters, and depriving them of the rights and liberties therein contained.”

The information of this quo warranto set forth, “ that the mayor and commonalty and citizens of the city of London, by the space of a month last past, and more, used, and yet did claim to have or use, without any lawful warrant or regal grant, within the city of London aforesaid, the liberties and privileges of the same city; viz. these liberties and privileges following: 1. To be of themselves a body politic, by the name mayor and commonalty and citizens of the city of London. To be sheriffs of the city of London and county of Middlesex, and to name, elect, make, and constitute them. 3. That the mayor and aldermen of the said city were justices of peace, and held sessions of peace. All which liberties privileges, and franchises, the said mayor and commonalty, and “ citizens

"citizens of London, upon the king, had by the
"space aforefaid usurped, and yet did usurp."

This conduct of the court arose from a petition which had been presented to the king by the city, on his proroguing the parliament, when they were about to try several noble persons on the popish plot; and for their printing and publishing the said petition, which was deemed seditious, and possessing the people with an ill opinion of the king and his government.

Notwithstanding all the arguments used by the citizens to support their conduct, and defend the infringement on their dear-bought liberties and privileges, yet the ministry were determined, at all events, to crush them. Accordingly the counsel and judges having displaced those from the bench who disapproved of these proceedings, justice Jones, on the twelfth of June 1683, pronounced the following sentence against the city:

"That a city might forfeit its charter; that
"the malversations of the common-council were
"acts of the whole city; and that the two points
"set forth in the pleadings, were just grounds
"for the forfeiting of a charter. Upon which pre"mises, the proper conclusion seemed to be,
"that therefore the city of London had forfeited
"their charter."

Although it was judged that the king might seize the liberties of the city; yet, being afraid of the consequences, the attorney-general, contrary to what is usual in such cases, was directed to move, that the judgment might not be recorded.

The citizens being greatly surprised at this unjust and arbitrary sentence, a common council was immediately summoned to deliberate on this exigency. At which the country party moved to have the judgment entered. This, however, was over-ruled by the court party, who insisted upon an absolute submission to the king, before judgment was entered; and though this was in effect a voluntary surrender of the city liberties, and depriving themselves of the means of obtaining the judgment reversed, the act of submission was carried by a great majority. And, in a petition from the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council, "they acknowledged their own misgovernment, and his majesty's lenity; begged his pardon, and promised constant loyalty and obedience; and humbly begged his majesty's commands and directions."

The answer returned by his majesty was, that he would not reject their suit, if they would agree to the following particulars:

1. That no Lord-mayor, sheriff, recorder, common-serjeant, town-clerk, or coroner of the city of London, or steward of the Borough of Southwark, shall be capable of, or admitted to, the exercise of their respective offices, before his majesty shall have approved them under his sign manual.

2. That, if his majesty shall disapprove the choice of any person to be Lord-mayor, and signify the same under his sign manual to the Lord-mayor, or, in default of a Lord-mayor, to the recorder, or senior alderman; the citizens shall, within one week, proceed to a new choice: and, if his majesty shall, in like manner, disapprove the second choice, his majesty may, if he please, nominate a person to be Lord-mayor for the ensuing year.

5. If his majesty shall, in like manner, disapprove the persons chosen to be sheriffs, or either of them, his majesty may appoint persons to be sheriffs for the ensuing year.

4. That the Lord-mayor and court of aldermen may also, with the leave of his majesty, displace any alderman, recorder, &c.

5. Upon the election of an alderman, if the court of aldermen shall judge and declare the person presented to be unfit, the ward shall choose again; and, upon a disapproval of a second choice, the court may appoint another in his room.

6. The justices of the peace are to be by the king's commission; and the settling of these matters to be left to his majesty's attorney and solicitor-general, and council learned in law.

To which the lord keeper added, "that these regulations being made, his majesty would not only pardon this prosecution, but confirm their charter in such a manner as should be consistent with them." Concluding thus: "My Lord-mayor, the term draws towards an end, and Midsummer day is at hand, when some of the officers used to be chosen: whereof his majesty will reserve the approbation. Therefore, it is his majesty's pleasure, that you return to the city, and consult the common-council, that he may speedily know your resolutions thereupon: and accordingly give his directions. That you may see the king is in earnest, and the matter is not capable of delay, I am commanded to let you know, he hath given order to his attorney-general to enter upon judgment on Saturday next, unless you prevent it by your compliance in all these particulars."

In consequence of this order, a common-council was immediately summoned, when the friends of liberty treated these slavish conditions with the contempt they deserved; declaring, at the same time, that they were ready to sacrifice all that was near and dear to them, rather than submit to such arbitrary impositions. However, when the question was put, it was carried for a submission by a majority of eighteen.

Notwithstanding the citizens complied with every thing the king required of them, in respect to their charter, yet he departed from his promise, and commanded the quo warranto to be entered; which was no sooner effected, than he commissioned Sir William Pritchard, the Lord-mayor, to hold the said office during his majesty's pleasure: in which manner he appointed the sheriffs. At the same time he appointed William Jenner, recorder of the city, in the room of Sir George Treby, displaced; degraded eight aldermen in the country interest, appointed eight others to supply their places; and, on the twentieth of October, appointed Sir Henry Tulse one of the informers against Pilkington, to execute the office of Mayor during pleasure.

In .

In the year 1684, a violent frost began about the beginning of December, and continued so sharp till the fifth of February following, that the Thames appeared as firm as the land; and all manner of trades, and every kind of diversion were exercised upon it.

The year following, king Charles II. being seized with a kind of apoplectic fit, languished only a few days, and died on the sixth of February, in the fifty-fifth year of his age, and thirty-fifth of his reign.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

King James II's accession. Alderman Cornish executed before his own house. Duke of Monmouth beheaded. The city charter restored. King James II. abdicates the throne. Destruction of the mass-houses in London. Death of lord-chancellor Jefferies. Prince of Orange's order for a convention of parliament. The citizens lend the government 200000 l. Accession of king William and queen Mary. Address of the city to the king. King and queen dine at Guildhall. Act of parliament for restoring the city to its ancient franchises. Speaker of the house of commons degraded. Death of queen Mary. The king's public entry into the city. The pretender proclaimed on the death of James II. Death of William III. and accession of queen Anne. Day of thanksgiving. Violent storm of Wind. Regulation of the city watch. Act of common-council for preventing fires. A prodigious fall of flies. Meeting-houses destroyed. Act of parliament for building fifty new churches. Description of St. Paul's.

ON the demise of king Charles II. the duke of York, who had a long time governed in the king's name, ascended the throne by the title of James II. and the arbitrary measures imposed on the citizens in the late reign, were still preserved in the present. For the first step taken by the king, after his accession, was the issuing out a prosecution against alderman Cornish, who had exerted himself, when sheriff, in the year 1680, to detect and prosecute the popish plot. In consequence of which, on the 13th of October 1685, he was apprehended and committed to Newgate, without the use of pen, ink, or paper, till the Saturday following, when he received notice, that an indictment of high treason was preferred against him, and that he was to be tried on the Monday following. During this short interval, he earnestly requested time to prepare for his defence; but the attorney-general abruptly told him, that he had not so well deserved of the government, as to expect such an indulgence. And although he strongly urged that his most material evidence was then above one hundred and forty miles from London, yet, on the Monday following, he was indicted for conspiring with other false traitors to raise a rebellion in the kingdom, in the late reign, to destroy the king, and subvert the constitution. The principal evidence against him was colonel Ramsay, an infamous and profligate villain, and one Goodenough, who had been outlawed, but was pardoned on purpose, that he might have the opportunity of bearing testimony against him. And notwithstanding the evidence of these two base men, did not in the least affect the prisoner, he was nevertheless condemned, and, on the twenty-third of the same month, hanged, drawn, and quartered, facing his own house, at the end of King-street, Cheapside.

This year the duke of Monmouth was beheaded on Tower-hill. When he went to the scaffold, he was attended by a very strong guard, who were ordered, in case of a rescue, (as was apprehended, he being the favourite of the people) to shoot him. When he laid his head on the block, and made the signal, the executioner struck three times ineffectually, and then threw down the ax, declaring, that he could not go on; but the sheriff compelled him to resume the work, which, with three other strokes, he finished.

In the year 1687 there arrived in England fifteen thousand five hundred French protestants, who had been compelled to fly from the persecution of their reformed religion in France. These unhappy people were immediately relieved by money arising from a brief, on which was collected the sum of sixty-three thousand seven hundred and thirteen pounds, two shillings and three-pence. And out of the above number thirteen thousand five hundred, settled in and about the city of London and parts contiguous.

The following year the archbishop of Canterbury, with six other bishops, were committed to the Tower. Soon after which they were brought to their trial, and acquitted.

In consequence of these arbitrary proceedings, the most zealous patriots came to a resolution of inviting the prince of Orange to come with an armed force, and deliver them from that slavery, oppression and popery, to which otherwise their laws and religion must submit.

This was no sooner heard at court, than the king ordered his chancellor Jefferies to carry back the charter of the city of London, with the grants under the broad seal for restoring the same. And the next day the Lord-mayor held a special court of aldermen, when an order was made for restoring the liverymen of the several companies of the city, city, that were on the livery at the time when judgment was given against the city upon the quo warranto. Which order the clerks of the several companies were to enter in their respective books.

Information being received of the prince of Orange landing at Torbay, the king declared his resolution to march against him with his army. On which occasion he sent for the Lord-mayor, and earnestly recommended to him the care of the city during his absence: told him that he had left sufficient troops for their defence; and that upon any emergency he might apply to the privy-council for assistance and advice; at the same time assuring him, that if he returned victorious, he would punctually perform all he had promised, for the security of their religion and liberties.

This security, however, was providentially brought about and established upon much better engagements, and a more lasting foundation: for the defection became so general, not only in most parts of the kingdom, but likewise in the army, that it occasioned the king's speedy return to London; where, apprehending himself in great danger, he resolved to provide for his security by abdicating the throne and leaving the kingdom.

In this reign the settlement of Carolina was effected; and that of Pennsylvania was also completed by one Pen, a leading person among the quakers, who possess a great part of the colony to this day.

As soon as the king's flight was known, the lords spiritual and temporal met at Guildhall, and signed and published their declaration to apply to the prince of Orange, and to assist his highness to obtain a free parliament, and to be ready to do all other matters that should tend to the public good. This was followed the same day by an address from the Lord-mayor, aldermen and common council; and by another from the lieutenantancy of the city of London to the prince of Orange. The contents of the city address, which was sent to his highness by a deputation of four aldermen and eight commoners, were as follows:

"We, taking into consideration your highness's fervent zeal for the protestant religion, manifested to the world in your many hazardous enterprizes, wherein it hath pleased almighty God to bless you with miraculous success, do render our deepest thanks to the divine majesty for the same, and beg leave to present our most humble thanks to your highness, particularly for your appearing in arms in this kingdom, to carry on and perfect your glorious designs to rescue three kingdoms from slavery and popery, and in a free parliament to establish the religion and the laws and liberties of these kingdoms upon a sure and lasting foundation.

"We have hitherto looked for some remedy for those oppressions and imminent dangers, which we, together with our protestant fellow-subjects, laboured under, from his majesty's concessions and concurrences with your highness's just and pious purpose expressed in your gracious declaration. But herein finding ourselves finally disappointed by his majesty's with-

"drawing himself, we presume to make your highness our refuge, and do, in the name of this capital city, implore your highness's protection; and most humbly beseech your highness to repair to this city, where your highness will be received with universal joy and satisfaction."

Notwithstanding the greatest precautions were taken to preserve the peace of the cities of London and Westminster, yet the magistrates could not prevent the populace from assaulting the papists, whom they looked on as the authors of their late misfortunes and present distractions. They furiously fell upon the new-erected mass-houses both in the city and suburbs, which they plundered, burnt and levelled to the ground with the greatest acclamations. Nor did their fury stop here: for being informed that the principal papists had taken sanctuary in the houses of the Spanish and Tuscan ambassadors, where they had deposited their best and most valuable effects, they plundered every thing of value, and what they could not take away they burnt. But, by the succeeding parliament, the ambassadors received ample satisfaction for their respective losses. They afterwards proceeded to the king's printing-house, where all the papers found therein were committed to the flames.

About this time, lord-chancellor Jeffries, who, in order to facilitate his escape, lay concealed in Wapping, disguised in a seaman's habit, being observed by a clerk in chancery carelessly looking out of the window, was seized by the mob, who treated him with such severity, that he died in a short time after.

In the year 1688, the prince of Orange, being thoroughly satisfied that king James had left the kingdom, published the following order:

"Whereas the necessity of affairs does require speedy advice, we do desire all such persons as have served as knights, citizens, or burgessees in any of the parliaments that were held during the reign of the late king Charles the second, to meet us at St. James's, upon Wednesday the twenty-sixth of this instant December, by ten of the clock in the morning; and we do likewise desire, that the Lord-mayor and court of aldermen of the city of London would be present at the same time; and that the common-council would appoint fifty of their number to be there likewise. And hereof we desire them not to fail."

In return for the great honour done the city by the prince of Orange, they soon after lent the government two hundred thousand pounds, of which Sir Samuel Dashwood subscribed sixty thousand pounds. And the zealots for the house of Orange drew up a petition to the lords, humbly requesting, that his most illustrious highness and his royal consort might be speedily settled on the throne.

This, however, was discountenanced by the prince, who desired the Lord-mayor to issue the following order:

"By

“ By the LORD-MAYOR, &c.

“ Whereas his highness the prince of Orange has been pleased to signify to me this day, that divers persons, pretending themselves to be citizens of London, in a tumultuous and disorderly manner, have lately disturbed the present convention of the lords and commons at Westminster, upon pretence of petitioning: it being regular and usual for the citizens of this city, that are under the apprehensions of any grievance, to make their application to myself and the court of aldermen: therefore, with the advice of my brethren the aldermen of this city, these are to require you, that you command, within your ward, that they forbear any tumultuous disturbance or assembly, as they will answer the contrary at their utmost peril.”

This motion, however, soon after took place; and the states of the kingdom offering them the crown, they accepted thereof, and were seated on the throne by the stile of king William and queen Mary.

In the year 1689, many letters from king James being intercepted, his majesty was graciously pleased to communicate the same not only to the parliament, but likewise to the citizens, who were so highly pleased, that on the twenty-second of June, the Lord-mayor and sheriffs presented a loyal and dutiful address to his majesty; in which they assured him, “ that they would, as far as in their power, oppose themselves to and suppress all designs of that nature; that they would search after, disarm, seize, secure, and bring to justice, all persons concerned therein, or contributing thereto; and that they were unanimously, firmly, and unalterably resolved and determined to stand by, defend, and maintain his majesty and his government, with the utmost hazard of their lives and estates, against all persons whatsoever that should conspire or attempt any thing against the same.”

This year the Lord-mayor and citizens, desirous of farther testifying their gratitude to their deliverer, invited the king, queen, prince and princess of Denmark, and both houses of parliament, to dine at Guildhall on the Lord-mayor's day ensuing. At which time their majesties, attended by a numerous train of the nobility, repaired to Cheapside, when, after having beheld the passing of the splendid cavalcade, they were conducted by the sheriffs to Guildhall, where they were sumptuously entertained in a manner properly adapted for such royal guests. And the evening concluded with bonfires, ringing of bells, and universal illuminations in all parts of the city.

In acknowledgment for these tokens of loyalty and affection from the city, towards their government and persons, their majesties immediately ordered the restoration of the citizens to their franchises. And a bill was brought into parliament, and soon after passed, for reversing the judgment of the quo warranto against the city of London, and for restoring the same to its ancient rights and privileges. This was done in such a manner and form, as to prevent any arbitrary minister, or corrupt judge and jury, from making any depredations on their chartered liberties for the future. The manner of which run thus:

“ Whereas a judgment was given in the court of king's-bench, in or about Trinity term, in the thirty-fifth year of the reign of the late king Charles II. upon an information in the nature of a quo warranto, exhibited in the said court against the mayor, and commonalty, and citizens of London, that the liberty, privilege, and franchise of the said mayor, and commonalty, and citizens, being a body politick and corporate, should be seized into the king's hands as forfeited; and forasmuch as the said judgment, and proceedings thereupon, is and were illegal and arbitrary; and for that the restoring of the said mayor, and commonalty, and citizens, to their ancient liberties, of which they had been deprived, tends very much to the peace and good settlement of this kingdom:

“ Be it declared and enacted, by the king and queen's most excellent majesties, and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons in this present parliament assembled, and by authority of the same, that the said judgment, given in the said court of king's bench, in the said Trinity term, in the thirty fifth year of the reign of the said king Charles the II<sup>d</sup>. or in any other term; and all and every other judgment given or recorded in the said court, for the seizing into the said late king's hand, the liberty, privilege, or franchise of the mayor, and commonalty, and citizens of the city of London, of being themselves a body corporate and politick, by the name of the mayor, and commonalty, and citizens of the city of London, and by that name to plead, and be impleaded, and to answer, and to be answered, or in what manner or words soever such judgment was entered, is, shall be, and are hereby reversed, annulled, and made void, to all intents and purposes whatsoever; and that vacates be entered on the rolls of the said judgment, for the vacating and reversal of the same accordingly.

“ And be it further declared and enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that the mayor, and commonalty, and citizens of the city of London, shall and may, for ever hereafter, remain, continue, and be, and prescribe to be, a body corporate and politick, in re, facto & nomine, by the name of mayor, and commonalty, and citizens of the city of London, and by that name, and all and every other name and names of incorporation, by which they at any time before the said judgment were incorporated, to sue, plead, and be impleaded, and to answer and be answered, without any seizure or forejudger of the said franchise, liberty, and privilege, or being thereof excluded or ousted, for or upon any pretence of any forfeiture or misdemeanor at any time heretofore or hereafter to be done, committed, or suffered; and the mayor and commonalty, and citizens of the said city, shall and may, as by law they

“ they ought, peaceably have and enjoy all and “ every their rights, gifts, charters, grants, li“ berties, privileges, franchises, customs, usa“ ges, constitutions, prescriptions, immunities,
 “ markets, duties, tolls, lands, tenements, estates,
 “ and hereditaments whatsoever, which they law“ fully had, or had lawful right, title, or interest
 “ of, in, or to, at the time of recording or giv“ ing the said judgment, or at the time or times
 “ of the said pretended forfeitures.

“ And be it enacted, by the authority aforesaid,
 “ that all charters, letters patents, and grants
 “ for incorporating the citizens and commonalty
 “ of the said city, or any of them, and all char“ ters, grants, letters patents, and commissions “ touching or concerning any of their liberties or “ franchises, or the liberties, privileges, fran“ chises, immunities, lands, tenements, heredi-“ taments, rights, titles, or estates of the mayor
 “ and commonalty, and citizens of the city of “ London, made or granted to any person or “ persons whatsoever, by the late king Charles
 “ the second, since the said judgment given, or “ by the late king James the second; be and are “ hereby declared and adjudged null and void to “ all intents and purposes whatsoever.

“ And be it enacted, by the authority aforesaid,
 “ that all and several of the companies and cor“ porations of the said city shall from henceforth “ stand and be incorporated by such name and “ names, and in such sort and manner, as they “ respectively were at the time of the said judg“ ment given, and every of them are hereby re“ stored to all and every the lands, tenements, “ hereditaments, rights, titles, estates, liberties,
 “ powers, privileges, precedencies, and immuni-“ ties, which they lawfully had and enjoyed at the “ time of giving the said judgment; and that as “ well all surrenders, as charters, letters patents,
 “ and grants, for new incorporating any of the “ said companies, or touching or concerning any
 “ of their liberties, privileges, or franchises,
 “ made or granted by the said late king James
 “ the second, or by the said king Charles the “ second, since the giving of the said judgment, “ shall be void, and are hereby declared null and “ void, to all intents and purposes whatsoever.”

In the year 1690, advice being received that the Dutch had been defeated by the French in the British-channel, it was apprehended that the enemy would attempt an invasion. To defend which the patriotic citizens, (in the absence of the king, who was then at the head of his army in Ireland,) immediately raised nine thousand trained bands, and offered them to her majesty ready to march wherever she should command, declaring that they were determined to support their majesties persons and government at the hazard of their lives and fortunes. Their suspicions, however, being ill-founded, assistance became unnecessary.

On the tenth of September following, his majesty, after a successful campaign in Ireland, and driving king James from thence, arrived safe at Kensington; and the next day he was attended by the Lord-mayor, aldermen and recorder, who, in the name of the city, congratulated his majesty on his happy success and safe return to his kingdom.

Many disagreeable controversies having arose respecting the nomination of aldermen, and election of common council-men, it was thought necessary to adjust these matters on such a principle as might prevent the like for the future. To effect which the common-council, in the year 1692; enacted, that none but freemen, being householders, and paying scot and bearing lot, and none other whatsoever, have the right or privilege to nominate aldermen, and elect common council men.

In the year 1694, the citizens of London finding themselves indebted to the orphans in their trust in the sum of seven hundred forty-seven thousand five hundred pounds, occasioned by various accidents and public calamities, applied to parliament for relief to discharge the same; and they obtained an act, whereby all the city estates, except those belonging to the hospitals and the bridge, were charged with raising the annual sum of eight hundred pounds clear of all deductions, for settling a perpetual fund for paying four pounds per annum interest, for every hundred due by the city to the said creditors. They farther enacted, that the profits arising from the several aqueducts belonging to the city, should be applied towards the payment of the said interest: that the Lord-mayor and common council might raise two thousand pounds per annum by equal assessments upon the personal estates of the citizens, that the six hundred pounds per annum paid by the lighters of the convex lamps should be applied in the same manner: that every apprentice at his binding to pay two shillings and sixpence, and every person made free five shillings towards the fund: that five shillings shall be paid for every ton of wine, and four-pence extraordinary meetage for a chaldron of coals, in the port of London, to the said fund: and that after the twenty-ninth of September 1700, the said four-pence per chaldron should be raised to six-pence, or, if weighable, six-pence per ton.

Sir John Trevor, speaker of the house of commons, having greatly oppressed the citizens in passing this act, and the house being informed thereof, a committee was appointed to inspect the accounts of the chamberlain's office; when, finding that Sir John had extorted from them one thousand and fifty pounds, he was degraded the office of speaker, and expelled the house.

On the twenty-ninth of October, his majesty being returned from Holland, was received by the citizens in a most dutiful and affectionate manner; three days after which the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and recorder waited on his majesty, and congratulated him on his safe arrival after so dangerous a campaign.

The citizens of London having been greatly injured by the increase of hawkers and pedlars, the Lord-mayor and common-council enacted, “ That no person should presume to sell any “ goods or merchandize in any public place with-
 “ in the city, or liberties thereof, except in open “ markets and fairs, on the penalty of forty “ shillings. That all citizens buying goods of “ such

"such person, should forfeit the like sum. And
 "that every citizen who should permit or suffer
 "such goods to be exposed for sale in their houses
 "should likewise forfeit the sum of forty shillings
 "for each offence."

On the twenty-eighth of December, this year, died queen Mary, the royal consort of king William III. the Lord-mayor and aldermen attended her funeral obsequies, which were celebrated on the fifth of March, with the greatest solemnity.

In the year 1695 the hawkers and pedlars, in order to evade the beforementioned act of common-council, carried their goods to the public markets, which occasioned another act of common-council to be made, whereby it was ordained, "that no person or persons whatever, whether
 "free or not free of this city, shall sell or expose
 "to sale in the public market, or any ground belonging to them, within the city and liberties,
 "any mercery wares, lace and linen, grocery or
 "confectionary wares, hosier's wares, cutler's
 "wares, tin wares, drapery wares, millinery
 "wares, glass or earthen wares, toys or any such
 "like commodities, or merchandizes, which are "sold in open shops, or warehouses of the free-
 "men of this city, and liberties thereof, upon
 "pain, to forfeit and pay, for every such offence,
 "the sum of three pounds with costs of suit, if
 "prosecuted within fourteen days, in the name
 "of the chamberlain, in the Lord-mayor's court;
 "one moiety of which is to be converted to the "use of St. Thomas's-hospital, and the other to "the prosecutor."

On the twenty-first of June the common-council passed an act for farther regulating the method and rule of proceedings upon elections: in which, after taking notice of the disputes concerning such rights and powers to call and adjourn, they enact, "that the right for assembling common
 "halls for the election of Lord-mayor, sheriffs,
 "and other public officers for the city, is and ought "to be in the Lord-mayor, for the time being.
 "That the right of taking a poll and scrutiny, and
 "of adjourning the hall from time, to time till the "same shall be concluded, shall be in the sheriffs;
 "that, if the sheriffs disagree, so as to impede the "completing of a poll or scrutiny, and refuse to "observe the orders sent to them on that occasion
 "by the Lord-mayor, to put an end to the difference,
 "his lordship may proceed himself in granting and
 "taking the poll and scrutiny, and in adjourning
 "the hall, until all shall be finally concluded."

In consequence of this establishment, it is the custom at all common halls for the Lord-mayor to come upon the hustings attended by the aldermen and sheriffs; and the business and intent of the meeting being opened to the livery by the recorder and common serjeant, the lord-Mayor and aldermen retire, and leave the execution of the intermediate proceedings to the sheriffs only. When a candidate is proposed, the sheriffs declare upon the question; they appoint clerks for a poll; and after a scrutiny has been made, they declare the majority to the mayor, who then returns to the hustings, certifies the election to the common-hall, by the recorder; and then the court, by his lordship's order, is dissolved; except in the election of representatives for the city in parliament, as they do not come under the denomination of city officers. They are chosen at a common-hall, summoned by the sheriffs, in pursuance to a writ directed to them only. In which case the sheriffs only are concerned in the return, and have exclusive power, given and specified by other statutes, to convene the voters, to preside at the poll, to adjourn from time to time, to make the final declaration, and they are personally answerable for any mistake made in the return.

In the election of Lord-mayor, all the aldermen under the chair, who have served the office of sheriff, are proposed in rotation; out of which the livery, if they think proper, elect the two senior aldermen under the chair; and these two being presented to the court of aldermen, they usually elect the senior; though each have a right to deviate from this usual method: the only question is, how far the exercise of that right may be justified, when it is not founded on such motives as have a real tendency to the greater dignity and better government of the community in general.

On the election of sheriffs, those aldermen who have not served that office, are put up in the order of their seniority; then such citizens as have been nominated, or drank to by the Lord-mayor, after these any others that shall be regularly proposed at the time of election, and have not paid the fine to be excused. And out of the whole number of aldermen and commoners, the liverymen choose whom they think proper.

In the year 1697, king William being returned from Holland after the conclusion of the treaty of Ryswick, he was earnestly requested by the Lord mayor and citizens to make his public entry into the city. In compliance with which, on the sixteenth of November his majesty set out from Greenwich, attended by his royal highness the prince of Denmark, the principal officers of state, and a great number of the nobility and gentry. His majesty was received at St. Margaret's-hill, in Southwark, by the Lord-mayor, aldermen, &c. in their formalities on horseback, who, after congratulating him on the joyful occasion, conducted him through the city to Whitehall, amidst the acclamations of a prodigious concourse of spectators. The procession was solemn, and the city was embellished with the most pompous decorations.

The following year an act of parliament passed in which it was enacted, "that the public market of Blackwell-hall shall be held every Thursday, Friday and Saturday, from eight to twelve in the forenoon, and from two to five in the afternoon, except days of humiliation and thanksgiving; and the keepers are not to admit any buying or selling of any woollen cloth at the said hall, upon any other days or hours, than aforesaid, upon the penalty of one hundred pounds."

In the year 1699, the market of Billingsgate, pursuant to act of parliament, commenced, on the tenth of May, a free market for fish six days in the week, with permission to sell mackarel on Sundays any time before or after divine service. And it was enacted, "That all persons buying any fish in the said market may sell the same again in any other market or place within London, or elsewhere, elsewhere, by retail; being sound and wholesome fish; except that none but fishmongers shall sell in public or fixed shops, or houses. And that no persons shall employ, or be employed by, any other person, in buying at Billingsgate any quantity of fish, to be divided by lots, or in shares, amongst any fishmongers, or others, to be afterwards sold by retail or otherwise; nor shall any fishmonger engross, or buy, in the said market, any quantity of fish, but what shall be for his own sale or use, and not for any other fishmonger to sell again, under penalty of twenty pounds for each offence; one moiety whereof to go to the prosecutor, the other to the parish."

Z z z

On the sixth of September 1701, the late king James II. died at St. Germain's in France; and the French king caused his supposed son to be proclaimed king of Great Britain and Ireland. This was so highly resented by the city of London, that the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council presented the following address to the lords-justices in his majesty's absence:

" Great Sir !

" We are deeply sensible how much we are in
 " duty bound highly to resent that great indignity
 " and affront offered to your most sacred majesty,
 " by the French king, in giving the title of king
 " of England, Scotland, and Ireland, to the pre-
 " tended prince of Wales, contrary to your ma" jesty's most just and lawful title, and to the se" veral acts of parliament for settling the succes" sion to the crown in the protestant line. By " this it is apparent, he designs, as much as in
 " him lies, to dethrone your majesty, to extirpate
 " the protestant religion out of these your ma" jesty's kingdoms, and to invade our liberties
 " and properties; for the maintaining whereof,
 " your majesty hath signalized your zeal, by the " often hazarding your precious life. We, there" fore, your majesty's most loyal subjects, do sin" cerely, unanimously, and chearfully assure your " majesty, that we will, at all times, and upon
 " all occasions, exert the utmost of our abilities,
 " and contribute whatever lies in our power, for
 " the preservation of your person, (whom God
 " long preserve) and the defence of your just
 " rights, in opposition to all invaders of your
 " crown and dignity."

On the twenty-first of February 1702, his majesty riding from Kensington to Hampton-Court, his horse fell under him, and he was thrown with such violence as produced a fracture in his collar-bone; soon after which he was seized with a violent fever and diarrhæa, which terminated in his death on the eighth of March following. In consequence of which the princess Anne, daughter to the late king James, succeeded to the crown with the universal joy and satisfaction of the nation.

The great successes obtained over the French in the preceding campaign, occasioned her majesty to appoint the twelfth of November for a day of public thanksgiving; on which day her majesty went in grand procession to St. Paul's cathedral, whither she was attended by both houses of parliament; and the citizens exerted their utmost abilities to render that day more pompous and brilliant than had ever been done on any other occasion.

In the year 1703 there happened the most dreadful storm of wind that perhaps ever was known. It began on the twenty-six of November about eleven o'clock at night, and increased with redoubled fury till seven next morning. The houses were entirely stripped of their covering, and the brick walls and stacks of chimnies fell with such impetuosity, that many people were killed, and others dreadfully mangled in the ruins. It destroyed a great number of spires and turrets; and upon churches and other public buildings sheets of lead were rolled up like scrolls, and blown from their places to the distance of many feet. The damage at sea far exceeded that at land; for, in that dreadful night, twelve men of war were lost, with above eighteen hundred men on board; besides the loss of a great number of merchant ships computed at ten times the value. All the ships in the river Thames were drove from London-bridge to Limehouse, except four, which were so damaged by beating against each other, as to be entirely unfit for any future service. The great destruction made in the tiles of houses, occasioned that commodity to rise from one guinea to six pounds the thousand.

In the year 1704 her majesty was pleased to order, that all the standards and colours taken by the British troops at the battle of Blenheim should be put up in Westminster-hall. Agreeable to which order they were, on the third of January, brought from the Tower of London by a detachment of the horse-guard and grenadiers, and a battalion of the foot-guards, who marched through the city in military order.

This year the common-council passed an act for better regulating the city watch; by which all former acts concerning the regulation of the night-watches within the city of London, and liberties thereof, were repealed, annulled, and made void. In this act they ordained, that each ward should provide a number of strong able-bodied men; and that the deputy and common-council of every ward should have power to oblige every person occupying any house, shop, or warehouse, either to watch in person, or to pay for an able-bodied man, to be appointed thereto by the said deputy and common-council-men: that the said watchmen be provided with a lanthorn and candle, and well and sufficiently armed with halberds; and watch from nine in the evening till seven in the morning, from Michaelmas to the first of April, and from ten till five from the first of April to Michaelmas.

In the year 1707 many dreadful fires having happened in the city of London, and its suburbs, principally occasioned by the carelessness of servants, the parliament passed an act for preventing such fatal accidents for the future; and the Lord-mayor and common-council, for the more effectual publication thereof, caused the following resolution to be printed and sent to every house within the city of London, and liberties thereof:

" Whereas

Engraved for Chamberlain's History of London

VIEW of S<sup>T</sup> PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.

VIEW of S<sup>T</sup> PAUL'S SCHOOL.

"Whereas divers fires often happen by the negligence and carelessness of servants; be it therefore enacted, that if any menial, or other servant, or servants, through negligence, or carelessness, shall fire, or cause to be fired, any dwelling-house, or out-house, or houses; such servant or servants, being thereof lawfully convicted, by the oath of one or more credible witnesses, made before two or more of her majesty's justices of peace, shall forfeit and pay the sum of one hundred pounds, unto the church-wardens of such parish where the fire shall happen, to be distributed amongst the sufferers by such fire, in such proportions as to the said church-wardens shall seem just. And in case of default, or refusal to pay the same immediately after such conviction, the same being lawfully demanded by the said church-wardens, that then and in such case, such servant or servants shall, by warrant under the hands of two or more of her majesty's justices of the peace, be committed to the house of correction, there to be kept to hard labour for the space of eighteen months." At the same time it was enacted by parliament, "That the church-wardens of each parish within the bills of mortality, should be empowered, at the charge of their respective parishes, to fix upon the several main water pipes in the streets, stop-blocks, or fire-cocks; and also to provide a large and hand engine, with a leathern pipe and socket to screw upon the fire-cock. And, for the future, all party-walls (except the houses on London-bridge) should be entirely of brick or stone."

About the middle of August this year, there fell such a prodigious quantity of flies in London, that many of the streets were so covered with them, that the people's feet made as full an impression on them as upon thick snow; and notwithstanding many hundred bushels were swept into the kennels, yet no distemper ensued.

In the year 1708 there arrived in England near twelve thousand distressed protestants of the Palatinate in Germany, who had been stripped of all the conveniences of life by the French armies that invaded and plundered their country. These unhappy people were at first assisted by the benevolence of her majesty, then by the private charity of the nobility, and at last from a collection on a brief issued for that purpose to all parts of the kingdom, amounting to twenty-two thousand and thirty-eight pounds. With this relief, above three thousand were sent to Ireland; six hundred to each of the provinces of North and South Carolina; and three thousand five hundred to that of New York; where, by their industry, they cultivated such large tracts of unimproved land, as afterwards became very beneficial to this nation.

This year the fiery zeal of contending parties broke out into a most violent flame at the prosecution of doctor Henry Sacheverel, chaplain of St. Saviour's Southwark, before the house of lords, on an impeachment of high crimes and misdemeanors by the commons for preaching two sermons. The populace were persuaded by the tories that instead of the doctor's ruin, that of the church was intended; and believing the same to be a contrivance of the presbyterians, breathed destruction to them and all other dissenters. Thus spirited up, they ran like as many enraged furies to the meeting-house of Mr. Burges, a presbyterian minister, in New-court, Little Lincoln's-inn-fields, which they instantly breaking open, stripped it of its doors, casements, sconces, wainscot, pews and pulpit, which they carried into Lincoln's-inn-fields; and while they were erecting the same into a pile, a party was sent to surprize Burges at his house, in order to have burnt him in his pulpit on the top of the same: but he luckily, however, avoided their fury by escaping out at a back window. After this they divided into different parties, and destroyed the meeting-houses in St. John's-square, New-street, Drury-lane, and Leather-lane. But before next morning this dangerous tumult was suppressed by her majesty's guards sent for that purpose. The trained bands continually kept on duty during the trial of the doctor, who at last was condemned not to preach for three years, and his two sermons to be burnt at the Royal-Exchange by the common hangman.

In the year 1710, the number of houses and inhabitants being greatly increased in the city of London, and its suburbs, the churches were thereby rendered insufficient for their accommodation: wherefore the parliament enacted, that fifty new churches should be erected in or near the populous cities of London and Westminster or suburbs thereof; for which purpose they appropriated two shillings per chaldron, or ton of coals, that should be brought into the port of London.

This being the year in which the stately building of St. Paul's Cathedral was finished, after the fire of London, it may not be improper, in this place, to insert an account of it.

Description of St. PAUL'S.

After the destruction of the old fabrick a resolution being taken to build a new cathedral, Sir Christopher Wren was ordered to prepare a design, and cause a model thereof to be made as a rule and direction for the whole work. And in order to raise a fund sufficient for carrying the work into execution, the chamber of London was made an office for the receipt of contributions to defray the expence; into which in ten years only, was paid the sum of one hundred and twenty-six thousand pounds, king Charles II. generously giving a thousand pounds a year out of his privy-purse, besides a new duty on coals which produced five thousand pounds a year, over and above all other grants in its favour.

Among the various designs projected by Sir Christopher was that of the present mighty structure, which being made choice of by the bishops, he immediately set to work; but, unluckily, in digging its foundation, when he wanted but six or seven feet to compleat his design, fell upon a pit, where the potters of old time had taken their pot earth from, and filled up the hole with broken fragments of urns, vases, and such like rubbish.

rubbish. This obliged him to dig through the sand, to the depth of forty feet at least, to the solid earth: he therefore sunk a pit eighteen feet wide, through all the strata, and laid the foundation of a square pier of solid masonry upon the hard sea-beach that covered the original clay, which he raised within fifteen feet of the present surface, and then turned a short arch under ground to the level of the stratum of the hard pot-earth; upon which arch the north-east coin of the choir of St. Paul's now stands.

All necessary preparations being now made, and many difficulties surmounted, in pulling down, clearing away, &c. Sir Christopher Wren laid the first stone on the twenty-first day of June, 1675, in the reign of Charles II.

The foundations being laid, portland stone was made choice of to complete the superstructure, as those from thence were of the largest scantlings; yet these could not be presumed upon for columns exceeding four feet in diameter: this determined Sir Christopher to make choice of two orders, instead of one and an attic story, as St. Peter's at Rome, in order to preserve the just proportions of his cornice, otherwise the fabric would have fallen short of its intended height. On these principles therefore he proceeded, and raised the lofty edifice we now see.

The lower division of the building is adorned with a range of double pilasters, with their entablatures of the Corinthian order; and as many of the Composite, or Roman order, ornament the upper.

The spaces between the arches of the windows, and the architrave of the lower order, are filled with great variety of curious enrichments; as are those likewise above.

On the west front is erected a most magnificent portico, graced with two stately turrets and a pediment, enriched with sculpture.

The columns of this portico are doubled; two columns are brought nearer together to make greater intercolumns alternately, and to give a proper space to three doors; the two side doors for daily use, and the middle for solemnities: the columns are widened to make a free and commodious passage to each, which is gracefully done by placing the pillars alternately wide and close.

The entrance to the north and south is likewise by two magnificent porticos.

The east end is beautified by a noble piece of carving, in honour of king William III.

Over all is a dome, terminated by a lantern, ball, and cross.

The pilasters of the outside are doubled, which serve as buttresses, and give space to large windows between; they also adjust the arcades within and regulate the roof.

This cathedral is built in form of a cross. The dimensions from east to west, within the walls, are five hundred feet; from north to south, within the doors of the porticos, two hundred and twenty-three feet; the breadth, at the entrance, one hundred feet; its circuit, two thousand two hundred and ninety-two feet; its height, within, one hundred and ten feet; to the upper gallery, two hundred and sixty-six feet; to the top of the cross, sixty-four feet; from the level of the ground to the top, four hundred and forty feet; the diameter of the dome is one hundred and eight feet, of the ball, six feet; the diameter of the columns of the porticos, four feet; their height, forty-eight feet. To the top of the west pediment, under the figure of St. Paul, is one hundred and twenty feet. The height of the towers, at the west front, is two hundred and eighty feet. The length of the minute-hand, on the dial, eight feet; of the hour-hand, five feet five inches; of the hour-figures, two feet seven inches.

The whole cathedral stands on two acres, sixteen perches, twenty-three yards, and one foot of ground.

This vast fabric is surrounded with about two thousand five hundred strong iron pallisadoes, and in the area of the grand west front, on a pedestal, stands a statue of queen Anne: the figures on the base represent Britannia, with her spear; Gallia with a crown on her lap; Hibernia, with her harp; and America, with her bow: the workmanship of the ingenious Mr. Hill, who was chiefly employed in all the decorations. By this gentleman were performed those fine statues and carvings that add such spirit and beauty to the whole: the lively representation of St. Paul's conversion, carved in relief on the pediment of the principal front: the majestic figure of St. Paul, on the apex of the pediment, with St. Peter on his right, and St. James on his left; the four evangelists, with their proper emblems, on the front of the towers. St. Matthew is distinguished by an angel, St. Mark by a lion, St. Luke by an ox, and St. John by an eagle. On the pediment, over the north portico, the royal arms with the regalia, supported by angels, with the statues of five of the apostles. On the pediment over the south portico, a phoenix rising out of the flames, with the word RESURGAM underneath it: This device, perhaps, had its origin from the following incident: Sir Christopher having fixed upon the place for the center of the great dome, a labourer was ordered to bring him a flat stone from among the rubbish, to leave as a mark of direction to the masons; the first the fellow came at happened to be a grave stone, with nothing remaining of the inscription but the word RESURGAM: which was remarked by the architect as a favourable omen. On this side of the building are five statues, which take their situation from that of St. Andrew on the apex of the pediment just mentioned.

The highest or last stone, on the top of the lantern, was laid by Christopher Wren, the surveyor's son, in the reign of queen Anne, 1710, in the presence of Mr. Strong, the principal mason, and others chiefly employed in the execution of the work.

Thus in thirty-five years was this mighty fabric, lofty enough to be seen at sea eastward and at Windsor westward, begun and finished by one architect, one principal mason, and under one bishop of London, Dr. Henry Compton.

Within this cathedral are three isles. The vault is hemispherical, consisting of twenty-four cupolas, cut off semicircular, with segments to join to the great arches one way, and the other way way they are cut across with elliptical cylinders, to let in the upper lights of the nave; but in the isles the lesser cupolas are cut both ways in semi-circular sections, and altogether make a graceful geometrical form, distinguished with circular wreaths, which is the horizontal section of the cupola: the arches and wreaths are of stone, carved; the spandrels between are of sound brick, invested with stucco of cockle-shell lime, which becomes as hard as Portland-stone; and which, having large planes between the stone ribs, are capable of further ornaments of painting, if required. Besides these twenty-four cupolas, there is a half-cupola at the east, and the great cupola of one hundred and eight feet diameter, in the middle of the crossing of the great isles; it is extant out of the wall, and is very lightsome by the windows of the upper order, which strike down the light thro' the great colonnade that encircles the dome without, and serves for the buttment of the dome, which is brick, of two bricks thick; but as it rises every way five feet high, has a course of excellent brick of eighteen inches long bending through the whole thickness; and to make it still more secure, it is surrounded with a vast chain of iron, strongly linked together at every ten feet: this chain is let into a channel cut into the bandage of Portland-stone, and defended from the weather by filling the groove with lead. Over the first cupola is raised another structure of a cone of bricks, so built as to support a stone lantern of an elegant figure, and ending in ornaments of copper, gilt: the whole church above the vaulting being covered with a substantial oaken roof and lead, so this cone is covered and hid out of sight by another cupola of timber and lead; between which and the cone are easy stairs which ascend to the lantern: the contrivance here is astonishing. The light to these stairs is from the lantern above, and round the pedestal of the same.

The inside of the cupola is painted and richly decorated, by that eminent English artist Sir James Thornhill, who in eight compartments has represented the principal passages in the history of St. Paul's life; namely, his conversion; his punishing Elymas the sorcerer with blindness; his preaching at Athens; his curing the poor cripple at Lystra, and the reverence there paid him by the priests of Jupiter as a god; his conversion of the goaler; his preaching at Ephesus, and the burning the magic books in consequence of the miracles he there wrought; his trial before Agrippa; his shipwreck on the island of Melita, or Malta; and his miracle of the viper.

Besides the choir, the stalls of which are very beautifully carved, and the other ornaments of equal workmanship, there is a morning-prayer chapel, where divine service is performed every day, Sundays excepted; and opposite it, the confistory, each of which has a magnificent screen of carved wainscot, and has been greatly admired by the curious, as has the carving of the stately figures that adorn the organ-case.

In the center of the cross-isle, where is fixed a brass plate, you have a full view of the cupola or dome, and of the whispering gallery.

The choir, the isles on each side of it, and the organ, are inclosed with beautiful iron rails and gates.

The organ gallery is supported with Corinthian columns of blue and white marble. The choir has on each side thirty stalls, besides the bishop's throne on the south side; and on the north, the Lord-mayor's. The reader's desk is inclosed with very fine brass rails, gilt, in which is a gilt brass pillar, supporting an eagle of brass gilt, which holds the book on its back and expanded wings. The altar-piece is adorned with four noble fluted pilasters, painted and veined with gold, in imitation of lapis lazuli; and their capitals are double gilt. In the intercolumniations are twenty-one pannels of figured crimson velvet.

All the floor of the church and choir to the altar rails is paved with marble; the altar is paved with porphyry, polished, and laid in several geometrical figures.

This grand cathedral, thus finished, is undoubtedly one of the most magnificent modern buildings in Europe; and we will venture to conclude, that for loftiness and grandeur, beauty in perspective, truth and firmness in building, taste in design, harmony of parts, and convenience for the solemn celebration of divine worship, there neither is, nor ever was, so perfect a building, begun and finished under the sole direction, of one man, in the universe.

The colours hanging in the cathedral, over the western entrance, were taken from the French at Louisbourg in 1758. They consist of an artillery-standard, white and gold; one pair of Spanish ragged staves; one pair of Swiss ensign-colours, green and white; two pair of ensign colours blue and white; and two staves without colours.

As you enter at the south door, on your left hand are the stairs by which you ascend the cupola, which lead to the golden gallery by five hundred and thirty-four steps, two hundred and sixty of which are so easy that a child may ascend them; but those above are unpleasant, and in some places exceeding dark, particularly between the brick cone and the outer case of the dome; but what light you have affords you an amazing proof of the architect's wonderful contrivance. From this gallery you have a fine prospect of the river, city, and country round, which in a clear day discovers a pleasing variety.

From the whispering gallery you have the most advantageous view of the fine paintings in the cupola; there is an easy ascent to this gallery for persons of note, by a most beautiful flight of stairs, not to be exceeded: here sounds are enlarged to an amazing degree; the shutting of the door seems as loud as thunder at a distance; the least whisper is heard round the whole circumference, even the ticking of a watch; and one person speaking against the wall, on this side, appears to be present to another on the other side, though the distance between them is no less than one hundred and forty-three feet.

The flooring of the library is most artfully inlaid without either nails or pegs, like the framing of a billiard-table; the books are neither numerous nor valuable; but the wainscoting and cases

A a a

for

for their reception, want neither elegance nor convenience. There is here a fine painting of bishop Compton, under whom the cathedral was built.

It is a mistaken notion of many people that the model which is in the cathedral was taken from St. Peter's at Rome; for it was undoubtedly Sir Christopher's own invention, laboured with much study, and, as he thought, finished with good success. This design, which is of the Corinthian order, like St. Peter's at Rome, the surveyor set a higher value upon than any he drew; but it was not approved of by the bishops.

In the south tower is the great bell, which weighs eighty-four hundred weight. On this bell the hammer of the great clock strikes the hour; and on the lesser bell the quarters are struck.

The geometry stairs are composed of steps which are artfully contrived to hang, as it were, together without any visible support.

The whole expence of erecting this superb edifice amounted to the sum of seven hundred and thirty six thousand, seven hundred and fifty-two pounds two shillings and three-pence, the principal part of which was collected by a small and easy imposition on sea-coal.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

Her majesty's letter to the Lord-mayor on a rumour about bringing in the pretender. Thanksgiving for the peace. Death of Queen Anne. Accession of George I. with his public entry into London. Dines at Guildhall. Remarkable eclipse of the sun. Advice of an intended invasion. Seditions tumults in the city occasioned by the mug-houses. Act of common-council for lighting the city. War declared against Spain. South-sea scheme. Prodigious price of stocks. Birth of the duke of Cumberland. Secretary Townshend's letter to the Lord-mayor concerning a conspiracy. The city's address thereon. Number of horses within the bill of mortality. Contested election of Lord-mayor. Act for regulating elections.

THE city of London having been greatly injured by a number of foreigners who exercised several manual operations and trades by retail, in contradiction to the laws and customs of the city, the common-council, on the fourth of July, enacted, "that no person whatever, not being free of the city, shall by any colour, way, or means whatsoever, directly or indirectly, by himself, or any other, use, exercise, or occupy, any art, trade, mystery, manual occupation, or handicraft whatsoever, or keep any shop, room or place whatsoever, by way of retail, within the said city, or the liberties thereof, upon pain of forfeiting five pounds. And that what freeman soever does set any person that is not free on work, knowing and having notice given to him that such person so by him to be set to work, is a foreigner, shall forfeit five pounds. And that the freeman, who employs a foreigner to sell by retail, shall also forfeit for each offence the sum of five pounds."

In the year 1712, a rumour being spread that the ministry were paving the way for the pretender's accession to the crown, the trading part of the city were so intimidated thereat, that it put a general stop to all commerce. In this critical juncture her majesty thought it necessary, for the support of credit, and to prevent the Londoners entering into any associations or measures that might restrain the ministerial schemes being carried into execution, to send the following letter to the Lord-mayor.

"Anne R.

"Right trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well."

"Although an aguish indisposition, succeeded by a fit of the gout, has detained us at this place longer than we designed; yet, since it has pleased Almighty God to restore us to such a degree of health, that we hope to be able soon to return to our usual residence, we continue determined to open our parliament on Tuesday the sixteenth of this instant February, according to the notice given by proclamation."

"Thus much we have judged proper to communicate to you, and by you to the court of Aldermen, and to our other loving subjects of our good city of London; to the intent that you may all in your several stations contribute to discountenance, and put a stop to those malicious rumours, spread by evil disposed persons, to the prejudice of credit, and the eminent hazard of the public peace and tranquillity."

"And so we bid you farewell."

In the year 1713, a peace being concluded between Great-Britain and France, the same was proclaimed in London on the seventh of July: on which occasion both houses of parliament attended a general thanksgiving at St. Paul's, her majesty being ill of the gout; and at night fireworks were exhibited on the Thames, and in various parts of the city and suburbs.

About this time the papists and non-jurors so far defended the pretender's claim to the crown as to enlist men for his service; which greatly alarming the citizens, her majesty thought proper, to issue a proclamation, with a reward of five thousand pounds, for apprehending the said pretender.

This

This in some measure dispelled the gloomy apprehensions of the citizens, who, in a very loyal address, thanked her majesty for publishing the same.

Many irregularities and misdemeanors having been charged on the office of coal-meters in this city, a committee was appointed to enquire into the same; who, on the sixteenth of March, made their report to the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen. In which, after reciting various acts of common-council for the regulation thereof, they declare as follows: "We are therefore of opinion, that the said ancient order and method of the coal-office ought to be observed and kept, and that it is incumbent on the alderman of Billingsgate-ward to see the same performed. And that as well the master meters, as the said under-meters, are liable to be punished, by suspension, removal, or otherwise, as this court shall think fit. That the said master meters have no right to employ what deputies, or under-meters, they please; but that it is the right of the Lord-mayor and aldermen to allow of the deputies or under-meters, and that no other ought to be employed but such as they allow. That the said deputies, or under-meters, ought not to be displaced, but upon a reasonable cause, and that upon application to the Lord-mayor and aldermen for that purpose: but the alderman of the said ward may suspend an under-meter, till the pleasure of this court is known therein. That the books of the coal-office do concern the right of the inheritance of this city, and ought to be used and inspected by this court, as they shall find occasion, &c. That no under-meter ought to begin to work in coal, before a Cocket of Permit has been issued from the Lord-mayor's office, &c." Which report being read, it was approved of by the said court, and ordered to be entered in the repertory. And it was thereupon ordered, "that the said master-meters do observe the ancient method and usage of shipping their under-meters, according to their seniority. And that the under-meters do not take their fellow's labour out of their turns, upon pain of being suspended from their labours for so doing, by the alderman or deputy of Billingsgate-ward."

In the year 1714, her majesty being seized with a lethargic disorder, languished only three days, and died on the first of August, in the fiftieth year of her age.

On the death of queen Anne, George Lewis, elector of Hanover, was proclaimed the same day king of Great-Britain, &c. in the city of London with the usual solemnities on that occasion. Soon after which his majesty arriving in England, made his public entry on the twentieth of September, accompanied by his son prince George. His majesty was received at St. Margaret's-hill by the Lord-mayor and aldermen; and the recorder, in the name of the city, made a congratulatory speech on his majesty's happy arrival; after which he was conducted in the most superb and pompous manner to St. James's, where he arrived about eight o'clock in the evening. And the city and lieutenancy soon after addressing his majesty in form at St. James's, he was pleased to return this most gracious answer: "I take these addresses very kindly. I have lately been made sensible of what consequence the city of London is, and therefore shall be sure to take all their privileges and interests into my particular protection."

His majesty having received an invitation from the city to dine at Guildhall on the approaching Lord-mayor's-day, He was graciously pleased to accept of the same; at which time his majesty, and their royal highnesses the prince and princess of Wales, attended by a numerous train of nobility, went to the usual place of standing, opposite Bow-church, in Cheapside; and after having beheld the pompous cavalcade, they were conducted by the sheriffs to Guildhall, where they were sumptuously entertained by the citizens, who exerted the utmost of their abilities to convince them of their loyalty and affection for his majesty's person and government. And the Lord-mayor having the honour to present the first glass of wine to the king, his majesty was pleased to order a patent to be passed for creating his lordship a baronet of this kingdom; and at the same time ordered one thousand pounds to be paid to the sheriffs for the relief and discharge of poor people imprisoned for debt.

About this time the citizens, to shew their abhorrence of the proceedings of the late ministry with respect to the peace concluded with France, and their warm attachment for the house of Hanover, drew up the following spirited instructions to their new-chosen members:

"We, the citizens of London, who have cheerfully elected you to serve us in parliament, and thereby committed to your trust the safety, liberty, property, and privileges of us, and our posterity, think it our duty, as it is our undoubted right, to acquaint you what we desire and expect from you, in discharge of the great confidence we repose in you, and what we take to be your duty as our representatives."

1. We desire and expect, that you will enquire by whose council it was, that after God had blessed the arms of her late majesty and her allies, with a train of unparallelled successes, she was prevailed upon, contrary to the grand alliance, and her repeated promises from the throne to both houses, to send or receive managers from France to treat separately of a peace, without the knowledge and consent of our allies.

2. By whose advice the emperor's minister, the count de Gallas, was discharged the court, for resenting and opposing those separate negotiations, contrary not only to the grand alliance, but to the queen's particular assurances to his master.

3. By whose advice his majesty's memorial, delivered by his minister, the baron de Bothmar, against those clandestine separate negotiations, was not only disregarded, but called a libel, and the said minister affronted.

4. By whose advice and management her majesty was prevailed upon, first, to come to a cessation of arms with our common enemy, and then so surprizingly to withdraw our troops from those of the allies, which was attended with such dismal circumstances.

of

5. By whose advice and management, all that had been gained by a profusion of blood and treasure, in a glorious and successful war, was thrown up, just as we were seizing the prize of our conquest; and a free-born people were brought within a view of slavery.

6. By whose advice and management our constitution was struck at by creating twelve new lords at once, to carry a vote in the upper-house.

7. By whose advice it was, that the treaty with the Dutch, for settling a common barrier in the Netherlands, and making guarantees of the protestant succession, was enervated, and a new treaty, which weakened both securities, made in its place.

8. By whose advice and management we were mocked with the assurances of being free from the danger of the neighbouring fortresses of Dunkirk: and whether the late ministry, or any of them, did agree that the French king should make a new harbour at Mardyke, as part of the equivalent for demolishing the fortifications and harbour of Dunkirk.

9. By whose advice and management the best branches of our trade were exchanged for chimeras, and the ruin of the whole endangered, by a vile treaty of commerce with France.

10. How the expedition of Canada came to miscarry: and by whose advice her majesty, contrary to her proclamations, published in New-England, &c. for encouraging the expedition, came to allow the French to keep their interest in Canada, to sell that in Newfoundland, and to settle on Cape-Breton, to the great detriment of our fishing trade, and to the manifest danger of all our plantations in North America.

11. By whose advice it was, that the confederates were refused to be invited to be guarantees of the protestant succession, though her majesty had promised it in her answer to the address of both houses in 1708.

12. By whose advice it was, that his now royal highness, George, prince of Wales, was denied the liberty to come and take his place in parliament, when the presence of one of the illustrious family of Hanover was so absolutely necessary to quiet the minds of the subjects, and to secure us from the just apprehensions we had of danger from the pretender.

13. By whose advice it was that his majesty's minister, baron Schutz, was discharged the court, because he demanded a writ for the prince.

14. By whose advice was Sir Patrick Lawless, the pretender's agent or envoy, entertained at court, at the same time; and honourably conveyed beyond sea soon after it was complained of in parliament.

15. By whose advice and management our holy church was in danger of being given up to popery, our civil rights to tyranny, and the way prepared for the pretender.

16. By whose advice it was that the jacobite clans in Scotland were armed and kept in pay, and the levies of men for the pretender in Great-Britain and Ireland, were so long connived at.

17. By whose management it was, that the public affairs of the kingdom are brought under the greatest difficulties, as well in respect to our trade, and the interruption of our navigation, as of the great debts of the nation, which have been very much increased since the last war, as his majesty has been graciously pleased to inform us, in his proclamation for calling a new parliament.

18. We also desire and expect, that you concur in demanding an account how the money raised by parliament, has been expended since the change of the ministry, in 1710.

19. That you not only concur in such enquiries, but also, in a parliamentary way, to bring such to justice, as shall be found guilty of those mismanagements; this being a duty owing to ourselves, as well as our confederates, and indispensably necessary for retrieving the honour of the nation, and restoring a due confidence and harmony betwixt us and our allies.

20. That you concur in making such laws as shall be thought necessary for the better security of the churches of England and Scotland, as severally by the laws established, and for suppressing and preventing those seditious and groundless clamours of the church of England being in danger by his majesty's administration.

21. That you concur in giving the king such sums as shall be thought necessary for enabling his majesty to defend the nation, to support and retrieve trade, and to keep the balance of Europe, which is threatened with a new war, by the intrigues of our common enemies.

On the twenty-second of April 1715, there happened the greatest eclipse of the sun that was, perhaps, ever seen either in this or any other kingdom. It begun six minutes and twenty-eight seconds after eight in the morning, and ended twenty minutes and fifteen seconds after ten. The sun, for three minutes and twenty-three seconds, was so totally darkened, that the moon and stars appeared as clear as the brightest evening; and the dumb creation were so confused, that they precipitately retired to their respective holes, nests, and receptacles.

His majesty having informed the parliament of his receiving certain advices from abroad of an intended invasion in favour of the pretender, the merchants and citizens of London addressed his majesty on this occasion with the strongest assurances of their loyalty and support in defence of his royal person and government.

This threatened invasion, however, soon after turned out an open rebellion, which was fomented and brought about in Scotland by the earl of Mar, * who, on the third of September, had a meeting

* This nobleman, at the death of queen Anne, was secretary for Scotland, and was one of the first who made profession of loyalty and attachment to king George I. but not meeting with the encouragement he expected, he retired in disgust to his own country, where, prompted by resentment and ambition, he resolved to make an effort in favour of the pretender.

meeting at Aboyne in Scotland, with several of the nobility and gentry of that kingdom, where they resolved to draw together immediately what number of men they could, and to advance towards the South. Accordingly the earl of Mar caused the pretender's standard to be set up the sixth of that month, and in the orders for so doing, stiled himself lieutenant-general of the king's forces in Scotland. And on the ninth he published the following declaration :

" Our rightful and natural king James VIIIth, who, by the grace of God, is now coming to relieve us from our oppressions, having been pleased to intrust us with the direction of his affairs, and the command of his forces in this his ancient kingdom of Scotland. And some of his faithful subjects and servants met at Aboyne, viz. the lord Huntley, the lord Tulibardine, the earl marechal, the earl of Southesk, Glingary from the clans, Glenderule from the earl of Broadalbine, and gentlemen of Argyleshire, Mr. Patrick Lyon of Auchterhouse, the laird of Auldbair, lieutenant-general George Hamilton, major-general Gordon, and myself, having taken into our consideration his majesty's last and late orders to us, find, that as this is now the time that he ordered us to appear openly in arms for him ; so it seems to us absolutely necessary for his majesty's service, and the relieving of our native country from all its hardships, that all his faithful and loving subjects, and lovers of their country, should, with all possible speed, put themselves into arms. These are, therefore, in his majesty's name and authority, and by virtue of the power aforesaid, and by the king's special order to me thereunto, to require and empower you forthwith to raise your fencible men, with their best arms ; and you are immediately to march them to join me and some other of the king's forces at the Inver of Braemar, on Monday next, in order to proceed in our march, to attend the king's standard, with his other forces.

" The king intending that his forces should be paid from the time of their setting out, he expects, as he positively orders, that they behave themselves civilly, and commit no plundering, nor other disorders, upon the highest penalties, and his displeasure, which is expected you will see observed.

" Now is the time for all good men to shew their zeal for his majesty's service, whose cause is so deeply concerned, and the relief of our native country from oppression, and a foreign yoke, too heavy for us and our posterity to bear ; and to endeavour the restoring, not only of our rightful and native king, but also our country to its ancient, free, and independent constitution, under him, whose ancestors have reigned over us for so many generations.

" In so honourable, good, and just a cause, we cannot doubt of the assistance, direction, and blessing of almighty God, who has so often rescued the royal family of Stuart, and our country from sinking under oppression.

" Your punctual observance of these orders is expected : for the doing of all which, this shall " be to you, and all you employ in the execution of them, a sufficient warrant.

" Given at Braemar, the ninth of September, 1715.

MAR."

This year a very severe frost began about the end of November, and continued to the ninth of February. The river Thames was frozen over so hard, that booths were erected thereon for the sale of all sorts of merchandize ; and on the nineteenth of January two large oxen were roasted whole upon the ice.

In the month of December following, a great number of the nobility and gentry, taken in the rebellion at Preston in Lancashire, were brought prisoners to London, and dispersed in the various gaols of the city, several of whom were afterwards executed as traitors.

Notwithstanding the rebellion in Scotland was now happily suppressed, yet the disaffected part of the three kingdoms, having made the city of London their general rendezvous, became so daring and desperate, as publicly to reflect on, and dishonour the king in the streets of the city (particularly on his majesty's birth-day, his accession to the crown, and coronation). This was so highly resented by the friends of the government, that many of them formed themselves into societies to prevent the like practices for the future. They divided themselves into different bodies, and assembled in various parts of the city at certain alehouses, which, from the vessels they generally used, were called Mug-houses. At each of which were provided a great number of alpen cudgels, like quarter-staves, and each party, on advice of any tumultuous proceedings in the streets, immediately sallied forth, and, as best suited their particular interest, either dispersed, or supported the mob. The populace were so enraged at this, that many thousands of them assembled on the fourth of July, and attacked and rifled one of the said houses in Salisbury-court ; for which five of the rioters were apprehended, and afterwards hanged opposite the said house. Which punishment, for the present, effectually stopped these tumultuous proceedings.

On the eighteenth of December, the common-council passed an act, in which, after having repealed, annulled, and made void, all the former acts concerning the lighting of the city of London, they enacted, " That all housekeepers, whose house door, or gateway, does front or lie next unto any street, lane, or public passage or place of the said city or liberties thereof, shall, in every dark night, that is, every night between the second night after each full moon, and the seventh night after each new moon, set or hang out one or more lights, with sufficient cotton wicks, that shall continue to burn from six o'clock at night till eleven o'clock of the same night, on penalty of one shilling. And that, under the like penalty, the occupiers of houses in any court, that faces any public place or passage, shall alternately hang or set out such a light on the outside of such doors or gates as shall be next the said public place or passage. Provided the “ party offending is not charged to the poor,

B b b b

" party

 “ and whose house shall not be of the rent of “ ten pounds per annum. Penalties to be levied
 “ by distress and sale of the offender's goods, by “ warrant from the mayor.”

In the year 1717, one James Shepherd, apprentice to a coach-maker, a lad of eighteen years of age, of high jacobitical principles, sent a letter to one Mr. Leathes, a non-juring clergyman, proposing a scheme for assassinating the king. He was immediately apprehended and brought to trial. He said he had imbibed these principles at the school of Salisbury, and had been confirmed in them by the writings of several of the non-juring clergy. He owned the design of which he was accused, declared he had harboured it for three years past, nor did he think there was any sin in carrying it into execution. He was accordingly condemned on his own confession, and hanged at Tyburn.

About the same time, the marquis of Palcotti, an Italian nobleman, brother to the dutchess of Shrewsbury, underwent the same fate, for having, in a transport of passion, killed his own servant. After sentence of death had passed on him, strong applications were made to the king for a pardon, as well by his sister the dutchess, as by many other persons of the first distinction; but the common people became so clamorous for justice, that it was thought dangerous to save him, and he therefore suffered the penalties of the law.

On the eighth of June, a fire broke out in the chambers of Mr. Bonithan, in Coney-court, Gray's-inn, whose father, serjeant Bonithan, a few years before had shot himself; and this gentleman, when his chambers were in flames, first stabbed himself, then leaped out of his window, and died soon after. Four chambers were burnt down, and two others very much damaged.

On the thirteenth of December, the stream of the river Thames was reduced so low, by a violent westerly wind, that people walked dry-shod through most of the arches, and on both sides London-bridge.

In the year 1718, the Lord-mayor and aldermen being apprehensive of receiving trouble from some designing men, for their neglect to subscribe the declaration against the solemn league and covenant at their admission into office, addressed his majesty, praying that he would be graciously pleased to give such directions and orders therein, as should effectually quiet the minds of his petitioners, &c. To which address his majesty was graciously pleased to return the following answer.

“ I am fully persuaded of your duty and af“ fection to me and my government; and I take “ this application kindly, as it is a mark of “ your trust and confidence in me. I shall be “ glad, not only for your sakes but my own, if “ any defects, which may touch the rights of my “ good subjects, are discovered in my time; since
 “ that will furnish me with means of giving you,
 “ and all my people, an indisputable proof of “ my tenderness for their privileges, and how

“ unwilling I shall be to take advantage of their “ mistakes.”

On the seventeenth of December, war was declared against Spain in the usual places, and with the accustomed solemnities, within the cities of London and Westminster.

In the year 1719, complaint having been made to the house of lords, that great sums of money had been issued out of the chamber of London to prosecute law-suits on controverted elections, the lords appointed a committee to examine into the affair, who found, that, since the thirteenth of November 1711, the city had paid for these purposes the sum of two thousand, eight hundred and twenty-seven pounds, ten shillings. And that not one of the said suits was ever determined in favour of the prosecutors. The report being read by the clerk, the house came to the following resolution:

“ Resolved, by the lords spiritual and tempo“ ral in parliament assembled, that it is the opi“ nion of this house, that the common-councils
 “ of London, having issued great sums of money
 “ out of the chamber of London, in maintain“ ing several suits of law between citizen and “ citizen, relating to controverted elections, have “ abused their trust, and been guilty of great “ partiality, and of gross mismanagement of
 “ the city treasure, and a violation of the free“ dom of elections in the city.”

On the seventh of January, a fire broke out in the house of Mr. Astel, a merchant, in Austin Friars, which did considerable damage; but the greatest misfortune was, Mr. Astel's wife and daughter, and an infant at the breast, with its nurse, were all burnt to death. And a servant maid, who, to escape the flames, leaped out of a two pair of stairs window, received so much hurt, that she died in a few hours after.

In the year 1720, almost an entire stagnation was put to the trade of the city of London, by a scheme of the South-sea company for paying off the debts of the nation; in which they offered one thousand pounds per annum for every hundred pounds subscribed. This golden scheme so deluded the citizens, that without considering from whence such great advantages were to arise, they eagerly scraped up every sum they could raise upon their estates, or borrow, to make, as they called it, an instantaneous fortune; nay, they even went so far as to give two hundred pounds per cent. premium upon that subscription, and eleven hundred pounds per cent. for one hundred pounds stock, from which stock fell by degrees to eighty six; so that many thousand families, especially citizens of this great metropolis, were entirely ruined. Some retaliation, however, was afterwards made by the parliament, who passed an act, whereby the directors were compelled to forfeit their estates for the relief of those whom they had utterly undone by their iniquitous proceedings.

The following is a compleat and exact ballance of the estates of the sub-governor, deputy-governor, &c. of the South-sea company, as delivered vetred upon oath to the barons of the exchequer, together with the allowances out of each, thought proper by the grand committee of the house of commons to be made to each person respectively.

Persons.	Estates. l. s. d. q.	Allowances. l. s. d.
Sir John Fellows, sub-governor	243096 00 06	10000 0 0
Charles Joye, Esq; deputy-governor	40105 02 00	5000 0 0
Mr. Astell	27750 19 08½	5000 0 0
Sir John Blunt	183349 10 08½	1000 0 0
Sir Lambert Blackwell	83529 17 11	10000 0 0
Sir Robert Chaplin	45875 14 05	10000 0 0
Sir William Chapman	39161 06 08½	10000 0 0
Mr. Chester	140372 15 06	10000 0 0
Mr. Child	52437 19 01	10000 0 0
Mr. Delaport	17151 04 06	10000 0 0
Mr. Eyles	34329 16 07	20000 0 0
Mr. Edmondson	5365 00 00	3000 0 0
Mr. Gibbon	106543 05 06	10000 0 0
Mr. Gore	38936 15 05	20000 0 0
Mr. Hawes	40031 00 02½	31 0 2
Sir William Hammond	22707 04 02	10000 0 0
Mr. Horley	19962 05 03	10000 0 0
Mr. Holditch	39527 10 04	5000 0 0
Sir Theodore Janssen	243244 03 11	50000 0 0
Sir Jacob Jacobson	11481 04 00	11000 0 0
Mr. Ingram	16795 00 00	12000 0 0
Sir John Lambert	72508 01 05	5000 0 0
Sir Harcourt Master	11814 12 03½	5000 0 0
Mr. Morley	1869 10 03	1800 0 0
Mr. Page	34817 12 03½	10000 0 0
Mr. Raymond	64373 06 03	30000 0 0
Mr. Read	117297 16 00	10000 0 6
Mr. Reignolds	18368 13 02½	14000 0 0
Mr. Sawbridge	77254 01 08	5000 0 0
Mr. Tillard	19175 14 04	15000 0 0
Mr. Turner	881 17 06	800 0 0
Mr. Surman, deputy-cashier	121321 10 00	5000 0 0

This iniquitous scheme produced such misery to traders in general, that it became unfashionable not to be a bankrupt; and no age can parallel the great number of self-murders committed about that time.

At first South-sea stock sold at 86l. and afterwards rose to 1100l. which advance upon their original fund of ten millions, made their stock about one hundred and ten millions; which, with the rise of their four subscriptions, made the whole about two hundred and ninety-five millions.

This amazing sum had such an effect on other stocks, that Bank stock rose from 100l. to 260l. India from 100l. to 405l. African from 100l. to 200l. York-buildings from 10l. to 305l. Lustring from 5l. 2s. 6d. to 105l. English copper from 5l. to 105l. Welsh copper from 4l. 2s. 6d. to 95l. Royal Exchange assurance from 5l. 5s. to 250l. London assurance from 5l. to 175l.

William, duke of Cumberland, being born on the fifteenth of April, 1721, the Lord-mayor and aldermen attended his majesty on the occasion, when the recorder, in their name, congratulated the king in words to the following effect:

“ May it please your majesty,
“ The Lord-mayor and court of aldermen of
“ the city of London most humbly intreat your “ majesty’s permission to congratulate your ma“ jesty on the birth of the young prince. These “ your majesty’s faithful and dutiful subjects, be“ ing sensible of their felicity under the government of a protestant king, having reason to be “ thankful for the preservation of their religion,

“ their laws, and liberties, and for the many “ blessings they enjoy from your majesty’s mild “ and gracious disposition, cannot but rejoice at “ this increase of your majesty’s royal progeny,
“ at this addition of strength to the protestant “ interest, and on this agreeable prospect of the “ continuance of happiness to them and their “ posterity. They have great satisfaction in the “ hopes, that this young prince will inherit the “ bright and virtuous qualities of his ancestors;
“ they beg leave to wish for his health and wel“ fare, and that your majesty may live long, and “ have the comfort to see him flourish and prof-“ per, and to see him prove an ornament to your “ majesty’s most illustrious family, and a glory
“ and honour to the British nation.”

To which his majesty was pleased to return this most gracious answer:

“ The zeal and affection you have upon all “ occasions shewn to my person and government, “ leave me no room to doubt of your joy at this “ happy increase of my family.
“ I cannot omit taking this opportunity of as“ suring you, that I am truly concerned at the “ calamity brought upon you by the wicked ma“ nagement of affairs in the South-sea company.
“ I have, however, this comfort, that the reproach
“ of any part of this misfortune cannot, with
“ the least justice, be imputed to me. Nothing “ will give me more ease and satisfaction, than
“ the seeing you delivered from your present suf“ ferings, your trade revived, and public credit
“ re-established.”

About this time, the plague raging violently at Marseilles in France, the parliament, fearful it should approach this kingdom, passed an act for performing quarantine; wherein it was enacted, that every infected place should be inclosed and shut up by a line or trench, in order to cut off all communication; and that all persons endeavouring to escape from the said infected place, without having regularly performed quarantine, should suffer death as felons convict, without benefit of clergy.

The citizens of London apprehending that not only their rights and privileges, but likewise that the trade and prosperity of the city were greatly affected by this act; the Lord-mayor, aldermen, common-council, and merchants, petitioned the house of lords against three clauses in the said act, then under their lordships consideration. After some debates, the question being put that the said petition be received, it passed in the negative by a majority of sixty-three against twenty-two voices; when seventeen of the latter entered their protest for the following reasons:

1. Because the liberty of petitioning the king (much more that of petitioning either house of parliament) is the birth-right of the free people of this realm, claimed by them, and confirmed to them, soon after the revolution, in an act, declaring the rights and liberties of the subject, and

and settling the succession of the crown : and whenever any remarkable check hath been given to the free exercise of this right, it hath always been attended with ill consequences to the public.

2. Because, the petition so rejected, was, in our opinion, every way proper and unexceptionable, both as to the manner of wording and presenting it, and the matter to which it referred ; nothing being more natural and reasonable than that any corporate body should, if they desire it, be heard upon any bill, under the consideration of parliament, whereby they judge their particular interests to be highly though not solely affected. This liberty we remember to have been granted, in a late session, to the traders of Norwich, upon their petition touching the callicoe bill ; nor are we aware that it hath ever, in like circumstances, been refused to the meanest corporation in the kingdom : but, if it had, we humbly conceive that, in this case, a distinction might have been made in favour of the city of London ; which, being the center of credit, of the trade and monied interest of the kingdom, and the place where the plague, should we be visited by it, is most likely first to appear, and having also remarkably suffered by means of the late fatal South-sea scheme, was, we think, in a particular manner entitled to apply for relief against some clauses in the quarantine act, and deserved to have been treated, on that occasion, with more indulgence and tenderness.

3. Because the rejecting the said petition tends, we conceive, to discountenance all petitions, for the future, in cases of a public and general concern ; and by that means to deprive the legislature of proper lights, which they might otherwise receive ; it being no ways probable, that subjects or societies of less consideration will venture to represent their sense, in cases of like nature, after the city of London have been thus refused to be heard.

4. Because, as the receiving this petition could have had no ill consequences, as we conceive, nor have given any great interruption to the business of parliament, so the rejecting it may, we think, widen the unhappy differences that have arisen, increase the disaffection to the government, which hath already too much prevailed in this kingdom.

5. Because the arguments used on the debate, seem to us not to be of sufficient force ; for we cannot conceive, that, because the said act of quarantine is a general act, therefore no particular community or city, who think they may, in a distinguishing manner, be prejudiced by it, have a right to be heard in relation to it, and that at a time when it is under the consideration of parliament. Nor can we be of opinion, that a petition agreed on by the Lord-mayor, aldermen and citizens of London, in common-council assembled, and presented, not even by the numbers allowed by law, but by a lord of this house, can possibly be a prelude, or example, towards introducing tumultuous petitions ; much less can we see why it ought the rather to be rejected because it came from so great a body as the city of London ; on the contrary, we apprehend that an universal grievance, which may be occasioned by any general act, must be represented to the legislature by particular persons or bodies corporate, or else it cannot be represented at all ; that the rejecting such petitions, and the not receiving of them, is the way to occasion disorders and tumults ; and that the more considerable the body is, the more regard should be had to any applications they make ; especially for matters whereip not only the rights, privileges, and immunities, but also their trade, safety and prosperity, are, as the petition avers, highly concerned.

Bristol,
St. John de Bletsoe,
Fran. Cestriens.
Cowper,
Bathurst,
Boyle,
Ailsford,
Strafford,
Aberdeen,

Gower,
Fran. Roffen, Litchfield,
North and Grey,
Trevor,
Guildford,
Bingley, Uxbridge.

Notwithstanding the petition was rejected, yet a bill was soon after brought in, and passed both houses for reversing the clauses that affected the city of London.

In the year 1722 advices being received of a most treacherous conspiracy carried on against the government in favour of the pretender, the lord Townshend, by command of his majesty, sent the following letter to the Lord-mayor of London :

“ My lord,

“ His majesty, having nothing more at heart
“ than the peace and safety of his good city of “ London, the protection of its inhabitants, and
“ the support of public credit, has commanded
“ me to acquaint your lordship, that he has re“ ceived repeated and unquestionable advices,
“ that several of his subjects, forgetting the alle“ giance they owe to his majesty, as well as the “ natural love they ought to bear to their coun“ try, have entered into a wicked conspiracy, in “ concert with traitors abroad, for raising a re“ bellion in this kingdom in favour of a popish “ pretender, with a traiterous design to over“ throw our excellent constitution both in church
“ and state, and to subject a protestant free peo“ ple to tyranny and superstition ; but I am “ persuaded that it will be a great satisfaction to “ your lordship and the city to find, that, at “ the same time I am ordered to inform you of “ this design, I am likewise commanded by his “ majesty to let you know, that he is firmly “ assured, that the authors of it neither are nor “ will be supported, nor even countenanced, by “ any foreign power. And as his majesty has “ had timely notice of their wicked machina-
“ tions, and has made the proper dispositions
“ for defeating them, has no reason to doubt
“ but, by the continuance of the blessing of “ almighty God, and the ready assistance of his “ faithful subjects, this effort of the malice
“ of his enemies will be turned to their own con“ fusion.

“ His majesty makes no doubt but your lord“ ship, pursuant to the trust reposed in you, will,
“ in conjunction with the other magistrates of his

" his good city of London, exert, with the utmost care and vigilance, your authority at so important a conjuncture, for the preservation of the public peace, and the security of the city."

On the receipt of this letter, the Lord-mayor and aldermen immediately drew up an address to his majesty, which they next day presented in the following words :

" Most gracious sovereign,

" Your majesty having been graciously pleased to signify to the Lord-mayor, how much you have at heart the peace and safety of your city of London, the protection of its inhabitants, and the support of public credit; and that your majesty has unquestionable advices of a wicked conspiracy, entered into by some of your majesty's subjects, in concert with traitors abroad, for raising a rebellion in this kingdom, in favour of a popish pretender to your majesty's crown.

" We, the Lord-mayor and court of aldermen of this city, most humbly intreat your majesty's permission to make this our immediate approach to your royal presence, that we may return our most humble and unfeigned thanks for this instance of your majesty's tender and indulgent regard to your faithful and dutiful subjects of this city, and that we may have leave to give your majesty assurances of our steady and unalterable affection and zeal for your royal person and government, and for the continuance of the protestant succession in your royal family,

" And it is an unspeakable satisfaction to us, that we can at the same time congratulate your majesty on the happy success of those negotiations, which have procured assurances that these wicked and traitorous purposes will not be supported or countenanced by any foreign power.

" When we reflect on the many blessings which Britons enjoy under the protection of a prince, who makes the laws of this land his rule for the government of his people, when we consider that neither the civil nor religious rights of your majesty's subjects have met with the least instance of violation since your majesty's happy accession to the throne of these realms, when we recollect your majesty's royal clemency and benevolence (since the last rebellion) to numbers of those who had offended in the highest degree against their king and the laws of their country, we cannot but express the utmost abhorrence of those vile and detestable persons, who shall again conspire and attempt to bring a free and happy people under the yoke of tyranny and superstition, and to involve this nation in a state of blood, misery, and utmost confusion.

" And as these must be the unavoidable consequences attending any enterprize to alter our present happy establishment, and to introduce a popish one; as Englishmen that value our liberties, as honest men that have sworn allegiance to your majesty, and who have abjured and renounced the pretender, and as real friends to our excellent constitution in church and state, with a protestant prince at the head of it, we beg leave, in the most solemn manner, to declare to your majesty, that, as we are bound in gratitude, we will exert ourselves in our several stations, with the utmost care and vigilance, for the preservation of the public peace and tranquillity, and for the restoring of public credit, and that we will use our sincere and hearty endeavours for the firm support of your majesty upon the throne, and for the making your reign easy and happy.

" And we doubt not, but, by the blessing of almighty God upon the wisdom and conduct of your majesty, and the vigilance of your councils, and the ready and chearful assistance of your majesty's faithful subjects, your majesty will entirely defeat and frustrate the malice and efforts of all your enemies, their aiders and abettors, and that their wicked machinations will be turned to their own confusion."

To this his majesty was most graciously pleased to return the following answer :

" Your affectionate and cordial assurances upon this important occasion, of an unshaken zeal and fidelity to my person and government, give me the greatest satisfaction. Your interest and mine are and ever must be inseparable; and I doubt not but that, with the blessing of God, the precautions I have taken, and your firm adherence to our just cause, will soon convince our enemies, that their wicked designs can end in nothing but their own confusion. You may depend upon my constant care and utmost endeavours to support the public credit, to protect the privileges and properties of this great and opulent city, and to maintain the religion, laws and liberties of this kingdom."

On the twenty-second of May an order was made by the privy-council for the several lieutenancies within the bills of mortality to return an exact account of the number of houses within their respective jurisdictions; when the sum total, (exclusive of any mention being made in those of Southwark, or any other part on that side the river) amounted to no more than seventeen thousand six hundred and one.

Disputes perpetually arising between the citizens about building party-walls and water-spouts to their houses, the parliament, to adjust these contentions, enacted, That if any person refused or neglected to build his share of a party-wall, after due notice given him, his next neighbour may build it for him, and oblige the person so neglecting it to pay the charges of rebuilding it. And that the water falling from the tops of houses, balconies and pent-houses, shall be conveyed into channels or kennels, by pipes in the front, or sides of the houses, on pain of forfeiting twenty pounds.

In the year 1725, many citizens of London, being greatly agitated by a bill then depending

C c c c

in

in the house of commons for regulating elections within the said city, petitioned the house, setting forth the respective grievances under which they laboured, and praying, "That for promoting the welfare, for preserving the liberties, the peace and tranquillity of the said city, and for settling elections on a just and lasting foundation, the house would take the premises into consideration, and give the petitioners such relief as they should think most expedient."

In consequence of this application to parliament, a bill was brought in, "For regulating elections in the city of London; and for preserving the peace, good order, and government of the said city."

This bill, however, created great disturbances among the citizens, and notwithstanding it was strongly opposed in the house of commons, yet it passed in the following form:

"Whereas of late years great controversies and dissensions have arisen in the city of London at the elections of citizens to serve in parliament, and of mayors, aldermen, sheriffs, and other officers of the said city; and many evil-minded persons, having no right of voting, have unlawfully intruded themselves into the assemblies of the citizens, and presumed to give their votes at such elections, in manifest violation of the rights and privileges of the citizens, and of the freedom of their elections, and to the disturbance of the public peace: and whereas great numbers of wealthy persons, not free of the said city, do inhabit, and carry on the trade of merchandize, and other employments within the said city, and refuse or decline to become freemen of the same, by reason of an ancient custom within the said city, restraining the freemen of the same from disposing of their personal estates by their last wills and testaments: and whereas great dissensions have arisen between the aldermen and commons of the common-council of London, in or concerning the making or passing of acts, orders, or ordinances in common-council, which, if not timely settled and determined, may occasion great obstructions of the public business and concerns of the said city, and create many expensive controversies and suits at law, and be attended with other dangerous consequences. Now to the intent that suitable remedies may be provided for preserving the privileges of the city of London, and the freedom of elections therein, and for settling the right of such elections, and putting a stop to the aforesaid controversies and dissensions, and the ill consequences of the same, and that a constant supply may be had of able officers, capable of supporting the dignity of, and maintaining good order and government within that ancient, populous, and loyal city, which is of the greatest consequence to the whole kingdom; be it enacted by the king's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That at all times, from and after the first day of June, in

"the year of our lord 1725, upon every election of a citizen or citizens to serve for the said city of London, in parliament, and upon all elections of mayors, sheriffs, chamberlains, bridge-masters, auditors of chamberlains and bridge-masters accounts, and all and every other officer and officers to be chosen in and for the said city by the liverymen thereof, and upon all elections of aldermen and common-council-men, chosen at the respective ward-motes of the said city, the presiding officer or officers at such elections shall, in case a poll be demanded by any of the candidates, or any two or more of the electors, appoint a convenient number of clerks to take the same; which clerks shall take the said poll in the presence of the presiding officer or officers, and be sworn by such officer or officers truly and indifferently to take the same; and to set down the name of each voter, and his place of residence or abode, and for whom he shall poll; and to poll no person, who shall not be sworn; or being a quaker, shall not affirm according to the direction of this act: and every person, before he is admitted to poll at any election of any citizen or citizens to serve in parliament, or of any officer or officers usually chosen by the liverymen of the said city, as aforesaid, shall take the oath herein after mentioned, or being one of the people called quakers, shall solemnly affirm the effect thereof."

That every voter for an alderman shall swear, That he is a freeman of London, and an householder in the ward of —, and has not polled at this election.

"That if a poll be demanded, the presiding officer or officers at such election shall begin such poll the day the same shall be demanded, or the next day following at furthest, unless the same shall happen on a Sunday, and then on the next day after, and shall duly and orderly proceed thereon, from day to day, Sundays excepted, until such poll be finished, and shall finish the poll at elections by the liverymen, within seven days, exclusive of Sundays; and the poll at the wardmote, within three days, exclusive of Sundays, after the commencing the same respectively, and shall, upon adjourning the poll on each day, at all and every the elections aforesaid, seal up the poll books with the seals, and in the presence of such of the respective candidates, or persons deputed by them, as shall desire the same; and the said poll-books shall not be opened again, but at the time and place of meeting, in pursuance of such adjournment: and after the said poll is finished, the said poll-books being sealed, as aforesaid, shall, within two days after, be publicly opened at the place of election, and be duly and truly cast up; and within two days after such casting up, the numbers of the votes or polls for each candidate shall be truly, fairly, and publicly declared to the electors, at the place of election, by the officer or officers presiding at such election; and if a scrutiny shall, upon such declaration made, be lawfully demanded, the same shall be granted and proceeded upon, and the respective candidates shall immediately nominate to

" to the presiding officer or officers at such elec" tion, any number of persons qualified to vote
 " at such election, not exceeding six, to be scru" tineers for and on behalf of the candidate or " candidates on each side, to whom the presiding " officer or officers at such election, shall, within
 " six days next after such scrutiny shall be de" manded, upon request, and at the charge of
 " the candidate or candidates, or any the scruti-
 " neers on his or their behalfs, deliver or cause
 " to be delivered, to him or them, a true copy,
 " signed by such officer or officers, of the poll
 " taken at such election; and all and every the " scrutinies to be had or taken upon any election
 " to be made by the liverymen of the said city,
 " shall begin within ten days after the delivery of
 " the copies of the said polls, and be proceeded
 " on day by day, Sundays excepted, and shall be " finished within fifteen days after the commence" ment of such scrutiny; and thereupon the " presiding officer or officers shall, within four " days after the finishing such scrutiny, publicly
 " declare at the place of such election, which of " these candidates is or are duly elected, and the " number of legal votes for each candidate ap" pearing to him or them upon such scrutiny;
 " and on the election of any officer or officers at
 " the respective wardmotes of the said city, if a
 " scrutiny be demanded, the candidates, or scru-
 " tineers nominated on their behalfs respectively,
 " shall, within ten days next after the receipt of
 " the copy or copies of the polls taken at such " election, deliver or cause to be delivered, to
 " the presiding officer or officers, the names in " writing of the several persons, who have polled
 " in the said election, against whose votes they " shall object, with the particular objections
 " against each respective name; and the presiding
 " officer or officers shall thereupon within three " days then next following, at the request and
 " charges of any candidate or candidates, or the " scrutineers named on his or their behalfs, de" liver, or cause to be delivered, to him or them,
 " one or more true copy or copies, signed as " aforesaid, of the paper containing such names
 " and objections, as aforesaid; and the said pre" siding officer or officers, within ten days then
 " next following, exclusive of Sundays, after
 " having fully heard such of the said candidates,
 " as shall desire the same, or some person ap" pointed by him or them, touching such objec" tions, shall, at or in the place of election,
 " openly and publicly declare which of the said
 " candidates is or are duly elected, and the num" ber of legal votes for each candidate appearing " to him or them upon such scrutiny; and if the
 " said presiding officer or officers, or any other " person or persons, shall offend in the premises,
 " every such offender shall forfeit for every such
 " offence the sum of two hundred pounds of law" ful money of Great-Britain, with full costs of " suit, over and above all other penalties and
 " forfeitures inflicted by any other act or acts of " parliament.

" That the right of election of aldermen and
 " common-councilmen, for the several and re" spective wards of the said city, shall belong

" and appertain to freemen of the said city of " London, being householders, paying scot, as " herein after is mentioned and provided, and " bearing lot, when required, in their several
 " and respective wards, and to none other what" soever.

" Provided nevertheless, that the houses of
 " such householder be respectively of true and real
 " value of ten pounds a year, at least; and that
 " such householders be respectively the sole occu-
 " piers of such houses, and have been actually in
 " the possession respectively of a house of such
 " value, in the ward wherein the election is made,
 " by the space of twelve kalendar months next
 " before such election.

" Provided also and for the better ascertaining
 " what are the rates and taxes, to which such
 " householders ought to contribute and pay their
 " scot, the same are hereby declared and enacted
 " to be a rate to the church, to the poor, to the " scavenger, to the orphans, and to the rates in " lieu of or for the watch and ward, and to such
 " other annual rates, as the citizens of London,
 " inhabiting therein, shall hereafter be liable unto,
 " other than and except annual aids granted or to
 " be granted by parliament; and in case any such
 " householder, within the space aforesaid, shall " have been rated and charged, and contributed
 " and paid his scot to all the said rates or taxes,
 " or thirty shillings a year to all, or some of them
 " except as aforesaid; every such person shall be " deemed and taken to be a person paying of
 " scot." With a proviso that partners in trade
 " may vote, each paying ten pounds a year rent:
 " and two inhabiting the same house, each pay" ing scot and ten pounds per annum rent. With " an exemption of all persons, who are discharged
 " from paying scot and bearing any lot by act of " parliament, charter or writ of privilege.

" It was further enacted, " That no person or " persons whatsoever, shall have any right or
 " title to vote at any election of a citizen or citi" zens to serve in parliament for the said city, or
 " of any mayor, or other officer or officers to be " chosen by the liverymen thereof, who have " not been upon the livery by the space of twelve
 " kalendar months before such election, and who " shall not have paid their respective livery-fines,
 " or, who having paid the same, shall have re" ceived such fines back again in part or in all,
 " or shall have had any allowance in respect
 " thereof; and no person or persons whatsoever
 " shall have any right to vote at any election of " a citizen or citizens to serve in parliament, or
 " of any mayor, alderman, or other officer or " officers of or for the said city, or any the wards,
 " or precincts thereof who have at any time,
 " within the space of two years next before such
 " election or elections, requested to be, and ac" cordingly have been discharged from paying to
 " the rates and taxes, to which the citizens of " London, inhabiting therein, are or shall be " liable, as aforesaid, or any of them; or have,
 " within the time aforesaid, had or received any
 " alms whatsoever; and the vote of every such " person shall be void.

" And

“ And that no act, order, or ordinance whatsoever, shall be made or passed in the common-council of the said city, without the assent of the mayor and aldermen present at such common-council, or the major part of them, nor without the assent of the commons present at such common-council, or the major part of them.

“ Provided always, that nothing in this act contained, shall extend, or be construed to extend, to any election, nomination or appointment in common-council, of any common-serjeant, town-clerk, judges of the sheriffs-court, coroner, common-cryer, commissioners of sewers, garbler, and the governor and assistants of London of the new plantation of Ulster in Ireland; but that the election, nomination, or appointment, of all or any of the said officers, shall and may be made by the mayor, aldermen and commons, in common-council assembled, or the major part of them.”

This act then proceeds with a clause to enable freemen to dispose of their personal estates, alleging, “ that to the intent that persons of wealth and ability, who exercise the business of merchandize, and other laudable employments, within the said city, may not be discouraged from becoming free of the same, by reason of the custom restraining the citizens and freemen thereof from disposing of their personal estates by their last wills and testaments; be it further enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that it shall and may be lawful to and for all and every person and persons, who shall, at any time from and after the first day of June, 1725, be made, or become free of the said city, and also to and for all and every person and persons, who are already free of the said city, and on the said first day of June, 1725, shall be unmarried, and not have issue by any former marriage, to give, devise, will, and dispose of his and their personal estate and estates, to such person and persons, and to such use and uses, as he or they shall think fit; any custom or usage of or in the said city, or any by-law or ordinance, made or observed, within the same, to the contrary thereof, in any wise notwithstanding.”

It was also enacted, by another clause added to this bill, (for the alteration of a freeman's oath) “ That there shall be omitted and left out of the oath of a freeman of the said city, the words following, that is to say, [ye shall know no foreigner to buy or sell any merchandize with any other foreigner within the said city, or the franchise thereof: but ye shall warn the chamberlain thereof, or some minister of the chamber:] and also these words following, that is to say, [ye shall implead or sue no freeman out of the city, whilst ye may have right and law within the same city]: and after these words, [ye shall take no apprentice] the words immediately following shall also be omitted, that is to say, [but if he be free-born, that is to say, no bondsmen's son, nor the child of an alien,] and for [no] these words [for any] shall be inserted in the said oath.”

As soon as the citizens knew the contents of this bill, and that it was sent up to the house of lords for their determination, a great number of freemen petitioned the house against it in the following manner:

“ That your petitioners waited with much patience and contentment of mind, (as very well became them) whilst the bill lately depending in the honourable house of commons, intitled, (an act for regulating elections in the city of London, and for maintaining the peace, good order, and government of the same city,) was there forming.

“ That they were fully persuaded that the same at last would be there so finished, as fully to answer the title thereof, and the good intentions which that honourable house always bears towards the citizens of London; but notwithstanding, your petitioners, with great concern of mind, humbly crave leave to represent to your lordships, that the said bill now transmitted thence to your lordships, in the form it now stands, will not only, as your petitioners apprehend, highly affect the rights and privileges of the freemen in particular, but the laudable and ancient government and customs of the city in general, in many instances, some of which, with perfect duty, submission, and resignation, we beg leave to lay before your lordships.

“ For that the said bill takes away from great numbers of the freemen (other than paupers and nonjurors) the undoubted rights which they before had of voting in their corporate elections, without any crime or fault in their assigned.

“ For that it destroys the former qualification of a voter in wardmote elections, and hath substituted a new, complicated, and uncertain one, in the room of it, and which, as your petitioners apprehend, may be productive of various controversies and disputes.

“ For that the said bill, in effect, leaves all the remaining votes of the city at the mercy of the presiding officer, who may still declare as he may be inclined, without granting a copy of the poll scrutinized, or giving any account what votes he allows or disallows, notwithstanding this bill; whence the remedy either for the injured candidate or voter, becomes exceeding difficult, if not wholly impracticable.

“ For that the bill, in a manner, abolishes the ancient and laudable custom of distribution of freemen's personal estates, so agreeable to natural equity, and so wisely adapted to the prosperity of a trading city, without just occasion, and upon suggestions not well grounded, as we humbly apprehend.

“ Lastly, For that by the same bill as your petitioners humbly apprehend, the commoners in common-council, who are two hundred and thirty-four in number, and though they are all unanimous, may nevertheless be restrained from applying to his majesty, or either house of parliament, upon any occasion, how neces“ sary

“sary soever; from issuing out of the chamber
 “so much as one farthing, upon any occasion,
 “how just soever; or seal any city lease, though “upon terms ever so advantageous; or come to “any resolution whatsoever, and how reasonable “soever, without the consent of the mayor and “aldermen, or the majority of them, though
 “they should be no more than three of them
 “there present: and this, as it is said, by the “ancient constitution of the city; and yet, which “is very extraordinary, the same bill lays no
 “restraint upon the power, which the Lord-“mayor and aldermen exercise themselves over
 “the public purse and the seal, which is now “become very great and extensive: if such hath “been the ancient constitution of the city, your “petitioners humbly beg leave to say, that the “same hath been so ancient, that few or no foot“steps thereof have remained to this day; and “that in the memories of the oldest of us, the “same hath never so much as been claimed or “mentioned by the mayor and aldermen, except “twice only; first in the year 1674, and now
 “again very lately, and both times relinquished
 “as soon as mentioned: and yet we find by “experience, that the Lord-mayor and al“dermen are never wanting to assert the most “remote pretensions to all their rights and pri“vileges.

“From such alterations and innovations, your “petitioners have too just reason to apprehend,
 “that the good fruit and effect intended by this “bill is not to be expected from it in the form
 “it now stands, and that the controversies and “dissentions of the city will not thereby be less“ened but increased.

“Wherefore your petitioners humbly intreat
 “your lordships to take the premises into your “tender consideration; to ascertain the quali“fications of the several voters in our elections;
 “the manner of our elections; to put a check
 “upon the behaviour of the presiding officers;
 “and to establish the good government and an“cient custom of the city, in such manner, as “to your lordship’s profound wisdom shall seem “just and reasonable, and may be compatible “with the rights, privileges, and freedom of the “said city: and that your petitioners may be “heard by their council, or otherwise, what they “have humbly to offer against such parts of the “said bill, as relate to the matters aforesaid, in “such manner as your lordships shall think “fit.”

After the petition was read, it was proposed to ask the opinions of the judges, “whether this “bill does repeal any of the prescriptions, privi“leges, customs and liberties of the said city of “London, restored to them, or preserved by the “act passed in the second year of king William
 “and queen Mary, for reversing the judgment
 “in a quo warranto against the city of London,
 “and for restoring the said city to its ancient “rights and privileges.

Various debates arising thereupon the question was put, “whether the judges shall deliver “their opinions upon the said proposed question?”
 It was resolved in the negative. On which the lords for the question entered their protest as follows:

Dissentient’.

1. Because it being enacted and declared, by the act mentioned in the question, that the mayor, commonalty, and citizens of London, shall for ever hereafter remain, continue, and be prescribed to be a body corporate in re facto & nomine, by the name of mayor and commonalty, and citizens of the city of London, and shall, as by law they ought, peaceably enjoy all and every their rights, gifts, charters, grants, liberties, privileges, franchises, customs, usages, constitutions, prescriptions, immunities, markets, duties, tolls, lands, tenements, estates, and hereditaments whatsoever, which they had, or had a right or interest in, or to, at the time of giving the said judgment: and we being apprehensive that the alterations made in this bill, in the constitution of the common-council, and other ancient rights, franchises, and prescriptions of the city, may utterly abolish the ancient legal title of the city to their rights, franchises, prescriptions, and constitutions, in the particulars contained in the said bill, and may,
 in consequence thereof, work a total change of the whole ancient constitution of the corporation of the said city, or greatly confound or prejudice the same, which has stood for so many ages, upon the foundation of its ancient title, rights, and prescription, confirmed by many grants, made by his majesty’s royal progenitors, and by many acts of parliament, all which were restored so soon after the happy and glorious revolution, and which have been peaceably enjoyed to the present time. We are of opinion that the solution of the said question by the judges, must have tended greatly to the necessary information of the house, and to their better judgment upon a bill of so great importance, as well as to the satisfaction and quiet of the citizens of London, who, so far as we can collect from the petitioners against the bill, are greatly alarmed at the consequence thereof: and we are of opinion, that it was the more necessary, and more consistent with the wisdom of this house, to be informed of the law by the judges upon the question proposed, because we don’t find in this bill, any saving or confirmation of any of the ancient titles, rights, prescriptions, privileges or franchises of the said city restored to them by the former law.

2. We think the question ought to have been proposed to the judges, the rather because the opinions of several counsels were admitted to be read at the bar of the committee of the whole house, in favour of the bill.

Bathurst,	Litchfield,	Foley,
Wharton,	St. John Bletsoe,	Franc. Cestriensis,
Arundel,	Strafford,	Lechmere,
Bruce,	Bingley,	Montjoy,
Coventry,	Gower,	Abingdon.
Bristol,

When it was resolved in the affirmative that the said bill with the amendment should pass, the following protest was entered:

D d d d

Dissentient’.

Dissentient.Lechmere,Warrington.

1. Because we apprehend, that the penalty of two hundred pounds upon the officer presiding at wardmote elections, as well at elections even for members of parliament, is so small, that it may be construed into an indemnification, and be looked upon rather as an encouragement than a restraint, by a wealthy, partial, and arbitrary officer: at least, we are of opinion, that such a one will not be sufficiently deterred by it from returning such candidates as he likes, rather than such as the city chooses; and if ever that melancholy case shall happen, we fear, neither the candidates nor voters will be able to find an effectual method of doing justice for so flagrant an injury, either to themselves or to the nation.

2. Because we cannot but think, from the evidence given at the bar, that this bill will take away from many citizens their right of voting in wardmote elections, by giving an exclusion to all those who inhabit houses under ten pounds a year, even though they pay parish duties, or thirty shillings in lieu of them, which we conceive an unjustifiable hardship upon those who may have long enjoyed that right, and have had no crime objected to them, much less proved, as we think it ought to be, before they can justly be deprived of it.

3. Because by this bill no act is to pass in common-council, for the future, except what relates to the nomination of some few officers, without the assent of the major part of the mayor and aldermen, present in such common-council, which we conceive will give too great an addition of power to the mayor and aldermen, who have already many and large prerogatives incontestably allowed them by the commonalty of the city; and though the council for the bill insisted, that the mayor and aldermen had anciently that right, which this bill establishes, yet the proof of that right appeared to us so remote and obscure, that we our ownelves were too short sighted to discern it; and on the other side it appears plain to us, that even from the time of incorporating the city to this present time, such a claim has very seldom been made; and that it has never been acknowledged, and therefore we conceive if there be any foundation for such right, which we are far from thinking there is, the dispute should be decided first in the inferior courts of justice, and rather determined in the house of lords upon an appeal, than ended by an act of parliament, which seems to us such a method of determining controversies of this nature, as may prove of the most dangerous consequence to the rights and properties of all the subjects of Great Britain.

4. Because the bill abolishes the custom relating to the distribution of the personal estates of free citizens; which is a custom not only of great antiquity, but seems to us to be wisely calculated for the benefit of a trading city, and has been acquiesced under for so many years, without the least complaint of any one free citizen, that we ever heard of; that the taking it away in this manner cannot but appear to us too rash and precipitate; and may too, probably, in our opinion, be very detrimental to the true interest of this ancient, populous, loyal, and hitherto flourishing city, the preservation of whose good order and government, the bill itself very justly and judiciously allows to be of the greatest consequence to the whole kingdom.

Scarsdale,	Bruce,	Montjoy,
Strafford,	Fr. Cestrien <sup>r</sup> .	Gower,
Boyle,	Abingdon,	Foley,
Bathurst,	Uxbridge,	Bristol,
Bingley,	Wharton,	Exeter,
Compton,	Craven,	Arundel,
Berkeley de Str.	Weston,	Litchfield,
		St. John Bletloe.

Dissentient.

For the foregoing reasons, and those that follow, (viz.)

1. Because we are of opinion that the great alterations made by this bill in the ancient constitution of the common-council, and other the rights, franchises, and prescriptions of the city of London, will, if passed into a law, entirely subvert and destroy the ancient title, which the city at this time lawfully claims, and has had hitherto; and will introduce and enact a new constitution upon the city hereafter, to be claimed and enjoyed, not upon the foundation of their ancient title, but of this act of parliament, which must, as we conceive, in all future times, whenever the city of London may have occasion to assert or defend their ancient title and franchises, bring them under insuperable difficulties, and may be followed with dangerous consequences, concerning the very being and constitution of the corporation, many of which it is impossible to foresee or enumerate.

2. We are of opinion, that the new constitution of the common-council enacted by this bill, whereby a negative is declared, and given to the mayor and aldermen, not only in the making of by-laws, for the government of the city, but in other acts concerning the issuing and disposal of the treasure of the city, and also of the seal of the city, whereby their lands and other estates are subjected to the said negative, and in all other acts and powers at this time, as we conceive, belonging to the common-council, except only the appointment of some few officers, mentioned in the bill, is a dangerous innovation upon the city, unsupported by any evidence offered at the bar, of the ancient constitution, and though in late time mentioned to be claimed, yet contrary, as we conceive, to a clear, uninterrupted, and convincing proof of the exercise of the powers and authorities of the common-council, in all ages, to the 29th of January, 1723. And we conceive, the alteration made by the bill, in this respect, to be the more unwarrantable, because the written evidence offered to support the claim of a negative by the mayor and aldermen, was either conceived in general terms, unapplicable to that claim, and not maintained by subsequent practice, or was drawn from proceedings in times of trouble and confusion.

3. We

3. We are of opinion, that the extraordinary power given by this bill to the mayor and aldermen, will rest in them new and exorbitant authorities over all the citizens, their rights, liberties, and franchises of all kinds inconsistent with that balance of power in the city by which the same have been preserved, and in the future exercise thereof, must, as we conceive, lay the foundation of constant and lasting disputes, divisions, and distraction in the city of London.

4. We think this bill is more dangerous, because it creates a new constitution in several particulars contained in it, not framed upon the ancient rights, proved or pretended to, or disputed on either side; but is a new model, without due regard to the antecedent rights, as claimed by either side; and will deprive a great number of citizens of their ancient rights and franchises in elections, and otherwise, without leaving them any opportunity of asserting the same by due course of law; and is a precedent of the most dangerous consequence to all the cities and corporations of this kingdom.

5. We are of opinion, that the abolition of the ancient custom of the city, touching the personal estates of freemen, is a dangerous innovation, tending to let in to the government of the city, persons unexperienced and unpractised in the laudable and beneficial trade of the city and kingdom, and unfit for the magistracy of the city, and may thereby introduce improper and pernicious influences over the citizens; and we think that the strength, the riches, power and safety of the city of London have been hitherto, in a great measure supported by this and other customs of the city, as the walls thereof; and we fear, that the decay of trade, and with that of the grandeur of the city of London, and the diminution and loss of the great excises and duties arising from the trade of the city, on which the support of his majesty's government so much depends, may be the consequence of the abolition of this ancient custom and privilege of the freemen of the city of London.

6. Because we are of opinion, that the petition of the many thousand freemen of the city against this bill, ought to be of far greater weight, than the petition of fifteen aldermen for it, and that the confusion which may arise from this bill, if passed into a law, may tend greatly to the future disturbance of his majesty's wife and gentle government.

Wharton,
Coventry,

Strafford.

Notwithstanding these debates, the bill soon after passed, in conformity to the original intent.

CHAPTER XL.

Treaty concluded between the emperor of Germany and Spain. Foundation of Guy's-hospital. Mutiny in Newgate. Death of George I. and accession of George II. King and queen entertained at Guildhall on Lord-mayor's-day. Account of the banquet. A design formed to rob the queen on her return from the city. Remarkable high tide. A petition for filling up Fleet-ditch, and making a market. Scheme for a general excise. Marriage of the princess royal with the prince of Orange. Great contest on the election of chamberlain. Violent storm of wind. Regulation of bakers. Black-friars added to the city. Act of parliament for a new method of Lighting the city, and settling the watch. A boy killed by the fly of a mill. King's printing-house burnt. Merchants petition against the depredations of the Spaniards.

A Treaty of peace having been concluded between the emperor of Germany and king of Spain very disadvantageous to the rights and privileges of Great-Britain, and calculated to destroy the chief branches of the british trade, and to favour the cause of the pretender, the citizens of London highly resenting the same, presented a loyal address to their injured king; in which they assured his majesty, "that the loyal city of London would be always ready to sacrifice their lives and fortunes in defence of his royal person and government, and of our excellent constitution, both in church and state, against all his enemies whatsoever."

His majesty not only returned them his hearty thanks for this additional mark of their affection for his person and government, but likewise entertained the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council, in a very sumptuous and magnificent manner at dinner, in his palace at St. James's, accompanied by the principal ministers of state, and a great number of the nobility.

About this time Orator Henly, the son of a worthy divine, set up a new sect under the title of an oratory. To advance which he informed the public, that on the third of July the oratory would be opened; that the fundamental authority of this institution, considered as a church, would be the same with that of all the modern churches; that is, "a legal liberty of private judgment in religion, which is the very principle of the reformation, the basis of all the protestant interest, and the most valuable branch of the freedom of our constitution." At the same time, in order to prevent any disturbance he might receive, on account of his separation from the church, in which he had been ordained a priest, he resolved to shelter himself under the canon of the toleration act; for which purpose he took the oaths of abjuration and allegiance, before the bench of justices at Hicks's-hall.

The place Mr. Henly adapted for his oratory was very remarkable, and befitting his novel institution; being a sort of wooden booth, built over the shambles in Newport market, near Leicester-fields, formerly used for a temporary meeting-house of a calvinistical congregation. After which he moved near to the west entrance into Clare market.

Although his private fortune was greatly increased by money paid for admission into his oratory for upwards of thirty-five years, yet he could never form an established congregation; nor does it appear that his religion gained him one profelyte; his whole system and conduct for that time exhibiting nothing more than satyr, burlesque, and grimace.

This year Guy's hospital was built at the sole expence of Mr. Thomas Guy, formerly a bookseller in London, afterwards member of parliament for Tamworth, who left a benefaction of two hundred thousand pounds for its support.

In the year 1726, some malefactors under sentence of death in the condemned hold of Newgate, having been previously supplied with arms, barrocaded the door of the said hold on the morning appointed for their execution; intimation whereof being sent to the sheriff, he went to the prison, and endeavoured to persuade them to surrender; but they remaining obstinate, the keepers fired in upon them from above; and after several wounds received, they surrendered, and were executed according to their sentence. The sheriff, however, was seized with the goal distemper, of which he soon after died.

In the year 1727, his majesty, who had not been abroad for two years, resolved to visit his German dominions. Accordingly, having appointed a regency, he embarked at Greenwich on the third of June, and landing in Holland on the seventh, set out on his journey to Hanover. On the ninth he arrived in apparent good health, between ten and eleven at night, at Delden. He supped heartily, rested well, and proceeded on his journey about four in the morning. Between eight and nine he ordered the coach to stop, and perceiving one of his hands to stand motionless, said, "I cannot move this hand." Soon after his eyes began to stare, his mouth to be distorted, and his tongue to swell, so that he was deprived of the faculty of speech. He was instantly seized with a fit of the palsy, and though recovered a little by opening a vein, he soon after became lethargic, and was conveyed in a state of insensibility to Osnaburg, where he expired on Sunday the eleventh of June, in his brother's palace, and was interred at Hanover among his ancestors.

On the demise of king George I. his only son, his royal highness George, then prince of Wales, was proclaimed on the fifteenth of June, by the name of king George II. The proclamation was first made before Leicester house, where the officers of state, nobility, and privy-counsellors were present, with the officers of arms, all being on foot; then the officers of arms being mounted on horseback, the like was done in Leicester-square, at Charing-cross, within Temple-bar, at the end of Wood-street in Cheapside, and lastly, at the Royal Exchange, with the usual solemnities. The proclamation ran thus:

"Whereas it hath pleased almighty God to call to his mercy our late sovereign lord king George, of blessed memory, by whose decease the imperial crowns of Great Britain, France and Ireland, are solely and rightfully come to the high and mighty prince George, prince of Wales; we, therefore, the lords spiritual and temporal of this realm, being here assisted with those of his late majesty's privy-council, with numbers of other principal gentlemen of quality, with the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and citizens of London, do now hereby, with one full voice, and consent of tongue and heart, publish and proclaim, That the high and mighty prince George, prince of Wales, is now, by the death of our late sovereign, of happy memory, become our only lawful and rightful liege lord George the second, by the grace of God, king of Great-Britain, France and Ireland, defender of the faith, &c. to whom we do acknowledge all faith and constant obedience, with all hearty and humble affection, beseeching God, by whom kings and queens do reign, to bless the royal king George the second with long and happy years to reign over us. Given at the court at Leicester-house, this fourteenth day of June, 1727.
"God save the king."

Two days after, the city of London addressed his majesty and the queen in a most loyal and affectionate manner. And on the sixth of October following, they invited their majesties, his royal highness the duke, and the three eldest princesses to dinner at Guildhall, on the approaching Lord-mayor's day; which their majesties graciously accepting, a committee of eight aldermen and sixteen commoners were appointed to super-intend the entertainment to be provided for the occasion. On the appointed day, their majesties, with the duke and princesses, attended by the great officers of state, with a numerous train of the nobility, and all the foreign ministers, came into the city, and in the usual place appointed for the purpose, beheld the pompous cavalcade; after which they were conducted to Guildhall, where, on entering the council chamber, the recorder, in the name of the citizens, complimented his majesty in the following speech:

May it please your majesty,

"The Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of this city beg leave to offer their most humble acknowledgements for this great honour to the city by the presence of your majesty, your royal consort, the princess royal and his royal highness. Their joy is inexpressible, to behold their sovereign condescending to accept their good will and affections, and, in the most engaging

"gaging manner, vouchsafing here to receive their
"homage and duty.

"This day will ever be remembered by them
"with the highest satisfaction. This happy day
"which gave birth to their most gracious king,
"who is pleased thus to honour them in the en"joyment of all their rights and privileges. A "prince who takes pleasure in promoting their
"happiness; and who thinks it gives the truest
"lustre to his crown, to preserve the religion,
"the laws, and liberties of his people. Fortu"nate is their present condition, and delightful
"is their prospect, while they have in view your "majesty, their most gracious and justly ad"mired queen, and the illustrious branches of
"your royal family.

"Permit, Sir, these your majesty's most faith"ful subjects, to take this opportunity of assur-
"ing your majesty of their unalterable attach"ment to your royal person, and of the warmest
"zeal for the support of your government; the "best, the only security of our excellent consti"tution in church and state, and of every thing
"which is dear and valuable to Englishmen.
"Gratitude and interest make these the unani"mous sentiments of this your majesty's most
"loyal, and most dutiful city of London."

Their majesties and the princesses then proceeded to the hustings, where they were most sumptuously entertained; after which they were graciously pleased to honour the ball with their presence till eleven o'clock in the evening. And his majesty ordered the sum of one thousand pounds to be paid to the sheriffs, for the relief and discharge of poor insolvent debtors.

As the citizens of London exerted their utmost abilities to make this royal entertainment as splendid as possible, it may not be unentertaining to our readers to give a particular account of it as recorded in the entertainment book in the chamber of London.

Fifteen tables were placed for the accommodation of the illustrious company; at the first of which, on the hustings, sat their majesties, the princesses, and the ladies of the bedchamber, which, with the other tables, were severally served with the number of dishes as follows:

	Dishes.
The royal table	279
For the nobility	144
For the foreign ministers	144
For the Lord-mayor and aldermen	132
For the common-council-men	128
For the judges and serjeants	36
For guests in the old council-chamber	36
In the mayor's court, for the lady mayorefs and aldermen's ladies	48
Two tables in the mayor's court for ladies	76
Two ditto in the orphan's court for ladies	52
In all	1075

The following are the several sorts and quantities of wines provided for this entertainment.

	doz. bot.
Preniach	20 1
Champaigne	20 1
Burgundy	12 0
Claret	167 1
Malmsey and Madeira	10 0
An aulin or awme of Mosell	13 4
Red Port	42 0

White Port
Canary
Old Hock

doz. bot.
21 6
5 8
4 0

In all 315 9

An account of the several sums of money paid for the discharge of this royal banquet, and to whom.

	£.	s.
To the king's cook, for his assistance	10	10
To Leonard Pead and Bowler Miller, cooks	1100	0
To Mr. Page, the confectioner	250	0
To different persons for wine (exclusive of that returned)	651	0
To Mr. Colt, for knots and cockades	42	0
To Messrs. Rite and Smith, for work	21	0
To Joseph Thompson, for work	68	0
To Samuel Bick for wax-candles	129	0
To Mr. Sedgwick, for lighting Guildhall yard	22	0
To Mr. Clappole, the butler, for napkins, knives, forks, &c.	240	0
To Messrs. Myngay and Tomlinson, for cloth	24	10
To Eleanor Rogers, for gloves	8	2
To Elizabeth Biddle and Co. for gold fringe	94	7
To Edward Colt, for gold favours	52	13
To Mr. Remembrancer, for attendance	26	12
To Elizabeth Charles, for entertaining the horse- grenadiers	25	0
To James Nelson, for entertaining the horse-guards	30	0
To John Parker, for entertaining his majesty's coaches	9	5
To the clerks of the chamber, for their trouble in searching for precedents	10	10
To John Stuart, for Stationary ware	9	0
To Mr. Fisher, for entertaining the yeomen of the comptroller, and officers of the guards	16	9
To Samuel Bennet, on account of the wine cellar	10	10
To Mr. West, clerk to the committee	105	0
To James Brown, for work	107	16
To Anne Leigh, for entertaining his majesty's coaches	14	0
To Richard Smith for entertaining the yeomen of the guard	23	0
To John Shirley, for entertaining the band of gentlemen pensioners	10	0
To Mr. Ayley, for entertaining the sheriffs yeomen	4	10
To Mrs. Berkley, for entertaining the serjeants of the Poultry-compter	4	10
To Mr. Cordwell, for work done in and about Guildhall	590	0
To Mr. Cleve, for the use of pewter	132	0
To John Robins, for work done in and about Guildhall	74	0
To the city musick	11	1
To George Smith, for disbursements and work	20	19
To Mr. Holley, for entertaining the committee and officers of the horse-guards and horse gre- nadiers	20	7
To Mr. Burscough, for entertaining the committee	4	8
To Edward Meakin, for entertaining the committee	5	9
To Mr. Blackwell, as a gratuity for the ar- tillery company	20	0
To Mr. Robinson, for attending the committee	2	2
To Mr. Turner, for extraordinary attendance of serjeants of the chamber	4	10
To Isaac Fryer, for glazier's work in Guildhall	8	14
To the marshall's men, for attendance	1	10
To Thomas Nash, &c. for upholsterer's work	500	0
To the concert of musick	100	0
To Daniel Collyer and Mr. Shaw, yeomen of the chamber, for attendance	4	0
To Robert Leak, for charges at Blackwell-hall	3	0
To Daniel Collyer, the hall-keeper, for sundry disbursements	206	15
To his man, for assistance	5	5
To the clerk to the committee's clerk	2	2
To Mr. Cooper, &c. for coffee, tea, &c.	48	0
To Mr. Walker, for attending the committee	5	5
Sum total of expence for this royal entertainment	£4889	4

The cities of London and Westminster had been greatly pestered for a considerable time past with a great number of street robbers; and so audacious were they become in their villanies, that they formed a scheme of robbing the queen in St. Paul's church-yard, as she returned privately from supper in the city, to St. James's palace. This scheme, however, was frustrated by their being busily employed in robbing Sir Gilbert Heathcote, an alderman of London, as he was returning in his chariot from the house of commons; during which time her majesty luckily escaped them in her coach.

This circumstance greatly alarming both the court and city, letters were immediately sent to all the magistrates, enjoining them to use their utmost endeavours to suppress such flagitious villanies; and many of them being apprehended and executed, these diabolical proceedings were soon after entirely eradicated.

On the 31st. of December, 1732, the river Thames rose with such a high tide, that it overflowed Wapping, Tooley-street, and many other places, and did incredible damage by filling cellars and warehouses, and spoiling great quantities of different merchandize.

The same year an epidemical distemper, which was a cold attended with a fever, raged so violently in the city of London, especially among the more advanced people, that not one in six escaped its fury: and the bill of mortality in one week, was increased four times its usual number.

On the twenty-sixth of February 1732-3, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council presented a petition to parliament, praying that a bill might be brought in to empower them to fill up that part of Fleet-ditch, lying between Holbourn bridge and Fleet-bridge, and to convert the ground to such purposes as they might think most convenient and proper. In consequence of this petition a bill was soon after brought in and passed; by virtue of which the premises were arched over, and the site converted into a market, which was opened on the thirtieth of September in the year 1737.

This market has two rows of shops of a great length, from north to south, with a handsome walk between; into which light is thrown by windows placed along the top; and in the centre is a neat lanthorn, with a clock; the whole of which part is paved with rag-stones. On the south end the fruiterers stands are made in the form of piazzas, erected on each side, and these have proper conveniences to deposit their remaining stock: and at the north-end is a spacious opening for gardeners, and dealers in vegetables.

The fee-simple of the ground and ditch, by this act, is vested in the mayor, commonalty, and citizens of London, for ever, with a proviso, that sufficient drains shall be made in and through the said channel or ditch, and that no houses or sheds exceeding fifteen feet in height shall be erected thereon.

In the year 1733 the nation was greatly alarmed with an attempt made by the ministry to introduce a general excise, under pretence of easing the people of various taxes, and promoting the interest of the fair-trader. It was strongly opposed by the independent members of the house, who represented it as a measure that would in the end so enrich the crown, as to render the assistance of parliament entirely useless, which could produce no other consequence than that of enslaving the whole nation.

When Sir Robert Walpole, the projector, moved for the bill in the house of commons, Sir John Barnard and Mr. Aldermen Perry, two of the city members, opposed it with their utmost abilities; and the fourteenth of March being appointed for the house to resolve themselves into a committee to consider of the most proper methods for the better security and improvement of the duties and revenues already charged upon and payable from tobacco and wines, the common-council assembled on the occasion, earnestly requested, by written instructions, the city members, to use their utmost endeavours to defeat the said pernicious design; alledging, that any extension of the excise laws to commodities not yet excised, must be very prejudicial to trade, as it would tend to diminish the consumption of commodities, subject the fair-trader to excise officers and laws, from which there is no appeal; and that an extension of such laws would encrease the number and power of officers, which would be inconsistent with those principles of liberty on which our happy constitution is founded; and would farther deprive the subjects of England of those valuable privileges, which have hitherto distinguished them from other nations.

Notwithstanding the discouragements Sir Robert Walpole met with, yet he persevered in bringing his scheme into parliament with all the power he was master of, both of elocution, influence, and artifice. But Sir John Barnard and Mr. alderman Perry supported their arguments so vehemently, assisted by other great men, friends of their king and country, that Sir Robert, finding the scheme likely to prove abortive, had recourse to that ministerial resort of depending upon numbers under direction. And when the question was put on Sir Robert's motion, the house divided.

For the excise, with teller	266
Against the excise, with teller	205

This success of the minister did not discourage the opponents to his arbitrary measures; for when the report thereof was made to the house on the sixteenth of March, Sir John Barnard renewed the attack in a most elaborate and pathetic speech consistently adapted to the principles and instructions of that great city which he had the honour to represent in parliament.

This speech of Sir John Barnard was followed by Sir Thomas Aston, who observed, that it was his misfortune to know too much of the influence that the officers of the customs and excise had at elections; for at his own election, there were many of the voters so free and open as to tell him, that they would vote for him rather than any other, but that those officers had threatened to ruin them if they did; and others told him, that they had promises either for themselves or for their sons to be made officers in the customs or excise, excise, by his antagonist, and as their bread depended upon getting those promises fulfilled, which they could not expect if they did not vote against him, therefore they hoped he would excuse them. "Thus, Sirs, says he, I know the evil of this illegal influence by experience, and therefore I shall always be against any measure that may tend to increase it, as this scheme most evidently will; for I hope I shall always disdain to owe the honour of representing my country in parliament, to any administration whatever; I hope I shall always depend upon the free votes of my fellow-subjects, and, for that reason I must be against what I think will destroy that freedom, upon which only I am always to depend."

Notwithstanding the solidity of these arguments, yet so powerful was ministerial influence, that, on a division, two hundred and forty-nine against one hundred and eighty-nine agreed that a bill should be brought in pursuant to the resolution on the said motion. The bill was brought into the house on the fourth of April, when every means were used to expedite it, and every art practised to prevent the contents of it being known among the people: and when a motion was made for printing a sufficient number of copies for the use of the members, as is usual, it was carried in the negative by a majority of sixteen voices.

The citizens were so alarmed at these illegal proceedings of the house, that Sir John Barber, the Lord-mayor, summoned a common-council to deliberate on the most effectual measures to prevent passing the said bill; on which occasion his lordship opened the court with the following speech:

"Gentlemen,

"There is a bill depending in the house of commons (a copy of which I have procured) for laying an inland duty on tobacco; which duty it is universally agreed, will prove extremely detrimental to the trade and commerce of this great city, as well as to that of the whole nation. And as the high station I have the honour to be in, obliges me to be watchful over every thing that may affect the interest of my fellow-citizens, I should think myself wanting in my duty, if I neglected to call you together on this extraordinary occasion, that you might have an opportunity to deliberate on an affair of so much importance, wherein our liberty and property are so much concerned."

His lordship then laid the bill before the common-council, who resolving to petition the house against it, the same was immediately drawn up, and ordered to be presented to the house on the sixteenth of April. In which petition the citizens of London, after delivering their sentiments on the bill depending in that house, and expressing the bad apprehensions they conceived of its effects, conclude thus: "Therefore your petitioners most humbly pray that this honourable house will be pleased to hear them by their counsel against the said bill."

This petition occasioned the excise scheme to be again brought upon the carpet in that honourable house. The citizens of London have always enjoyed one privilege superior to any other body whatever; which is, that any petition from them is presented to the house by their sheriffs, and is brought up by the clerk of the house, and read at the table, without asking leave of the house for that purpose; whereas all other petitions must be presented by a member of the house, and cannot be by him brought up, or read at the table by the clerk, till leave be first asked of and granted by the house. Accordingly this petition was brought up and read at the table; after which Sir John Barnard got up, and shewed how much the city and citizens of London, as well as all the other trading part of the nation, were to be affected by the bill for altering the method of raising the duties payable upon tobacco, and what just reasons they had to insist upon being heard by their counsel against it; and concluded with a motion for granting them leave to be heard by their counsel if they thought proper.

It was insisted on, in opposition to this motion, that it had always been the practice of that house never to receive any petitions, and much less to admit counsel to be heard against any bill for imposing taxes upon the subject; for if any such thing were to be admitted of, it would be impossible ever to pass any such bill, because that there would be so many different petitions presented against it by those who were to be subject thereto, that it would be impossible to hear counsel separately upon every such petition within the usual time of the continuance of one session of parliament; and that, in refusing to admit counsel to be heard, there could be no inconvenience, because every man, and every body of men had their representatives in that house, who certainly would represent their case to the house, if any particular hardship was to be put upon them by any bill then before the house.

The reply made to this was, that the house had never pretended to any general custom of refusing petitions, except against those bills which were called money-bills, that was to say, such bills as were brought in for raising money for the current service of the year; and that, even as to them, there were many precedents where the house had admitted the parties, whom they thought to have a real interest therein, to be heard by their counsel against the passing of such bills; that the admitting of counsel even in such cases could never prevent the passing of such bills, because the house could always order all parties petitioning to be heard at one time, and could give such directions, that it could never take up many days to hear every thing that could be objected by every one of the parties petitioning; that though every part of the nation had their representatives in that house, yet it was well known, that speaking in public was a talent that every man was not endowed with, from whence it might happen, that the particular persons, or part of the nation, which was then to be aggrieved by what was passing in the house, might not have any such members as were proper to lay their case fully and clearly before the house, and that therefore, even as to money-money-bills, it was proper to admit parties to be heard against them, when it appeared that they were very particularly interested therein. But as to the case then before them, there was not the least pretence for refusing the desire of the petition, because the bill against which it was presented was no money-bill; it was granted by the advocates for the bill: it was even insisted on, as the greatest argument for it, that there were no new duties to be imposed; it was a bill only for altering the method of collecting the taxes already imposed, and therefore it could never be pretended that there was any practice or custom of the house for refusing to admit parties interested to be heard against such a bill; that, if there had been such a custom introduced, it ought not to be observed, especially when such a considerable body as the Lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council of the city of London, come with an humble petition to be heard against a bill, which they thought would not only be injurious to them in particular, but destructive to the trade and commerce of the nation in general.

In the course of this debate many precedents were brought by Mr. Sandys, Mr. Gybbon, and Mr. Bootle, where the house had received petitions, and admitted counsel to be heard against money-bills; and there were likewise precedents brought by Sir William Yonge and Mr. Wollaston, where the same had been refused, the reading of which took up a considerable part of the day.

The principal speakers for granting the desire of the petition were,

Sir John Barnard	Sir William Wyndham,
Samuel Sandys, Esq;	Walter Plummer, Esq;
Philip Gybbon, Esq;	George Heathcoate, Esq;
Thomas Bootle, Esq;	Thomas Wyndham, Esq;
William Pulteney, Esq;

The principal speakers against granting the desire of the petition were,

Mr. Chancellor of the exchequer,	Mr. Solicitor-general,
Horatio Walpole, Esq;	Mr. Attorney-general,
Thomas Winnington, Esq;	Sir William Yonge,
	Hon. Henry Pelham.

On the question being put, for allowing the petitioners to be heard by their counsel against the bill, there was a division, and the question was carried in the negative two hundred and fourteen against one hundred and ninety-seven.

Notwithstanding this, the powerful opposition of the city which was supported by many different counties, soon convinced Sir Robert of the impossibility of carrying his point without endangering the peace of the nation, and his own safety. In consequence of which the bill, instead of being read a second time on the eleventh of the following month, was, upon a motion made by the chancellor of the exchequer, deferred till the twelfth of June, a day exceeding the time of closing the sessions; so that the passing of this bill become impracticable, and Sir Robert Walpole's scheme, by the firm and steady interposition of the citizens, proved entirely abortive.

On the twelfth of April complaint was made to the house by several members, who had voted in favour of the scheme, that a tumultuous crowd of people had been assembled together the preceding night, and several days during the session, in the court of requests, and other avenues to that house; and that they themselves, and several other members of the house, had been, in their return from the house, menaced, insulted, and assaulted by a tumultuous crowd of people in the passages to the house; whereupon it was resolved and declared, first, that the assaulting, insulting, or menacing any member of that house, in his coming to, or going from the house, or upon account of his behaviour in parliament, was an high infringement of the privilege of that house, a most outrageous and dangerous violation of the rights of parliament, and an high crime and misdemeanor. Secondly, that the assembling and coming of any number of persons in a riotous, tumultuous, and disorderly manner to that house, in order either to hinder or promote the passing of any bill, or other matter depending before the house, was an high infringement of the privilege of that house, destructive of the freedom and constitution of parliament, and an high crime and misdemeanor. Thirdly that the inciting and encouraging any number of persons to come in a riotous, tumultuous, and disorderly manner to that house, in order either to hinder, or promote the passing of any bill, or other matter depending before the house, was an high infringement of the privilege of that house, destructive of the freedom and constitution of parliament, and an high crime and misdemeanor.

It was then ordered, first, that the members of that house, who served for the city of London, should signify the said resolutions and declarations to the Lord-mayor of London, second, that those who served for the county of Middlesex should signify the same to the sheriff of Middlesex; and thirdly those who served for the city of Westminster should signify the same to the high bailiff thereof.

On the eleventh of March 1734 the princess royal was given in marriage to the prince of Orange; on which occasion the citizens of London, to testify their approbation of his majesty's wife choice in bestowing his eldest daughter on a prince of the house of their great deliverer king William III. presented the following loyal and grateful address:

" May it please your majesty,

" We the Lord-mayor, aldermen and commons of the city of London, in common-council assembled, most humbly beg leave to congratulate your majesty on the happy conclusion of the marriage of the princess royal with his most serene highness the prince of Orange.

" Our minds presage the greatest glory, the brightest triumphs, and the most distinguished prosperity, to these nations, both in the present and future age, from another alliance with that truly illustrious house, the house of Nassau; from whence so many heroes have sprung,

"sprung, the scourgers of tyrants and the assertors of liberty."

"Among these we must for ever remember that glorious prince, king William III. who delivered these kingdoms from the imminent dangers of popery and arbitrary power; and, during the course of his important reign, established the constitution, and secured our liberties in such a manner, that he seems to have left nothing more to be done than what, we hope, was reserved to complete the glories of your majesty's reign; a reign in which we justly promise ourselves that nothing will be omitted, which may appear necessary for the confirming our ancient constitution, for easing the people from those heavy burthens which the defence of their liberties induced them to impose on themselves, for encouraging the trade, and advancing the maritime power of this kingdom, for making us happy at home, and respected abroad. And, as we have a grateful sense of the many blessings we enjoy under your majesty's auspicious reign, we beg leave to assure your majesty of our hearty endeavours, in our sphere, to promote an affectionate zeal for your majesty's person and government, that your reign may be easy and happy."

To which his majesty was pleased to return the following most gracious answer:

"My Lord-mayor and Gentlemen,

"I return you my thanks for this dutiful and loyal address; and am very glad that the marriage of my daughter with the prince of Orange gives such general satisfaction.

"It is a great pleasure to me to see this metropolis remember, with so much gratitude, the deliverance of these kingdoms from popery and slavery by my great predecessor king William.

"A just sense of the imminent dangers that this nation then escaped, and of the inestimable blessings that we now enjoy, will best secure to my people the continuance and preservation of our present happiness, which it has been, and always shall be, my care to support and maintain to the utmost of my power."

About this time, a great contest arose between the citizens and the ministry, respecting the election of a chamberlain. The candidates were, Mr. John Bosworth, a tobacconist, of Newgate-street; Mr. William Selwin, a silkman, in Pater-noster-row; and Mr. John Thomas, a fishmonger, near the Monument; the latter of whom making no shew of hands in the common-hall, declined. And Mr. Bosworth being declared to have the majority of hands, a poll was demanded by the friends of Mr. Selwin. This was conducted with the greatest dexterity and influence; and notwithstanding both candidates were equally well respected by their fellow-citizens, and supposed to be equally well qualified for the discharge of that important trust, yet the contest, for seven days, was the warmest ever known; the citizens being determined to preserve their own principles of freedom in elections against any ministerial opposition whatever. On the close of the poll, however, the numbers appeared so equal that a scrutiny was demanded; and when the declaration was made on the fourth of May, the numbers appear as follows:

For Mr. Bosworth 3212
Mr. Selwin 3208

In consequence of which the former was declared duly elect, and chamberlain of the city of London.

The ministry, however, so highly resented this strenuous opposition of the citizens to a candidate of their choice, that they conferred the office of receiver-general of the land-tax, which had generally been annexed to the chamberlainship, on their disappointed friend Mr. Selwin, who had obtained the ill-will of the independent voters of the city of London, by having unadvisedly solicited the government, or ministerial interest, to oblige all their dependents to vote for him.

On the first of January 1734-5, a beautiful marble statue of king William III. was placed in the great hall of the bank. On the pedestal is a latin inscription, the translation of which runs thus:

For restoring efficacy to the laws,
Authority to the courts of justice,

Dignity to the parliament;
To all his subjects their religion and liberties;

And confirming these to posterity
By the

Succession of the illustrious house of Hanover to the British throne:

To the best of princes, William III.

Founder of the bank,

This corporation, from a sense of gratitude,

Has erected this statue,

And dedicated it to his memory,

In the year of our Lord M.DCC.XXXIV.

And the first year of this building.

On the eighth of January this year, about eleven o'clock in the morning, a most violent storm of wind arose, little inferior to that in November 1703. It blew down a great number of houses and barns, stripped the churches, and tore up trees by the roots without number: but the greatest damage was done to the shipping, nothing but wrecks being seen on every coast. Such heavy rains fell before and during the storm, that the rivers rose so high as to overflow the banks, by which a great number of cattle were drowned; and the inhabitants had no other resource to save themselves from the like fate, but by taking refuge on the tops of their houses. The damage done to the park of Carshalton, in Surry, only amounted to two thousand pounds.

On the twenty-fifth of November following, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council, for the better regulation of the bakers, enacted, that, exclusive of the fine, the names and places of abode of all bakers, detected and convicted of making bread under weight, shall be published, and that the assize of bread (instead of quartern loaves, wherein the poor were oftentimes defrauded of half a farthing) be penny, two-penny, and three-penny loaves, and to be marked

F f f

marked accordingly: the weight of which to be as follows:

The penny loaf (fine) 8 ounces 7 drams.
 Wheaten 12 ounces 10 drams.
 Household 16 ounces 4 drams.
 And all other in proportion.

In the year 1735, the inhabitants of the precinct of Black Friars claiming a privilege of exemption from the jurisdiction of the city of London, in right of the ancient monastery being dissolved there by king Henry VIII. occasioned the Lord-mayor and aldermen to ascertain their right thereto, which they did by a trial in the court of King's-bench, on the tenth of July; wherein John Bosworth, Esq; chamberlain of London, was plaintiff, and Daniel Watson, shalloon and drugget-feller, defendant. The action was brought against the latter for opening shop in Black-friars, and retailing his goods there without being a freeman of the city. The counsel for the plaintiff alledged, that Black-friars actually belonged to the city of London when it was a monastery, and before trades were ever occupied there; to prove which they produced several ancient records, viz. a charter of king Edward I. and a record, 2 Richard II. calling it the Friary of London; and another 21 Hen. VIII. mentioning a parliament held at the Friars-preachers of the city of London, Nov. 3, 1530, and other records of this kind: they likewise cited a parallel case to this, 15 Car. I. when an action was brought against one Philpot, a shoemaker of Black-friars, for opening a shop, and vending shoes there, without being free of the city: and after a fair trial by an equal and indifferent jury of the county of Hertford, a verdict was given for the plaintiff, with five shillings damage. In consequence of this decision, Black-friars became a precinct of the ward of Farringdon within, and sends two members to represent it in the common-council of this city.

The following year, Frederick, prince of Wales, father to his present majesty king George III. was married to the princess Saxa-Gotha; on which occasion the Lord-mayor and aldermen presented the most dutiful and loyal addresses to the king, queen, and their royal highnesses, in which they expressed the greatest zeal and concern for the prosperity and support of his majesty's family and government, and their joyful sentiments on the solemnization of the said nuptials.

The city of London being at this time greatly pestered with street-robbers and house-breakers, owing to the insufficiency of lights in the night, the Lord-mayor and common-council, to prevent the like enormous crimes for the future, and to enable them to light the streets in a more effectual manner, applied to parliament; who enacted, That the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commonalty of London, be empowered to erect a sufficient number of such sort of glass lamps as they shall judge proper, to be put in such places of the city and liberty as they shall think fit, to be lighted and kept burning, from the setting to the rising of the sun throughout the year: and in order to defray the expences of maintaining and repairing the same, the following rates and assessments are to be laid yearly on the inhabitants of the several wards: every house under 10l. per annum, charged to the poor, to pay 7s. From 10l. to 20l. per annum, 12s. From 20l. to 30l. per annum, 14s. From 30l. to 40l. per annum, 16s. From 50l. and upwards, 20s. per annum at most. It was likewise further enacted, that all parish churches, cemeteries, chapels, meeting-houses, schools, markets, warehouses, and other public edifices, (except hospitals) together with pieces of void ground and spacious places, should be severally taxed and assessed in due proportion by the alderman, deputy, and common-council men of the respective wards: the dean and chapter of St. Paul's to pay for the fence round the cathedral, if not lighted at their own expence; all public structures by the church and chapel wardens, and chief officers, masters, wardens or governors belonging thereto; and Moorfields, and other void and spacious places by the chamberlain of London. All persons who think themselves aggrieved by the assessment have a right to appeal to the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen for redress, whose decision shall be conclusive. The rates to be collected half-yearly, without any expence, and to be paid in such manner into the chamber of London, that no collector shall at any time have in his possession, for the space of ten days, the sum of fifty pounds, and all embezzlements to be made good by a reassessment of the ward in which it shall happen.

By this act, and many others since passed for the better lighting streets, parishes and roads, it is computed that the whole number of public and private lamps now, within the bills of mortality, cannot amount to less than fifteen thousand.

The use of spirituous liquors was at this time become so general among the inferior sort of people, and so destructive to the morals of the populace, that the parliament, in order to prevent its evil consequences, enacted, That after the twenty-ninth of September, 1736, no person whatsoever should sell any sort of spirituous liquors in a less quantity than two gallons, without taking a licence for such purpose; for which every retailer was not only annually to pay the sum of fifty pounds, but likewise twenty shillings duty for every gallon sold after that manner. And every person who shall sell such liquors without qualifying himself as aforesaid, is to forfeit for every such offence, the sum of one hundred pounds. And, to prevent all persons from hawking and vending of spirituous liquors, both by land and water, every offender to forfeit the sum of ten pounds. And in case the party offending is incapable of paying the penalty, he, she, or they are to be committed to hard labour in the house of correction, for the space of two months.

On the seventeenth of December, the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen presented the freedom of the city of London to his royal highness the prince of Wales, who was graciously pleased to accept the same from the hands of the chamberlain.

On the second of March, a petition of the master and wardens of the company of Bakers, in the city of London, on behalf of themselves, and

and the rest of the bakers within the bills of mortality, was presented to the house, and read, setting forth, "That the meal-weighers, who were officers appointed to bring in the prices of wheat to the magistrates, in order to affix the affize of bread within the city of London, made their cockets or returns of the prices of three different kinds of wheat, as sold at the market of Bear-key only; from which three prices of wheat the affize of the three sorts of bread, distinguished by the names of white, wheaten, and household, was always ascertained: and that the best kind of wheat at Bear-key was generally sold in parcels with wheat of inferior quality at one common price; so that the meal-weighers were not able to distinguish the true and real price of the best wheat: and that the first sort of bread in the affize-table, distinguished by the name of white bread, being that kind of bread commonly called French rolls, was of late years greatly improved; and in making such white bread the petitioners used only the finest part of the flour, produced from the choicest kind of wheat, collected not from Bear-key only, but from all the adjacent markets; and even such selected wheat afforded but a very small quantity of that sort of flour, which was also used in making the finest kind of paste: and that although the finest sort of wheat, mentioned in the cockets of the meal-weighers, was not of a quality fine enough to make the first sort of bread, called white bread, yet the affize of such white bread was fixed from the price of the first sort of wheat inserted in those cockets; and that the second sort of bread in the affize-table, distinguished by the name of wheaten bread, which was the best kind of large bread wherewith the families within the city of London and bills of mortality were daily served, was made entirely of the first sort of wheat mentioned in the cockets of the meal-weighers; and the second sort of wheat contained in those cockets was not of a sufficient goodness to make such wheaten bread; nevertheless the affize of that wheaten bread was ascertained according to the price of that second sort of wheat, as returned by the meal-weighers: and that the petitioners apprehended, that the affize of wheaten bread ought to be settled according to the affize of the first sort of wheat mentioned in the cockets of the meal-weighers, being the very grain of which the wheaten bread was made; and that the affize of the white bread ought to be advanced in proportion: and that, although the expences, attending the trade and business of the petitioners were very greatly increased since the making of the table of affize, yet they had had no allowance in respect to such increase of expences: and that by these means much the greatest number of the petitioners were reduced to very low circumstances; and the most considerable among them, notwithstanding all their pains, application, and frugality, found their substance daily diminishing: and therefore praying the house to give leave, that a bill might be brought in for explaining and amending the laws then in being for regulating the price and affize of bread, or to give such other relief to the petitioners, in the premises, as to the house should seem meet."

This petition was referred to the consideration of a committee, who, making a favourable report, a bill was ordered to be brought in for giving a proper relief to the petitioners, which was accordingly soon after done, and passed both houses.

About this time the citizens of London, not having sufficient authority for the establishing, ordering or well-governing of the city watch, applied to parliament to enable them to regulate the same. For which purpose they enacted, that the common council of London shall, from year to year, be empowered to appoint such a number of beades and watchmen for the several wards of the city, and liberties thereof, as they shall judge necessary; to order the arming of them, to appoint the time they are to watch, to ascertain their wages, and to appoint the number of constables that shall attend in each of the said wards: the inhabitants to be assessed by the aldermen and common-council in each ward; and that the said rate be paid quarterly. That any person neglecting or refusing to pay the same when demanded, shall be disqualified from voting at elections within the city of London: and that houses let into tenements, and occupied by three or more tenants, shall be assessed on the owners of such houses, but paid by some one or more of the tenants. That the mayor, commonalty and citizens, may impose any reasonable tax upon tenants and occupiers, and upon owners of houses, &c. where there is no present occupier; to be levied by distress; and to order such places before houses, shops, &c. untenanted to be well and sufficiently paved and amended as often as need shall be, to be paid for by the owner, under pain of distress.

In the year 1738, on the seventh of January, a young lad, thirteen years of age, servant to Mr. Snowden, a brewer, at Fleet-ditch, going up a ladder, fell backwards under a mill where the malt was grinding, when one of the flyers ripped his body entirely open, and killed him on the spot.

On the fourteenth of the same month the king's printing-house in Black-friars was burnt down by an accidental fire which began in the kitchen of Mr. Basket, the patentee. The flames communicated themselves with such rapidity, that the family in the dwelling house escaped with the utmost difficulty. The destruction made by this fire, in printing materials and stock in trade was computed at least to twenty-thousand pounds. And

On the twenty-fifth a fire broke out in Duke's-place, which consumed upwards of twenty houses besides the meeting-house at the corner of Bury-street.

The merchants of London finding themselves still greatly oppressed by the Spanish depredations on our American trade and navigation, presented a petition to the house of commons on the third of March; in which they set forth the several applications that had been made to parliament

liament against the Spanish depredations; and complaining, that, notwithstanding his majesty's most gracious endeavours, they had not only continued the same ever since the treaty of Seville, but had last year carried them to a greater height than ever; and therefore praying relief, and to be heard by themselves and counsel.

This petition was presented by Mr. Alderman Perry, who opened it with an elaborate speech that did him the highest honour. After which he moved for leave to bring it up; which being granted, and the petition read, he then moved that it might be referred to the consideration of a committee of the whole house; which being likewise agreed to, he moved for an instruction to the said committee, that they do admit the said petitioners to be heard, if they think fit, by themselves and counsel, before the said committee.

Mr. Speaker opposed this last motion by observing, that it never was the method of that house to admit parties to be heard by themselves and counsel, but only by themselves or counsel. In reply to this, Sir John Barnard said, that as this petition was founded on facts, he should be sorry to see the design of it defeated by a scrupulous adherence to any points of form whatever; and that he humbly thought it would be a hardship on the petitioners to deny them a request of so little importance as the present, merely because it interfered with a matter of form.

The speaker, however, insisting, before he put the question, to take the sense of the house with regard to the terms in which he was to put it upon the present motion, Mr. alderman Wilmot rose, and spoke as follows:

"Sir,

"I think the petitioners ought to have liberty to be heard, not only by themselves and counsel, but if it were possible that we could indulge them in other advantages we ought to do it. To talk of working upon passions.—Can any man's passions be wound up to a greater height; can any man's indignation be more raised, than every free-born Englishman's must be when he reads a letter which I received this morning, and which I have now in my hand? this letter, Sir, gives an account that seventy of our brave sailors are now in chains in Spain. Our countrymen in chains! and slaves to Spaniards! Is not this enough, Sir, to fire the coldest? Is not this enough, Sir, to rouse all the vengeance of a national resentment? and shall we, Sir, sit here debating about words and forms, while the sufferings of our countrymen call out loudly for redress?"

Though this had not its wished-for effect, yet on Tuesday the sixteenth of March, the merchants, agreeable to appointment, attended to make good their allegations; which they accomplished after the examination of witnesses for several days. This being done, Sir William Pultney got up, and spoke vehemently in defence of the merchants, against the cruelties of the Spaniards. And after strongly enforcing every part of the petition, he concluded thus: "We assemble in this house, in order to receive the petitions, and hear the complaints of injured subjects; but we are not to receive and hear only, we are likewise in duty bound to provide a remedy for the grievances they justly complain of, and to take the most effectual measures for that purpose. We have twice already come to general resolutions upon this subject: we have twice already found that such general resolutions have produced no effect; therefore it would be undonable in us to proceed no further upon the present occasion. Perhaps some gentlemen may think, we ought now to go much farther than I have taken the liberty to propose; but I cannot think any gentleman will oppose our going thus far; for the least we can do, is to assert those national rights, which seem of late to have been neglected; because, after such a solemn and public declaration of our rights, I hope no minister will hereafter dare to give up any of them by treaty, or to allow them to be any longer incroached on and violated, under the pretence of a negotiation."

Sir Robert Walpole, desirous at all events of preventing a rupture with Spain, rose up, and spoke many things by way of alleviation; in which after setting forth the hazards of such a war to the merchants trading to Spain, Italy and Turkey, he concluded as follows:

"Having thus, Sir, laid my thoughts before you, upon the matter now under our consideration, and having given you my reasons for not approving of all the propositions, the honourable gentleman has told us he is about to make, I shall now beg leave to offer an amendment to his motion, which is, that the first part of his motion should stand as it is in these words: that it is the natural and undoubted right of British subjects to sail with their ships on any part of the seas of America, to and from any part of his majesty's dominions. So far I entirely agree with him; but, in my opinion, all that he has proposed to follow after these words, ought to be left out; and instead thereof, I propose, that these words or resolutions ought to be inserted, That the freedom of navigation and commerce, which the subjects of Great-Britain have an undoubted right to by the law of nations, and which is not the least restrained by virtue of any of the treaties subsisting between the crowns of Great-Britain and Spain, has been greatly interrupted by the Spaniards, under pretences altogether groundless and unjust. That before and since the execution of the treaty of Seville, and the declaration made by the crown of Spain pursuant thereunto, for the satisfaction and security of the commerce of Great-Britain, many unjust seizures and captures have been made, and great depredations committed by the Spaniards, which have been attended with many instances of unheard-of cruelty and barbarity. That the frequent applications made to the court of Spain, for procuring justice and satisfaction to his majesty's injured subjects, for bringing the offenders to condign punishment and for preventing

Engraved for Chamberlain's History of London.

VIEW of WESTMINSTER BRIDGE

VIEW of BLACK-FRYER'S BRIDGE

VIEW of LONDON BRIDGE

"venting the like abuses, for the future, have proved vain and ineffectual; and the several orders or cédulas, granted by the king of Spain, for restitution and reparation of great losses sustained, by the unlawful and unwarrantable seizures and captures made by the Spaniards, have been disobeyed by the Spanish governors, or totally evaded and eluded. And that these violences and depredations have been carried on to the great loss and damage of the

"subjects of Great-Britain trading to America and in direct violation of the treaties subsisting between the two crowns."

This amendment was, however, after a long debate, carried in the affirmative; and the two houses of parliament addressed his majesty on the vigorous resolutions taken by them against the depredations of the Spaniards.

CHAPTER XLI.

Birth of his present majesty king George III. Scheme for pressing men for the sea service. Foundation of Westminster-bridge. Description of the same. City's petition against the convention between England and Spain. Debates thereon. Violent storm of thunder and lightning. War declared against Spain. Foundation of the Mansion-house; with an account of the building. Remarkable frost. Charter granted for establishing the Foundling-Hospital. Description of the same. Contest for the election of Lord-mayor. King George II's charter, creating all the aldermen justices. City's petition to parliament on their losses by Spanish privateers.

ON the twenty-fourth of May 1738 her royal highness the princess of Wales was delivered of a prince at Norfolk-house, in St. James's-square, who, on the twenty-first of June following, was christened by the name of George William Frederick; and is at this time our most gracious sovereign king George III. The ceremony of baptism was performed by the bishop of Oxford; and the godfathers were the king of Sweden and the duke of Saxa-gotha; the godmother was the queen of Prussia; all which were represented by proxy. On this occasion the Lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council, in a cavalcade of eighty-four coaches, exclusive of the Lord-mayor's, waited on the prince and princess of Wales at Norfolk-house with the most salutary congratulations on this royal birth.

On the second of August this year, the populace were greatly alarmed at the sight of two large birds which were perched on the top of St. Paul's-cathedral. They sat very quietly, the one on the cross, the other on the pine apple, till a man went up to the gallery, and fired a gun at them, which occasioned them to fly away. In consequence of the great number of people assembled to view these birds, the following scheme was formed, in order to supply the necessities of the state, which required a fleet of ships to be immediately manned. The press-gangs placed a live turkey on the top of the Monument, which in a short time occasioning a great number of idle people to assemble, they had the opportunity of selecting such a number of men as answered the purposes of their intended project.

About this time the town was greatly entertained by a most uncommon creature brought from Carolina. It was a female, whose height was about four feet, and in every part formed like a woman, except the head, which nearly resembled an ape. She walked upright, sat down to her food, which was chiefly vegetables, and fed herself as a human creature. She expressed great respect for a boy who was on board the ship with her, and seemed very unhappy at his absence. It was supposed to be the female of the creature which the Angolans call Chimpanze; or the Mockman.

On the thirteenth of September this year, the pile was driven for the foundation of Westminster-bridge; and on the twenty-ninth of January 1738-9, the first stone was laid by the earl of Pembroke. This bridge, after having been eleven years and nine months building; was opened about twelve o'clock at night on the seventeenth of November, 1750. And as it is universally allowed, by the judges of architecture, to be one of the grandest in the world, we shall be more particular in giving an account of it.

Description of WESTMINSTER-BRIDGE.

THIS bridge is built in a neat and elegant taste, and with such simplicity and grandeur, that whether viewed from the water, or by the passenger who walks over it, it fills the mind with an agreeable surprize. The semi-octangular towers, which from the recesses of the foot-way, the manner of placing the lamps, and the height of the balustrade, are at once, the most beautiful, and, in every other respect, the best contrived.

It is forty-four feet wide; a commodious foot way is allowed for passengers, about seven feet broad on each side, raised above the road, allowed for carriages, and paved with broad Moor stones, while the space left between them is sufficient to admit three carriages, and two horses, to go a-breast, without the least danger.

G g g g

Its

Its extent from wharf to wharf is 1223 feet, which is above 300 feet wider than the same river at London-bridge.

The free water-way under the arches of this bridge is 870 feet, which is more than four times as much as the free water-way left between the sterlings of London-bridge; which, together with the gentleness of the stream, are the chief reasons why no sensible fall of water can ever stop, or in the least endanger the smallest boats, in their passage through the arches.

It consists of 14 piers, 13 large, and two small arches, all semi-circular, and two abutments.

The length of every pier is about 70 feet, from point to point; and each end is terminated with a salient right angle against either stream.

The two middle piers are each 17 feet wide at the springing of the arches, and contain 3000 cubic Feet, or near 200 tons of solid stone; and the others decrease in breadth equally on each side, by one foot; so that the two next to the largest are each sixteen feet wide; and so on to the two least of each side which are twelve feet wide at the springing of the arches.

Each of these piers are four feet wider at their foundation than at top, and each of them is laid on a strong bed of timber, of the same shape as the pier, about 80 feet long, 28 feet wide, and two feet thick.

The value of 40,000 pounds is computed to be always under water, in stone, and other materials. And here it may not be improper to observe, that the caisson, on which the first pier was sunk, contained 150 loads of timber: for it is a precaution used in most heavy buildings, to lay their foundations on planks, or beds of timber, which (if sound when laid, and always kept wet) will not only remain sound, but grow harder by time.

The depths or heights of every pier are different, but none of them have their foundations laid at a less depth than five feet under the bed of the river, and none at a greater depth than fourteen feet under the said bed. This difference is occasioned by the nature and position of the ground; for though the foundations of all the piers and abutments are laid in a hard bed of gravel (which by boring was found to grow harder, the deeper it was bored into) yet this bed of gravel lies much lower, and is more difficult to come at on the Surry side than on the Westminster side.

All the piers are built the same on the inside as on the outside, of solid Portland block stones, none less than one ton, or twenty hundred weight, unless here and there a small one, called a closer, placed between four other large stones; but most of them are two or three tons weight, and several of four or five tons. All the stones are set in (and their joints fitted) with a cement called dutch tarris, and they are besides fastened with iron cramps, run in with lead, and so placed, that none of those cramps can be seen, or ever affected by the water.

All the arches of Westminster-bridge are semi-circular, that form being one of the strongest and the best adapted for dispatch in building.

They all spring from about two feet above low-water mark, and from no higher; which renders the bridge much stronger than if the arches sprang from taller piers, besides the saving a great quantity of materials and workmanship.

The middle arch is seventy-six feet wide, and the others decrease in width equally on each side by four feet; so that the two next to the middle arch are seventy-two feet wide, and so on, to the least of the two arches, which are each 52 feet wide. As to the two small ones, close in shore to the abutments, they are each about 25 feet wide.

The soffit of every arch is turned and built quite through, the same as the fronts, with large Portland blocks, over which is built, bounded in by the Portland, another arch of Purbeck stone, four or five times thicker on the reins than over the key; so calculated and built, that by the help of this secondary arch, together with the incumbent load of materials, all the parts of every arch are in equilibrio; so that each arch can stand single, without affecting or being affected, by any of the other arches.

Moreover, between every two arches a drain is managed to carry off the water and filth, which in time, might penetrate, and accumulate in those places, to the great detriment of the arches. Some bridges have been ruined for want of this precaution, which should be observed in all considerable stone or brick bridges; and yet it has been generally if not always omitted.

Just above and below each abutment there are large and commodious flights of Moor stone steps, for the shipping and landing of goods and passengers.

All the piers are laid at a considerable depth under the bed of the river, in a hard bed of gravel, which never requires piling; it being, after rock, the best sort of foundation; whereas the usual method of building stone or brick bridges over large tide-rivers, is to build them upon stilts; that is, driving piles in the bed of the river, showing their heads at low-water mark, and often above; then laying some planks, to erect the piers thereon. Such are the foundations of London and Rochester bridges, and of many others in Great-Britain as well as abroad.

The materials of Westminster-bridge, are the best four kinds of stone (for the several uses to which they are employed) that are; and they are all not only durable, but some of the heaviest in England, some kinds of marble only excepted. And the size and disposition of those materials are such, that there is no false bearing, or so much as a false joint, in the whole bridge; so that every part is fully and properly supported; and whatever ought to be made of one stone, is not made of several small ones, as is but too common in other buildings.

Instead of chalk, small stones or rubbish, with which the insides of most buildings are filled, the piers are entirely built with solid blocks of Portland, and secured as we have explained before; and in building the arches, several precautions have been used, as have been scarcely ever before observed, such as building them quite through with the same sorts of large stones as in the fronts, thus destroying their lateral pressures by a proper disposition of the materials, in, between, and over those arches.

Nothing

Nothing is more common in the construction of bridges, than for some of the piers to sink, or at least so far give way, as to occasion the necessity of rebuilding them, even before the fabric is passable: this has been the case of one of the piers of Westminster-bridge, which, by sinking, damaged the arch to which it belonged so much, that the commissioners thought fit to have it pulled down; when, by laying 12,000 Tons of cannon and leaden weights on the lower part of the pier, the foundation was settled and set to rights, in such a manner as to render it completely secure from all accidents of the like kind for the future. This misfortune happened in 1747, when this noble structure was almost compleated, and prevented its being finished till the tenth of November 1750; when the last stone was laid by Thomas Lediard, esq; in the presence of several of the commissioners; and, on the seventeenth, about twelve at night, it was opened by a procession of several gentlemen of that city, the chief artificers of the work, and a crowd of spectators, preceded by trumpets, kettle-drums, &c. and guns firing during the ceremony.

As to the time that has been employed in erecting this magnificent bridge, it is sufficient to observe, that the ballast-men having dug the foundation of the first pier to the depth of five feet under the bed of the river, levelled it, and kept it level, by a proper inclosure of strong piles, and the caisson being brought over to the place where it was to be sunk, on the 29th of January, 1738-9, the first stone of the western pier was laid by the Right Hon. the earl of Pembroke; so that the erecting this noble structure was compleated in eleven years and nine months; a very short period, considering the vastness of the undertaking, the prodigious quantity of stone made use of, hewn out of the quarry, and brought by sea; the interruptions of winter, the damage frequently done by the ice to the piling and scaffolding, and the unavoidable interruption occasioned twice a day by the tide, which, for two years together, reduced the time of labour to only five hours a day.

The charge of building this bridge, from the beginning to the finishing, and for procuring the several conveniencies requisite thereto, amounted to the sum of 389,500*l.* whereof 197,500*l.* was raised by three successive lotteries, and the remainder, being 192,000*l.* was granted by parliament.

A guard, consisting of twelve watchmen, is appointed for the security of the passage over this bridge; they are to be upon duty at the close of every day, till the opening of it the next morning.

In the year 1739, the citizens of London finding themselves greatly injured by the ministry, who had, during the recess of parliament, contrived and signed a convention between the two courts of London and Madrid, thought it expedient to exert their accustomed spirit of liberty, and to petition the house of lords against the said convention. For which purpose a court of common-council was immediately called, and a petition drawn up which was approved of, and presented to the house by his grace the duke of Bedford, who introduced the same in words to the following effect:

“ My lords,

“ I have in my hand a petition from a very great body of men, no less a body, my lords, than the citizens of London. The importance of this juncture called upon them to assemble and deliberate upon the most proper means of preventing the effects of the convention, which they apprehend to be ruinous, not only to them, but the whole kingdom, from taking place. Encouraged, my lords, by their former experience of your lordships great indulgence, they resolved to proceed in the most dutiful manner, by petitioning your lordships to take the reasons they are ready to offer against the convention into your mature deliberation.”

The purport of the petition itself was as follows: “ That the citizens of London are too deeply interested in whatever affects the trade of this nation, not to express the utmost anxiety for the welfare of that only source of our riches; and it is with a concern the petitioners are unable to express, that they perceive the trade to his majesty’s American colonies still continues exposed to the insults of the Spaniards, who, under unwarrantable and injurious pretences, continue to stop, search, and make prize of British vessels navigating the American seas, in manifest violation of the treaties subsisting between the two crowns; and that the petitioners apprehend, that the trade from these his majesty’s kingdoms to his American colonies is of the utmost importance, and almost the only profitable trade this nation now enjoys unrivalled by others; and that the petitioners were induced to hope, from his majesty’s known goodness and paternal care of his subjects, supported by the vigorous resolutions of both houses of parliament, and the equipment of a very powerful fleet, that his majesty’s trading subjects in the seas of America, as well as in all other parts of the ocean, would not only have received a full satisfaction for all their losses, occasioned by the Spanish depredations, but also an undoubted security for their navigation and commerce in time to come; and that reasonable and adequate reparation would likewise have been obtained for the barbarities and inhuman cruelty exercised by that nation on the English seamen, who have had the unhappiness of falling into their merciless hands; and expressing their great concern and surprize to find, by the convention lately concluded between his majesty and the king of Spain, that the Spaniards are so far from giving up their, as the petitioners apprehend, unjust pretensions of a right to visit and search our ships in the open seas of America, that this pretension of theirs is, amongst others, referred to the future regulation and decision of plenipotentiaries appointed on each side, whereby the petitioners apprehend it is in some degree admitted.”

“ admitted ; and that the petitioners conceive
 “ they have too much cause to fear, if the right “ pretended to by Spain, of searching British “ ships at sea, be admitted in any manner or de“ gree whatsoever, that the trade of his majesty’s
 “ subjects in or to America will become so pre“ carious, as to depend in a great measure upon
 “ the indulgence and justice of the Spaniards, of “ both which they have given, for some years “ past, such specimens, as the petitioners think
 “ this nation can have no cause to be satisfied “ with ; and expressing the apprehensions of the “ petitioners, that such a precarious situation as “ this must inevitably expose the trade in and to “ the American seas to continual interruptions
 “ and alarms, as well as to frequent losses ; and “ that, to these unhappy causes the petitioners “ apprehend the present low state of the British “ colonies in America may, in a great measure,
 “ be attributed ; and that, if the cruel treatment
 “ of the English sailors, whose hard fate has “ thrown them into the hands of the Spaniards, “ should be put up without any reparation, the “ petitioners apprehend it may be the means of “ deterring seamen from undertaking voyages to
 “ the seas of America, without an advance of “ wages, which that trade, or any other, will “ not be able to support ; and that the peti“ tioners therefore, having laid before parliament
 “ the high importance this trade is of to the “ kingdom in general, and this city in particu“ lar, thought it their indispensable duty to re“ present to parliament, the fatal consequences “ of leaving the freedom of our navigation and “ commerce any longer in suspense and uncer“ tainty ; and therefore expressing their hope,
 “ that the parliament will take it into mature “ deliberation, and do therein as shall seem “ meet.”

Various were the debates in the house of lords in consequence of this petition ; and notwithstanding the merchants minutely proved all their allegations, and were strongly supported by many noble lords, yet it was at last carried in favour of the convention by a majority of twenty-four voices. And the ministry procured an address of thanks to his majesty from the house of commons also, for procuring the said convention. This, however, prognosticated Sir Robert Walpole’s decay of power in that house ; for, upon the division, he had no more than two hundred and sixty-two contents, against two hundred and thirty-five non-contents, with sixty-one absentees ; and among these two hundred and sixty-two, were two hundred and thirty-four placemen, whose employments amounted to the value of two hundred and twelve thousand, nine hundred and fifty-six pounds, thirteen shillings and four-pence. It was in consequence of this that Sir Robert took the liberty of calling the citizens sturdy beggars ; and in order to propagate a mean opinion of them, and to lessen them in the esteem of the members of both houses, he procured printed lists of the common-council, with the addition of their several trades, or companies, to insinuate that they were an insignificant or contemptible body of tradesmen and mechanics.

The citizens, however, took every measure to shew their abhorrence of the minister’s collusion with the court of Spain ; and being thoroughly convinced that Sir George Champion, knt. who was the alderman next the chair, and member for Aylesbury, had voted for the convention, they, on the twenty-ninth of September, the day of election, rejected him from the high office of Lord-mayor, and for ever looked on him with the greatest contempt.

On the tenth of September, about seven o’clock in the evening, there fell a most violent storm of thunder and lightening, accompanied with very heavy rain, which continued till near twelve at night. Though the thunder was not very violent, yet the flashes of lightening were as quick, and at the same time as strong as perhaps were ever known in this part of the world. This tempestuous night, among many other things, was the destruction of a large aviary of sparrows, which had for many years rested themselves in a grove of high trees adjoining to Mile-end turnpike. Such numbers of them were killed by the lightening, that the next morning the ground was covered with their dead bodies.

The statue of king Edward VI. in brass, left by Charles Ivy, esq; late treasurer, was, on the twenty-second, fixed on a marble pedestal in the middle square of St. Thomas’s hospital in Southwark.

The day of election for Lord-mayor being arrived, the livery paid no regard to the seniority of Sir George Champion. They returned Sir John Salter and Sir Robert Godschall : but a poll being demanded by the friends of Sir George, the same was continued for about a quarter of an hour ; when, finding the livery were determined to oppose him, it was thrown up, and the numbers, on inspection, appeared as follows :

Sir John Salter	95
Sir Robert Godschall	90
Sir George Champion	21

In consequence of which Sir John Salter, knt. was declared, in the common-hall, Lord-mayor for the year ensuing.

The nation grew more and more clamorous against the ministry, and repeated their addresses, so strenuously to the house of commons for a vigorous war with Spain, that his majesty resolved to comply with their request. Accordingly, on the twenty-second of October the officers of arms, with the serjeants at arms and trumpeters, mounted their horses in the stable-yard, St. James’s, and proceeding thence to the palace-gate, garter principal king of arms read his majesty’s declaration of war, and Norroy king of arms proclaimed it aloud ; which being done, a procession was made to Charing cross in the following manner :

A party of horse-guards or grenadiers to clear the way.
 Beadles of Westminster bare-headed, with staves, two and two.
 Constables of Westminster in like manner.
 High constable of Westminster with his staff.

The

Engraved for Chamberlain's History of London.

The MANSION HOUSE

The GUILDHALL of London.

The officers of the high bailiff of Westminster on horseback, with white wands.
Clerk of the high bailiff of Westminster.
High bailiff himself, with the deputy steward on his right hand.
Knight marshal's men.
Knight marshal.
Drums.
Drum major.
Trumpets.
Serjeant trumpeter in his collar, bearing his mace.
Pursuivants, bluemantle, rousedragon, portcul-lis.
Richmond herald.
Windfor herald.
York herald between two serjeants at arms.
Somerset herald between two ditto.
Norroy king of arms, between two ditto.
Garter king of arms, between two ditto.
And the procession was closed by
A party or troop of horse-guards.

At Charing-cross the declaration was read by Norroy king of arms, and proclaimed aloud by Somerset herald. They then proceeded to Temple-bar, where the officers of the city of Westminster retired; and within the gate the Lord-mayor, aldermen, deputy-recorder, and sheriffs in scarlet attended; and bluemantle pursuivant having presented to his lordship the earl marshal's warrant, the city procession followed the troops. At the end of Chancery-lane Somerset herald read the declaration, and York herald proclaimed it aloud.
At the end of Wood-street York herald read the declaration, and Windfor herald proclaimed it aloud. And lastly, at the Royal Exchange, Windfor herald read the declaration, and Richmond herald proclaimed it aloud. This ceremony was performed at each respective place amidst innumerable spectators, who testified their approbation by the most joyful acclamations.

The chief corner-stone of the Mansion-house for the Lord-mayor of the city of London to reside in, was laid on the twenty-fifth of this month,
by the Right Hon. Micajah Perry, Esq; Lord-mayor: on which was cut the following inscription:

This chief corner-stone
Was laid the twenty-fifth day of October, in the year of our Lord MDCCXXXIX.
And in the thirteenth year of the reign of our Sovereign Lord GEORGE the Second,
King of Great-Britain, France and Ireland,
By the Rt. Hon. MICAJAH PERRY, Esq;
Lord-mayor of the city of London.

ALDERMEN.

Francis Child, Knt.	John Barber, Esq;
Edward Bellamy, Knt.	Sir John Williams, Knt.
John Barnard, Knt.	Sir Robert Godschall, Knt.

COMMONERS.

Mr. Deputy John Snart,	Mr. Deputy James Danfie,
Mr. William Tims,	Mr. Deputy Tho. Sandford,
Mr. John Everett,	Mr. Deputy John Ayliffe,
Mr. Deputy R. Farrington,	Mr. Deputy Benj. Hodges,
Mr. Deputy Samuel Tatem,	Mr. Deputy Thomas Nash,
Mr. Robert Evans,	Mr. Charles Hartley.

Being the committee appointed by order of the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of this city, in common-council assembled, to erect this fabric for a mansion-house, for the use of the Lord-mayor of this city for the time being.

George Heathcote, Esq; } Aldermen, being sheriffs.
Sir John Lequefne, Knt. }
George Dance, Architect:

Description of the MANSION-HOUSE.

THIS edifice is very substantially built of Portland stone, and has a portico of six lofty fluted columns of the Corinthian order in the front; the same order being continued in pilasters both under the pediment, and on each side. The basement story is very massy and built in rustic.
In the centre of this story is the door which leads to the kitchens, cellars, and other offices; and on each side rises a flight of steps of very considerable extent, leading up to the portico, in the middle of which is the door that leads to the apartments and offices where business is transacted. The stone balustrade of the stairs is continued along the front of the portico, and the columns, which are wrought in the proportions of Palladio, support a large angular pediment, adorned with a very noble piece in bas relief, representing the dignity and opulence of the city of London. Beneath this portico are two series of windows, which extend along the whole front, and above these is an attic story with square windows crowned with a balustrade. The building is an oblong, and its depth is the long side; it has an area in the middle, and the farthest end is an Egyptian-hall, which is the length of the front,
very high and designed for public entertainments.
Near the ends at each side is a window of extraordinary height, placed between coupled Corinthian pilasters, and extending to the top of the attic story.

The inside apartments and offices are most elegantly furnished; and the bas relief over the grand pediment is finely designed, and as beautifully executed by Mr. Taylor. The principal figure on which represents the genius of the city of London in the dress of the goddess Cybele, cloathed with the imperial robe, alluding to her being the capital of this kingdom, with a crown of turrets on her head; in her right hand holding the prætorian wand, and leaning with her left on the city arms. She is placed between two pillars

Before the building of this noble edifice, it was customary for the chief magistrate of the city to hold his court at one or other of the halls belonging to the twelve principal companies. This, however, being attended with great inconveniences, it was thought proper, for the honour of the city, and the more regular discharge of that high office, to erect a house, as the Mansion for the Lord-mayor for the time being. This being determined by the Lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council, several places were proposed, as the end of Pater-noster-row, fronting Cheapside, Moorfields, and Stocks-market, and the latter was chosen from its being situated nearly in the centre of the city, and in the heart of business. Stocks-market was therefore removed to Fleet-ditch, and the earth dug up for laying the foundation, when the ground was found so full of springs, that it became necessary to erect the building on piles. This great work was finished in 1753, and Sir Crisp Gascoigne was the first Lord-mayor who resided in it.

or columns, to express the stability of her condition; and, on her right hand, stands a naked boy, with the fasces and axe in one hand, and the sword, with the cap of liberty upon it, in the other; to shew, that authority and justice are the true supports of liberty; and that while the former were exerted with vigour, the latter will continue in a state of youth. At her feet lies faction, as it were in agony, with snakes twining round his head; intimating, that the exact government of this city, not only preserves herself, but retorts just punishment on such as envy her happy condition. In the group farther to the right, the chief figure represents an ancient River-god, his head crowned with flags and rushes, his beard long, a rudder in his right hand, and his left arm leaning on an urn, which pours forth a copious stream; the swan at his feet shews this to be the Thames; the ship behind, and the anchor and cable below him, very emphatically express the mighty tribute of riches paid by the commerce of this river to the city, to which it belongs. On the left hand there appears the figure of a beautiful woman in an humble posture, presenting an ornament of pearls with one hand, and pouring out a mixed variety of riches from a cornucopia or horn of plenty, with the other; signifying, that abundance which flows from the union of domestic industry and foreign trade. Behind her is a stork, and two naked boys, playing with each other, and holding the neck of the stork; to signify that piety, brotherly love, and mutual affection, produce and secure that vast stock of wealth, of various kinds, which appears near them in bales, bags, and hogsheds; so that every thing in this piece is not barely beautiful and ornamental, but, at the same time, instructively expressive of the happy condition of that great city, for the residence of whose chief magistrate this noble building was erected.

The whole expence of building the Mansion-house, (including the sum of 3900*l.* paid for purchasing houses to be pulled down) amounted to 42638*l.* 18*s.* 8*d.*

In the reign of queen Anne several eminent merchants, filled with compassion for the many innocent children who were daily exposed to misery and destruction, proposed to erect an hospital for the reception of such infants, as either the misfortunes or inhumanity of their parents should leave destitute of other support; and to employ them in such a manner as to render them fit for the most laborious offices, and the lowest stations. With these laudable views, they proposed a subscription, and solicited a charter; but from the ill-grounded prejudices of some weak people, who suggested that such an undertaking would encourage persons in vice, by making too easy a provision for their illegitimate children, all their solicitations proved ineffectual.

Although this was suspended, yet it did not entirely defeat this laudable design: some of these worthy persons left large benefactions for the use of such an hospital as soon as it should be erected; which coming to the ears of Mr. Thomas Coram, a commander of a ship in the merchants service, he left the sea to solicit a charter for the establishment of this charity, and with unwearied assiduity spent all the remainder of his life in promoting this noble design.

Previous to his presenting any petition to the king, his first step was to procure a recommendation of his design from some persons of quality and distinction. This he pursued with such unbounded diligence, that in a short time he procured the following memorial, signed by the ladies whose names are underwritten:

“Whereas, among the many excellent designs
“and institutions of charity which this nation,
“and especially the city of London, has hitherto “encouraged and established, no expedient has “yet been found out for preventing the frequent “murders of poor miserable infants at their birth,
“or for suppressing the inhuman custom of exposing
“new-born infants to perish in the streets, “or the putting out such unhappy foundlings to “wicked and barbarous nurses, who, undertaking
“to bring them up for a small and trifling
“sum of money, do often suffer them to starve
“for want of due sustenance or care, or, if “permitted to live, either turn them into the “streets to beg or steal, or hire them out to loose “persons, by whom they are trained up in that “infamous way of living, and sometimes are “blinded or maimed, and distorted in their “limbs, in order to move pity and compassion,
“and thereby become fitter instruments of “gain to those vile, merciless wretches.
“For a beginning to redress so deplorable a “grievance, and to prevent as well the effusion
“of so much innocent blood, as the fatal consequences
“of that idleness, beggary, or stealing,
“in which such poor foundlings are generally “bred up, and to enable them, by an early and “effectual care of their education, to become “useful members of the commonwealth; we,
“whose names are underwritten, being deeply “touched with compassion for the sufferings and “lamentable condition of such poor, abandoned,
“helpless infants, as well as the enormous abuses
“and mischiefs to which they are exposed;
“and in order to supply the government plentifully
“with useful hands on many occasions;
“and for the better producing good and faithful “servants from amongst the poor and miserable “cast-off children or foundlings, now a pest to
“the public, and a chargeable nuisance within “the bills of mortality; and for settling a yearly “income for their maintenance and proper education,
“till they come to a fit age for service;
“are desirous to encourage, and willing to contribute “towards erecting an hospital for infants “whom their parents are not able to maintain,
“and having no right to any parish; which we “conceive will not only prevent many horrid “murders, cruelties and other mischiefs, and be “greatly beneficial to the public, but will also “be acceptable to God Almighty, as being the “only remedy of such great evils, which have “been so long neglected, though always complained “of; provided due and proper care be “taken for setting on foot so necessary an establishment,
“and a royal charter be granted by
“the

Engraved for Chamberlain's History of London.

View of the FOUNDLING HOSPITAL Lamb's Conduit Fields.

View of the SMALL-POX HOSPITAL near St. Pancras.

"the king to such persons as his majesty shall approve of, who shall be willing to become benefactors for the erecting and endowing such an hospital; and for the receiving the voluntary contributions of charitable and well-disposed persons; and for directing and managing the affairs thereof gratis to the best advantage, under such regulations as his majesty in his great wisdom shall judge most proper for attaining the desired effect of our good intentions.

Charlotte Somerset,	F. Wa. and Nottingham,
S. Richmond,	E. Cardigan,
H. Bolton,	Dorothy Burlington,
Jane Bolton,	F. Litchfield,
Leeds,	A. Albemarle,
Bedford,	F. Biron,
Devendish Portland,	A. Trevor,
Manchester,	A. Torrington,
Hartford,	E. Onslow,
Harold,	A. King."
Huntington,

After Mr. Coram had obtained this recommendation from the ladies, he procured another to the same purpose, signed by a great number of noblemen and gentlemen, both of which he annexed in his petition to the king, who not only approved of the same, and passed a licence for nominating trustees, for erecting an hospital for foundlings, &c. but was most graciously pleased to grant his royal charter, dated the 17th of October 1739, for establishing this hospital.

His grace the duke of Bedford, who was appointed first president, summoned the several members of the society to meet him at Somerset-house on the twentieth of November, when most of the noblemen and gentlemen mentioned in the charter being assembled, Thomas Coram, esq; thanked his grace in particular and the rest of them in general, for their protection and assistance in promoting the patent.

After this, the court, pursuant to their charter, proceeded to the election of a secretary; and a committee of fifteen noblemen and gentlemen were chosen to conduct the affairs of the corporation.

Books were now opened, and the governors obtained large subscriptions; the work went on with great spirit; an act of parliament was obtained to confirm and enlarge the powers granted by his majesty to the governors and guardians of the hospital. A piece of ground was purchased in Lamb's Conduit-fields, of the earl of Salisbury, which his lordship not only sold at a very reasonable consideration, but promoted the charity by a considerable contribution.

The governors were so anxious for the completion of this charity, that, during the building of the hospital, they hired a large house in Hatton-Garden, nurses were provided, and it was resolved that sixty children should be admitted; but as the funds increased, so a greater number were received in proportion.

As soon as one wing of the hospital was finished, the committee ordered the children to be removed thither, and quitted the house in Hatton-garden. And a chapel being much wanted, and several ladies of quality expressing their desire of contributing to it, a subscription was opened for that purpose, and a neat and elegant edifice was soon erected.

Two years after the governors being informed of the increase of benefactions to this charity, of the number of the children, and the expediency of keeping the boys separate from the girls, gave directions for building the other wing of the hospital; since which the whole design has been completed.

Description of the FOUNDLING-HOSPITAL.

THE wings of the hospital are directly opposite to each other, and are built in a plain but regular manner, of brick, with handsome piazzas. At the farther end is placed the chapel, which is joined to the wings by an arch on each side, and is very elegant within. Before the hospital is a large piece of ground, on each side whereof is a colonade of great length, which also extends towards the gates, that are double, with a massy pier between, so that coaches may pass and repass at the same time; and on each side is a door to admit those on foot. The large area between this outer gate and the hospital is adorned with grass plats, gravel walks and lamps erected upon handsome posts, exclusive of which there are two handsome gardens.

In the court room are placed four capital pictures, taken from sacred history, the subjects of which are suitable to the place for which they were designed.

The first, which is painted by Mr. Hayman, is taken from Exodus ii. 8, 9. "The maid went and called the child's mother, and Pharaoh's daughter said unto her, take this child away and nurse it for me, and I will give you wages."

The following verse is the subject of the next picture, done by Mr. Hogarth, viz. "And the child grew up, and she brought him to Pharaoh's daughter, and he became her son, and she called his name Moses."

The third picture is the history of Ishmael, painted by Mr. Highmore, the subject of which is taken from Gen. xxi. 17. "And the angel of the Lord called to Hagar out of heaven, and said to her, what aileth thee, Hagar? fear not, for God hath heard the voice of the lad where he is."

The fourth picture is painted by Mr. Wills, and is taken from Luke xviii. 16. "Jesus said, suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven."

On each side of these pictures are placed small drawings in circular frames of the most considerable hospitals in and about London, done by Mr. Haytley, Mr. Wilson, Mr. Whale, and Mr. Gainsborough.

Over the chimney is placed a very curious bas-relief, done by Mr. Rysbrack, and presented by him, representing children employed in husbandry and navigation.

The

The other ornaments of the room were given by several ingenious workmen, who had been employed in building the hospital, and were willing to contribute to adorn it. The stucco work was given by Mr. William Wilton; the marble chimney-piece by Mr. Deval; the table with its frame curiously carved, by Mr. John Saunderson, and the glass by Mr. Hallet.

In the other rooms of the hospital are the pictures of several of the governors and benefactors, viz. Mr. Thomas Coram, by Mr. Hogarth; Mr. Milner and Mr. Jacobson, by Mr. Hudson; Dr. Mead, by Mr. Ramsey; and Mr. Emerson, by Mr. Highmore. In the dining-room is a large and beautiful sea-piece of the English fleet in the downs, by Mr. Monamy; and over the chimney in another room is Mr. Hogarth's original painting of the march to Finchley.

The altar-piece in the chapel, which is most beautifully painted, represents the wise men making their offerings to the infant Jesus, who is held in his mother's arms. Here is likewise a fine organ presented by Mr. Handel; in consequence of whom the foundation has been enriched by a sacred oratorio being performed several times in the year to crowded audiences.

Several very handsome shields done in lead were given by Mr. Ives, and placed over the charity boxes, with proper inscriptions; and other artists have contributed their labours to the ornamenting of the hospital and chapel, for which they received the thanks of the corporation: and an inscription is put up to inform the public, that these ornaments were the benefactions of the several artists whose names are wrote thereon.

Another good foundation was established this year, which was the erecting a mathematical school in the Grey-coat hospital, in the parish of St. Margaret, Westminster, for training up boys in the art of navigation, so as to fit them for the service of their country; many of whom, since the erection of this school, have been put apprentice to captains in the king's service.

On Christmas-day a most severe frost began, which continued, with some short intermissions, near eight weeks. Its intenseness and bad effects exceeded all others ever remembered. A few days after it began a very high wind arose, which did great damage among the shipping. Several ships loaded with corn, others with coals, &c. were sunk by the ice; many were thrown on their anchors which made holes in them; some on their sides, foul of others; several lighters and boats under the ice; and, on the whole, the river Thames presented a more dismal scene than had ever been beheld by the oldest man living. The damage done between the Medway and London-bridge amounted to 100,000*l.* besides the number of persons who lost their lives. The necessities of the poor were so great, that had it not been for the extensive collections in most parishes, and the benefactions of a great number of the gentry, they must have inevitably perished.

An act of parliament was passed this session, to amend and extend the powers of the Court of Conscience in the city of London; in which it was enacted as follows: "That it shall be lawful for every citizen and freeman of London, and every other person inhabiting within the said city or liberties, and every person who rents or keeps any shop, shed, stall, or stand, or seeks a livelihood in the said city or liberties, which have any debt owing to him not exceeding forty shillings, by any person inhabiting, or seeking a livelihood, within the said city or liberties, during their respective inhabiting there, to cause such debtor to be summoned by any of the beaules, or officers of the Court of Requests, by writing left at the dwelling-house, lodgings, shed, stall, or stand, or any other place of seeking a livelihood, of such debtor, or by any other reasonable notice, to appear before the commissioners of the Court of Requests, holden in the Guildhall of the said city. And the said commissioners, or three of them, shall, after summons, have power by this act to set down such orders between such parties as stand with equity and good conscience; all such orders to be registered in a book, as they have been accustomed to be.

"If any person contemptuously affront any of the commissioners of the said court, during the time of their sitting, it shall be lawful for the commissioners then sitting, or three of them, to certify under their hands and seals the name of the person so offending, and the nature of his offence, to the Lord-mayor of London, who shall summon such person before him; and upon his appearance, and the fact alleged being proved upon the oath of one or more witnesses, or in default of his appearance, shall punish the person so offending, by fine or imprisonment, or both; provided the fine do not exceed twenty shillings, and imprisonment be for no longer than ten days.

"Upon the non-payment of the said fine, it shall be lawful for the Lord-mayor to issue a warrant for levying the said fine on the goods and chattels of every offender, and to cause sale to be made thereof in case they be not redeemed in five days; which fine, when levied, shall be paid over to the church-wardens or overseers of the poor of the parish, wherein such offender, at the time of such offence, inhabits, or seeks a livelihood, towards the support of the poor.

"The number of beaules or officers employed in the execution of the orders of the said commissioners, may, by the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen of London, be enlarged to two or more, not exceeding four.

"The act 3 Jac. I. c. 15. and all things therein not hereby altered, shall continue in force, and extend to all persons to whom this present act doth extend.

"If any action be brought for any thing done in pursuance of this act, or the act 3 Jac. I. c. 15. the action shall be brought within six months after the fact is committed; and shall be laid in the city of London: and the defendant may plead the general issue; and if the plaintiff become nonsuited, &c. the defendant shall recover double costs."

In

In the year 1740 both houses of parliament addressed his majesty on the success of admiral Vernon, who, with six ships only, had entered the port, and taken the town of Porto-Bello; and on the twenty-fifth of March a motion was made in the common-council to present the admiral with the freedom of the city of London, in a gold box; and to congratulate his majesty on the occasion: both of which being agreed to, the latter was presented to his majesty, by the Lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council, on the twenty-seventh of the same month. And,

On the tenth of May the Lord-mayor and aldermen waited on his majesty with their compliments on the nuptials of the princess Mary with the prince of Hesse; after which they addressed the new married princess on the occasion.

In consequence of a motion being made in the last session of parliament for a place bill, the court of common-council met on the eighteenth of June, and agreed to thank their four worthy representatives for their good conduct in parliament; which they did in the following manner:

"We, the Lord-mayor, aldermen and commons, of the city of London, in common-council assembled, return you our thanks for your faithful and diligent attendance in parliament, particularly while the place bill was depending last sessions; and being solicitous that the rights and liberties which this nation has hitherto enjoyed, should be continued to latest posterity, and considering that those blessings can alone be secured by the independency of parliament, do most earnestly require of you to renew your endeavours in procuring a proper bill for reducing and limiting the number of placemen in the House of commons.

"As we apprehend that your expectations last sessions were in a great measure disappointed, through the absence of a few members from parliament, we cannot but entertain the strongest hopes of success the next year, not doubting but those gentlemen, being at last convinced that a diligent attendance in the house of commons is of the utmost consequence to the nation, will not hazard a second loss of this salutary law, so immediately necessary to preserve the freedom of our constitution; to restore unanimity among the people, and establish that confidence in his majesty's measures, as may effectually enable him, at this important juncture, to assert the honour of his crown and kingdom."

On the twenty-fifth of September a previous meeting of the livery was held at Vintner's-hall, to consider of two proper persons to be returned on Michaelmas-day at Guild-hall, to the court of aldermen, for the choice of one to be Lord-mayor.

After Mr. Glover, who was in the chair, had opened the cause of their meeting, it was resolved to support the nomination of Sir Robert Godschall, knt. and George Heathcote, esq; in the common-hall on Michaelmas-day, they being the two senior aldermen (except Sir George Champion) below the chair. These two gentlemen were accordingly returned by the common-hall; but the court of aldermen, contrary to the usual method, chose Mr. Heathcote, who very politely begged to be excused on account of his health being greatly impaired by serving the office of sheriff the foregoing year.

This occasioned great debates; and strong opposition was made by the friends of the negative aldermen. However, it was at last carried that Mr. Heathcote should not be compelled to serve; and that he should be excused without paying any fine.

Another common-hall was summoned to meet on the fourteenth of October, previous to which the livery met again at Vintner's-hall, and resolved on the nomination of Sir Robert Godschall and Humphry Parsons, esq; who had lately been Lord-mayor; accordingly these two were unanimously returned by the common-hall; but the aldermen, after a debate of near three hours, were pleased to put by Sir Robert Godschall again, and returned Humphry Parsons, esq; who, at a court of common-council held on the twenty-second told them, that if it was their desire, he was willing to accept the office of Lord-mayor, for the ensuing year, let the expence be what it would. This declaration was received by the court with unanimous applause; and thereupon the following motion was made: "That the thanks of this court be given to Humphry Parsons, esq; Lord-mayor elect, for accepting a second time the laborious and expensive office of the mayoralty, and thereby, in some measure restoring the peace and tranquillity of this city, which has been greatly disturbed by a late extraordinary and uncommon proceeding;" which question, after long debates, was agreed to by a great majority: but an amendment being proposed by some of the aldermen present, and Sir John Eyles and Sir Robert Baylis insisting that the opinion of the aldermen should be separately taken thereon, and several of the court of aldermen insisting upon a negative, a long debate ensued, in which their power of putting a negative on the question, was disputed with great warmth; but they still insisting upon that power, Sir John Barnard, and the rest of the worthy aldermen, who voted for Sir Robert Godschall, and a very great majority of the common-council, withdrew from court, protesting, that the aldermen had no right to vote separately, or to put a negative in the forming of a question. After which the aldermen and common-council returned thanks to the Lord-mayor elect, for his accepting the office a second time. And

On Wednesday the twenty-ninth the right hon. Humphry Parsons, esq; the new Lord-mayor, was, with the usual solemnity, sworn into that high office for the year ensuing.—This gentleman was the first who rode in a coach drawn by six horses in the procession on Lord-mayor's day.

On the third of November the London Infirmary, now called the London-hospital; which was carried on in a little house adjoining to Upper Moor-fields, was removed and opened in a more commodious situation in Prescot-street, Godman's-fields.

On the eleventh of the same month, a court of common-council was held at Guildhall, when a motion was made and the question put, "That the court of aldermen have the power of putting a negative upon the framing of a question," which passed in the negative; and it likewise passed the same in the court of aldermen, by a majority of ten to four. Another motion was then made, and the question put, "that the court of aldermen have not the power of putting a negative upon the framing of a question," which passed in the affirmative; and the same passed in the affirmative, by a majority of eleven to four, in the court of aldermen.

The day following, being the birth-day of admiral Vernon, the citizens of London, to express the sense they entertained of the advantages the nation might reap from a vigorous war with Spain, celebrated the same with the greatest rejoicings that had been known for many years. The effigy of Don Blás, governor of Porto Bello, was burnt in many places; and at Chancery-lane end was erected a pageant, representing a Spaniard on his knees, offering his sword to admiral Vernon. A view of Porto Bello, and the ships and warlike implements. Over the admiral's head was written, Veni, vidi, vici, and under him these words, Semper vires.

On the nineteenth a meeting of the livery was held at Vintner's-hall, to consider of proper persons to represent the city in the ensuing parliament; and a letter was produced from Sir John Barnard, in which he desired to be excused all further attendance in parliament, on account of his ill state of health. This plea, however, had no effect on the livery, who, unwilling to lose so worthy a member, put him in nomination, together with Mr. alderman Parsons, Sir Robert Godschall, and Mr. alderman Heathcote. Death, however, soon after frustrated their designs, by taking off alderman Parsons, their Lord-mayor, who died on the twenty-first of March, in the sixty-fifth year of his age. In consequence of which, the next day (being Sunday) a court of aldermen was held at Guildhall, when the question was put, Whether precepts should be issued for a new election, which was carried accordingly. And on Monday the twenty-third, a court of hustings was held at Guildhall, by virtue of a precept from the Locum Tenens and court of aldermen, for the election of a Lord-mayor for the residue of the year; when the common-hall almost unanimously returned Sir Robert Godschall and Sir John Barnard to the court of aldermen, who, in opposition to the livery, once more rejected Sir Robert, and elected Sir John Barnard, who, in a most genteel speech, informed them he was not obliged by the laws of the city to serve that high office more than once; after which, desiring to be excused, it was readily granted. They then proceeded to a new election; when the livery returned Sir Robert Godschall and Daniel Lambert, esq; and the aldermen elected the latter by a majority of thirteen to ten. Accordingly that same evening at nine o'clock, alderman Lambert was accepted by the lord-chancellor with the usual ceremonies; and next day went in great state to the Tower, attended by the twelve companies, where, on a booth erected for that purpose without the gate, he was sworn in by the right honourable the lord Cornwallis, constable of the Tower, according to ancient custom when the barons of the exchequer are out of town. The last Lord-mayor that had been sworn on Tower-hill was Sir Thomas Bloodworth, in the year 1665, when the courts of law were held at Oxford on account of the dreadful plague in London.

The election of an alderman for Broad-street ward was soon after attended with great trouble and expence. The candidates were Charles Ewer, esq; and Mr. Eggleton. On the close of the poll a scrutiny was demanded, and the numbers appearing to be exactly equal, the Lord-mayor held a wardmote at Draper's hall for a new election; at which Charles Ewer, esq; meeting with no opposition, was declared duly elected. In consequence of this Mr. Eggleton petitioned the court of aldermen, setting forth his right to the said election. On the day following, a rule was made in the court of King's-bench, to shew cause why a mandamus should not be granted to swear in Mr. Eggleton alderman of Bread-street ward; and on the twenty eighth the court of aldermen, by consent of both parties, returned that neither party was duly elected. So that the determination of the election must be tried in the court of King's-bench, which was accordingly done in the Michaelmas term following, in favour of Charles Ewer, esq; who was accordingly sworn in.

On the twelfth of May 1741, the poll ended at Guildhall for members of parliament for the city of London; when the list at Vintner's-hall carried it by a great majority; the numbers standing thus:

For the Rt. Hon. Daniel Lambert, esq; Lord-mayor	3117
Sir John Barnard	3769
Sir Robert Godschall	3143
Alderman Heathcote	3322
Admiral Vernon	1175
Sir Edward Bellamy	1311
Alderman Perry	1710

Whereupon the sheriffs next day declared the four first gentlemen duly elected.

It having been found, on the great increase of inhabitants of this city, that it was necessary for the better government thereof, and the more easy bringing delinquents to punishment, to increase the justices of peace within the city of London, and its liberties, his majesty, for that purpose was pleased to grant the following charter:

"George the second, by the grace of God, of Great-Britain, France, and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c. To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting. Whereas our royal predecessor king Charles I. late king of England, by his letters patent, under the great seal of England, bearing date at Westminster, the eighteenth day of October, in the fourteenth year of his reign, did give and grant unto the mayor and commonalty, and citizens of the city of London, and their successors, amongst other things, that the then mayor and recorder of the said city, and the mayor and recorder of the said city for the time being, as well as those aldermen who be"fore

" fore that time had sustained and borne, as those
 " aldermen who thereafter should have sustained
 " and borne, the charge and office of mayoralty
 " of the said city, although they should cease
 " from the mayoralty, or should be dismissed
 " therefrom, so long as they should remain alder" men there; and the three senior aldermen of
 " the said city, for the time being, who should " have been longest in the office of aldermanship,
 " and had not before sustained and borne the " charge and office of mayoralty of that city for " ever, should be all and every of them a justice
 " and justices, to preserve and keep the peace of " the said king, his heirs and successors, within
 " the said city of London and liberties thereof,
 " and appointed the said mayor and recorder, for
 " the time being, to be of the Quorum. And
 " whereas our royal predecessors, king William
 " and queen Mary, by certain other letters patent,
 " under their great seal of England, bearing date
 " at Westminster, the 28th day of July, in the " fourth year of their reign, reciting the said let" ters patent of king Charles I. and reciting
 " also, that the said mayor and aldermen, by
 " their humble petition, had represented to their
 " majesties, that the number of justices of the " peace, constituted within the said city by the " said letters patent of king Charles I. were so
 " few, that, by reason thereof, it frequently
 " happened, that justice could not be admini" stered within the said city with so much ex" pedition, so commodiously, and in such a man" ner, as might be most expedient for their said
 " late majesty's service, and the utility of their
 " subjects: and their said late majesties, there" fore, by their said recited letters patent, did
 " grant to the said mayor and commonalty, and
 " citizens of the city of London, and their suc" cessors, that six other aldermen of the said
 " city for the time being, who then were, or for " the future should be, next in the office of al-
 " dermanship to the three senior aldermen men" tioned and constituted justices of the peace in
 " the said first-mentioned charter, and who then
 " had borne, and thereafter should have borne,
 " the office of sheriff of the said city, besides
 " and beyond the three senior aldermen as afore-
 " said, should for ever thereafter be justices of " the peace within the said city of London and " liberties thereof; and these six aldermen, with
 " the mayor and recorder for the time being, as " well as those aldermen who had borne the office
 " of mayoralty, and the aforesaid three senior
 " aldermen, or any four of them, whereof the " said mayor or recorder for the time being to be
 " one, are by the said last-recited letters patent
 " constituted justices of the peace for the said
 " city and liberties, with the same powers that
 " are granted to the justices of the peace of any " county of this kingdom, as by the said several " recited letters patent (amongst divers other
 " matters and things therein contained, rela" tion being thereto respectively had) may
 " more fully and largely appear. And whereas
 " the Lord-mayor and aldermen of the said city
 " of London have, by their petition, humbly
 " represented unto us, that, since the granting of
 " the said last-mentioned letters patent, the du" ties of the justices of the peace, within the " said city and liberties, are, by many acts of " parliament, very much increased; so that the " petitioners, who are constituted justices by the " said charter, have, for the more speedy and ef" fectual execution of justice, agreed amongst

 " themselves to sit daily, by turns, in the Guild-
 " hall of the said city, for the public administra" tion of justice: and that the petitioners most
 " humbly conceive it will be for the public uti" lity of all our subjects within the said city and
 " liberties, and that justice may still be more
 " commodiously and expeditiously administered,
 " if the present number of justices of the peace,
 " within the said city of London and liberties
 " thereof, was increased: and the petitioners fur" ther represent, that the Lord-mayor and re" corder being the only justices of the Quorum,
 " if by sickness or other unavoidable accident, it
 " should happen that neither may be able to attend
 " the session, great inconveniences may arise:
 " the petitioners, therefore, have humbly be" sought us to grant to our good subjects, the
 " mayor and commonalty and citizens of the
 " said city, that, for the future, the mayor, re" corder, and all the aldermen, for the time be" ing, may be justices of the peace for the said
 " city of London and liberties thereof; and that
 " all those aldermen, for the time being, who " shall have borne and sustained the office of " mayoralty of the said city, may be of the Quo" rum, as well as the mayor and recorder: we
 " being willing to gratify the petitioners in their " request; know ye, therefore, that we, of our " special grace, certain knowledge, and mere
 " motion, have given, granted, and by these
 " presents, for us, our heirs and successors, do
 " give and grant, to the mayor and commonalty
 " and citizens of the city of London, and their " successors, that the mayor, recorder and all the " aldermen of the said city of London, for the " time being, and every one of them, be for ever
 " hereafter a justice or justices of the peace of us,
 " our heirs and successors, within the said city
 " of London and liberties thereof: and we do
 " by these presents, for us, our heirs and succe" ssors, constitute, make, and ordain, the mayor,
 " recorder, and all the aldermen of the said city
 " of London, for the time being, and every of " them, or any four of them (of whom the mayor
 " and recorder, or any one of the aldermen who " have sustained the office of mayoralty, for the " time being, we will shall always be one) justices
 " of us, our heirs and successors, within the said
 " city of London and liberties thereof, to keep,
 " and cause to be kept, all and singular statutes
 " and ordinances, in all their articles, made, and
 " to be made, for the preservation of the peace,
 " of us, our heirs and successors, and for the " peaceable ruling and governing the people of
 " us, our heirs and successors, as well within the " said city as the liberties thereof, according to
 " the form and effect of the same; and to cor" rect and punish, in the manner prescribed by,
 " those statutes and ordinances, all such persons
 " as shall be found offending, within the said
 " city and liberties thereof, against the form and
 " effect of the same statutes and ordinances, or
 " any

“ any or either of them; and to demand such “ sufficient security for the peace, and good be“ haviour towards us, our heirs and successors,
 “ and all the subjects of us, our heirs and succefsors,
 “ of all such persons who shall send threatenings to any subject or subjects, of us, our “ heirs or successors, concerning their bodies, or
 “ the burning their houses; and if they refuse to “ find such security, then to cause them to be “ safely kept in our goal of Newgate, or in any “ other prison of us, our heirs or successors, in “ our said city of London, until they shall have “ found such security; and to do and perform all
 “ and singular other matters and things, which “ any justices or keepers of the peace of us, our “ heirs and successors, within any county of that “ part of our kingdom of Great-Britain called “ England, may, can, or ought to do and per“ form, by virtue of any statutes and ordinances
 “ of this part of our kingdom of Great-Britain
 “ called England, or by virtue of any commission
 “ of us, our heirs and successors, to preserve the “ peace in any such county. In witness whereof
 “ we have caused these our letters to be made “ patent.

“ Witness John archbishop of Canterbury,
 “ and other guardians and justices of the “ kingdom, at Westminster, the 25th day
 “ of August, in the fifteenth year of our “ reign.

About eleven o'clock in the forenoon, on the eighth of September, the wind due south, a prodigious hurricane arose, which did considerable damage to the ships and craft in the river Thames; it uncovered houses, threw down chimnies, and tore up trees by the roots. But the most considerable damage was done in the countries.

About this time the city of London, and places adjacent were visited with an epidemic fever, which carried off great numbers for several months together. The cause of it was supposed to arise from the heat of the weather, which occasioned a coagulation of the blood, or a stagnation thereof in the capillary arteries.

The removal of Sir Robert Walpole producing a great change in the ministry, the city of London, in common-council assembled, on the tenth of February, presented the following instructions to their representatives in parliament.

To the right hon. Sir Robert Godschall, knt. Lord-mayor, Sir John Barnard, knt. Mr. alderman Lambert, and Mr. alderman Heathcote.

“ This court doth take this public occasion to “ acknowledge their grateful sense of your vigilant and faithful conduct in parliament, which “ hath already contributed to the production of “ many good effects.

“ As they have now reason to hope for a change
 “ of measures as well as of men, they desire you
 “ will strenuously promote all those salutary laws
 “ as are or shall be proposed in the house of commons, such as the place-bill, a pension-bill and
 “ the repeal of the septennial act, in order to re“ store the ancient freedom of our constitution;

 “ and secure it against all future attempts either
 “ of open or secret corruption, or of any undue “ influence whatsoever.

“ And more particularly they recommend that “ you will persist, with unwearied diligence, to “ make the earliest and strictest enquiry into the “ causes of all past mismanagements, and exert “ your utmost endeavours to prevent the like for “ the future.

“ And they further expect, that you will extend such enquiry to all persons who, in their “ respective employments, have contributed to
 “ the complicated evils, which have so long oppressed and dishonoured this nation.

“ And they congratulate themselves and the “ whole kingdom that, from the virtue and spirit
 “ of the present parliament, every odious name
 “ of distinction will soon be lost among us, and “ that from this happy period they may date their “ entire abolition of parties, of which the most “ pernicious use has hitherto been made, to the “ imminent danger of our liberties.

“ For now they may reasonably expect, that “ those who wish the real and solid support of his “ majesty and his royal family; and are qualified “ by their virtues and abilities, may have it in “ their power to serve both their king and country;
 “ and that no distinction will remain but of those “ who are friends or enemies to the constitution;
 “ of those who would maintain the freedom
 “ and independency of parliament, and of those “ who would subject it to corrupt and ministerial “ influence.”

At a general meeting of the independant electors of the city and liberty of Westminster, held on the seventeenth of February at the Fountain-tavern in the Strand, it was unanimously agreed that the following representation be delivered to the right hon. lord viscount Percival, and Charles Edwin, esq; their representatives in parliament:

“ We, the burgeses and inhabitants of the “ city and liberty of Westminster, cannot avoid “ taking the first opportunity of paying our most “ grateful acknowledgments for your faithful behaviour during this short, but important period
 “ of parliament; and though we have no reason
 “ to doubt your steady perseverance, yet we cannot think it altogether improper to acquaint
 “ you with our sentiments on the present crisis
 “ of affairs;—a crisis which we apprehend must “ determine the fate of us and our posterity, and “ render this kingdom either a glory or scoff
 “ among the nations.

“ We have beheld, with the deepest concern,
 “ such measures pursued for many years past, as
 “ have manifestly tended to disgrace the name,
 “ betray the interests, ruin the trade, weaken
 “ the liberties, and depress the courage of the “ British nation. It is now with the most sensible “ pleasure we behold the agreeable prospect of “ being delivered from the fatal effects of such “ measures, by the virtue of a truly British parliament, and the removal of those persons who, “ supported by the influence of corruption (that “ canker

“canker of our constitution) have two long wanted in the abuse of power, and mocked the calamities of an almost despairing people.

“But as the melancholy experience of past times evinces, that the removal of the person of a minister from the helm, is insufficient for securing the interests and liberties of a people, while his creatures, his maxims, and his views, are entailed upon the government; we therefore hope you will most strenuously oppose them, and endeavour to procure us such a constitutional security, as may prevent this kingdom from suffering by the like errors or iniquities for the future.

“As the strictest enquiry only can satisfy, so nothing but the most rigorous justice ought to avenge an injured people; it is therefore we earnestly intreat you to make a diligent scrutiny into the authors of those grievances we have so long groaned under, and not suffer impunity to be the lot of the oppressor: justice is a duty you owe to posterity, as examples are most likely to prevent future evils. Should the disturber of the public be permitted the enjoyment of private tranquillity, or his influence remain in those counsels from which his person is removed, we conceive that such an event at this juncture must give a fatal encouragement, or rather sanction to a wanton and wicked exercise of power in all succeeding ministers. Lenity to such an one would be cruelty to the nation; and the calling to a severe account the instruments of pernicious measures, however unavailing to procure us reparation for what is past, may have the happy effect of henceforth preventing the like violations of the constitution, the like profusion of public treasure at home, and the like prostitution of the public faith and honour abroad.

“We zealously recommend to your endeavours the extirpating those party distinctions, which, though their foundation have long ceased to exist, were yet so industriously fostered among us, in order to serve the mischievous purposes of a ministerial tyranny, and in opposition to the real and permanent interests of the present royal family. The common interest, it is hoped, has now united all parties and persuasions, and every man will be regarded only as he prefers the welfare and liberties of his country to any private dependence or venal consideration whatever.”

The merchants and traders of the city of London, finding themselves greatly oppressed by the Spanish privateers; owing to the bad conduct of the admiralty in not granting them proper convoys and cruizers to protect their ships, presented a petition to both houses of parliament on the 20th of January, in which they set forth, “that the petitioners, with the utmost concern, have found themselves under the necessity of representing to the house that the navigation and commerce of these kingdoms have been continually exposed to the growing insolence of the Spanish privateers, from the commencement of this just and necessary war; that during its whole progress and continuance, notwithstanding the repeated applications of the suffering merchants for protection and redress, their losses and misfortunes have considerably increased of late; to the impoverishing of many of his majesty’s subjects, the great detriment of trade in general, the diminution of his majesty’s revenue, and the dishonour of the nation; that upwards of three hundred ships and vessels have been taken, (the greatest part of them in or near the British channel and soundings) and carried into St. Sebastian, and other adjacent ports; by which numbers of his majesty’s most useful subjects have been reduced to want and imprisonment, or, compelled by inhuman treatment, and despairing of a cartel for the exchange of prisoners, have enlisted in the service of Spain; that the petitioners apprehend, that most of these misfortunes might have been prevented, considering the weakness of our enemy at sea, had a few of his majesty’s ships of war been properly stationed, and the commanders kept strictly to their duty; a neglect, which appears the more surprizing, as there was a precedent of an act of parliament in 1707, expressly made for those purposes, intitled, An act for the better securing the trade of this kingdom, by cruizers and convoys: that by means of this neglect, and the many valuable prizes the Spaniards have made, they have been encouraged and enabled to fit out such numbers of privateers from St. Sebastian and Bilboa, exclusive of other ports, as to render the navigation to and from these kingdoms every day more and more dangerous; and that the present great and unexpected power of the enemy, in the Mediterranean gives the petitioners reason to apprehend, that their trade is become extremely precarious in those parts; that there have been various neglects and delays in the appointment and sending out of convoys; and that out of those few, which have been granted, some of the commanders have paid so little regard to the ships under their care, that they have deserted them at sea, and left them as a prey to the enemy: and praying leave further to represent, that the navigation to and from several of his majesty’s colonies has often been much exposed to the enemy; and that many ships have been taken in the American seas by their privateers, principally owing, as the petitioners presume, to a want of a sufficient number of ships, or of proper care in some of his majesty’s commanders, stationed in those parts; that many ships have been brought into danger by the arbitrary impressing of their ablest hands out of the homeward bound ships before they had made the land, or arrived to a place of safety; and out of the outward-bound ships, in the prosecution of their voyages; and praying leave to assure the house, that they do not complain of such captures as are the unavoidable consequence of a war, but of such only as have been occasioned by a want of due care for the protection of trade, which has, during the whole war, laboured under an apparent neglect and disregard; nor shall they ever be induced, either by their past misfortunes or future apprehensions, so far to forget

K k k k

“their

“ their duty to his majesty and the legislature, as “ once to repine or murmur at the present war
 “ with Spain, which his majesty and these king“ doms are so necessarily engaged in, and upon
 “ the vigorous prosecution of which the interest
 “ of the British trade and the freedom of naviga“ tion so evidently depend; and praying the “ house to take the premises into their considera“ tion, that such provision may be made for the “ future protection of the trade and Navigation
 “ of these kingdoms as the house shall think fit;
 “ and that the petitioners may be heard by them“ selves or council thereupon.”

This petition was closely followed by another of the same tendency from the city of London, which was presented by the sheriffs on the twenty-sixth of the same month; setting forth, “ that,
 “ at a time when a feeble enemy holds our naval “ power in derision, and the conduct and distri“ bution of our ships of war are the subject of “ universal censure, to remain unconcerned and “ silent, would ill become the representative body
 “ of this great metropolis, which so sensibly “ shares in every public misfortune; that the peti“ tioners therefore beg leave humbly to represent
 “ to the house, that it is with the utmost grief
 “ they have seen the navigation and commerce of “ these kingdoms so constantly interrupted, on “ our own coasts, and almost in sight of our “ late powerful naval armaments, by the priva-“ teers of Spain, to the ruin of our trade, the “ enriching of the enemy, and the disgrace of “ the British name; that the losses hereby “ sustained, the manner in which applications
 “ for redress have been often evaded, and other “ numerous instances of negligence and disre“ gard of the commercial interest of these king“ doms, (whilst a neighbouring nation is every “ day converting these errors to their own ad“ vantage) have given the petitioners the most “ dreadful apprehensions, lest our trade, the “ foundation of our wealth and power, and which “ has formerly enabled us to maintain the liber“ ties of Europe, should be transferred into the “ hands of our potent and dangerous rival; that
 “ the petitioners cannot but observe with concern,
 “ that those ships of war, which they might rea“ sonably have expected would have been em“ ployed in protecting our trade, have not “ contributed either thereto, or to the interest
 “ or honour of the nation: and that the peti“ tioners have seen a powerful and well provided “ fleet remaining inactive in our own ports, or “ more ingloriously putting to sea, without the “ appearance of any enterprize in view, or even “ the possibility of meeting an enemy worthy of “ its attention, whilst our trading vessels have “ been daily exposed in the British channel and “ soundings to the privateers of a place so incon“ siderable as St. Sebastian’s. And that, not“ withstanding these various subjects of com“ plaint, the petitioners beg the house to believe, “ that they do not hereby intend to signify the “ least desire of peace with Spain, until his ma“ jesty shall, by a vigorous prosecution of the “ war, have obtained from the enemy an ample “ acknowledgment of his people’s just rights,

“ and the possession of such a pledge as may ef“ fectually secure the freedom of navigation to “ our latest posterity: and therefore intreating
 “ the house to take the calamitous state of trade, “ occasioned by the grievances complained of,
 “ into their consideration: and that the house “ would be pleased to make such a provision, for “ the future security of the navigation and com“ merce of these kingdoms, as they shall think “ fit.

In consequence of these petitions, the Lord-mayor and Sir John Barnard were ordered to prepare and bring in a bill for protecting and securing the trade and navigation of this kingdom in times of war. The citizens and merchants were so elated at this order of the house, that they testified the same by the most public rejoicings.

On the twenty sixth of June 1742, Sir Robert Godschall, Lord-mayor of the city of London, died of a violent fever. He was succeeded as mayor by George Heathcote, esq; and as member of parliament, by William Calvert, esq;

At a court of common-council held the twenty-first of October, the following instructions were drawn up, approved of, and ordered to be presented to the city representatives in parliament.

To the right hon. George Heathcote, esq;
 Lord-mayor, Sir John Barnard, knt. and alderman, Mr. alderman Lambert, and
 Mr. alderman Calvert.

“ In the present unhappy conjuncture, when
 “ the domestic enemies of these kingdoms are “ flattering themselves, that, by the late astonish“ ing example of unpunished treachery, and “ corruption, the nation must be driven to de-“ pair, and abandon all thoughts of any future “ efforts for the support and security of the pub“ lic liberty; We, the Lord-mayor, aldermen and “ commons of the city of London, in common-“ council assembled, think it our indispensable “ duty to declare, in this most solemn manner,
 “ that as we were fully sensible how advantage“ ously this nation has hitherto been distinguish“ ed, by its freedom, from the rest of mankind,
 “ we will not, by supineness, resign our claim to “ so invaluable a blessing; but that we will still “ persevere, with the same uniform and unshaken
 “ resolution, against the malice of our undis“ guised enemies, and the falshood of our pre“ tended friends, whose shameful union and con“ federacy against their country, at the same “ time that they serve to increase our apprehen“ sions, shall redouble our attention and zeal for
 “ the defence and preservation of all our consti“ tutional rights. We, therefore, address our“ selves to you, our worthy representatives in “ parliament, and, with the most grateful ac“ knowledgments of your former meritorious “ conduct, take this occasion of laying our sen“ timents before you.

“ We cannot but lament that means have been “ used to defeat our hopes of a speedy and effec“ tual reformation. We had long seen the great “ concerns of the kingdom all perverted to the sin“ gle purpose of maintaining power in one hand.

With

“ With this pernicious design our wealth has “ been exhausted, our trade neglected, our honour
 “ prostituted, and the independency of parlia“ ment invaded; at length, after a continued “ struggle of twenty-years, when we had reason
 “ to expect that the happy period of our deliver“ ance was at hand, that each offender would “ have received the chastisement due to his “ crimes, and such regulations have been esta“ blished as would have secured us from the like “ enormities in time to come, how great was our “ surprize to find, that some of those, who, un“ der a mask of integrity, and by dissembling a “ zeal for their country, had long acquired the “ largest share of its confidence, should, with“ out the least hesitation or seeming remorse, “ greedily embrace the first occasion to disgrace
 “ all their former conduct, and, in defiance of
 “ the most solemn protestations, openly conspire,
 “ with the known enemies of the public, to de“ fraud the nation of that justice and security,
 “ which they themselves had so often and so pe“ remptorily declared was indispensibly necessary
 “ to its preservation and support?

“ Amidst these melancholy considerations, we “ have the satisfaction to find, that the general
 “ censure and indignation have so immediately “ pursued these betrayers of their trust, that few “ have been misled by their pretences; and that “ they succeed in the public hatred those they “ have screened, though they have not, as yet, “ succeeded to their power. And we may reason“ ably expect a more fortunate issue in the ap“ proaching sessions, since many of those crimes
 “ which have so long excited the just resentment
 “ of the public, are now incontestibly evinced
 “ to all mankind, notwithstanding the various “ artifices put in practice to conceal and protect “ them: for it cannot now be a doubt that “ our troops, under the extremest distress in “ an unhealthy climate, were defrauded, by “ collusive contracts, of their just pay; that the “ power of an administration hath been ap“ plied to corrupting of returning officers, the “ purchasing of votes, and the subversion of “ charters; and that immense sums of that pub“ lic treasure, which was appropriated to the “ support of the civil government, have been “ partly secreted, and partly converted to purpo“ ses injurious to the dignity of the crown, and “ destructive of our happy constitution.

“ We therefore most earnestly entreat, that,
 “ at this important crisis, you will not suffer
 “ yourselves to be amused with distant objects,
 “ which of late have been so speciously dressed up
 “ with all the arts of fallacy and delusion; but, “ whatever plea may be offered in behalf of our “ safety abroad, be persuaded that security at “ home is the first point which merits your con“ sideration; that the gratifying the reasonable

“ desires of the people, who ask no more than “ justice and the re establishment of the British “ constitution, can alone give weight and success
 “ to his majesty's councils and measures, can “ alone recover the lost confidence of our antient
 “ allies, and strike terror into our most powerful “ enemies. We therefore apply to you now,
 “ with all the urgent solicitations of men fully “ convinced that their all is at stake, the rights “ and privileges of ourselves and posterity, with “ every valuable advantage purchased for us by “ the blood of our ancestors, conjuring you to “ postpone every other consideration, particu“ larly the supplies for the current service of the “ ensuing year, till you have renewed the secret “ committee of enquiry; procured an effectual
 “ bill to reduce and limit the number of place-“ men in the house of commons; restored the “ frequency of elections, and restrained the abuse “ of power in returning officers. Yet, after “ these salutary provisions, when you shall think “ fit to grant the supplies, at the same time have “ some regard to their application. A nation
 “ burdened with taxes, oppressed with debts,
 “ and almost exhausted by one lavish adminis“ tration, can but ill undergo a fresh profusion of “ its treasure in the parade of numerous land “ armies, and the hire of foreign forces, without “ the appearance of any service in the behalf of “ his majesty's British dominions.

“ These points alone can give safety to the “ kingdom, and appease the general discontents;
 “ and the vigorous prosecution of them, in con“ currence with all true friends of the public, “ (independent of party, or of any other in-“ vidious distinction whatsoever) will insure to “ yourselves the lasting favour and affection of “ this great metropolis.”

On the twentieth of December a cause was tried before lord chief justice Willes, in which the company of weavers were plaintiffs, and Mr.
 Thomas Handycraft, defendant, who refused to be of the livery of the company, not being free of the city. It appearing, however, that every member of a company is eligible to the livery, though not free of the city, a verdict was given in favour of the plaintiffs.

Another cause was tried on an action brought by one Anthony Wright against William Ayres, the lessee of the toll on London-bridge, who had received and insisted upon a prescriptive right to receive two-pence for the passage of each cart laden with one ton weight, or upwards, passing over the bridge. After many learned arguments on both sides, it appearing by the evidence that the usage had been to take one-penny only for a cart with two horses, although laden with a ton or upwards, a verdict was given in favour of the plaintiff.

CHAPTER XLII.

Birth of prince William Henry. City address to his majesty on the occasion. French invasion intended. War declared against France. Combination of journeymen taylors. Proclamation for detecting street-robbers. Act of parliament for better lighting the city. Fire at Shad-Thames. Letter from the duke of Newcastle to the Lord-mayor concerning a rebellion. Proclamation against papists. The city guarded by the militia. Voluntary subscriptions for the army. Association of lawyers. Quakers subscribe to the army. A regiment of lawyers. The rebels defeated. Duke of Cumberland presented with the freedom of the city. Execution of the earl of Kilmarnock, lord Balmerino, Charles Ratcliffe, and Simon lord Lovat. Corporation for clergymens widows. Election of members of parliament. Great fire in Cornhill. Ordinances for electing sheriffs.

ABOUT the time his majesty returned from his German dominions, her royal highness the princess of Wales was safely delivered of a prince on the fourteenth of November, who was baptized by the name of William Henry; and his majesty's daughter, the princess Louisa being married about the same time to the prince royal of Denmark, the citizens of London in common-council assembled, agreed to address his majesty on these several occasions. Accordingly on the nineteenth, the Lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council waited on his majesty at St. James's, and presented him with the following congratulations:

"Most gracious sovereign,

"We, your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons, of the city of London, in common-council assembled, most humbly approach your throne with hearts full of the sincerest wishes for the honour and prosperity of your sacred person and government, and beg leave to offer our most hearty congratulations upon your safe return to these your British dominions.

"Permit us, royal Sir, at the same time to express our joy, that your happy arrival hath been blessed with the safe delivery of her royal highness the princess of Wales of a prince: an auspicious omen and further pledge of our future happiness by the increase of your royal progeny, to defend our religion, laws, and liberties, and protect our trade and commerce, always confiding that a race of princes, descending from your majesty, will be ever mindful to preserve these blessings to our latest posterity.

"We further beg leave to congratulate your majesty upon the marriage of your royal daughter the princess Louisa to the prince royal of Denmark, by which alliance we have reason to hope that the protestant interest in Europe will be more firmly united.

"We shall ever think it our indispensable duty to pray, that the hearts and affections of your loyal subjects may be the just and grateful reward of your paternal care and protection;

"that your majesty's reign may be long and glorious over a free, dutiful, and united people; and that the sceptre of these realms may always remain in your royal family."

And on the 15th of December, the said court waited on their royal highnesses the prince and princess of Wales, whom they addressed in the following manner:

"May it please your royal highnesses,

"We, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council-men of the city of London, humbly beg leave to present our most hearty congratulations, upon the safe delivery and happy recovery of madam, your royal highness, and the increase of your illustrious family, by the birth of another prince; an event, which must greatly contribute to our happiness, as it strengthens our present constitution, and yields a further prospect of its continuance in the protestant succession of his majesty's royal line.

"We cannot sufficiently express our joy when we reflect on the many eminent virtues, which, we promise ourselves, will be transmitted from your royal highnesses to your posterity; formed with the same generous and benevolent dispositions, for which you are so universally admired; and instructed by the same great examples to pay a dutiful obedience to his majesty, and a tender regard for the liberties of his subjects.

"Permit us likewise, Sir, to make use of this opportunity, to return you our particular thanks for the repeated declarations of your attachment to the interests and welfare of our city, of which you have so graciously condescended to become a member; and with minds truly sensible of the high honour of your princely patronage and protection, we offer up our constant prayers, that your royal highnesses may enjoy all happiness and prosperity; and that your descendants may successively continue the blessings derived from you to the latest posterity."

On

On the eighteenth of February 1744, his majesty having informed both houses of parliament, and the Lord-mayor of London, that he had received undoubted intelligence of the pretender's eldest son intending to invade this kingdom thro' the support of France, the Lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council, on this occasion presented his majesty with the following address:

" Most gracious sovereign,

" We, your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, in common council assembled, having heard, that attempts are forming by the common disturbers of the peace and tranquillity of Europe, in favour of a popish pretender, to interrupt that happiness we thankfully enjoy under your majesty's government, humbly beg leave to take this earliest opportunity, to express our greatest concern for, and abhorrence of this indignity intended against your majesty and these kingdoms.

" We have no reason to doubt, but that, by the blessing of God on your majesty's arms, our enemies will be disappointed in their expectations. As your majesty's subjects must be too sensible of the blessings of Liberty, property, and the free exercise of their religion, which they enjoy under your most auspicious reign, to exchange them for a certain arbitrary and tyrannical government; so the loyalty and unanimity of your faithful subjects, will greatly tend to discourage these desperate endeavours to destroy and subvert our excellent constitution. We therefore beg leave most humbly to assure your majesty, of our firm and sincerest attachment to your sacred person and government, and our present happy establishment in church and state; and that no endeavours of ours shall, even at the hazard of our lives and fortunes, be wanting to frustrate these attempts, to the prejudice of both, and to secure the laws and liberties of this country, and the protestant succession in your majesty's most illustrious house, to latest generations."

This address was soon followed by another from the merchants of the city of London; which runs thus:

" We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the merchants of your city of London having observed, by your majesty's most gracious message to your parliament, that designs are carrying on by your majesty's enemies, in favour of a popish pretender, to disturb the peace and quiet of these your majesty's kingdoms, think it our indispensable duty, not to omit this opportunity of expressing our just resentment and indignation at so rash an attempt.

" We have too lively a sense of the happiness we enjoy in our religion and liberties under your majesty's mild and auspicious reign, and of the flourishing condition of our trade and commerce, even in the midst of war, under your paternal care and vigilance, not to give your majesty the strongest assurances of our highest gratitude for such invaluable blessings; nor can we doubt, but by the blessing of God upon your majesty's arms, and the unanimous support of your faithful subjects, the attempts of your faithful subjects, the attempts of your enemies will recoil upon themselves, and end in their own confusion-

" We therefore humbly beg leave to declare to your majesty our unshaken resolution, that we will, on this critical conjuncture, exert our utmost endeavours for the support of public credit, and at all times hazard our lives and fortunes, in defence of your majesty's sacred person and government, and for the security of the protestant succession in your royal family."

Many other addresses were presented on this occasion; particularly from the lieutenancy of London, the city of Westminster, Bristol, Rochester, Leicester, Poole, the university of Cambridge, and many other parts of the kingdom.

On the 25th of February a proclamation was issued, commanding all papists to depart the cities of London and Westminster, and within ten miles of the same; for confining papists and reputed papists to their habitations; for seizing the arms and horses from such as refuse to take the oaths, &c. And for putting the laws in execution against the instigators of tumultuous proceedings.

On the thirty-first of March his majesty's declaration of war was proclaimed against France at the usual places, and with the accustomed ceremonies on such occasions.

A great number of journeymen stay-makers and taylor's having entered into a combination not to work for the wages established by law, and the same being represented to his majesty, the privy-council on the eighteenth of September, by his majesty's command, wrote a letter to the duke of Newcastle, Custos Rotulorum of the county of Middlesex, requiring his grace to recommend the justices of the peace to carry into execution the act of 7th George I. for preventing all unlawful assemblies and combinations. Letters to the same purport were sent to the constable of the Tower, and to the Lord-mayor of London. In consequence of which the justices met on the twenty-sixth, and came to the following resolutions: " that if any journeyman should refuse to work for the wages settled by act of parliament, he should be committed to hard labour for two months: and that the master that paid more than the act allowed, should forfeit five pounds."

The streets of the city of London were this winter so pestered with the most daring street-robbers, that it became dangerous to those whose business called them out after dark. And to such a pitch of insolence had they arisen, that they went to the houses of the peace officers, and made them beg pardon for endeavouring to apprehend them; and many, whose lives they had threatened, were obliged to secure themselves by taking shelter in Bridewell.

For the immediate suppression of these desperate villains, and the preservation of the citizens, the Lord-mayor and aldermen, on the thirteenth of October, waited on his majesty with the following address :

“ Most gracious sovereign,

“ We, your majesty’s most dutiful and loyal subjects, the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen of the city London, having taken into consideration the many disorders and robberies which have been committed within these few weeks last past, in the streets of your loyal metropolis, beg leave to approach your throne, and humbly to represent to your most sacred majesty,

“ That divers confederacies of great numbers of evil disposed persons, armed with bludgeons, pistols, cutlasses, and other dangerous weapons, infest not only the private lanes and passages, but likewise the publick streets and places of usual concourse, and commit most daring outrages upon the persons of your majesty’s good subjects, whose affairs oblige them to pass thro’ the streets, by terrifying, robbing, and wounding them; and these facts are frequently at such times as we heretofore deemed hours of security.

“ That the officers of justice have been repulsed in the performance of their duty, some of whom have been shot at, some wounded, and others murdered, in endeavouring to discover and apprehend the said persons; by which means many are intimidated from duly executing their offices, and others put in manifest danger of their lives.

“ These unhappy circumstances do, as we apprehend, tend greatly to weaken the hands of the magistrates, and render the laws ineffectual.

“ It is to us a most alarming consideration, and matter of great grief, that these crimes should, in so short a time, have grown to so great a height; and we beg leave humbly to assure your majesty, that we will vigorously, and with the utmost diligence, apply ourselves to restrain these violences, and detect the authors of them.

“ Permit us, Sir, to express our hopes, that a speedy, rigorous, and exemplary execution of the laws upon the persons of offenders, as they shall fall into the hands of justice, may, under your majesty’s princely wisdom, conduce greatly to the suppressing those enormities, by striking terror into the wicked, and preventing others from entering into such evil courses.

“ We thought it our indispensable duty to lay these facts, and our apprehensions upon them, before your majesty; not doubting but we shall receive effectual support, and your good subjects all possible security, from your majesty’s authority and fatherly protection.”

In consequence of this address his majesty, on the ninth of January, issued a proclamation, promising a reward of one hundred pounds over and above all other rewards, to be paid by the lords of the treasury, for the apprehension of any person or persons found guilty of robbery or murder.

This was followed by an act of parliament obtained by the citizens for the better enlightening the city, which in the preamble sets forth as follows: “ Whereas to prevent the committing of murders, robberies, burglaries, felonies, and other crimes of a heinous nature, in the night season, in the streets, lanes, passages, and courts within the city of London, and the liberties thereof, an act of parliament was made and passed in the ninth year of the reign of his present majesty, for the better enlightening the streets of the city of London: And whereas the provisions made by the said act have been found defective, and insufficient to answer the several ends and purposes thereby intended: wherefore, and to the end the good purposes intended by the said act may be carried on, and fully executed, for the safety and preservation of the citizens and inhabitants of the said city, the mayor, aldermen, and commonalty of the city of London, in common-council assembled, do most humbly beseech your majesty that it may be enacted; and be it enacted by the king’s most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that such a convenient and sufficient number of glass lamps, of such sort and fashion, as the mayor, aldermen, and commonalty of the said city, in common-council assembled, shall think proper and requisite, shall from time to time be erected, fixed, set up, and lighted, in such parts and places, within the said city or liberties thereof, as to the said mayor, aldermen, and commonalty, in common-council assembled, shall seem meet and expedient.”

It likewise enacted, that the rates for defraying the charges of erecting, maintaining, &c. the said lights shall be settled by the Lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council, so as they do not exceed six-pence in the pound, nor fifty shillings on any one person in the whole, in any one year: with a right of appeal to the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen in case of being aggrieved, which appeal to be determined in ten days without fee. And it likewise enacts, that houses let into tenements shall pay to the lamps; that the assessment shall be allowed the tenant by his landlord.

Another act of parliament passed this year for preventing the abuses and annoyances arising from carts within the weekly bills of mortality. In which it was enacted, “ That no person shall drive any cart within the bills of mortality, unless the owner place upon some conspicuous part the name of the owner, and the number of such cart, in order that the driver may be the more easily convicted for any disorder.

“ Every owner of such cart residing within the limits aforesaid, shall enter his name and place
“ of

" of abode, with the commissioners for licensing
 " hackney-coaches, for which entry he shall pay
 " one shilling and no more.

" If any person drive any cart within the limits
 " aforesaid, not numbered and entered as before
 " directed, he shall forfeit forty shillings, and it " shall be lawful for any person to seize and de-
 " tain the cart, or any of the horses, till such
 " penalty be paid.

" It shall be lawful for any person using any
 " cart as aforesaid, having the wheels of the " breadth of six inches when worn, to have the " same bound with streaks of iron, provided
 " such streaks be of the breadth of six inches,
 " and made flat, and not set on with rose-headed
 " nails." And by stat. 30 Geo. II. it was fur" ther enacted, " That the justices of the peace
 " of the city of London shall, at the general " sessions of the peace holden for the city of " London next after the twenty-fourth of June
 " in every year, assess prices for the carriage of " goods taken up in the city of London, as from " the city of London to the city of Westminster,
 " or any other place not exceeding the distance
 " of three miles from the city of London; and
 " make rules for governing such carts, &c. and
 " the drivers; and compel payment for carriage
 " of goods by such licensed carts, &c. accord" ing to the prices assessed, annex penalties for " breach of any such rules, not exceeding five " pounds for any one offence, as to the major " part of the justices at such sessions shall seem
 " meet; and at any other such sessions of the " peace in London, alter such rules, and make
 " new ones. All which rules shall, within thirty " days after, be printed and affixed in some pub" lic places of the city of London, and be made " public in such manner as the said justices in
 " sessions shall order.

" No persons shall wilfully obstruct the passing
 " and repassing in any public streets, lanes, or
 " passages, within the limits beforementioned,
 " or set any empty casks or other vessels in any " such streets, &c. (except for such time only as
 " is necessary for the removing thereof to or from " any place, or for the trimming thereof) or set
 " any empty cart or other carriage, in any such
 " street, &c. except only during such time as " any such cart, &c. is plying for hire in the " places appointed by the persons authorized to " appoint the standings thereof, and except
 " during such time as any such cart, &c. is " waiting in any such street, &c. to load and " unload goods or commodities, or to take up or
 " set down a fare; and every person offending
 " and convicted by confession, or by oath of one
 " witness, before any justice of the peace of the " county, &c. where such offence is committed,
 " shall, for every offence, forfeit any sum not " exceeding twenty shillings, and not less than " five shillings, or be committed to the house of " correction or some other prison of the county,
 " &c. in which the offence is committed, or the " offender apprehended, to be kept to hard la" bour for any time not exceeding one kalendar
 " month, as such justice shall order.

" No person shall ply for hire with any hack-
 " ney coach, cart, or other wheel carriage, in

" Bridge-street, Parliament-street, George-street,
 " St. Margaret-street, or Abingdon-street, in the
 " the city of Westminster, or stay in any of the " said streets, with any wheel carriage, longer
 " than is reasonable to wait to take or set down
 " his fare, or to load and unload goods; and
 " every person having the care of such wheel car" riage offending, and being convicted either by
 " confession or by oath of one witness, before
 " any justice of peace for Westminster, shall for " every offence, forfeit any sum not exceeding
 " twenty shillings, and not less than five shillings,
 " or be committed to the house of correction in " Westminster, to be kept to hard labour for " any time not exceeding one kalendar month, as
 " such justice shall order.

" If the driver of any carriage in the cities of " London or Westminster, or in any public street
 " or common highway within the weekly bills of " mortality, by negligence or wilful misbehaviour
 " interrupt the free passage in any of the public
 " streets in London or Westminster, or in any " public streets or common highways within the
 " said weekly bills of mortality, every such dri" ver, being convicted either by confession of,
 " or by oath of one witness, before any justice
 " of the county, &c. wherein the offence is com" mitted, shall for every offence forfeit any sum
 " not exceeding twenty shillings, or be commit-
 " ed to the house of correction, or some other
 " prison of the county, &c. in which such of" fence is committed, or the offender apprehend-
 " ed, to be kept to hard labour for any time not " exceeding one kalendar month, as such justice
 " shall order."

On the fourteenth of May 1745, a fire broke out at a sail-makers in Shad Thames, occasioned by a pot of tar boiling over, which not only consumed the shop in which it began, but being close to the river, communicated itself to the Berwick, captain Kemp, a ship of three hundred tons, which it burnt to the water's edge, together with several lighters; and the flames were so rapid on shore, that in less than three hours near thirty houses were entirely destroyed, besides a great number which were considerably damaged.

On the tenth of June Edward Gibbon, alderman of Vintry ward, begged permission of the court to resign his gown on account of his constant residence in the country; which being granted, he was succeeded in his office by Crisp Gascoigne, esq;

On the fifth of September, the Lord-mayor received a letter, in his majesty's name, from the duke of Newcastle, informing him that one of the pretender's sons had erected a standard in Scotland, and that a great number of people had assembled together in a rebellious manner; at the same time recommending his lordship to use his utmost care and vigilance for the preservation of peace and quietness throughout his jurisdiction.

On the receipt of this letter, the Lord-mayor and aldermen addressed his majesty on his safe arrival from Germany, and on the conquest of Cape Breton; and assured him that they would support and defend his person and government, even at the hazard of their lives and fortunes.

Two

Two days after a proclamation was issued, commanding all papists and reputed papists to depart from the cities of London and Westminster; and from within ten miles of the same; and for confining all papists and reputed papists to their habitations; and for putting in execution the laws against riots and rioters.

On the tenth of September, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council, attended by the sheriff, recorder, and all the city officers, waited on his majesty at Kensington, and presented him with the following address:

“ Most gracious sovereign,

“ We your majesty’s most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, in common-council assembled, beg leave to approach your sacred person, and with the sincerest joy to congratulate your majesty upon your safe and happy return to these your British dominions.

“ Permit us, most gracious sovereign, at the same time, with the warmest sentiments of loyalty and affection to your majesty, to express our grateful returns to heaven for the blessing upon your majesty’s arms in the conquest of the island and forts of Cape Breton; a place of the greatest consequence to this nation, as it secures to your majesty’s subjects a free and uninterrupted trade in America, and protects them from the insults of a dangerous and inveterate enemy. And we entirely rely upon your royal patronage and protection, to secure to these kingdoms the perpetual enjoyment of this invaluable acquisition.

“ The rash and daring attempts of the professed enemies of this nation, in favour of a popish and abjured pretender, have filled the hearts of us, your loyal citizens, with the utmost abhorrence and detestation. And we beg leave to give your majesty the most solemn assurances, that we will be ready upon all occasions to sacrifice all that is dear and valuable to us, in defence of your majesty’s royal person and family, and in support of our happy constitution both in church and state.”

The merchants of London the day following went in a cavalcade of one hundred and forty coaches, and presented his majesty with a most dutiful and loyal address on the same occasion. And so determined were they to support the public credit, that above eleven hundred of the most considerable merchants, traders, and proprietors of the public funds subscribed their names to the following agreement: “ We, the undersigned merchants, and others, being sensible how necessary the preservation of public credit is at this time, do hereby declare, that we will not refuse to receive bank notes in payment of any sum of money to be paid us; and we will use our utmost endeavours to make all our payments in the same manner.”

The citizens took all necessary precautions for maintaining their just rights, privileges and properties, in opposition to the attempts of the pretender and his French abettors. The militia were mustered, and brought upon duty to guard the city gates both night and day. The most substantial citizens, especially young gentlemen of fortune, merchants and tradesmen, entered into several associations, learned the military exercise, and provided themselves with proper accoutrements and arms, in defence of their king and country. The very lawyers thought it time to exert their courage; and on the twenty-third of November they, preceded by the lord-chancellor, the chief justices, and master of the rolls, the chief baron, and the rest of the judges, proceeded from Westminster-hall in a train of near two hundred coaches, and presented their address and association in defence of his majesty’s sacred person and government, and of the protestant succession in his royal family; and promised to concur in any measure conducive to the great end of it, at the hazard of their lives and fortunes. This address was signed by the lord-chancellor, the speaker of the house of commons, the judges of the several courts, and 369 gentlemen of the law.

The quakers likewise raised a sum of money among their own people, to purchase woollen waistcoats for the soldiers to wear under their cloathing when obliged to keep the field in winter; and the same was transmitted to the army in the north.

At a court of Lord-mayor and common-council held on the the third of December, it was unanimously agreed to subscribe 1000*l.* out of the chamber of London, towards the relief, support, and encouragement of such soldiers, as then were, or should thereafter be employed in his majesty’s service during the winter season, towards the suppression of the then unnatural rebellion. By this and a voluntary subscription paid into the chamberlain’s office at Guildhall, there was raised a sufficient stock to provide 12,000 pair of breeches, 12,000 shirts, 10,000 woollen caps, 10,000 pair of woollen stockings, 1000 blankets, 12,000 pair of woollen gloves, and 9000 pair of woollen spatterdashes, which were immediately converted to the use of the army.

On the seventh of December another proclamation was issued for discovering, apprehending, and bringing to trial all jesuits and popish priests, who should be found after the ninth of that instant, in the cities of London and Westminster, or the borough of Southwark, or within ten miles of the same, with a reward of one hundred pounds to those who should discover or apprehend, any such jesuit or popish priest.

The next day a great number of lawyers met in the middle Temple-hall, and agreed to form themselves into a regiment, under the command of lord-justice Willes, for the defence of the royal family, in such manner as his majesty should think proper within the cities of London and Westminster; to be denominated, “ the associated regiment of the law, for the defence of the royal family, and the preservation of the constitution in church and state.” This was so well received by the king, that the lord-chief justice next day took his commission as colonel of the said regiment.

In

In consequence of the great progress made by the rebels, who had, by forced marches, and avoiding the rout of his majesty's forces under general Wade, advanced as far as Derby in their way to London, the disaffected in and about the metropolis were so spirited up, that they publickly declared their sentiments; and several treasonable papers, called the pretender's declarations, were put under the doors of peoples houses, and dropped on the parade in St. James's Park.

Matters at last came to such a crisis, that a camp was ordered to be formed on Finchley Common, to cover the metropolis, and to make a stand in case of need. Accordingly, on the ninth of December a large train of artillery set out from the Tower, for that place, with a presumption that his majesty intended to repair thither in person, and erect his royal standard for assembling together all his faithful subjects able to bear arms.

It was owing to these vigorous proceedings that the pretender and his rebel crew altered their opinions, and instead of advancing to London, determined to return into Scotland, whither they precipitately fled by the way they had come. His royal highness the duke of Cumberland, however, closely pursued, and gained a complete victory over them beyond the Spey and near Culloden, in the highlands; and on the twenty-first of December he, with his whole army, invested Carlisle, and on the thirtieth, the garrison surrendered at discretion. The prisoners, amounting to about four hundred, were distributed in different goals in England, and the duke immediately returned to London, which he entered amidst the most joyful acclamations of the people.

On the twenty-third of January 1746 the new common-council began the year with a petition to parliament for leave to bring in a bill to take off the negative voice of the court of aldermen; and at the same time they unanimously agreed to present his royal highness the duke of Cumberland with the freedom of the city of London in a gold box. And on advice being received of the total defeat of the rebels by his royal highness, the Lord-mayor and aldermen, and the common-council, and the merchants, &c. of the city of London, respectively addressed his majesty with their most sincere congratulations on that happy event.

On the twenty-ninth of September, when the new Lord-mayor was elected, Sir Richard Hoare, knt. who had governed the city the preceding troublesome year, addressed the livery as follows:

"Gentlemen,

"I take this opportunity before I quit my present station, to return you my hearty thanks for having honoured me with so great a trust, and for your indulgence to me in the execution of it: in which I can presume to claim no merit to myself, any further, than that my endeavours have been sincere to discharge my duty in such a manner, as might best intitle me to your esteem. Your welfare, gentlemen, has been my chief concern. Your approbation will be my highest honour."

The rebellion being quelled, it now became absolutely necessary to make some examples of justice. In consequence of which bills of indictment for high treason were found by the county of Surry against the earls of Kilmarnock and Cromartie, and the lord Balmerino. These noblemen were tried by their peers in Westminster-hall, the lord chancellor presiding as lord high steward on the occasion.

Kilmarnock and Cromartie confessed their crime, and, in pathetic speeches, recommended themselves to his majesty's mercy. Lord Balmerino pleaded not guilty; he denied his having been at Carlisle at the time mentioned in the indictment; but this exception was over-ruled: after this he moved a point of law in arrest of judgment, and was allowed to be heard by his council. Being told, however, that this plea was altogether frivolous, he thought proper to acquiesce; and sentence of death was passed upon him and his two associates. Cromartie's life was spared, but the other two were beheaded on Tower-hill on the eighteenth of August.

About six o'clock on the morning of their execution, a thousand of the foot-guards, a troop of life-guards, and one of horse grenadier-guards, marched through the city to Tower-hill. They marched in upon the hill from Tower-street, and the foot threw themselves into the form of a battledore, the round part inclosing the scaffold in the center, and the handle being formed by two lines, extending to the Tower-gate, with a proper space between for the procession to pass. The horse-grenadiers and horse-guards were drawn up in the rear of the foot, with a space between for the commanding officers to traverse the lines. About nine, the sheriffs of London (attended by their officers and the executioner) came to view the place of execution, as also the house to which the lords were to be conducted, two rooms whereof were hung with black. At ten o'clock the block was fixed upon the scaffold, and covered with black cloth, with which also the scaffold was hung; and some sacks of saw-dust were carried up to strew upon it. Soon after, the two coffins were brought on the scaffold, covered with black cloth, with gilt nails, &c. On the earl of Kilmarnock's was a plate with this inscription, viz. "Gulielmus Comes de Kilmarnock, decollat. 18 Augusti, 1746, ætat. suæ 42." And that for lord Balmerino had this inscription on the plate, viz. "Arthurus Dominus de Balmerino, decollat. 18 Augusti 1746, ætat. suæ 58." In the mean time the sheriffs went to the Tower, and, after knocking at the gate, were admitted; and the prisoners, on their giving a receipt, were delivered to them. Soon after this the procession began: and when they had passed through the lines into the area of the circle formed by the guards, the passage was closed, and the troops of horse drew up behind the foot. The lords were conducted into separate apartments in the house, facing the steps of the scaffold; their friends being admitted to see them. The earl of Kilmarnock was attended by the reverend Mr. Foster, the reverend Mr. Hume, the chaplain of the Tower; and another clergyman of the church of England accompanied lord Balmerino; on entering the door, hearing several of the spectators ask eagerly, which is lord Balmerino? he answered smiling, I am lord Balmerino, gentlemen, at your service.

After which lord Balmerino, pursuant to his request, being admitted to confer with the earl, first thanked him for the favour, and then asked "if his lordship new of any order signed by the prince (meaning the pretender's son) to give no quarter at the battle of Culloden?" and the earl answering, no; the lord Balmerino added, "nor I neither, and therefore it seems to be an invention to justify their own murders." The earl replied, "he did not think this a fair inference, because he was informed, after he was a prisoner at Inverness, by several officers, that such an order, signed George Murray, was in the duke's custody"—"George Murray! said lord Balmerino, then they should not charge it on the prince." After this he took his leave, embracing lord Kilmarnock, with the same kind of noble and generous compliments as he had used before, "my dear lord Kilmarnock, said he, I am only sorry that I cannot pay this reckoning alone; once more farewell for ever!" and returned to his own room.

The earl then, with the company kneeling down joined in a prayer delivered by Mr. Foster; after which having sat a few moments, and taking a second refreshment of a bit of bread and a glass of wine, he expressed a desire that lord Balmerino might go first to the scaffold; but being informed that he could not be indulged in this as his lordship was named first in the warrant, he appeared satisfied, saluted his friends, and said he should make no speech on the scaffold, but desired the ministers to assist him in his last moments, and they accordingly, with other friends, proceeded with him to the scaffold. The multitude who had been long expecting to see him on such an awful occasion, on his first appearing on the scaffold dressed in black, with a countenance and demeanor, testifying great contrition, shewed the deepest signs of commiseration and pity; and his lordship, at the same time, being struck with such a variety of dreadful objects at once, the multitude, the block, his coffin, the executioner, the instrument of death, turned about to Mr. Hume, and said, "Hume! this is terrible;" though without changing his voice or countenance.

After repeating a short prayer, concluding with a petition for his majesty king George, and the royal family, in verification of his declaration in his speech, his lordship embraced, and took his last leave of his friends. The executioner, who before had something administered to keep him from fainting, was so affected with his lordship's distress, and the awfulness of the scene, that, on asking him forgiveness, he burst into tears. His lordship bid him take courage, giving him at the same time a purse with five guineas, and telling him that he would drop his handkerchief as a signal for the stroke. He proceeded, with the help of his gentleman, to make ready for the block, by taking off his coat, and the bag from his hair, which was then tucked up under a napkin cap, but this being made up so wide as not to keep up his long hair; the making it less occasioned a little delay; his neck being laid bare, tucking down the collar of his shirt and waistcoat, he knelt down on a black cushion at the block, and drew his cap over his eyes, in doing which, as well as in putting up his hair, his hands were observed to shake; but, either to support himself, or as a more convenient posture for devotion, he happened to lay both hands upon the block, which the executioner observing, prayed his lordship to let them fall, lest they should be mangled or break the blow. He was then told that the neck of his waistcoat was in the way, upon which he rose, and with the help of a friend took it off, and the neck being made bare to the shoulders, he knelt down as before. In the mean time, when all things were ready for the execution, and the bays which hung over the rails of the scaffold having, by direction of the colonel of the guard, or the sheriffs, been turned up that the people might see all the circumstances of the execution; in about two minutes (the time he before fixed) after he knelt down, his lordship dropping his handkerchief, the executioner at once severed his head from his body, except only a small part of the skin, which was immediately divided by a gentle stroke; the head was received in a piece of red bays, and, with the body, immediately put into the coffin.

While this was doing the lord Balmerino, after having solemnly recommended himself to the mercy of the Almighty, conversed cheerfully with his friends, refreshed himself twice with a bit of bread and a glass of wine, and desired the company to drink to him, acquainting them that he had prepared a speech, which he should read on the scaffold, and therefore should there say nothing of its contents. The under sheriff coming into his lordship's apartment to let him know the stage was ready, he prevented him by immediately asking if the affair was over with the lord Kilmarnock, and being answered, it is, he enquired how the executioner performed his office, and upon receiving the account, said, it was well done; then addressing himself to the company, he said, "gentlemen, I shall detain you no longer;" and with an easy unaffected cheerfulness saluted his friends, and hastened to the scaffold, which he mounted with such composure of mind as astonished the spectators. He then took off his coat and waistcoat, together with his neckcloth, and threw them on his coffin; putting on a flannel waistcoat, which had been provided for the purpose, and then taking a plaid cap out of his pocket, he put it on his head, saying, he died a Scotchman: after kneeling down at the block, to adjust his posture, and shew the executioner the signal for the stroke, which was dropping his arms, he once more turned to his friends, and took his last farewell, and looking round on the crowd, said, "perhaps some may think my behaviour too bold, but remember, Sir, (said he to a gentleman who stood near him) that I now declare it is the effect of confidence in God, and a good conscience, and I should dissemble if I should shew any signs of fear."

Observing

Observing the axe in the executioner's hand, as he passed him, he took it from him, felt the edge, and returning it, clapped the executioner on the shoulder to encourage him; he tucked down the collar of his shirt and waistcoat, and shewed him where to strike, desiring him to do it resolutely, for in that, says his lordship, will consist your kindness.

He went to the side of the stage, and called up the warder, to whom he gave some money, asked which was his hearse, and ordered the man to drive near.

Immediately, without trembling or changing countenance he again knelt down at the block, and having with his arms stretch out, said, "O Lord reward my friends, forgive my enemies, and receive my soul," he gave the signal by letting them fall: but his uncommon firmness and intrepidity, and the unexpected suddenness of the signal, so surprized the executioner, that though he struck the part directed, the blow was not given with sufficient strength to wound him very deep; on which it seemed as if he made an effort to turn his head towards the executioner, and the under-jaw fell and returned very quick, like anger and gnashing the teeth; but it could not be otherwise, the part being convulsed. A second blow immediately succeeding the first, rendered him, however, quite insensible, and a third finished the work. His head was received in a piece of red bays, and with his body, put into the coffin, which, at his particular desire, was placed on that of the late marquis of Tullibardine's in St. Peter's church in the Tower. They were both interred the same evening.

The earl of Kilmarnock was a nobleman of fine personal accomplishments; he had been educated in revolution principles and engaged in the rebellion, partly from the desperate situation of his fortune, and partly from resentment to the government, on account of his being deprived of a pension for which he had for some time enjoyed. The enemies of doctor Foster (who attended him after condemnation) pretended that he had all along flattered his lordship with the hopes of a pardon, provided he kept up his shew of penitence to the last. This calumny, for it was probably no other, received some countenance by Kilmarnock's raising his head after it was laid upon the block, and looking round among the spectators; notwithstanding which, he died as a man and a christian.

The behaviour of Lord Balmerino, on this solemn occasion, though very different from that of Kilmarnock, was far from such as his enemies reported. It was well known he would have accepted of a pardon from the crown, could he have obtained it; but finding all his applications ineffectual, he prepared himself for death with great fortitude and resolution. The most accurate observers could not discover in his eye or gesture the smallest symptom of concern, much less of fear; but he was so far from being insensible, that he was seen to check his natural boldness lest the spectators should think it indecent. He maintained his principles to the last. Kilmarnock seemed to be convinced of the guilt of his conduct, but Balmerino had undoubtedly acted upon principle.

On the eighth of December Charles Ratcliff, esq; commonly called earl of Derwentwater, who had been taken in a ship bound to Scotland, was beheaded on Little Tower-hill, near the Minories, in consequence of a rule of the court of King's-bench, for being concerned in the rebellion in the year 1715; sentence of death being at that time passed against him.

As soon as he arrived at the scaffold, he asked for the executioner, who coming to him, he took a parcel of gold out of his pocket, and gave it him, saying, "I am but a poor man, and there is ten guineas for you; if I had more I would give it you, and I desire you to do your execution so as to put me to the least misery you can." He then kneeled down before the block, and, putting his hands together, made a short prayer; after which two of the warders of the Tower came to him, one of whom took off his wig, and the other put a white cap upon his head; and then the unhappy criminal rose upon his legs, and, with their assistance, pulled off his coat and waistcoat. He turned about and took his leave in a respectful manner, of the sheriffs, and then untied the collar of his shirt, which was fastened with a black ribbon, and began to tuck the collar of his shirt down, but not being able to reach far enough behind, he desired the executioner to do it for him, which he did accordingly. Then, after saying a short prayer to himself, and crossing himself several times, he laid his head down upon the block, and desired the executioner to strike far enough, adding these his last words, When I spread my hands thus, do you take my head off. Which signal he gave in less than half a minute, when one stroke of the axe severed his head, except a bit of skin, which was cut asunder at two or three chops. The body then fell down upon the scaffold; and the executioner, searching his pockets, found half a guinea, a silver crucifix and his beads. Four undertaker's men stood ready with a piece of red bays to receive the head as it fell off, and the body and head were put into the coffin, and conveyed in a hearse to the Nags-head in Gray's inn Lane, and soon after interred at St. Giles's in the Fields.

Thus fell this unhappy man thirty years, within three days, after his escape from Newgate; the principal part of which time he spent with the pretender in Italy. He was the youngest brother of James earl of Derwentwater, who was beheaded in the year 1716.

This year an hospital was founded for relieving poor people afflicted with the small-pox, and for inoculation; and this was the first of the kind in Europe. It consisted of three houses; one in Old street, for preparing patients for inoculation; another in Frog-lane, Illington, when the disease appeared; and the third in the Lower-street Illington, for patients in the natural way.

On the fifth of February 1747 the bill for naturalizing foreign protestants, which had been several times attempted, being brought again into the house of commons, the city petitioned strongly against it, which had its effect, and the bill was thrown out.

On the ninth of April Simon, lord Lovat, another Scotch nobleman concerned in the rebellion, lion, was, pursuant to his sentence by the house of lords, beheaded on Tower-hill: an account of whom with his behaviour after condemnation, we shall be a little particular.

When the warrant for the execution of this noble lord was notified to him, he remained uncertain as to his fate, and really seemed indifferent to live or die; for though he was pressed by his friends to throw himself at his majesty's feet, and petition for mercy, he absolutely refused it, saying, "he was so old and infirm that his life was not worth asking."

Through the whole of his conduct after conviction he appeared undaunted, but preserved his jocular satirical temper to the very last moment of his life. He received the notice of his death-warrant without the least alteration in his countenance, thanked the gentleman who brought it for the favours he had done him, and drank a glass of wine to his health; after which he sat down with him, entertained cheerfully a conversation for some time, and drank part of a bottle of wine. Next morning being informed of the report, that an engine was to be made for his execution like that called the Maiden, provided many years ago for beheading state criminals in Scotland, he commended the contrivance, for, says he, as my neck is very short, the executioner will be puzzled to find it out with his axe; and if such a machine be made, I suppose it will get the name of lord Lovat's Maiden.

On Monday the sixth, the major of the Tower came to see him, and asked him how he did. Do, says he, why, Sir, I am doing very well; for I am fitting myself for a place where hardly any majors go, and very few lieutenant generals. Next morning he desired one of the warders to lay a pillow upon the floor at the foot of the bed, that he might try if he could properly perform his part in the tragedy in which he was next Thursday to be chief actor; and after having kneeled down, and placed his head upon the foot of the bed, he rose up and said, By this short practice, I believe, I shall be able to act my part well enough.

On Wednesday his lordship waked about two o'clock in the morning, and prayed most devoutly for some time; after which he went to sleep again, and slept till between six and seven, when he called for the warder to dress him as usual; and, during the remaining part of the day, he not only talked pertinently and sedately with some gentlemen that came to see him, both about his own private affairs and the public affairs of the nation, but cracked his jokes merrily with the warders that attended him, the barber that shaved him, and almost every one that came near him. After eating a hearty dinner, he smoked a pipe, according to custom, and then sent orders to the cook, to get some veal roasted, that it might be ready to mince for his breakfast in the morning.

On Thursday the ninth, being the fatal day, his lordship waked about three o'clock in the morning, and, as he had done the morning before, prayed in a very devout manner for some time. At five he got up, called for a glass of wine and water, as usual, and set reading in his chair for two hours without spectacles; for notwithstanding his great age, he had never made use of any, which was owing it is supposed, to his sober and regular way of living; for though he often drank a cheerful glass, yet he very seldom tasted wine without water, and never drank to great excess.

All this morning he behaved with his usual gaiety, without once discovering the least sign of fear or uneasiness, as appeared by several incidents. At eight, he desired his wig might be sent to the barber, that he might have time to comb it out in the genteel manner; and having desired the warder to get him a purse, to put the gold in, which he designed for the executioner, he added, "Let it be a good one, lest the gentleman should refuse it." Upon the warder's bringing two to chuse, he did not approve much of either; however, he chose one and said, "Tho' it be none of the best, it is a purse that no man would refuse with ten guineas in it." Between eight and nine, he called for a plate of minced veal, eat heartily, and then having called for some wine and water, drank the healths of several of his friends.

In the morning, Mr alderman Alfop, one of the high sheriffs of London and Middlesex, (the other being ill) attended by the two under sheriffs and the proper officers, with the executioner, went from the Mitre Tavern in Fenchurch-street, to the house hired for them on Tower-hill. At ten o'clock the block was fixed on the scaffold, and his lordship's coffin brought, which was covered with black cloth, adorned with coronets, &c. and with this inscription on the lid, "Simon Dominus Frazer de Lovat, decollat. April 9, 1747, ætat. suæ 80."

At eleven o'clock, the high sheriff, with his attendants, went to the Tower, where they knocked at the gate, and demanded the prisoner; and when it was notified to his lordship, that the sheriff was come to demand him, he desired the company to withdraw a little, till he put up a short prayer. In a few minutes, he called them in again, and said, "gentlemen, I am ready;" and after having got down one pair of stairs, being invited by general Williamson to rest himself a little in his apartment, his lordship, upon his entrance, paid his respects, in a very polite manner, to the ladies, then to the gentlemen, and talked as freely, and with as little seeming concern as if he had been come to an entertainment. After getting down the other pair of stairs, he was put into the governor's coach, and carried to the Tower-gate, where he was delivered to the high sheriff attending, upon his receipt.

From the Tower-gate he was conducted into another coach to a house, from the upper rooms of which there was a passage to the scaffold, and the rooms were lined with black cloth, and hung with sconces for his lordship's reception, which dismal prospect produced no alteration in his lordship's countenance. After delivering a paper to the sheriffs, he told them, they might give the word of command when they pleased, "For, says he, as I have been an officer in the army many years, I have been accustomed and am ready to obey command;" and after having said a short prayer on his knees, and drank a little burnt brandy brandy with bitters, he was conducted up the scaffold.

As his lordship was going up the steps to the scaffold, he looked round, and observing such a prodigious crowd of people upon the hill, he said, "He wondered there should be such a bustle about taking off an old grey head, that could not get up three steps without two men to support it;" and after being upon the scaffold, and observing one of his friends very much dejected, he clapped him upon the shoulder, saying, "cheer up thy heart, man; I am not afraid, why shouldst thou?" then he gave the executioner the purse with ten guineas in it, recommending to him, to act his part handsomely; for says he, "if you do not, and I am able to rise again, I shall be very angry with you;" and after examining the axe, and viewing his coffin, he sat down in the chair provided for him, and repeated several lines from Horace and Ovid.

After which, delivering his cloaths and things to his friends, he kneeled down at the block, telling the executioner, he would say a short prayer, and then drop his handkerchief as a signal for him to do his business.

Having placed himself too near the block, the executioner desired his lordship to move a little farther back, which he did; and after having placed his head and neck properly on the block, in half a minute he dropped his handkerchief, and the executioner being now, it seems, become expert at his business, severed the head from the body at one blow, both of which were put into the coffin, and carried in a hearse back to the Tower, where, the next day, they were interred.

His lordship, who had in France professed himself a papist, and in Scotland was desirous to be deemed a protestant, pulled off the mask, after his dead warrant came down, and avowed himself a jacobite and a papist.

A little after ten o'clock on the morning of his execution, a large high scaffold, at the south side of the hill, supposed to contain upwards of four hundred persons, suddenly fell down without giving the least warning: by which accident about twenty persons were killed on the spot, or died of their wounds; and many others had their limbs and bones broke, or were otherwise greatly maimed or wounded.

Courts of judicature were opened in Southwark, and in the north of England, for the trial of those of inferior note. Out of forty-three who were condemned at London, no more than seventeen were executed; and in other parts of the kingdom a still less number in proportion; but a great many of them were transported to America.

About this time a perpetuity passed the great seal for incorporating the bishopric of London, &c. into one body politic, for the relief of poor clergymen's widows and children, within the diocese of London, and to hold in mortmain lands of 1500l. per annum.

The thirtieth of June being appointed for the election of representatives to serve in parliament for the city of London, a smart contest arose between a list set up by the corporation, and another by the merchants of London. However, Sir John Barnard, Sir William Calvert, Slingsby Bethel, and Stephen Theodore Janssen, esqrs; were declared to have a majority of hands; and on the close of the poll carried the election by as great a majority. These were supported by the interest of merchants in opposition to Sir Daniel Lambert and Sir Robert Ladbroke, who was strongly recommended by the aldermen and common-council.

The sixpence per chaldron on coals allowed by parliament in aid of the orphan fund, expiring at Michaelmas 1750, the court of common-council, after having agreed on the twenty-second of October last, and passed a bill on the eighteenth of December, to raise 2000l. on the personal estates of the inhabitants, for the orphan's fund, from Midsummer 1747 to Midsummer 1748, petitioned parliament for a continuation of the said duty. In consequence of which a bill was brought into the house, whereby the said sixpence per chaldron on coals was continued for the further term of thirty-five years, from and after the thirtieth day of September 1750; under these conditions: That the said city, out of the produce of the said imposition, shall pay 3000l. per annum to the mercer's company; and that the revenues of the city shall be charged with two thousand pounds per annum, over and above the 8000l. per annum applied by the fifth and sixth of William and Mary, for the relief of the orphans; with power to the Lord-mayor and aldermen to pay off the principal debt and interest, due upon the act above-mentioned. Pursuant to which power the city borrowed 25000l. at the rate of three pounds six shillings per cent. And the chamberlain, by order of the common-council, dated on the 20th of June 1751, discharged the sum of 21,735l. 17s. 9d. due to the orphan's fund, from the city account, and placed it to the credit of the orphan's fund in discharge of the same debt. And from this time, by act of common-council, the city has always been assessed, at Midsummer, from year to year, and paid two thousand pounds per annum.

On the twenty-fifth of March 1748, about one o'clock in the morning, a most dreadful fire broke out in the house of one Mr. Eldridge, a peruke-maker, in Exchange-alley, Cornhill. It was at first said to begin by the carelessness of a boy placing a candle near some wig-boxes in the shop; but it afterwards appeared to be occasioned by a girl living at a green stall adjoining to Mr. Eldridge, who had left a candle burning in her shed, while she was diverting herself by hearing the music at a concert in the Swan-tavern. The flames communicated themselves with such amazing rapidity, that notwithstanding they had the greatest supply of water and engines, and the buildings in that situation were so very strong, yet, before twelve o'clock at noon, upwards of one hundred houses were entirely levelled with the ground. Mr. Eldridge, his wife, and child were burnt; and Mr. Cook, a lodger, was so much hurt by leaping out of a window, that he died soon after. The maid fortunately saved herself by leaping out of the two pair of stairs window; and the two apprentices escaped by getting over the tops of the houses to the Swan-tavern.

tavern. Notwithstanding the utmost vigilance was used by the magistrates and officers to suppress this dreadful conflagration, yet the least computation made of its destruction in effects and merchandize amounted to two hundred thousand pounds.

Several gentlemen, bankers, and others, immediately set about a contribution for the relief of those sufferers who were real objects of charity, and whose claims amounted to 8000*l*. On the nineteenth of April a committee was chosen at a general meeting of the contributors, who appointed alderman Janssen, esq; chairman; and on the thirteenth of September following they published a report of the sums contributed, and what was paid to each claimant.

On the twenty-eighth of January following, when the subscribers met at Guildhall to examine into the disposal of the money collected on this occasion, the committee reported, that there was remaining in their hands 3300*l*. in balance of the said subscription; and recommended the said remaining balance to be thus disposed of, viz.

	£
To St. Bartholomew's-hospital	1000
St. Thomas's-hospital	1000
Hospital at Bath	1000
London Infirmary	100
Westminster Infirmary	100
Infirmary at Hyde-park-Corner	100
	<hr/>
	3300
	<hr/>

For the more expeditious rebuilding the houses destroyed by the above fire, the court of common-council, on the twenty-ninth of March, did empower the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen to permit as many non-freemen as should be found necessary to be employed in the execution of the said work.

About eight o'clock on the following evening seven prisoners in Newgate for smuggling, on the turnkeys opening the door of their apartment, rushed on them with pistols and broom-sticks, and knocking them down, ran out of the prison and made their escape. An alarm, however, being immediately spread, five of them were retaken in the neighbouring streets, and carried back to Newgate; the other two got clear off.

At a court of common-council held the seventh of April, a bill passed for repealing all former acts, orders and ordinances of their court, touching the nomination and election of sheriffs of the city of London and county of Middlesex; and for regulating and enforcing such nominations and elections for the future: in which it was ordained, that the right of electing persons to the office of sheriffalty shall be vested in the liverymen, and that the general election day of sheriffs shall be the twenty-fourth of June, except it be Sunday, and then on the following day. That the person or persons elected to the said offices, shall take the same upon him or them on the vigil of St. Michael the archangel, next following the said election, and hold the same for and during the space of one whole year from thence next ensuing, and no longer, until some other persons shall be duly elected, and sworn into the same office in their stead. That at the general elections for sheriffs, all the aldermen, who have not actually served the said office shall be publickly put in nomination, according to their seniority, before any commoner: that the Lord-mayor may, at any time, between the fourteenth day of April, and the fourteenth day of June, in every year, nominate in the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen, nine persons free of this city, to be put in nomination for the said office of sheriffalty, to the liverymen assembled for the election of sheriffs, who shall be put in nomination publickly for the said office, before any other commoner, and in the same order as nominated by the Lord-mayor. That if any so nominated shall, within six days after notice thereof, pay 400*l*. to the chamberlain, and twenty marks towards the maintenance of the ministers of the several prisons, together with the usual fees, every such person shall be exempt and discharged from serving the said office, except he shall afterwards take upon him the office of an alderman. That any two liverymen having a right to vote at the election of sheriffs, may publickly nominate any person or persons free of the city for the said office, after the aldermen, and those nominated by the Lord-mayor. That no freemen shall be discharged from such election or nomination for insufficiency of wealth, unless he voluntarily swears himself not worth 15000*l*. in lands, goods, and separate debts, and the same be attested upon oath by six other freemen of credit and reputation. That every person elected to the said office shall, at the next court of Lord-may and aldermen, give 1000*l*. bond to the chamberlain, that he will take upon him the said office on the twenty-eighth of September next following. That the person elected who does not give bond to serve, shall, if an alderman or commoner of the Lord-mayor's nomination, forfeit and pay 600*l*. but if he be neither aldermen nor one nominated by the Lord-mayor, he shall forfeit and pay only four hundred pounds to be recovered by action of debt, in the name of the chamberlain of London, to go and be applied to the use of the Lord-mayor, commonalty and citizens of London, subject to the orders and resolutions of the court of common-council; except one one hundred pounds to be paid to each of the new sheriffs out of 800*l*. if two fines happen to be paid, or fifty pounds to each of the said sheriffs, should there be only one fine paid unto the chamberlain. That no person who has fined shall be ever after eligible, except he takes upon him the office of an alderman; neither shall any person be compelled to serve the said office more than once.

On the fifth of May a cessation of arms was proclaimed at the royal exchange, and the usual places in London and Westminster. And on the evening of the fifth of August, just before a great storm of rain, there appeared in the city of London, and parts adjacent, a prodigious multitude of locusts; which, by a person who took particular notice of them, are thus described: "they said he, resemble grasshoppers in some particular
" lars;

“lars; but are different from them in others: they are more robust. Their common length is about two inches and an half, including the head and the wings. The body is scaly, and coloured like a salmon. The head, neck, and part of the body are covered with a grass cowl or hood. The head is large, and the face streaked with brown and white. The eyes are very bright, and of a hazel colour. The jaws are rounded like a pair of pincers, are blunt and open, and shut horizontally, and are of a black, horny substance. The tongue is like a small French bean seed. Their mouths are large, and their teeth big and strong; and over the jaws, where they meet, they let fall a thin cover, to be contracted and folded at pleasure to draw in their nourishment. Their wings which come from the neck, underneath are greenish, though some are transparent and brown, divided into panes by a small black line spotted and scaly like a salmon. The back is green, the belly dusky, and the tail or stem blackish at the end. They have fewer legs than the grasshopper; and in flying they make a buzzing with their wings like that of the great black beetle.”

At a court of common-council held the twenty-fourth of September, a committee was appointed to examine into the state of the city income, to consider in what manner it might be capable of being improved, and how to raise money for discharging the debt due to the fund for the relief of orphans.

A prodigious hurricane of wind happened on the second of December, which lasted for near eight hours. It blew down two houses entirely, unstripped the tiling of others, and tore up trees by the roots. By the number of chimnies and signs which fell, many persons who were passing the streets were greatly wounded; and a child was killed that stood by the fire by the fall of bricks from a chimney. But the most considerable damage was done to the shipping and small craft in the river.

The court of common-council, on the fifteenth, passed a bill for raising two thousand pounds upon the personal estates of the inhabitants of the city and its liberty, towards paying the interests of the orphan debt, in pursuance of the power granted by an act of king William and queen

Mary, intituled, “An act for the relief of orphans, and other creditors of the city of London.” And on the twenty-second, the committee appointed for enquiring into the laws relating to hawkers and pedlars, came to a resolution to prosecute all hawkers selling wares within the city, or liberties of the same, notwithstanding they should appear to have licenses.

That the peace in agitation, and the arts of the ministry were not so pleasing to the most discerning part of the people is particularly exemplified in a spirited letter wrote by Mr. alderman Heathcote to the Lord-mayor and aldermen, requesting leave to resign his gown. It was dated from Bath, on or about the tenth of January, 1748-9; and is as follows:

“My Lord-mayor,

“The general corruption of the age I have the misfortune to live in; and the frequent detestable instances of apostacy from every principle of honour, integrity, and public spirit of many of my countrymen, both of my own and a superior rank, having fully convinced me, that the endeavours of the few determined to live and die honest men, are fruitless and vain; I have resolved to seek that small share of happiness, which is to be acquired in this venal country, in privacy and retirement, where I am sure it is only to be found; and, therefore, I am determined to return no more to London, unless my own private concerns call me thither. I cannot think it in any respect right to hold an office I shall never attend: this obliges me to apply to your lordship and court of aldermen for leave to resign my gown, and beg the court will accept of this my resignation, and that your lordship will be pleased to issue out a precept for the election of some other Person to serve instead of me for the ward of Walbrook. I most sincerely wish health and felicity to my brethren the aldermen, and the most flourishing commerce, with the full enjoyments of liberty, to the citizens of London, to whom I am inexpressibly obliged for the many honours and trusts they have reposed in me; all which I can, with a safe conscience, say I have faithfully discharged, without ever having once betrayed or deceived,

CHAPTER XLIII.

Remarkable imposition on the public. Peace proclaimed. Proclamation against murderers and robbers. Account of the fire-works on occasion of the peace. Great fire at Battle-bridge. Another in the Poultry. Aldermen Janssen preserves the constitution of the city of London by rejecting the assistance of the military power. Two earthquakes. Act of common-council. for licensing foreigners. Death and funeral of Frederick prince of Wales. Election of a chamberlain. Remarkable hurricane. Prisoners attempt to escape out of Newgate. Act of parliament for preventing thefts and robberies.

THE year 1749 was introduced by one of the most extraordinary impositions on the public that ever brain projected, or credulity countenanced. The particulars of which cannot be unentertaining to our readers.

About the middle of January the following advertisement appeared in the London newspapers:

“ At the new theatre in the Hay-market, on Monday next the sixteenth instant, to be seen a person who performs the most surprizing things following, viz. First, he takes a common walking cane from any of the spectators, and thereon plays the musick of every instrument now in use, and likewise sings to surprizing perfection. Secondly, he presents you with a common wine bottle, which any of the spectators may first examine; this bottle is placed on a table in the middle of the stage, and he (without any equivocation) goes into it in sight of all the spectators, and sings in it; during his stay in the bottle, any person may handle it, and see plainly that it does not exceed a common tavern bottle. Those on the stage, or in the boxes may come in masked habits (if agreeable to them) and the performer (if desired) will inform them who they are. Stage 7s. 6d. Boxes 5s. Pit 3s. Gallery 2s. To begin at half an hour after six o'clock. Tickets to be had at the theatre. The performance continues about two hours and a half.—

“ N. B. If any gentlemen or ladies, after the above performances (either singly or in company, in or out of mask) are desirous of seeing representation of any deceased person, such as husband or wife, sister or brother, or any intimate friend of either sex, (upon making a gratuity to the performer) shall be gratified by seeing and conversing with them for some minutes as if alive. Likewise (if desired) he will tell you your most secret thoughts in your past life; and give you a full view of persons who have injured you, whether dead or alive. For those gentlemen and ladies who are desirous of seeing this last part, there is a private room provided. These performances have been seen by most of the crowned heads of Asia Africa, and Europe and never appeared publick any where but once; but will “ wait of any at their houses, and perform as above, for five pounds each time. There will be a proper guard to keep the house in due decorum.”

In ridicule to this mad-headed advertisement, and to open the eyes of the people, the next day produced the following:

“ Lately arrived from Italy.

“ Sig Capitello Jumpedo, a surprizing dwarf, no taller then a common tavern tobacco-pipe; who can perform many wonderful equilibres on the slack or tight rope: likewise he'll transform his body into above ten thousand different shapes and postures; and, after he has diverted the spectators two hours and a half, he will open his mouth wide, and jump down his own throat. He, being the most wonderfulest wonder of wonders as ever the world wondered at, would be willing to join in performance with that surprizing musician on Monday next in the Hay-market. He is to be spoke with at the Black Raven in Golden-lane every day, from seven to twelve, and from twelve all day long.”

The scheme, however, took, and the playhouse was crowded with dukes, dutchesses, and the most principal people of distinction; the issue of which was as follows:

About seven o'clock the theatre was lighted, and the audience sat a considerable time without even the entertainment of a single fiddle. Their patience being tired out produced a chorus of cat-calls, heightened by loud vociferations and beating with sticks. Soon after which a fellow came from behind the curtain, and, bowing, said, that if the performer did not appear, the money should be returned. In reply to which some person in the pit spoke out aloud, that if the ladies and gentlemen would give double prices, the conjuror would get into a pint bottle. After this a young gentleman in one of the boxes took a lighted candle, and threw it on the stage; which alarming the greatest part of the audience, they made the best of their way out of the theatre, some losing their cloaks and hats, and others their wigs and swords. The remaining party assisted lifted by the mob, who broke into the house, tore up the benches, broke to pieces the scenes, pulled down the boxes, and entirely dismantled the theatre; all which they conveyed into the street, preceded by the curtain fastened on a pole, as a flag of triumph, and converted the same into a large bonfire. A party of guards was sent for, but did not arrive time enough to prevent the resentment of the populace. No material damage ensued from this disaster, except a young nobleman's chin being hurt, occasioned by his falling into the pit.

Many enemies to a book published about that time concerning the ceasing of miracles, were greatly disappointed by the conjuror's non-appearance in the bottle; they imagining that his jumping into it would have been the most convincing proof possible, that miracles were not yet ceased.

This strange delusion and disappointment afterwards produced many satirical strokes in the public papers: among which was the following:

" This is to inform the public,

" That, notwithstanding the great abuse that " has been put upon the gentry, there is now in " town a man, who, instead of creeping into a
" quart or pint bottle, will change himself into a
" rattle; which he hopes will please both young " and old. If this person meets with encourage" ment to this advertisement, he will then ac-
" quaint the gentry, where and when he per" forms."

One very particular reason assigned why the conjuror did not go into the quart bottle was, that after searching all the taverns, not one quart bottle could be found.

On the twenty-sixth of this month, a court of common-council was held at Guildhall; when, after augmenting the salary of the recorder from one hundred and twenty to two hundred pounds, they came to the following resolutions: " That
" the thanks of this court be given to George
" Heathcote, esq; for his uniform, active and " disinterested conduct in every station of public
" trust; for his many and great services done
" this metropolis, as magistrate and representa" tive in parliament; for his zeal and laudable
" endeavours to promote the trade and prosperity
" of his fellow-citizens; and for his exemplary
" public spirit and independence in making the " preservation of the laws and liberties of his " country, the constant and invariable rule of all
" his actions."

On the second of February, the heralds at arms, accompanied by the second troop of horse-guards, attended by the knight-marshal's men, serjeant-trumpeter, high-bailiff of Westminster, and other proper officers, met at St. James's gate, where, his majesty having from the window of the apartments over the gate first sheathed the sword, the proclamation of peace was read with beat of kettle drums and sound of trumpet. From St. James's, the cavalcade proceeded to Charing-cross, where peace was proclaimed a second time. From thence they proceeded to Temple-bar, where the officers of Westminster retired. And, within the gate, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, recorder, and sheriffs, performed the usual ceremony, at their entrance into the city. Proclamation was made a third time at the end of Chancery-lane; a fourth time at the end of Wood-street in Cheap-side; and the last time at the Royal Exchange. It was afterwards proclaimed in all the cities and market towns in Great Britain and Ireland.

On the fifteenth, the Lord-mayor, and the rest of the commissioners of the lieutenancy for the city of London, addressed his majesty with congratulations on the above occasion, and his safe and happy return to his British dominions. And on the twenty-first, the Lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council waited on his majesty with another address of congratulation on the safe delivery of her royal highness the princess of Wales, of the princess Louisa Anne.

Murders and robberies were become, at this time, so frequent in and about the cities of London and Westminster, that the next day, February the third, a proclamation was issued, offering a reward of one hundred pounds over and above all other rewards, to be paid by the lords of the treasury, upon the conviction of any murderer or robber in those cities, or within five miles thereof. Violent riots and tumults also prevailed throughout the kingdom, which were evidently owing to the numbers of unprovided persons discharged from the army and navy. The most dangerous insurrection happened at Bristol, where great numbers of people from Gloucestershire and Somersetshire assembled, cut down the turnpikes, and committed various other outrages. Many of them were well armed, and bid defiance to the magisterial power for some considerable time; but at length six troops of dragoons being sent down against them, they were obliged to disperse, and the quiet of the country was restored.

The great preparations made for solemnizing the peace being of a more extraordinary and expensive nature than were ever exhibited in this metropolis, we shall be a little particular in giving an account of them. The following is a description of the machine for the fire-works, that were exhibited on the twenty-seventh of April, 1749.

THE machine was situated in the Green Park, 500 feet from his majesty's library, and represented a magnificent Doric temple, from which extended two wings terminated by pavillions.

It was 114 feet high to the top of his majesty's arms, and 410 feet long. The ornaments were all in relief, and it was adorned with frets, gildings, lustres, artificial flowers, inscriptions, statues, allegorical pictures, &c.

The inscriptions were as follow:

On the pedestal of Peace in the center, Pax rediviva an. MDCCXLVIII.—Peace restored in the year 1748. In the frieze over the center arch, Georgius II. Rex. Which appeared transparent during the whole performance of the fire-work.

On the left-side of the machine, Redintegrata Europæ pax, securitate fœderum stabilita, commer-

O o o

610

io feliciter restituto, sub auspiciis opt. princ. letatur S. P. Q. B.—To give peace to Europe, to secure the faith of treaties, to restore and enlarge commerce, is the auspicious work of a British king, the triumph of a British people.

On the right side of the machine, Hinc principem bello accingit, libertati devota, fortitudo. Illinc pacificum ostendit, saluti omnium, consulens, clementia.—A prince never disposed to engage in war but from a fortitude sacred to liberty. Ever studious of peace from clemency intent on the public good.

On the attic in the middle of the back front, Georgio II. Regi opt. auctori salutis, libertatis vindici, fundatori quietis, patri patriæ.—To the guardian of our safety, the asserter of our liberty, the establisher of our tranquillity, the most gracious sovereign, and father of his people, George the second.

The statues which adorned it were twenty-three, viz.

On the first half-pace of the great stair-case on the right hand was the figure of Tame; on the left Isis, each reclining on an urn.

In the center of the Temple, seated on an altar, was the goddess of Peace, holding an olive branch, and supported on the right by Neptune, and on the left by Mars. These five were cast in plaister of Paris.

In the front were four statues, viz. Justice, Temperance, Fortitude, Prudence. On the right end, Religion, Constancy, Honour, Clemency. In the back front, Faithfulness, Vigilance. On the attic above the cornice in the front, Jupiter, Ceres, Diana, Apollo. In the back front, at the angles, were Mercury, Minerva.

The pictures in the front of the machine were eighteen, each painted double: They at first appeared as marble basso relievos, and after the fire-work was played off they were removed by machinery, and discovered pictures representing the same subject in colours, which were rendered transparent by a great number of lampions.

The great picture over the cornice in the center of the machine was twenty-eight feet by ten. It represented his majesty giving Peace to Britannia. The attendants on Peace were Plenty, Riches, Felicity, Trade, and Commerce. The attendants on Britannia were Liberty, Agriculture, and the Arts and Sciences.

On the right of this, below the entablature, was a picture of fifteen feet by eight, representing the return of Neptune: he was riding on the ocean in a carr drawn by sea-horses: his right hand held a trident, and his left supported a globe: he was conducted by the genius of Peace, and attended by tritons, sea-nymphs, &c. On the left of the central arch, was the return of Mars seated on a carr drawn by three lions, the arms of England, and was conducted by Fame, with an olive-branch, who proclaimed the peace.

On each side of these two last pictures was a festoon of arms and military instruments.

The medallion on the right hand was Britannia joining hands with France: the legend, Concordia redux. Exergue, Brit. Gall. Concord renewed. Britain, France. Below this was the figure of Liberty.

On the left was a medallion representing Britannia joining hands with Spain: the legend, Salus mutua. Exergue, Brit. Hisp. Mutual Benefit. Britain, Spain. Below this was the figure of Plenty.

At the right end were two medallions, one of Augustus: the other of Antoninus Pius. At the left end, two medallions, one of Vespasian: The other of Trajan. Underneath two Genii on each side a globe, one sitting with a book in his hand, the other standing, holding parchments with seals pendant, &c.

The exhibition began about nine in the evening, and was introduced by a grand concert of warlike instruments. The fire-works were opened by a royal salute of one hundred and one brass ordnance, which was immediately followed by a display of rockets of various sorts, air balloons, &c. in eleven courses the number amounting to 32,684.

After all these had been displayed, there followed a grand girandole from the top of the Temple, consisting of six thousand rockets, headed with stars, rains, and serpents, all in one flight. Then the machine cleared of its combustibles, became so illuminated as to shew the emblematical figures; and the front was beautifully illuminated with a variety of designs, which continued burning for a considerable time.

The following is an abstract of the number of pieces fired on this occasion:

Sky-rockets.
Honorary	482
Caduceus	48
Girandole	48
In flights	10072

Total from 4 ounces to 6lb. weight 10,650

Air balloons	87
Tourbillons	88
Regulated pieces	21
Figured pieces	30
Pots d'Aigrettes	180
Pots de brins	12,200
Cascades	21
Vertical suns and wheels	136
Fixed suns	71
Fountains	160
Gerbes	260
Lances	3700
Marrons	5000

About eleven o'clock the whole building was illuminated, and continued so till between two and three in the morning. His majesty and the royal family retired about twelve.

All the various parts of this great work were performed by direction of Charles Frederick, esq. comptroller, and captain Thomas Desaguliers, chief fire-master of his majesty's royal laboratory.

On the twelfth of August about ten o'clock at night, a terrible fire broke out in Mr. Spencer's dye-house, near Battle-bridge, Southwark. A loft adjoining, which was full of straw, catching fire, fire, the flames communicated themselves to several wooden houses which burnt with such rapidity, that all endeavours to stop it proved ineffectual. What contributed to the misfortune was, the tide being then at ebb. Exclusive of the dye-house, a large brew-house, four wharfs, a cooperage, and about eighty houses were entirely destroyed: many others were greatly damaged, and some coasters on the shore had their rigging burnt. Three men and one woman lost their lives. Upwards of 2000 quarters of malt, a large quantity of hops, and 800 butts of beer were lost by this accident: and the whole damage was supposed to amount to 50,000l.

On the twenty-third of August, a melancholy accident happened at Bartholomew fair, occasioned by the falling down of a gallery in Mr. Philip's booth, wherein were a great number of people. Two men were killed, and many others had their limbs broke, or were dangerously bruised or wounded.

On the twenty-seventh, between three and four in the morning, a fire broke out at Mr. Harwood's, in Grocer's-alley, near the Poultry-compter, which entirely burnt that and four others. The compter and several houses adjoining, were greatly damaged. In consequence of the former being on fire, fifty prisoners for debt, and nine felons, were set at liberty. One of the felons only was retaken; and about forty of the debtors returned voluntarily to their confinement.

On the eighteenth of October, Mr. Sheriff Janssen gave the following example of the constitution and ancient custom of this city, and of the little necessity there is of calling in a military aid to assist a civil magistrate in the due execution of his office. Fifteen criminals being ordered for execution on that day at Tyburn, it was reported and apprehended that a rescue would be attempted at least two of them, named Wilson and Penlez; (the former of whom was pardoned the day before execution) and a party of foot guards were therefore ordered to attend the sheriff or his officers on that occasion: but Mr. sheriff Janssen, for the dignity of the city and his office, mounted on horseback, when the criminals were put into the carts at Newgate, and with no other weapon than the authority of his office, signified by a white wand in his hand, very civilly dismissed the party of soldiers at Holbourn-bars; and, attended by his proper officers, prevented all disturbance and violence, with a promise that the bodies of the malefactors, after execution, should not be delivered to the surgeons. It was hoped, that the remarkable example set by that magistrate, in executing (agreeable to our constitution and ancient custom) his office, without a military aid, would be productive of the most happy effects in a multitude of other instances, and prevent the soldiers from being called in to quell every trifling disorder.

Towards the close of the year there was the most remarkable contest for parliament men in the city of Westminster, that was ever known. The candidates were, lord Trentham, and Sir George Vandeput set up by the independent electors. On the close of the poll, however, it appeared, that the numbers were,

For lord Trentham 4811
For Sir George Vandeput 4654

But a scrutiny being demanded by Sir George and many of the electors, the same was allowed by the high-bailiff, who on examination thereof, declared lord Trentham to have a majority of 170, and returned him accordingly.

About this time, a grant passed the great seal, wherein his majesty was pleased to re-incorporate, singular, all the freemen of the art of butchers of the city of London, and all others who then used or exercised, or should thereafter use and exercise the art within the said city, the liberties and suburbs thereof, or in any place within two miles from the said city, by the name of the master, wardens, and commonalty of the art or mystery of butchers.

This year an act was passed for the more easy and speedy recovery of small debts within the city and liberty of Westminster, and that part of the duchy of Lancaster, which adjoineth thereto. By which it was enacted, That there shall be two hundred and thirty-two commissioners in the whole, to be nominated on the first day of May, yearly, by the inhabitants who have a right to assemble in vestry, viz.

In the parish of St. Margaret's	30
St. John's	20
St. James's	42
St. George's, Hanover-square	30
St. Anne's	24
St. Martin's in the Fields	30
St. Clement Danes	24
St. Mary le Strand	12
St. Paul Covent Garden	20
	<hr/>
	232

And that any three of them may hold a court by the name of the Court of Requests, in the parish of St. Margaret, on every Tuesday; in St. James's, every Wednesday; and in St. Paul's, Covent-garden, every Thursday, to hear and determine, and to execute judgment, and to award execution with costs: but that none shall be imprisoned upon an execution longer than forty days.

Another act was likewise passed the same year for the easy and speedy recovery of small debts within the Tower Hamlets. Whereby they that have a right to meet in vestry for the choice of parish officers, are empowered to nominate two hundred and forty commissioners in the whole, viz.

In the parish of St. Mary Whitechapel	31
Christ-church	21
St Leonard, Shoreditch	20
St John's, Hackney	18
St. Matthew's, Bethnal-Green	8
St. Mary Stratford, Bow	4
Bromley, St. Leonard	3
St. Anne's Limehouse	8
St. Paul's, Shadwell	16
St. George's	18
St. John's, Wapping	17
St.

St. Botolph, without Aldgate	15
Trinity, Minorities	3
Mile End, Old Town	8
Mile End, New Town	3
Ratcliff	15
Poplar and Blackwall	7
Tower without	6
St. Catharine's	7
Well-clofe	3
Old Artillery Ground	4
Norton Falgate	5

240

By the name of the Court of Requests; wherein any three commissioners are empowered to set on Tuesdays and Fridays, weekly, to hear, determine, give judgment, and award execution with costs, against bodies or goods, for any debts under forty shillings.

This year finished with a remarkable cause tried in the Lord-mayor's court, between a club of journeymen free painters, plaintiffs, and Mr Row, citizen and master painter, defendant, for employing a person not free to work for him in the city. The defendant, pleaded, and made it appear by evidence, that from the want of free journeymen of the trade, it was not possible for the summer business of the city to be done, without the assistance of at least an equal number of non freemen; and that no freeman was ever refused, or could sometimes be got on any terms. To which the counsel for the plaintiffs replied with a very learned argument, upon a by-law made by the city in the reign of queen Anne. The jury went out at two o'clock in the afternoon, and returned twice without agreeing on the verdict; and being sent out again, and continuing a long time, the court ordered them to be locked up in the room, without fire, candle, or any sustenance, by an officer sworn to observe the same, and to attend them: in which situation they continued till six o'clock next morning, when they brought in a verdict for the plaintiffs.

The masters of the several handicraft trades finding themselves greatly aggrieved by this verdict, petitioned the common-council for liberty to employ foreigners, under certain restrictions. This produced a counter-petition from the journeymen; the consideration of which was deferred till their next meeting. And

On the 8th of February 1750 a committee of six aldermen and ten commoners met in the old council chamber, to hear and examine the disputes between the several masters and journeymen freemen; when a day was appointed, and thirty masters, with the same number of journeymen were allowed to attend the said committee; who, after several adjournments, made their report on the 21st of June, in which they said they had come to the following resolutions:

" That the matters complained of by the several petitioners require some regulation.

" That the present method of proceedings in the Mayor's-court against persons employing non freemen likewise requires some regulation.

" That the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen

" of this city be empowered, from time to time upon application, any Tuesday, by any master freeman, to give leave to employ any number of non-freemen to work under him within this city and liberties thereof, and for such time and under such restrictions, as the court shall think necessary and proper; but in case there shall be any Tuesday on which the said court shall not be held, that then the Lord-mayor for the time being, upon such Tuesday, shall have the like power.

" That no freeman of this city shall be liable to the penalty inflicted by the act of common-council made and passed the fourth of July 1712, if it be proved that the defendant did, immediately before setting such foreigners to work, use his best endeavours to procure a journeyman being a freeman to work with him; and could not procure any such freeman being a fit and proper person to be employed by him in his work."

This affair was finally determined at a court of common-council held the twenty-second of November following; when, after a debate of near four hours, it passed unanimously.

" That after the first day of December, 1750, the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen might grant a licence to a free master, who has used his best endeavours and cannot procure a sufficient number of fit and able free journeymen to carry on his business, to employ such number of foreigners, for or during such time or times, and under such restrictions, as to the said court shall seem fit and necessary.

" That on any Tuesday, on which no court of Lord-mayor and aldermen shall be holden, the power above-mentioned, so as the same do not exceed the space of six weeks, should be vested in the Lord-mayor for the time being.

" That no licence shall be granted, by virtue of this act, to any freeman to employ any foreigner, unless he has one apprentice at least, or has had one apprentice, within twelve calendar months next before his application for such licence.

" That no freeman should be enabled to employ any foreigner by virtue of this licence, until he has registered the christian and surname, and place of abode, of the said foreigner, and in what business he is to be employed, with the town clerk of the city for the time being, who is to enter the same in a book to be kept for that purpose, he being paid two shillings and sixpence for every licence so to be registered: which book any freeman of this city should have liberty to inspect, gratis, every day, between twelve o'clock at noon and two in the afternoon, (Sunday's excepted :) and if any person registered by virtue of this licence, should leave his master's service, or be discharged the same, the town clerk is, upon application, to insert and enter in the licence and register another person's name in the room of the person discharged, for the remaining term of the licence without any fee.

" That

“ That the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen have a power to revoke or call in any licence, though the time limited therein be not expired.”

On the eighth of February, between twelve and one o'clock at noon, the shock of an earthquake was felt all over the cities of London and Westminster, and parts adjacent. It was more particularly felt by the inhabitants bordering near the river Thames; and at Limehouse, Poplar, &c. it was so violent, that many boats and ships in the river received a very considerable shock. The counsellors in the court of King's-bench and Chancery in Westminster-hall were so alarmed, that they expected the building to fall; and in the new buildings about Grosvenor-square, people ran out of their houses, the chairs shaking, and the pewter rattling on the shelves. A slaughter-house, with a hay-loft over it, was thrown down in Southwark, a chimney in Leadenhall-street, another in Billiter-square, and several chimneys and part of a house near Horslydown. And

On the eighth of March, about half an hour after five o'clock in the morning, the town was again alarmed with another shock of an earthquake, which was generally allowed to be more violent, and of a longer continuance than that which was felt that day month. Great numbers of people were awaked from their sleep merely by its violence, which, however, did no other mischief than throwing down several chimneys and damaging some houses. The shock was so great in some parts, that the people ran from their houses and beds almost naked. In the high grounds by Grosvenor-square; &c. it was said to have been felt more than in other parts, the brasses and pewters of several kitchens being thrown down, and to some distance from the shelves on which they stood. In St. James's-park, and all the open places, the ground moved very perceptibly, and the noise seemed to break three times. It was observed about five o'clock, that there was a continual, though confused lightening, till within a minute or two of the shock being felt, which darted very low, and the flashes were great and strong. A lady in Piccadilly, a curious collector of old china, who had piled a considerable quantity on stands, had it thrown down and broke; bells in several steeples were struck by the chime hammers; and great stones fell from the new spire of Westminster-abbey. A maid servant in Charter-house-square was thrown out of bed by the shock, and broke her arm. The dogs howled in an uncommon manner, and the water was so agitated, that the fish leaped half a yard above the surface.

It was felt in Essex, Kent and Surry, as well as in most parts of Middlesex; and the panic which was universal in the four counties, was considerably increased, by the predictions and admonitions of a fanatic soldier, who publicly preached up repentance, and boldly prophesied that the next shock (which he said would happen the same day in the next month) would lay the cities of London and Westminster in ashes. The fanatic, however, happened to be mistaken; but the two shocks which had already been felt, had brought a serious air upon every face. The pulpits and pews were employed in calling a degenerate people to repentance, and in deprecating the wrath of heaven. “ In after ages (says a modern writer) it will scarcely be believed, that on the evening of the eighth day of April, the open fields that skirt the metropolis, were filled with an incredible number of people, assembled in chairs, in chaises, and coaches, as well as on foot, who waited in the most fearful suspense, until morning and the return of day disproved the truth of the dreaded prophecy. Then their fears vanished: they returned to their respective habitations in a transport of joy: they were soon reconciled to their abandoned vices, which they seemed to resume with redoubled affection, and once more bade defiance to the vengeance of heaven.”

On the eighteenth of March, between five and six o'clock in the evening, a shock of an earthquake was felt at Gosport, Portsmouth, and the Isle of Wight, which greatly alarmed and terrified the inhabitants. Several other places in Europe, particularly France and Germany, were visited with this dreadful calamity; and the island of Cerigo, in the Archipelago, was almost destroyed, and above two thousand of the inhabitants perished.

On the twentieth of April died Sir Samuel Penant, Lord-mayor of London, whose death was occasioned by an infectious fever, which prevailed in Newgate, and was from thence communicated to the Sessions-house in the Old Baily, where it was caught by a great number of persons, and proved fatal, not to his lordship only, but to Sir Daniel Lambert, knight and alderman; to Sir Thomas Abney, a judge of the common-pleas; to Mr. Clark, a baron of the exchequer; to many of the lawyers that attended the sessions; to a greater part of the jury, and to a large number of others who happened to be present.

About four o'clock in the afternoon of the twenty-fifth of June, a man supposed to be a weaver, fell from the top of the monument into the street. He pitched against the top of the pedestal, and from thence against one of the posts, whereby the upper part of his skull was laid open, and the other parts of his body most terribly shattered.

On the 27th of June the Lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council waited on their royal highnesses the prince and princess of Wales, with the following congratulatory address on the birth of prince Frederick William:

“ May it please your royal highnesses,

“ We the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council-men of the city of London, humbly beg leave to present our most sincere and hearty congratulations to your royal highnesses, on the birth of another prince, and the happy recovery of her royal highness.

“ We cannot, at present, better shew our loyalty to the king than by paying our duty to your royal highnesses, and expressing our unfeigned joy at this increase of his majesty's family.

P P P P

“ We

" We consider every child of your royal highnesses as an additional security of the peoples happiness and freedom; by your examples they will learn the practice of every social virtue, to be earnest and zealous in the cause of liberty, and to maintain our religious and civil rights. May we never want one of your royal highness's descendants to reign over a free, grateful, and obedient people!

To which his royal highness returned the following answer:

" My Lord and Gentlemen,

" I return you my thanks and those of the princes, for this very remarkable instance of duty to the king, and regard to us.

" The expectations you express to have of my children are most agreeable to me; may they always be a blessing to this nation, and maintain the liberty, wealth, and power it ought to have!

" The city has always shewed so much partiality to me, that they may be assured none of their fellow citizens can be warmer than I am for promoting their welfare and their trade."

About this time his majesty's royal charter having passed the great seal for encouraging the British White Herring Fishery, and for incorporating certain persons of great wealth and distinction, by the name of "the Society of the Free-British-fishery," for the term of twenty-one years, his royal highness the prince of Wales, on the twenty-fifth of October, (escorted by a party of horse-guards to Temple-bar) went in his state-coach, attended by two others, in which were the lords of the bed-chamber, his footmen and watermen walking before, to Fishmonger's-hall in Thames-street, to receive the charter of the British herring-fishery company, as governor thereof. His royal highness was received at the door of the hall by Mr. alderman Bethel, president of the society, Mr. alderman Janssen, vice-president, admiral Vernon, general Oglethorpe, and such of the society as were in town; and afterwards by the master and court of assistants of the Fishmonger's company, in their gowns, who all waited on him to their parlour. His royal highness made a most gracious speech, in which he expressed his great regard for the prosperity of the city of London. After which, the fishery charter being read by the clerk of the Fishmonger's company, his royal highness wished all imaginable success to this national undertaking, and declared that he had the welfare of it extremely at heart. The clerk of the company then thanked his royal highness for the great honour done the society, and beseeched him, in the name of the company, to accept of the freedom thereof; and his royal highness being graciously pleased to accept of the same, it was presented to him on the twenty-fifth in a gold box of the most exquisite workmanship.

On the eighth of November, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council waited on his majefty at St. James's, to congratulate him on his happy return, from his German dominions and the birth of a prince; when the recorder made their compliments in the following speech:

" May it please your majesty,

" We, the Lord-mayor, aldermen and commons of the city of London in common-council assembled, your majesty's truly loyal and faithful subjects, humbly beg leave, with most respectful duty to congratulate your majesty on your safe return to your British dominions, and with joy to express the satisfaction we derive from your royal presence amongst us.

" As our zeal and affection for your royal house have the next place in our hearts to our zeal and affection for your royal person, we gladly embrace this first opportunity of congratulating your majesty on the birth of another prince: an additional security for perpetuating the protestant succession and the British constitution, the greatest blessings these kingdoms can enjoy.

" We want words to express the grateful sense we have of your majesty's gracious acceptance of our duty, and your majesty's repeated declarations of favour and protection. It shall be our constant prayer, that your majesty may long reign over a free, grateful, and obedient people; and that the sceptre of these kingdoms may be swayed to the end of time by a race of princes descended from your majesty, and inheritors of those virtues which adorn your royal person."

To which his majesty was pleased to return the following most gracious answer:

" I thank you for this very affectionate address. My care and attention shall never be wanting for the support of the trade and commerce of my subjects: and the city of London may always depend upon my favour and protection."

On the 22d of December a proclamation was published by order of council, promising 100*l.* over and above all other rewards, for the discovering and apprehending any offender, who since the 20th of September, has committed, or before the 20th of December 1751 shall commit, any murder or robbery by violence, or make an assault with offensive weapons with intent to rob, in any of the streets of London, or within five miles of the city.

In the beginning of the year 1751 a cause was tried at Hicks's Hall between the tin-plate workers and one Milton, whom they indicted upon the statute of Queen Elizabeth, for exercising their art and mystery, not having served a regular apprenticeship to the same. The verdict was given for Milton, because the tin-plate workers were not incorporated till many years after the enacting that statute.

At a court of common-council held the 8th of January it was unanimously resolved and ordered, that the Recorder's salary should be further augmented by the additional sum of 280*l.* to the former 120*l.* and that the said sum should be paid to Richard

Richard Adams, the then recorder of London, as long as he should continue in the said office, unless he should be thereafter made a judge in any of his majesty's courts, or accept of the office of attorney or solicitor-general; in which case the said grant of 280*l.* should cease.

The same court likewise unanimously agreed to petition the parliament to apply such remedy as might be effectual for preventing the pernicious use of spirituous liquors; and about the same time the grand jury for the county of Middlesex delivered several presentments to the court of King's-bench; to which was annexed the following writing, which had been by them unanimously agreed to, and signed:

"We, the grand jury for the county of Middlesex, beg leave, in discharge of the duty we owe to our king and country, to represent, that returns and presentments made of public nuisances by the constables from the several wards, by virtue of our precept to them directed, are become a mere matter of form; occasioned partly (as some of them confessed) from lewd, disorderly, and gaming houses, and unlawful places of assembly, having been often presented without effect.

"The present ill state of this country, in regard to idleness, luxury, robberies, and other shameful, destructive practices, induces us to make this representation to this honourable court, in hopes, that if it shall appear prosecutions upon such presentments have not been carried into execution from any defect of the laws, or the extraordinary expence attending them, that this honourable court will be pleased to represent it to his majesty for his royal consideration.

"We are the more solicitous for a summary and effectual law to suppress these public nuisances, as we conceive them to be the principal root of the enormous and threatening vices of the age, which greatly endanger the public peace, and every person's property and safety."

On the twentieth of February, a great number of sailors assembled at the Fountain tavern behind the Royal Exchange, having mistaken the sense of an advertisement inserted to procure a meeting to consult agents and managers, how to obtain a few bounty bills, for which they were not proper vouchers; and imagined themselves summoned to receive money, and (upon their disappointment) that the advertisement was published by one who had before summoned them, and raised two subscriptions, they were so irritated as to force the agent into a coach, and carry him to the Lord-mayor: here they were advised to apply to the admiralty, where they went, and afterwards to justice Fielding, who not being at home, they returned to the Lord-mayor, who, to prevent the agent being pulled to pieces, had sent him to Newgate. And some ill designing people having reported that their money was at Mr. Belchier's, in Lombard-street, they assembled before his house, and threatened to demolish it; and notwithstanding the proclamation was read to them, and a party of soldiers brought to prevent mischief, yet they would not disperse till one of them was sent to Newgate.

On the twentieth of March, between ten and eleven at night died his royal highness Frederick prince of Wales, father to his present majesty king George III. His death was occasioned by the breaking of an imposthume between the pericardium and diaphragm, which threw the matter contained in it upon the substance of the lungs. His royal highness was said to have caught a cold about three weeks before in Kew gardens, and to have encreased it on the twelfth by coming very warm from the house of lords with the windows of his chair down; soon after which he complained of pains which were thought to be pleuritic, and were attended with a fever. About a quarter of an hour before his death, he told doctor Wilmot who attended him, and had been up all the preceding night, that he was much better, and advised the doctor to go home: the princess remained with him, to whom he soon after complained of a sudden pain, and an offensive smell, and immediately threw himself backward and expired. And on the thirteenth of April at half an hour after one o'clock in the morning, the bowels of his royal highness, which, in an urn covered with crimson velvet, were brought from Leicester house in a coach and six to the prince's chamber, were from thence carried to Henry the VIIth's chapel, and there interred in the vault, together with the royal corpse, at nine o'clock the same evening. The procession began at half an hour after eight o'clock at night; and when it arrived at the abbey-gate, the corpse was met by the dean and prebendaries, attended by the gentlemen of the choir, and king's scholars, who fell into the procession immediately before the officer of arms, with wax tapers in their hands, properly habited, and began the common burial service (no anthem being composed on the occasion) two drums beating a dead march during the service. Upon entering the chapel, the royal body was placed on tressels, the crown and cushion at the head, and the canopy held over, the supporters of the pall standing by; the chief mourner and his two supporters seated in chairs at the head of the corpse; the lords assistants, master of the horse, groom of the stole, and lords of the bed-chamber, on both sides; the four white staff-officers at the feet, the others seating themselves in the stalls on each side the chapel; the bishop of Rochester, dean of Westminster, then read the first part of the burial service, after which the corpse was carried to the vault, preceded by the white staff-officers, the master of the horse, chief mourner, his supporters and assistants, Garter king of arms going before them. When they had placed themselves near the vault, the corpse being laid upon a machine even with the pavement of the chapel, was by degrees let down into the vault, when the bishop of Rochester went on with the service; which being ended, Garter proclaimed his royal highness's titles.

As soon as the procession began to move, two rockets were fired off in Old-Palace-yard, as a signal for the guns in the Park to fire, which were followed by those of the Tower; during which which time the great bells of Westminster, and that of St. Paul's, tolled, as did most of the parishes in and about London.

On his royal highness's coffin was a silver plate with a latin inscription, signifying his titles and descent, and that he died the 20th of March 1751 aged 45.

About this time Sir John Bosworth, knight, resigning the office of chamberlain of the city of London, on account of his ill state of health, the citizens seemed desirous to invite the late alderman Heathcote to succeed him; and gave it out that he intended to offer himself for that important office. As soon as Mr. Heathcote, who was then at Bath, heard of this report, he sent a letter to the liverymen of London, declaring that he never had any such intention, and did entirely decline offering himself for the chamberlainship. In consequence of which there immediately appeared the following candidates: Mr. Deputy Harrison, Mr. Richard Glover, Mr. deputy Hodges, Mr. Thomas Meakes, and Mr. deputy Pycroft. When they were put in nomination at the common-hall, the majority of hands was declared in favour of Mr. Harrison. However, a poll was demanded by the friends of Mr. Glover, Mr. deputy Hodges, and Mr. deputy Pycroft; and on casting up the books, the numbers appeared as follows:

For Mr. Harrison	1938
Mr. Glover	1358
Mr. Pycroft	542
Mr. Hodges	474

There being a majority of five hundred and eighty voices for Mr. Harrison, he was declared duly elected chamberlain of the city of London, in return for which he immediately paid his respects to the livery in the following speech:

" Gentlemen,

" I return you my warmest and most sincere thanks, for the very high honour you have done me, in electing me chamberlain of this great and opulent city.

" So honourable a preference speaks the more favourable opinion you are pleased to entertain both of my integrity and abilities: the former of these my heart tells me you cannot be mistaken in, how partially soever you may have judged of the latter. I flatter myself therefore, that by a due exertion of these abilities (such as they are) in a diligent and conscientious discharge of the important trust reposed in me, I shall be honoured with the continuance of your favour and protection.

" Give me leave, gentlemen, once more to thank you, and, with a heart overflowing with gratitude, to assure you, that I shall endeavour to act, both in my public and private capacity, as becomes a faithful servant of the corporation, and a sincere friend to every individual member thereof."

After Mr. Harrison had finished his speech, Mr. Glover, who had declined the poll, addressed the livery in the following most genteel and obliging manner:

" Gentlemen,

" After the trouble which I have had so large a share in giving you, by my application for your favour to succeed Sir John Bosworth in the office of chamberlain, this day so worthily supplied, I should deem myself inexcusable in quitting this place, before I rendered my thanks to those in particular who so generously have espoused my interest; to your new-elected chamberlain himself, and numbers of his friends, whose expressions and actions have done me peculiar honour, amidst the warmth of their attachment to him; to the two deserving magistrates who have presided among us with impartiality, humanity, and justice; and, lastly, to all in general, for their candour, decency, and indulgence.

" Gentlemen, heretofore I have frequently had occasion of addressing the livery of London in public; but at this time I find myself at an unusual loss, being under all the difficulties which a want of matter, deserving your notice, can create. Had I now your rights and privileges to vindicate, had I the cause of your suffering trade to defend, or were I now called forth to recommend and enforce the parliamentary service of the most virtuous and illustrious citizen, my tongue would be free from constraint, and, expatiating at large, would endeavour to merit your attention, which now must be solely confined to so narrow a subject as myself. On those occasions, the importance of the matter, and my known zeal to serve you, however ineffectual my attempts might prove, were always sufficient to secure me the honour of a kind reception and unmerited regard.

" Your countenance, Gentlemen, first drew me from the retirement of a studious life; your repeated marks of distinction first pointed me out to that great body, the merchants of London, who, pursuing your example, condescended to entrust me, unequal and unworthy as I was, with the most important cause, a cause, where your interest was as nearly concerned as theirs. In consequence of that deference which has ever been paid to the sentiments and choice of the citizens and traders of London, it was impossible but some faint lustre must have glanced on one, whom, weak as he was, they were pleased to appoint the instrument on their behalf; and from these transactions I accidentally acquired the smallest share of reputation, it was to you, Gentlemen of the livery, that my gratitude ascribes it, and I joyfully embrace this public opportunity of declaring, that whatever part of a public character I may presume to claim, I owe primarily to you. To this I might add the favour, the twenty years countenance and patronage of one, whom a supreme degree of respect shall prevent me from naming; and though under the temptation of using that name, as a certain

" certain means of obviating some misconstruc-
 " tions, I shall, however, avoid to dwell on the " memory of a loss so recent, so justly and so
 " universally lamented. Permit me now to re" mind you, that when placed by these means in
 " a light not altogether unfavourable, no lucra" tive reward was then the object of my pursuit,
 " nor ever did the promises or offers of private
 " emolument induce me to quit my independ-
 " dence, or vary the least of my former profes" sions, which always were, and remain still
 " founded on the principles of universal liberty ;
 " principles, which I assume the glory to have " established on your records. Your sense, livery
 " men of London, the sense of your great cor" poration, so repeatedly recommended to your " representatives in parliament, were my sense,
 " and the principal boast of all my compositions,
 " contained matter imbibed in my earliest edu" cation, to which I have always adhered, by " which I still abide, and which I will endeavour
 " to bear down with me to the grave. And even
 " at that gloomy period, when deserted by my " good fortune, and under the severest trials, even
 " then, by the same consistency of opinions and " uniformity of conduct, I still preserved that " part of reputation which I originally derived " from your favour, whatever I might pretend
 " to call a public character, unshaken and un-
 " blemished ; nor once, in the hour of affliction,
 " did I banish from my thoughts the most sincere
 " and conscientious intention of acquitting every
 " private obligation as soon as my good fortune
 " should please to return ; a distant appearance
 " of which seemed to invite me, and awakened
 " some flattering expectations on the rumoured
 " vacancy of the chamberlain's-office ; but, al" ways apprehending the imputation of presump" tion, and that a higher degree of delicacy and
 " caution would be requisite in me than in any
 " other candidate, I forbore, till late, to present
 " myself one more to your notice, and then, for
 " the first time, abstracted from a public con" sideration, solicited your favour for my own
 " private advantage. My want of success shall " not prevent my cheerfully congratulating this " gentleman on his election, and you on your " choice of so worthy a magistrate ; and if I may " indulge a hope of departing this place with
 " a share of your approbation and esteem, I
 " solemnly from my heart declare, that I shall " not bear away with me the least trace of dis" appointment."

Her royal highness the princess of Wales being safely delivered of a princess, the Lord-mayor and aldermen of London on the nineteenth of July, waited on his majesty with congratulations on the same ; when the recorder made the following speech :

" Most gracious Sovereign,

" We your majesty's loyal subjects, the Lord-
 " mayor and court of aldermen of the city of " London, humbly beg leave to congratulate
 " your majesty on the safe delivery of her royal " highness the princess of Wales ; and the birth

 " of a princess.

" As we are truly sensible of the blessings we " enjoy under your majesty's government, and
 " are convinced that the security of our rights
 " and liberties, in time to come, depend on the " protestant succession established in your illus" trious house ; it is at this time a peculiar satis" faction to us, that we have once more the ho" nour of congratulating your majesty on the in" crease of your royal family.

" And, upon this occasion, permit us, Sir, to " render our most dutiful thanks to your ma" jesty, for a late signal instance of your majesty's
 " paternal care of your people, in the provision
 " made by parliament for the future tranquillity
 " of this kingdom : a provision moving prima" rily from your majesty's goodness, and brought
 " to perfection by your majesty's wisdom. Yet,
 " wise and salutary as it is, we cannot forbear to " express our wishes, that a long continuance
 " of your majesty's life may make it unne" cessary.

" Fixed in these sentiments of duty and grati" tude, our prayers shall always be, that your " majesty may long reign over us ; and that the " throne may be filled by your majesty's descend" ants even to remotest ages."

On the twenty-second of October a cause was heard before the Lord-mayor and court of aldermen about laying open the port of London for bringing in foreign oats, pursuant to a statute 1.
 James II. empowering that court in April and October to determine the common market prices of middling English corn, by the oaths of two substantial persons of Middlesex and Surry, being neither merchants, cornfactors, mealmen, nor factors for importing corn, nor interested in the corn, and each having a freehold estate of 20l. or a leasehold estate of 50l. per annum ; and by such other ways as to them shall seem fit ; and if the same shall appear to be above sixteen shillings a quarter, they are to certify the same with two such oaths annexed, to the commissioners of the customs, to be hung up in the custom-house.
 The persons that made the application were several masters of livery stables, and inn-keepers, and their opponents were the cornfactors. After a hearing which lasted ten hours, it was decided for the cornfactors, five aldermen being for laying open the port, and five, with the Lord-mayor, who threw in his casting vote against it.

On the twenty-fifth the court at Guildhall, after a hearing of several hours, allowed the journeymen tailors two shillings and sixpence per day for the summer half year, and two shillings for the winter half year, and three half-pence for strong beer, to work from six o'clock in the morning till seven in the evening, which is an hour less than is prescribed by act of parliament.

On the twenty-sixth his majesty granted his royal charter for incorporating several of his loving subjects therein named, by the name of the society of antiquaries of London. And at a meeting of the said society on the twelfth of December their newly granted royal charter of incorporation

ration was read, and several other deeds drawn and signed by the president, vice-presidents, and council, and a committee appointed to inspect their former rules and orders, and to draw up such by-laws as might be necessary to perpetuate the society for ages to come: at the same time the archbishop of Canterbury and the lord chancellor were admitted members.

This is the year in which the royal assent was given to the memorable act of the British legislature, for regulating the commencement of the year, and for correcting the kalendar now in use; that is, for abolishing the old and establishing the new-style, which was already in use in most other parts of Christendom. It took place the day following, the second of September 1752, which instead of being called the third was dated the fourteenth. This act was modelled with great skill and learning, by the earl of Macclesfield, and has been productive of many excellent consequences; in particular, the correspondence between the English and foreign merchants, has been and will be greatly facilitated, with respect to the dates of letters and accounts.

The year 1752 was introduced by a violent storm of wind which happened on the fifteenth of March. It blew down a great number of chimnies; and in some places the roofs of the houses were so beat in, that many persons were killed, and others greatly bruised and wounded. The head of Levi, and the feet of Abraham, in the curiously painted window in Westminster-abbey, were blown out, windows were greatly damaged in many places, and in St. James's-park, and the villages about this metropolis, great numbers of trees were torn up by the roots. The ships in the river were driven from their moorings, lighters and wherries sunk, and many lives lost.

About seven o'clock in the evening, on the twentieth of March, three of the prisoners under sentence of death in Newgate, and ordered for execution, viz. Hayes, Agnew, and Broughton, (who had found means to saw off their irons) attacked Mr. Sinclair the turnkey when he went to lock them up in the cells, and stabbed him in several parts of the belly in so desperate a manner, that there were no hopes of his recovery. After which two of them stripped Derby (who was confined there for robbing the mail) of his cloaths when one put on his great coat, and the other his close bodied-coat, and insisted on Sinclair's calling to Wood, the other turnkey, to open the door to let the two gentlemen out; but, upon hearing a struggle, he began to suspect something more than ordinary, and made an alarm; when the prisoners ran to secure Derby, whom they suspected of betraying them; and Agnew, whose post it was to keep the door, upon hearing a struggle between his confederates and two assistant turnkeys, who were with Sinclair at the first onset, and whom they had hauled into the cells) forgot his charge of door-keeper, and ran to their assistance, when Derby immediately shut the cell door and bolted it on the outside, which fastened them altogether in the cell. Mr. Akerman, the keeper, immediately applied to the sheriffs, and a guard was presently had from the tilt-yard. The Lord-mayor, Sir William Calvert, alderman Gascoigne, and several other gentlemen, came soon after; and the guard was reinforced with another from the Tower. The fellows being quite desperate, his lordship waited on the duke of Newcastle, and got an order to fire on them, in case they refused to surrender. However, upon being surrounded in their cells, and having a parly with his lordship through the cell doors, they surrendered, and were immediately, with the rest of the prisoners, double ironed and handcuffed.

On the fourth of June Thomas Winterbottom, Lord-mayor of London, died in his mayoralty, and was succeeded by Robert Alfop, esq;

The honourable Sir Peter Warren, knight of the Bath, vice-admiral of the red, and member of parliament for the city of Westminster, having been presented with the freedom of the city of London for the signal services he had done his country in the late war, and made free of the company of Goldsmiths, was put in nomination to succeed the late Lord-mayor as alderman of Billingsgate-ward. An honour which Sir Peter declined; but at the same time sent the common-council of Billingsgate 200l. one to be distributed amongst the poor of the said ward, and the other to be at the disposal of the inhabitants. The deputy and common-council waited on him again, hoping to prevail with the admiral to accept that office. He received them with great politeness, but said it was incompatible with the duty he owed to his king and country as a naval officer. The inhabitants, however, did, elect him; and on the twenty-third of June Sir Peter sent a message to the court of aldermen, desiring to be excused from serving the office of an aldermen, to which he had been elected, and paid his fine of five hundred pounds for that purpose. He was succeeded by William Beckford esq;

About one o'clock in the morning, on the twenty-seventh of June, a fire broke out at No. 10. in Lincoln's-inn New-square; and, for want of water, in a short time, that and the next building were entirely consumed. The honourable Charles Yorke and Mr. Hoskyns who lay up one pair of stairs in No. 10, were both asleep, and escaped in their breeches and shirts at the most imminent hazard of their lives. All their papers, books, plate, furniture, and wearing-apparel were entirely destroyed, as were those in the other chambers under the same roof. Mr. Pickering, clerk to Mr. Wilbraham lost upwards of 1100l. in money and bank notes of his own, and other persons, and securities for 30,000l. more.

On the twenty-second of November the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council waited on his majesty at St. James's, with their congratulatory address on his safe return from Germany; when his majesty was pleased to confer the honour of knighthood on the Lord-mayor, sheriffs, recorder and chamberlain.

About this time an act of parliament passed for the better preventing of thefts and robberies, and for regulating places of public entertainment, and punishing persons keeping disorderly houses in London or Westminster, or within twenty miles thereof. In which it was enacted, "That as the " multitude

“ multitude of places of entertainment for the “ lower sort of people is another great cause of “ thefts and robberies, as they are thereby “ tempted to spend their small substance, and so “ put upon unlawful methods of supplying their “ wants and renewing their pleasures; in order to “ prevent such thefts, and to correct the habit
 “ of idleness, from the first of December 1752,
 “ any house, room, garden, &c. kept for pub“ lic dancing, music, or other public entertain“ ment, in London or Westminster, or within “ twenty miles thereof, without a licence from
 “ the last preceding Michaelmas quarter sessions, “ under the hands and seals of four or more of “ the justices, who are hereby empowered to “ grant licences, shall be deemed a disorderly “ house or place, and every such licence to be “ signed and sealed in open court, and not at any “ adjourned sessions, and publickly read by the “ clerk, together with the justices names sub“ scribing the same, without any fee or reward
 “ for such licence. And any constable or other “ person thereto authorized, by warrant from one
 “ or more of the justices of peace, may enter
 “ such house or place, and seize every person “ found there, to be dealt with according to law:
 “ and every person who keeps such house, &c.
 “ without licence, shall forfeit 100l. to such as “ will sue for it, and be otherwise punishable, as “ in cases of disorderly houses. And over the “ door or entrance of such house, &c. so li“ censed, shall be the following inscription in “ capital letters, Licensed pursuant to act of par“ liament of the twenty-fifth of king George the “ second. And no such house, &c. shall be “ opened before five in the afternoon. The in“ scription, and restriction as to the time, shall “ be made conditions of every such licence; and “ in case of breach of either, such licence shall “ be forfeited and revoked at the next general or “ quarter sessions, and shall not be renewed to
 “ the same person; always excepting the theatres
 “ of Drury-lane, Covent-garden, and the Hay-“ market, or any other licensed by the crown or “ lord chamberlain.

“ And to encourage prosecutions against persons “ who keep bawdy-houses, gaming-houses, or “ other disorderly houses, upon any two inhabi“ tants, who pay scot and lot, giving notice in “ writing, to a constable or other peace officer,
 “ of any person keeping such disorderly house, the “ constable shall go with such inhabitants to a “ justice of peace, and upon such inhabitants

“ making oath that such notice they believe to be “ true, and entering into a 20l. recognizance to “ produce material evidence against such person
 “ so offending, and the constable into a thirty “ pound recognizance, to prosecute such person
 “ at the next sessions, or next assizes; and such “ constable to be allowed all the reasonable ex-“ pences of such prosecution, to be ascertained
 “ by two justices of the peace, and paid by the “ overseers of the poor; and, upon conviction,
 “ each of the inhabitants to be paid, forthwith,
 “ by the overseers, ten pounds each, on penalty
 “ of forfeiting double the sum.

“ Upon this the justice is to make out a war“ rant to bring the person so accused before him,
 “ and bind him or her over to appear at the ses“ sions, or assizes, and in the mean time take se“ curity for such person's good behaviour.

“ Upon the constable's neglect in any of the “ above particulars, he is to forfeit 20l.

“ And as it is difficult to prove who is the real “ owner or keeper of such bawdy house, &c.
 “ any person who acts as master or mistress shall “ be deemed the keeper thereof, though he, or “ she, shall not, in fact, be so. And any person
 “ may give evidence for or against the defendant, “ though he or she be an inhabitant. And such “ indictment shall be finally determined at the “ sessions or assizes, and not removed by certiorari
 “ to any other court.”

One miss Blandy was executed this year for poisoning her father, an eminent attorney at Henley upon Thames. And one miss Jefferies, a young woman, with Swan, her lover, were executed for murdering her uncle, a wealthy tradesman, who had retired from business, and with whom she had lived for a considerable time. A large mob assembled at Tring in Hertfordshire, and seizing an old woman and her husband, under the notion of their having commerce with the devil, treated them with such inhumanity, by ducking and beating them, that the woman died on the spot, and the man with difficulty escaped with his life; for which murder one Colley, a chimneysweeper, was executed. Two felons, Welsh and Jones, were discovered to be the perpetrators of a rape and murder for which one Coleman, a brewer's clerk, had unjustly suffered. Those wretches were present at Coleman's execution, heard the declaration of his innocence, and drew the cart from under him. Both of them were hanged, confessing the crime.

CHAPTER XLIV.

The case of Elizabeth Canning. Act of parliament for purchasing Sir Hans Sloane's curiosities. Description of the British museum. Execution and behaviour of doctor Archibald Cameron. Act of parliament for naturalizing Jews. Edward Ironside, Esq; dies in his mayoralty, and is succeeded by Thomas Rawlinson, Esq; Act for relief of constables. Motion for a new bridge over the river Thames between those of London and Westminster. Mr. Dance's plan and estimate for a new bridge. Election of members of parliament for the city of London. Mr. Holland's verdict against the toll-gatherers in Smithfield.

THE year 1753 was introduced by an event of so extraordinary a nature, that (though little connected with history, yet) it might be thought unpardonable in us entirely to omit it. We shall, therefore, proceed to relate it in as concise a manner as possible.

A young woman, whose name was Elizabeth Canning, pretended that, on the first day of January, as she was coming home at night, she was met under Bedlam-wall by two men, who pulled off her gown, cap, and apron; and having secured her mouth with a gag, threatened to kill her if she made the least noise: that they dragged her along to the house of one Wells near Enfield Wash, where a woman robbed her of her stays: that she was then forced into a cold, damp room, where she was confined for a month without any other sustenance than a few stale crusts of bread, and about a gallon of water: that all these hardships were imposed upon her in order to make her turn prostitute: that nevertheless, she was enabled to preserve her virtue: and that having, at last, found means to make her escape through a window, on the twenty-ninth of the month, she ran home almost naked to her mother, who lived near Moorgate.

Notwithstanding the improbability of this story, yet it so powerfully operated on the passions of the common people, especially the enthusiasts of all denominations, that large subscriptions were raised for prosecuting the supposed delinquents. Accordingly, warrants were immediately issued for apprehending Wells, mistress of the house at Enfield Wash, the maid servant, whose name was Virtue Hall, and one Squires, an old gipsy woman, whom Canning charged with having robbed her of her stays.

No evidence appearing to convict Wells of the felony, she was punished as a bawd. Hall, being intimidated by the justice who examined her, turned evidence for Canning, and Squires was convicted of the robbery, although she produced undoubted evidence to prove that she was at Abbotsbury in Dorsetshire that very night in which the felony was said to have been committed; and during the course of the trial, Canning and her witnesses contradicted themselves in many particulars.

The prepossession of the common people, however, in favour of Canning was so great, that the most clear falsehoods, advanced by her and her adherents, were admitted as unquestionable truths; while the witnesses for Squires were so over-awed by the rabble, that they durst not enter the court; and those who had resolution enough to give evidence in her behalf, were insulted in such a manner, that even their lives were sometimes in danger.

Sir Crispe Gascoigne, who was at this time Lord-mayor of London, conducted himself in this affair with the greatest justice and impartiality. Considering the improbability of the charge, the heat, passion, and furious zeal with which it was prosecuted; and being convinced of the old woman's innocence by a great number of affidavits, voluntarily sent up from the country by persons of undoubted veracity, he, in conjunction with some other worthy citizens, determined to oppose the torrent of popular prejudice. Application was made to the throne for mercy. The affair was referred to the attorney and solicitor-general, who, having examined the witnesses on both sides, made their report in favour of Squires, who was first respited, and afterwards received his majesty's free pardon.

A bill of indictment was preferred by the Lord-mayor against Elizabeth Canning for perjury. Her friends did the like against the witnesses from Abbotsbury in favour of Squires. The Abbotsbury people appeared; but no evidence coming against them, they were acquitted. Canning, being admitted to bail, at first absconded, but afterwards surrendered to take her trial, which continued by adjournment five days; when she was convicted of perjury, and committed to Newgate.

When Canning was brought up to the Old Bailey to receive sentence, her council moved for a new trial, on the affidavit of two jurymen, who swore, that what they had done was contrary to their consciences; for though they believed her guilty of perjury, they did not believe her guilty of wilful and corrupt perjury. The argument of which point, in arrest of judgment, was put off till next sessions; and Canning remained in Newgate till the thirtieth of May following, when, five judges on the bench, it was adjudged that the verdict was a good one, and perfectly agreeable to the evidence. After which the court passed judgment, that she should suffer one month's

Engraved for Chamberlains History of London

VIEW of the BRITISH MUSEUM.

VIEW of BEDFORD HOUSE.

month's imprisonment, and then be transported to America for seven years. Her friends, however, stuck so close to her, that they obtained permission for her to transport herself, and she was liberally fitted out with every convenience for her voyage.

The corporation of London were so truly sensible of the rectitude of Sir Crispe Gascoigne's conduct in the above affair, that the court of common-council, at the expiration of his mayoralty, in their thanks presented to him, had the following expression: "That the thanks of this court be given to the right honourable Sir Crispe Gascoigne, kn't. late Lord-mayor, for his steady perseverance in the cause of justice, his generous protection of the distressed, and his remarkable humanity."

About this time an act of parliament passed for the purchase of the Museum or collection of Sir Hans Sloane, (who died the eleventh of January 1753) and of the Harleian collection of manuscripts, and for providing one general repository for the better reception and more convenient use of the said collections, and of the Cottonian library and the additions thereto. By which act twenty thousand pounds was paid to Sir Hans Sloane's executors for his collection, and ten thousand pounds to the trustees of the earl and countess of Oxford and Mortimer for the Harleian collection. And it was enacted, that the said collections, together with the Cottonian library and its additions, should be repositied in one place, to be erected or purchased for that purpose by the trustees therein mentioned; and that the collection of Sir Hans Sloane, in all its branches, should be kept and preserved together in the general repository whole and entire, and with proper marks of distinction; and that the Harleian collection of manuscripts shall be kept together in the said repository, as an addition to the Cottonian library. And the said trustees were made a body corporate, with power to make statutes, rules and ordinances; to choose librarians, officers and servants, and to appoint salaries: upon this special trust and confidence, "that a free access to the said general repository, and to the collections therein contained, shall be given to all studious and curious persons, at such times and in such manner, and under such regulations, for inspecting and consulting the said collections, as by the said trustees, or the major part of them, in any general meeting assembled, shall be limited for that purpose." And it was farther enacted, that there should be raised 300,000*l.* by way of lottery, to satisfy and discharge the several sums necessary for the purposes of this act: 30,000*l.* of which to be put out at interest in the public funds, towards paying of officers salaries, and other necessary expences.

Soon after the passing of this act it very fortunately happened that, while the trustees were at a loss where to purchase or build a proper repository, an offer was made them of Montague-house, in Great Russel-street, Bloomsbury; which being readily accepted of, the same was purchased for 10,000*l.* The repairs of which, together with alterations, book-cases, cabinets, and other conveniences for placing the whole collection properly, and the making apartments for the officers, cost 15000*l.* more. And every part is now so excellently contrived for holding this noble collection, and the disposition of it in the several rooms is so orderly and well designed, that the British Museum may justly be esteemed an honour and ornament to the English nation. The contents of which we shall in this place give a particular account.

Description of the curiosities in the British Museum.

Before we begin to describe the different departments in this spacious building, it may not be improper to inform the reader of the method to obtain admittance.

If any number, not exceeding fifteen, are inclined to see it, they must send a list of their christian and surnames, and places of abode, to the Porter's-lodge, in order to their being entered in the book; in a few days the respective tickets will be made out, specifying the day and hour in which they are to come, which, on being sent for are delivered. The fewer names there are on a list, the sooner they are likely to be admitted to see it.

In the British Museum are three departments. The first is of manuscripts, medals and coins; the second of natural and artificial productions; and the third consists of printed books; exclusive of many articles in the hall, in the first room above stairs, and other places.

In the hall you will first take notice of seven blocks of very hard marble, of an hexangular form, which were brought from the Giant's causeway near Coleraine in Ireland. And next to them is a stone brought from the Appian road, which led from Rome to Brundisium.

Two fragments of Granite columns; some curious pebbles, and two antique heads called Termini, which were used by the Romans as landmarks.

A large piece of serpentine marble: it was called Ophites, from its resemblance to a serpent's skin. It has a dusky brown ground, streaked with green and pale yellow.

A beautiful large cubic piece of lava, issued from Mount Vesuvius.

In another part is a painted genealogical tree of a noble Venetian family.

A skeleton of a unicorn fish.

The head of a very particular kind of buffalo, which instead of hair, is covered with long wool.

The paintings on the side of the staircase represent Cæsar and his military retinue, the chiefs of the provinces he had in part subdued attending on him, and others on their knees, imploring his protection and assistance.

In a compartment are the feasts and sacrifices of Bacchus.

In another, the rivers Nile and Tiber are represented by gigantic figures emblematically ornamented: and there are views of emblematical landscapes at a distance, and several fine pieces of architecture.

On the ceiling is represented the story of Phaeton;

R r r

ton;

ton: the gods are assembled, and the youth appears asking Phœbus to permit him to drive his chariot for a day; he consents, and in another part is seen conducting him to the chariot: Diana is near them, and Juno is attended by Iris.

Farther on, Phaeton, with all the ardour of youth, is driving the sun's chariot, accompanied by the hours in the form of women. Time is represented by Saturn, Eternity by a woman holding a serpent, and Cybele, or the goddess of the earth, appears also.

On a pedestal, as you go up stairs, is the busto of Sir Hans Sloane.

In the first room, the story of Phaeton is completed on the ceiling. The gods are assembled, and whilst Jupiter is casting his thunder bolts at Phaeton falling from the chariot, you see Saturn, Apollo, Mars, Neptune, Juno, Diana, Venus, Cupid, Mercury, Minerva, and Bacchus, in various attitudes, and agitated by different passions.

The portraits of many illustrious personages hang up in the several departments of this Museum; they are all presents, and continually increasing in number.

This room is set apart for the immediate reception of presents: it contains

An Egyptian mummy, which is deposited in a glass-case, in one corner of the room, as its coffin is in the other. The face of the mummy is covered with a gilded mask; near its feet is a skull, and several bones, viz. feet and hands, taken from a broken mummy. Over its head are some small earthen idols. Over the coffin is a square case, in which the Egyptians placed some utensils belonging to the deceased, and deposited it near the body: as also two models of a mummy, one of which they put near the coffin at the head, the other at the feet.

Over the mummy is an urn of the Ibis, and several Egyptian idols in bronze. We shall first mention Osiris: it is the figure of a man, the body in the shape of a mummy, with a three cornered cap on its head, a whip in one hand, and a lituus (a staff not unlike a crozier) in the other. Isis is figured by a woman, with the infant Orus in her lap. Orus, or Harpocrates, their son, is the figure of a young man, holding the fore-finger of his left hand on his lips, to enforce silence as the greatest mark of prudence, and a reverential awe for the divinity.

In this room are some natural productions; as several large corals, a substance produced in the sea, but in what manner is not yet determined by the naturalists.

Here are likewise various species of corals; and in one of the repositories is a curious large brainstone, which is of the nature of coral.

In one of the cabinets is a wasp's nest, which is very curious; and in spirits you see a vulture's head, some serpents, birds, spiders, lizards, and other articles; but what must attract particular notice, is a fine young flamingo stuffed.

Here is a fine jay, brought from the East-Indies, and the back-bone of an elephant petrified.

The saloon is finely ornamented with fresco paintings, consisting of architecture, stair cases, flowers, statues, and other things properly arranged.

The dome is supported by several atlantes, and on it is represented a council of the heathen gods.

In the different compartments, The giants are turned out of heaven. Mercury is seen ready to receive his orders, as messenger of the gods. In another appears Ceres and Neptune, Pan and Amphitrite.

Phaeton is represented driving the chariot of Phœbus, preceded by Aurora, and properly attended by the hours.

On a table in this room is a fine model of Laocoon and his two sons, encircled with serpents, as described by Virgil.

The saloon is for the reception of company that happen to come before the hour mentioned in their tickets.

Having viewed the articles already mentioned, the first department consists of a collection of manuscripts, medals, and coins.

The first room contains two several collections of manuscripts.

Bibliotheca Regia MSS. These manuscripts are in number upwards of two thousand volumes.

There are in this collection some very ancient copies of the holy scriptures, and translations of them into many different Oriental and other languages.

Some old and curious manuscripts, treating on the subject of religion, and of the different confessions of faith, in various languages.

Many large volumes of history, finely wrote, and ornamented in a most elegant manner with paintings.

A great number of manuscripts relating to the history and government of the church, and other curious subjects.

Bibliotheca Cottoniana MSS. In this room is likewise contained the Cottonian collection of manuscripts; it is ancient and noble, consisting of original charters, deeds, and evidences of facts.

There are many ancient copies of several parts of the bible.

But what is more particularly to be admired, is an original of that great bulwark of our liberties, the Magna Charta.

Bibliotheca Harleiana MSS. These are a part of the Harleian manuscripts. The room we are now treating of, contains many curious copies of the bible, and the different parts of it, in a variety of languages. Some original manuscripts, treating of divinity and ecclesiastical matters; alcorans, and other Turkish books; and a Thorah, the five books of Moles, finely wrote in Hebrew on a vellum roll.

In this room is a series of English medals, beginning with William Rufus, and reaching down to the present times.

